The Mandan and other Siouan tribes dance in an elaborate ceremony, called the Buffalo dance, to bring game when food is scarce, in accordance with a well-defined ritual. In like manner the Indians of the arid region of the S. W. perform long and intricate ceremonies with the accompaniment of the dance ceremonies which, in the main, are invocations or prayers for rain and bountiful harvests and the creation of life. Among the Iroquois, in the so-called green-corn dance, the shamans urge the people to participate in order to show gratitude for bountiful harvests, the preservation of their lives, and appreciation of the blessings of the expiring year. The ghost dance, the snake dance, the sun dance, the scalp dance, and the calumet dance (q. v.), each performed for one or more purposes, are not developments from the dance, but rather the dance has become only a part of the ritual of each of these important observances, which by metonymy have been called by the name of only a small but conspicuous part or element of the entire ceremony.

Davis, John. A full-blood Creek, born in the "Old Nation." In the War of 1812, when a boy, he was taken prisoner, and was reared by a white man. He emigrated from Alabama in 1829, and was educated at the Union Mission after reaching Indian Territory. He had good talents, and in early manhood became a valuable helper to the missionaries as interpreter and speaker in public meetings. He was an active worker in 1830, and died about 10 years later. Two daughters survive him, who were educated in the Presbyterian boarding school, one of whom, Susan, wife of John McIntosh, rendered important service to Mrs A. E. W. Robertson in her Creek translations. Davis was joint author with J. Lykens in translating the Gospel of John into Creek, published at the Shawanoe Baptist Mission, Ind. Ter., in 1835, and was also a collaborator with R. M. Loughridge, D. Winslett, and W. S. Robertson in the translation into Creek of two volumes of hymns.—Pilling, Bibliog. Muskhogean Lang., Bull. Daycao. A territory that lay 10 days' journey beyond the extreme westerly point reached by Moscoso, of De Soto's expedition, in 1542. The name was strictly that of a stream, possibly Trinity r., Texas, and is spoken of also as if designating an Indian "province." See Gentl. of Elvas in Hakluyt Soc. Publ., ix, 138-140, 1851.

Dayoitgao ('there where it issues'). A former Seneca village situated at Squakie hill, on Genesee r., near Mt Morris, N. Y. It received the name Squawkiehah from the fact that 700 Fox (Muskwaki) captives were settled there by the Iroquois in 1681-83. The site was sold by the Seneca in 1825 and relinquished by them in 1827.

Deadoses. A small Texan tribe which in the 18th century lived with other tribes on San Xavier r., probably the San Miguel, which joins Little r. and flows into the Brazos about 150 m. from the gulf. In 1767-68 they were said to reside between Navasota and Trinity rs., and in 1771 were mentioned with the Tonkawa, Comanche, Towash (Wichita), and others as northern Texas tribes in contradistinction to the Cocos (Coaque), Karankawa, and others of the coast region. If the Mayeyes were really related to the Tonkawa, as has been asserted, the fact that this tribe is mentioned with them may indicate that the language of the Deadoses resembled that of the Tonkawa. They may have been swept away by the epidemic that raged among the Indians of Texas in 1777-78.

Dekanawida ('two river-currents flowing together.'—Hewitt). An Iroquois prophet, statesman, and lawgiver, who lived probably during the second and third quarters of the 15th century, and who, conjointly with Hiawatha, planned and founded the historical confederation of the five Iroquois tribes. According to a circumstantial tradition, he was born in the vicinity of Kingston, Ontario, Canada, in what then was probably Huron territory. He was reputed to have been one of 7 brothers. Definite tradition gives him rank with the demigods, owing to the masterful orenda or magic power with which he worked tirelessly to overcome the obstacles and difficulties of his task, the astuteness he displayed in negotiation, and the wisdom he exhibited in framing the laws and in establishing the fundamental principles on which they were based and on which rested the entire structure of the Iroquois confederation. Omens foreshadowed his birth, and portents accompanying this event revealed the fact to his virgin mother that Dekanawida would be the source of evil to her people, referring to the destruction of the Huron confederation by that of the Iroquois. Hence at his birth his mother and grandmother, with true womanly patriotism, sought to spare their country woes by attempting to drown the new-born infant by thrusting it through a hole made in the ice covering a neighboring river. Three attempts were made, but in the morning after each attempt the young Dekanawida was found unharmed in the arms of the astonished mother. Thereupon the two women decided that it was decreed that he should live, and so resolved to rear him. Rapidly he grew to man's estate, and then, saying that he must take up his foreordained work, departed southward, first assuring his mother that in the event of his death by violence or sorcery, the otter skin flayed entire which, with the head downward, he had hung in a corner of the lodge, would vomit blood. Dekanawida was probably a Huron by blood, but perhaps an Iroquois by adoption. In the long and tedious negotiations preceding the final establishment of the historical confederation of the five Iroquois tribes, he endeavored to persuade the Erie and the Neuter tribes also to join the confederation; these tribes, so far as known, were always friendly with the Huron people, and their representatives probably knew of Dekanawida's Huron extraction. Many of the constitutional principles, laws, and regulations of the confederation are attributed to him. His chieftanship did not belong to the hereditary class, but to the merit class, commonly styled the 'pine-tree chiefs.' Hence, he could forbid the appointment of a successor to his office, and could exclaim, "To others let there be successors, for like them they can advise you. I have established your commonwealth, and none has done what I have." But it is probable that prohibition was attributed to him in later times when the true nature of the merit chiefs had become obscured. Hence it is the peculiar honor of the merit chiefs of to-day not to be condoled officially after death, nor to have successors to their chieftaincies. For these reasons the title Dekanawida does not belong to the roll of 50 federal league chieftships. (J. N. B. H.)

Dekanisora. An Onondaga chief who came into prominence in the latter part of the 17th century, chiefly through his oratorical powers and his efforts to maintain peace with both the French and the English. He was first mentioned by Charlevoix in 1682 as a member of an embassy from the Iroquois to the French at Montreal. He was also one of the embassy to the French in 1688, which was captured by Adario (Le Rat), and then released by the wily captor under the plea that there had been a mistake, blaming the French for the purpose of widening the breach between them and the Iroquois. Colden (Hist. Five Nat., i, 165, 1755) says Dekanisora was tall and well made, and that he "had for many years the greatest reputation among the Five Nations for speaking, and was generally employed as their speaker in their negotiations with both French and English." His death is supposed to have occurred about 1730, as he was a very old man

Dekanogah ('between the rapids,'—Hewitt). A village, inhabited by Seneca, Naticoke, Conoy, and remnants of other tribes, placed by Gov. Evans (Day, Penn., 391, 1843) in 1707 on Susquehanna r., about 9 m. from Pequehan, the Shawnee village on the E. side of the Susquehanna, just below Conestoga cr., in Lancaster co., Pa.

Dekaury, Choukeka. A chief, eldest of the Winnebago, born about 1730. He was the son of Sabrevoir De Carrie, an officer of the French army in 1699, and Hopoekaw, daughter of a principal Winnebago chief, whom he married in 1729, spoken of by Carver (Travels, 20, 1796) as the queen of the Winnebago. Their son, Choukeka ('Spoon'), was known to the whites as Spoon Dekaury. After having been made chief he became the leader of attacks on the Chippewa during a war with the Winnebago, but he maintained friendly relations with the whites. It was principally through his influence that the treaty of June 3, 1816, at St Louis, Mo., was brought about. He died at Portage, Wis., in the same year, leaving 6 sons and 5 daughters.

Dekaury, Konoka. The eldest son and successor of Choukeka Dekaury, born in 1747. He was named Konoka ('Eldest') Dekaury, and is often mentioned as "Old Dekaury," but is equally well known as Schachipkaka. Before his father's death, in 1816, Konoka had joined a band of Winnebago who took part, in 1813, in the attack led by Proctor on Ft Stephenson, on lower Sandusky r., Ohio, which was gallantly defended by Maj. George Croghan. He fought also in the battle of the Thames, in Canada. He was held for a time, in 1827, as a hostage at Prairie du Chien for the delivery of Red Bird. His band usually encamped at the portage of Wisconsin r., the site of the present Portage, Wis. Mrs. Kinzie (Wau-Bun, 89, 1856) describes him as "the most noble, dignified, and venerable of his own or indeed of any other tribe," having a fine Roman countenance, his head bald except for a solitary tuft of long, silvery hair neatly tied and falling back on his shoulders, and exhibiting a demeanor always courteous, while his dress was always neat and unostentatious. An unpleasant peculiarity of his face was an immense hanging under lip. He signed the treaty of Prairie du Chien Aug. 19, 1825, on behalf of the Winnebago, and died on Wisconsin r. Apr. 20, 1836.

Other members of the family, whose name has been variously written DeKaury, DeKauray, DayKauray, Day Korah, Dacorah, and DeCorrah, were noted. From Choukeka's daughters, who married white men, are descended several well-known families of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Delaware. A confederacy, formerly the most important of the Algonquian stock, occupying the entire basin of Delaware r. in E. Pennsylvania and S. E. New York, together with most of New Jersey and Delaware. They called themselves Lenápe or Leni-lenápe, equivalent to 'real men,' or 'native, genuine men'; the English knew them as Delawares, from the name of their principal river; the French called them Loupe, 'wolves,' a term probably applied originally to the Mahican on Hudson r., afterward extended to the Munsee division and to the whole group. — To the more remote Algonquian tribes they, together with all their cognate tribes along the coast far up into New England, were known as Wapanachki, 'easterners,' or 'eastern land people,' a term which appears also as a specific tribal designation in the form of Abnaki. By virtue of admitted priority of political rank and of occupying the central home territory, from which most of the cognate tribes had diverged, they were accorded by all the Algonquian tribes the respectful title of "grandfather," a recognition accorded by courtesy also by the Huron. The Nanticoke, Conoy, Shawnee, and Mahican claimed close connection with the Delawares and preserved the tradition of a common origin.

The Lenápe, or Delawares proper, were composed of 3 principal tribes, treated by Morgan as phratries, viz: Munsee, Unami, and Unalachtigo (q. v.), besides which some of the New Jersey bands may have constituted a fourth. Each of these had its own territory and dialect, with more or less separate identity, the Munsee particularly being so far differentiated as frequently to be considered an independent people.

The early traditional history of the Lenápe is contained in their national legend, the Walam Olum (q. v.). When they made their first treaty with Penn., in 1682, the Delawares had their council fire at Shackamaxon, about the present Germantown, suburb of Philadelphia, and under various local names occupied the whole country along the river. To this early period belongs their great chief, Tamenend, from whom the Tammany Society takes its name. The different bands frequently acted separately but regarded themselves as part of one great body. About the year 1720 the Iroquois assumed dominion over them, forbidding them to make war or sales of lands, a condition which lasted until about the opening of the French and Indian war. As the whites, under the sanction of the Iroquois, crowded them out of their ancient homes, the Delawares removed to the Susquehanna, settling at Wyoming and other points about 1742. They soon crossed the mountains to the headwaters of the Allegheny, the first of them having settled upon that stream in 1724. In 1751, by invitation of the Huron, they began to form settlements in E. Ohio, and in a few years the greater part of the Delawares were fixed upon the Muskingum and other streams in E. Ohio, together with the Munsee and Mahican, who had accompanied them from the E., being driven out by the same pressure and afterward consolidating with them. The Delawares, being now within reach of the French and backed by the western tribes, asserted their independence of the Iroquois, and in the subsequent wars up to the treaty of Greenville in 1795 showed themselves the most determined opponents of the advancing whites. The work of the devoted Moravian missionaries in the 17th and 18th centuries forms an important part of the history of these tribes (see Gnadenhuetten, Missions). About the year 1770 the Delawares received permission from the Miami and Piankishaw to occupy the country between the Ohio and White rs., in Indiana, where at one time they had 6 villages. In 1789, by permission of the Spanish government, a part of them removed to Missouri, and afterward to Arkansas, together with a band of Shawnee. By 1820 the two bands had found their way to Texas, where the Delawares numbered at that time probably at least 700. By the year 1835 most of the tribe had been gathered on a reservation in Kansas, from which they removed, in 1867, to Indian Ter. and incorporated with the Cherokee Nation. Another band is affiliated with the Caddo and Wichita in w. Oklahoma, besides which there are a few scattered remnants in the United States, with several hundred in Canada, under the various names of Delawares, Munsee, and Moravians.

It is impossible to get a definite idea of the numbers of the Delawares at any given period, owing to the fact that they have always been closely connected with other tribes, and have hardly formed one compact body since leaving the Atlantic coast. All the estimates of the last century give them and their connected tribes from about 2,400 to 3,000, while the estimates within the present century are much lower. Their present population, including the Munsee, is about 1,900, distributed as follows: Incorporated with Cherokee Nation, Ind. T., 870; Wichita res., Oklahoma, 95; Munsee, with Stockbridges, in Wisconsin, perhaps 280; Munsee, with Chippewa, in Kansas, perhaps 45; "Moravians of the Thames," Ontario, 347; "Munsees of the Thames," Ontario, 122, with Six Nations on Grand r., Ontario, 150.

According to Morgan (Anc. Soc., 171, 1877) the Delawares have 3 clans (called by him gentes), or phratries, divided into 34 subclans, not including 2 subclans now extinct. These clans, which are the same among the Munsee and Mahican, are: (1) Took-seat ('round paw,' 'wolf'). (2) Pokekooungo ('crawling,' 'turtle'). (3) Pullaook ('non-chewing,' 'turkey'). These clans—Wolf, Turtle, and Turkey—are commonly given as synonymous with Munsee, Unami, and Unalachtigo, the 3 divisions of the Delawares, exclusive of the New Jersey branch. According to Brinton they are not clans, but mere totemic emblems of the 3 geographic divisions above named. Of these the Unami held the hereditary chieftainship. The New Jersey branch probably formed a fourth division, but those bands broke up at an early period and became incorporated with the others. Many of them had originally removed from the w. bank of Delaware r. to escape the inroads of the Conestoga. The 3 clans as given by Morgan are treated under the better known geographic names.

The Took-seat, or Wolf clan, has the following 12 subdivisions: (1) Maangreet (big feet); (2) Weesowhetko (yellow tree); (3) Pasakunamon (pulling corn); (4) Weyarnihkato (care enterer, i. e. cave enterer?); (5) Tooshwarkama (across the river); (6) Olumane (vermilion); (7)

Punaryou (dog standing by fireside); (8) Kwineekcha (long body); (9) Moonhartarne (digging); (10) Nonharmin (pulling up stream); (11) Longushharkarto (brush log); (12) Mawsootoh (bringing along).

The Pokekooungo, or Turtle clan, has the following 10 subdivisions, 2 others being extinct: (1) Okahoki (ruler); (2) Ta-koongoto (high bank shore); (3) Seeharongoto (drawing down hill); (4) Oleharkarmekarto (elector); (5) Maharolukti (brave); (6) Tooshkipakwisi (green leaves); (7) Tungulungsi (smallest turtle); (8) Welunungsi (little turtle); (9) Lee-kwinai (snapping turtle); (10) Kwissee-keesto (deer).

The Pullaook, or Turkey clan, has the following 12 subdivisions: (1) Moharala (big bird); (2) Lelewayou (bird's cry); (3) Mookkwungwahoki (eye pain); (4) Mooharmowikarnu (scratch the path); (5) Opinghoki (opossum ground); (6) Muhhowekaken (old shin); (7) Tongonaoto (drift log); (8) Noolamarlarmo (living in water); (9) Muhkrentharne (root digger); (10) Muhkarmhukse (red face); (11) Koowahoke (pine region); (12) Oochukham (ground scratcher).

The divisions of the Munsee, according to Ruttenber, were the Minisink, Waoranec, Waranawonkong, Mamekoting, Wawarsink, and Catekill. He names among the Unami division the Navasink, Raritan, Hackensack, Aquackanonk, Tappan, and Haverstraw, all in n. New Jersey, but there were others in Pennsylvania. Among the Unalachtigo divisions in Pennsylvania and Delaware were probably the Neshamini, Shackamaxon, Passayunk, Okahoki, Hickory Indians (?), and Nantuxets. The Gachwechnagechga, or Lehigh Indians, were probably of the Unami division. Among the New Jersey bands not classified are the Yacomanshaghking, Kahansuk, Konekotay, Meletecunk, Matanakons, Eriwonec, Asomoche, Pompton (probably a Munsee division), Rancocas, Tirans, Siconesses (Chiconessex), Sewapoo (perhaps in Delaware), Kechemeche, Mosilian, Axion, Calcefar, Aesunpink, Naraticon, and Manta (perhaps a Munsee division). The Nyack band, or village, in Rockland co., N. Y., may have belonged to the Unami. The Papagonk band and the Wysox probably belonged to the Munsee. See also Munsee, Unami, Unalachtigo.

The following were Delaware villages: Achsinnink, Ahasinus (Unami?), Alamingo, Allaquippa, Alleghany, Anderson's Town, Aquackanonk, Au Glaize, Bald Eagle's Nest, Beaversville, Beavertown, Bethlehem (Moravian), Black Hawk, Black Leg's Village, Buckstown, Bullets Town (?), Cashiehtunk (Munsee?), Catawaweshink(?), Chikohoki (Unalachtigo),

Dashu.—Emmons in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., III, pl. v, 1908. Deou.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Deshuhittan ('people of the house at the end of the road'). A Tlingit clan at Killisnoo, Alaska, belonging to the Raven phratry. Formerly they lived at Angun. Dashiton.—Emmons in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., III, pl. xlii, 1903. De'citan.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904 (contracted form of name). Deou'hlt tian.—Ibid. Deshitän.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 118, 1885.

Desnedekenade ('people of the great river'). A tribe of the Chipewyan group of the Athapaskan family living along the banks of Great Slave r., Athabasca, Canada. There were 122 enumerated at Ft Resolution and 256 at Smith Landing in 1904.

Des-nèdhè-khè-nadhè.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 363, 1891.

Desnedeyaretottine ('people of the great river below'). An Etchareottine division living on the banks of upper Mackenzie r., British America.

Des-nèdhè-yapè-l'Ottinè.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 363, 1891. Gens du Fort Norman.—Petitot, Dict. Dènè-Dindjé, xx, 1876. Tess-cho-tin-nèh.—Ross quoted by Gibbs, MS., B. A. E., 1866. Tel-kha-Gottinè.—Petitot, Autour, op. cit. ('people on the water').

Dest. A former village, probably Timuquanan, in Florida, lat. 28° 30', near a small lake.—Bartram, Voy., I, map, 1790.

Destcaraguetaga. Named by La Salle (Margry, Déc., II, 149, 1877) with the Mahican, Manhattans, Minisink, and others as a New England tribe in 1681. Unidentified.

Destchetinaye ('tree in a spring of water'). A Coyotero band or clan at San Carlos agency, Ariz., in 1881; considered by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890) to be an offshoot of a former clan of which the Tittessenaye also formed part.

Destchin ('red paint'). An Apache band or clan at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881 (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 111, 1890); coordinate with the Chie of the Chiricahua and the Theshchini of the Navaho.

Destchin.—Gatschet, Apache MS., B. A. E., 1883. Dis-chené.—White, Apache Names of Ind. Tribes, MS., B. A. E.

Detsanayuka (Detsánayuka, 'bad campers'). A division of the Comanche, formerly called Nokoni ('wanderers'), but on the death of a chief bearing the latter name their designation was changed. In 1847 they were said to number 1,750, in 250 lodges, evidently a gross exaggeration; in 1869 their number was 312, and in 1872 they were reported at 250. Their present population is unknown, as no official account is now taken of the various Comanche divisions.

(J. M.) Detsánayuka.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1044, 1896. Go-about band.—Sen. Ex. Doc. Y., near Allegheny r. Allegany Village.—Morgan, League Iroq., 466, 1851. Gannanogau.—La Tour, map, 1779. Cold Spring Village.—Brown, West. Gas., 335, 1817. Déanagino.—Morgan, League Iroq., 466, 1851. Déyo-kne-gi-ne.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886. Dennawagau.—Procter (1791) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 152, 1832.

Deyonongdadagana ('two little hills close together'.—Hewitt). An important Seneca village formerly on the w. bank of Genesee r. near Cuylerville, N. Y. The tract was sold by the Indians in 1803.

De-o'-nun-dá-gá-a.—Morgan, League Iroq., 426, 1851. De-yo-nón-dá-dá-gá-i.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886. Little Beard's Town.—Morris deed (1797) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 627, 1832.

Dhatada. One of the four gentes of the Hangashenu subdivision of the Omaha.

The meaning is lost, although Dorsey translates it 'bird.'

Osada.—Dorsey in 31 Rep. B. A. E., 219, 1885; 15th Rep. B. A. E., 226, 1897. Lá-tá-dá.—Morgan, Anc. Soc. 155, 1877.

Dhegiha ('on this side.'—Fletcher). A term employed by J. O. Dorsey to distinguish a group of the Siouan family comprising the Omaha, Ponca, Osage, Kansa, and Quapaw tribes. Dorsey arranged the group in two subdivisions: the Quapaw or Lower Dhegiha, consisting of the Quapaw only; and the Omaha, or Upper Dhegiha, including with the Omaha, the Osage, Kansa, and Ponca. See Chiwere. Degha.—Dorsey in 3d Rep. B. A. E., 211, 1885 (Ponca and Omaha name for themselves). Yegha.—Dorsey, Osage MS., B. A. E., 1888 (name of Osage for themselves). Dé-tá.—Dorsey, Kwapa MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1891 (used by the Quapaw in speaking of themselves). Dhegiha.—Dorsey in Am. Antiq., 168, 1879. Yegha.—Dorsey, Kansas MS., B. A. E., 1883 (name of Kansa for themselves on their own land).

Dhigida. A Ponca gens, divided into the subgentes Sindeagdhe and Wamii-tazhi, according to Dorsey. The meaning of the name is lost.

Dizida.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 228, 1897 (trans. 'bird'). De-a-ghe-ta.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 155, 1877 (trans. 'many people').

Dhia. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871) as a pueblo of New Mexico in 1598. Doubtless situated in the Salinas, in the vicinity of Abo, E. of the Rio Grande, and in all probability a village of the Piro or the Tigua.

Dictionaries. Dictionaries have been made of at least 63 different North American Indian languages belonging to 19 linguistic families, besides many vocabularies of other languages. Of 122 dictionaries mentioned below more than half are still in manuscript.

Beginning with the Eskimaun family, vocabularies of Greenland Eskimo have been supplied by the labors of Egede (1750), Fabricius (1804), Kleinschmidt (1871), Rink (1877), and Kjer and Rasmussen (1893); of Labrador Eskimo, by Erdmann (1864); of Chiglit (Kopagmiut), by Petitot (1876); and there are collections by Pinart of the Aleutian Fox (Unalaskan Aleut) dialect (1871, MS.), and of that of the Kaniagmiut (1871-72, MS.).

In the Athapascan languages there are the dictionaries of Végreville for the Chipewyan (1853-60, MS.), the three-fold dictionary of Petitot for the Montagnais (Chipewyan), Peau de Lièvre (Kawchodinne), and Loucheux (Kutchin) (1876); of Radloff for the Kenai (Knaiakhotana) (1874); of Garrioch (1885) for the Beaver (Tsattine); of Morice for the Tilkotin (1884, MS.); of Matthews (1890, MS.) and Weber (1905, MS.) for the Navaho; and of Goddard for the Hupa (1904, MS.).

Of the languages of the Algonquian family, the Cree has dictionaries by Watkins (1865), Lacombe (1874), and Végreville (ca. 1800, MS.); the Montagnais, by Silvy (ca. 1678, MS.), Favre (1696, MS.), Laure (1726, MS.), and Lemoine (1901); the Algonkin, 3 by anonymous Jesuit fathers (1661, 1662, 1667, all MS.) and 1 each by André (ca. 1688, MS.), Thavenet (ca. 1815, MS.), and Cuq (1886); the Micmac, by Rand (Micmac-English, 1854, MS., and English-Micmac, 1888); the Malecite-Passamaquoddy, by Demillier (ca. 1840, MS.); the Abnaki, by Rasles (1691, first printed in 1833), Aubéry (1712-15, MS.), Lesueur (ca. 1750, MS.), Nudénans (1760, MS.), Mathevet (ca. 1780, MS.), and Vetromile (1855-75, MS.); the Natick Massachuset, by Trumbull (1903); the Delaware, by Ettwein (ca. 1788, MS.), Dencke (ca. 1820, MS.), Henry (1860, MS.), Zeisberger (1887), and Brinton and Anthony (1888); the Ojibwa (Chippewa), by Belcourt (ca. 1840, MS.), Baraga (1853, new ed. 1878-80), Wilson (1874), and Férard (1890, MS.); the Potawatomi, by Bourassa (ca. 1840, MS.) and Gaillard (ca. 1870, MS.); the Ottawa, by Jaunay (ca. 1740, MS.); the Shawnee, by Gatschet (1894, MS.); the Peoria Illinois, by Gravier (ca. 1710, MS.) and Gatschet (1893, MS.); the Miami Illinois, by Le Boulanger (ca. 1720, MS.); the Menominee, by Krake (1882-89, MS.) and Hoffman (1892); the Blackfoot (Siksika), by Lacombe (1882-83, MS.), Tims (1889), and McLean (1890, MS.).

In the Iroquoian languages there are dictionaries of the Huron (Wyandot), by Le Caron (1616-25, MS.), Sagard (1632, repr. 1865), Brebeuf (ca. 1640, MS.), Chaumonot (ca. 1680, MS.), and Carheil (1744, MS.); of the Iroquois Mohawk, by Bruyas (1862), Marcoux (1844, MS.), and Cuq (1882); of the Iroquois Seneca, by Jesuit fathers (MS.); the Iroquois Onondaga, by Jesuit fathers (printed in 1860); of the Iroquois Tuscarora, by Mrs E. A. Smith (1880-82, MS.) and Hewitt (1886, MS.); besides extended glossaries of the Cherokee, by Gatschet (1881, MS.) and Mooney (1885, MS.; and 1900, 19th Rep. B. A. E.).

In the Muskhogean languages there are the dictionaries of the Choctaw by Byington (ca. 1865, MS.), Wright (1880), and Rouquette (ca. 1880, MS.); of the Muskoki (Creek), by Robertson (1860-89, MS.) and Loughridge (1882, MS.).

The Siouan family is provided with dictionaries of the Santee Dakota by Riggs (1852, 1890) and Williamson (1871, 1886); of the Yankton Dakota, by Williamson (1871); of the Quapaw, the Biloxi, the Winnebago, and the Dhegiha (Omaha), by Dorsey (1891-95, MS.); of the Hidatsa, by Matthews (1873-74); and of the Kansa, by Bourassa (ca. 1850, MS.).

Other linguistic families are represented by dictionaries or extended glossaries as follows: Natchesan, Natchez lexicon, by Gatschet (1893, MS.); Chitimachan, Shetimasha (Chitimacha), by Gatschet (ca. 1890, MS.); Caddoan, Pawnee, by Dunbar (1880, MS.); Tonkawan, Tonkawa, by Gatschet (ca. 1877, MS.); Kiowan, Kiowa, by Mooney (1900, MS.); Shoshonean, Snake (Shoshoni), by Gebow (1864, 1868), and Comanche, by Rejon (1866); Koluschan, Chilkat, by Everette (ca. 1880, MS.); Chimmesyan, Tsimshian, by Boas (1898, MS.); Salishan, Kalispel by Giorda (1877-79), Twana by Eells (ca. 1880, MS.), and Nisqualli by Gibbs (1877); Chinookan, Chinook by Gibbs (1863) and Boas (1900, MS.), and Chinook jargon by Blanchet (1856), Gibbs (1863), Demers (1871), Gill (1882), Prosch (1888), Tate (1889), Coones (1891), Bulmer (1891, MS.), St Onge (1892, MS.), and Eells (1893, MS.); Kitunahan, Kutenai, by Chamberlain (1891-1905, MS.); Shahaptian, Nez Percé by McBeth (1893, MS.) and Gatschet (1896, MS.); Lutuanian, Klamath by Gatschet (1890); Shastan, Shasta, by Gatschet (1877, MS.); Piman, Cora by Ortega (1732, repr. 1888), Opata by Pimentel (1863), and Tarahumare by Steffel (1791) and Lumholtz (1894, MS.). (w. e.)

Diegueños. A collective name, probably in part synonymous with Comeya, applied by the Spaniards to Indians of the Yuman stock who formerly lived in and around San Diego, Cal., whence the term; it included representatives of many tribes and has no proper ethnic significance; nevertheless it is a firmly established name and is here accepted to include the tribes formerly living about San Diego and extending s. to about lat. 31° 30'. A few Diegueños still live in the neighborhood of San Diego. There are about 400 Indians included under this name as attached to the Mission agency of California, but they are now officially recognized as part of the "Mission Indians." The rancherias formerly occupied by the Diegueños, so far as known, are: Abascal, Ahwhut, Cajon, Camajal, Campo, Capitan Grande, Cenyowpreskel(?), Cojuat, Coquilt, Corral, Cosoy, Cuyamaca, Ekquall, Foromae, Gueymura, Hasoomale, Hasnasci, Hataam, Hawaii, Honwee, Vallecito, Irayme, Inomassi, Inyaha, Kwalwhut, Laguna, La Punta, Lorenzo, Macatati, Maramoydos, Mataguay, Matamo, Mutlronn, Mattawottis, Melejo, Mesa Chiquita, Mesa Grande, Meti, Nellmole, Nipaguay, Otai, Otat, Pocol, Prickaway, San Felipe, San José, San Luis, Santa Isabel, Sequan, Suahpi, Tacahlay, Tahwie, Tapanque, Toowed, Valle de las Viejas, Wahti, Xamacha, Xana, and Yacum. The Conejos, the Kiliwi, and the Coyotes are mentioned as former Diegueño bands. (H. W. H.)

Digger. Said by Powell to be the English translation of Nuanuints, the name of a small tribe near St George, s. w. Utah. It was the only Paiute tribe practising agriculture, hence the original signification of the name, "digger." In time the name was applied to every tribe known to use roots extensively for food and hence to be "diggers." It thus included very many of the tribes of California, Oregon, Idaho, Utah, Nevada, and Arizona, tribes speaking widely different languages and embracing perhaps a dozen distinct linguistic stocks. As the root-eaters were supposed to represent a low type of Indian, the term speedily became one of opprobrium. (H. W. H.)

Digging sticks. See Agriculture, Perforated stones.

Dighton Rock. A mass of silicious conglomerate lying in the margin of Taunton r., Bristol co., Mass., on which is an ancient, probably prehistoric, inscription. The length of the face measured at the base is 11½ ft. and the height a little more than 5 ft. The whole face, to within a few inches of the ground, is covered with the inscription, which consists of irregular lines and outline figures, a few having a slight resemblance to runes; others triangular and circular, among which can be distinguished 3 outline faces. The earliest copy was that of Danforth in 1680. Cotton Mather copied a part as early as 1690 and sent a rude woodcut of the entire inscription to the Royal Society of Great Britain in 1712. Copies were also made by Isaac Greenwood in 1730; by Stephen Sewall, of Cambridge, in 1768; by Prof. Winthrop in 1788; by Joseph Gooding in 1790; by Edward A. Kendall in 1807; by Job Gardner in 1812, and one for the Rhode Island Historical Society in 1830. Soon after this the suggestion was made that it was a runic inscription of the Norsemen, and the interest excited by this caused it to be frequently copied and published. The subject, with accompanying figures, was thoroughly discussed by Danish antiquaries, especially by Rafn, in Antiquitates Americanæ (1837). The earlier drawings mentioned above are reproduced by Mallery (10th Rep. B. A. E., pl. xi, 1893). The annexed illustration from a photograph is perhaps the most nearly correct of any published. The opinions advanced in regard to the origin and signification of the inscription vary widely. The members of the French Academy, to whom a copy was sent, judged it to be Punic; Lort, in a paper in Archæologia (London, 1786), expressed the opinion that it was the work of a people from Siberia; Gen. Washington, who saw Winthrop's drawings at Cambridge in 1789, pronounced the inscription similar to those made by the Indians; Davis and Kendall also ascribed it to the Indians, the former thinking it represented an Indian deer hunt. The Danish antiquaries decided that it was the work of the Norsemen; Prof. Finn Magnussen interpreted the central portion, assuming it to consist of runes, as meaning that Thorfinn with 151 men took possession of the country; and even Dr De Costa was persuaded that the central part is runic. Buckingham Smith, according to Haven (Proc. Am. Antiq. Soc., Apr. 29, 1863), was inclined to believe it to consist of ciphers used by the Roman Catholic Church. Schoolcraft, although charged with wavering in his opinion, decided without reservation in 1853 that it was entirely Indian. The latter author submitted several drawings of the inscription to an Algonquian chief, who, rejecting a few of the figures near the center, interpreted the remainder as the memorial of a battle between two native tribes. Although this Indian's explanation is considered doubtful, the general conclusion of students in later years, especially after Mallery's discussion, is that the inscription is the work of Indians and belongs to a type found in Pennsylvania and at points in the W.

Discoidal stones. Prehistoric objects of unknown use (see Problematical objects) whose most typical form is that of a double-convex or double-concave lens. The perimeter is a circle and the sides range from considerably convex through plane to deeply concave. The diameter varies from 1 in. to 8 in., the thickness from one-fourth of an inch to 6 in., very rarely passing these limits; the two dimensions have no definite relation to each other. Some specimens are convex on one face and plane on the other; but when one face is concave the other is also. Of the latter form many have a secondary depression at the center; others have a perforation which is sometimes enlarged until the disk becomes a ring. They are made principally of very hard rock, as quartz, flint, jasper, novaculite, quartzite, porphyry, syenite, and the like, though stone as soft as marble, sandstone, barite, and even steatite was sometimes chosen. No type of relics is more difficult to classify than these disks.

DISK OF GRANITE, VIRGINIA. (1-8)

The name first given them, and by which they are still commonly known, is "chunky stones," from the native name of the game played with analogous disks by southern Indians. But the description of the game, considered in connection with the great variation in size and material of the specimens, shows that only a small percentage of them could have been thus utilized. Culin believes that a limited number may be definitely regarded as chunky stones. He recognizes three types: (1) perforated (least common); (2) symmetrical, unperforated; (3) asymmetrical, unperforated. A similar diversity is observed in the stones used in the analogous Hawaiian game of maika (24th Rep. B. A. E., 1906). From the smooth, symmetrical, highly polished chunky stone they merge by insensible gradations into mullers, pestles, mortars, pitted stones, polishing and grinding stones, hammers, sinkers, club heads, and ornaments, for all of which purposes except the last they may have been used in some of their stages, so that no dividing line is possible. They present various styles and degrees of finish. Many retain their natural surface on both sides with the edge worked off by grinding or pecking, the latter marks possibly resulting from use as hammers. The sides may be ground down while the edge remains untouched; or, when made from a thick pebble, the sides may be pecked and the edge ground. Some specimens which are entirely unworked require very close examination to distinguish them from others whose whole surface has been artificially produced. It is possible, however, to arrange a large number of specimens from one locality in a regular series from a roughly chipped disk to a finished product of the highest polish and symmetry. The finest specimens, in greatest numbers, come from the states s. of the Ohio r., and from Arkansas eastward to the Atlantic. The territory within a radius of 100 m. around Chattanooga, Tenn., and for about the same distance around Memphis, is especially rich in them. From s. e. Ohio to central Missouri a considerable number has been found, though few of them are as well wrought as those from the S. Rather rough ones occur along the Delaware r. Beyond the limits indicated the type practically disappears. Discoidal stones corresponding closely with eastern types, save that the faces are rarely concave, are found in the Pueblo country and in the Pacific states. See Chunkey.

Dishes. Vessels for the preparation and serving of food and other purposes were manufactured by all Indian tribes. While their use as receptacles prescribes a concavity of circular, oval, or oblong outline, there is a great variety of shape, decoration, etc., according to individual taste or tribal custom, and a wide range of material, as stone, shell, bone, ivory, horn, rawhide, bark, wood, gourd, pottery, and basketry.

The vessels for serving food were not used to hold individual portions, for the Indians ate in common; but the little dishes held salt and other condiments, small quantities of delicate foods, etc. The larger dishes contained preparations of corn or other soft vegetables, and the trays and platters were for game, bread, etc., or for mixing or preparing food. In many cases the cooking pot held the common meal, and portions were taken out by means of small dishes and ladles, in which they were cooled and eaten. Some dishes had special uses, as platters, mats, and trays for drying fruits, roasting seeds, etc., and as ceremonial bowls, baskets, etc.

From archeological sites have been collected many examples of dishes. Some made of soapstone were found in several Eastern and Southern states, and in Wyoming and California. Vessels formed of seashells, cut principally from Buccinum, and also from Cassia, Strombus, and Fusciolaria, were found in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Arkansas, Georgia, and Florida. Dishes of pottery come from many parts of the United States and some made of wood from Florida.

The Indians in general used dishes of wood, and even where pottery, basketry, and bark were common, wooden vessels were made. Each region supplied suitable woods. A predilection for burl wood and knots was general. The majority of existing wooden vessels were fashioned with iron tools, but before metal was introduced they were excavated by means of fire and stone tools. Eskimo wooden dishes were sometimes cut from a single piece, but they usually had a rim of bent wood fastened to the excavated bottom and were oval in shape. Those of the N. W. coast tribes were boxes of rectangular shape, with scarfed and bent sides attached to the bottom; but the Indians also had excavated dishes carved to represent animal forms in great variety, and small bowls of horn occur. The Salishan tribes made dishes of wood and horn which were elaborately carved. The northern Athapascans as a rule used dishes, platters, and trays of birch bark folded and sewed, but among some tribes the dishes were like those of the Eskimo.

The Chippewa had well-finished wooden dishes of rectangular, oval, or circular shape. The Iroquois made excellent dishes, cups, bowls, etc., of burl wood, and sometimes furnished them with handles. The Plains Indians also used in preference burl or knot wood, and while as a rule their dishes were simple in outline and homely, some specimens were well carved and finished. The Virginia and other Southern Indians cut dishes, often of large size, from soft wood; of these the Cherokee and Choctaw bowls and platters made of tupelo are noteworthy. The Ute made rude oval bowls with projections at the ends, and oblong platters and knot bowls with handles. The Paiute used for dishes the carapace of the box turtle. The Pueblos, while relying mainly on pottery and basketry, had dishes wrought from knots and mountain-sheep horn. The Pima and Papago made oblong trays and shallow platters from mesquite wood. The Hupa of N. California cut large, flat trays from redwood. The tribes of the Santa Barbara region, California, inlaid wooden vessels with mother-of-pearl.

Bark dishes were extensively used by tribes within the birch area and to some extent by all the forest Indians. Those of the S. made great use of gourds.

The Pueblo Indians employed pottery and to some extent basketry for dishes, and the same is true in a lesser degree of some of the Plains and Eastern tribes. Southwestern and Californian Indians made use of basketry almost exclusively. See Bark, Basketry, Bowls, Implements, Pottery, Receptacles, Woodwork.

Ditsakana (Ditsá'kána, 'sewers'). A Comanche division, the name of which was formerly Widyu ('awl'), but on the death of a chief bearing the same name it was changed to Ditsakana. They were also popularly known as Yamparika, from their habit of eating yampa root. They were estimated to number 356 in 1869, and 200 in 1872, but their present population is unknown, as the Comanche divisions are not officially recognized. (J. M.) Ditsá'kána.—Mooney in 14th Rep. Djahui-skwahladagai (Djahui' sqa'lad-aga-i, 'down-the-inlet Skwahladas'). A division of the Raven clan of the Haida. They were probably once a part of the Skwahladas who lived on the w. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., being distinguished from them by the fact that they lived seaward (djahui) down Skidegate inlet.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 269, 1905.

Djigua (Dji'gua). A legendary Haida town on the n. shore of Cumshewa inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., whence the ancestress of the Djiguah-lanas, Kai-ahl-lanas, Kona-kegawai, and Stawas-haidagai is said to have come.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 94, 1905.

Djiguah-lanas (Dji'gua at lá'nas, 'Dji'-guatown people'). A prominent division of the Eagle clan of the Haida, so named from a legendary town on the n. side of Cumshewa inlet, whence their ancestress, who was also the ancestress of the Kai-ahl-lanas, Kona-kegawai, and Stawas-haidagai, is said to have come. They lived in the town of Kloo.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 273, 1905.

Tăgostl lă'nas.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 25, 1898.

Djihugits (Djihuágits, Masset dialect Chawagis, 'always low water'). A Haida town on a creek just s. of Naikun, E. coast of Graham id., N. W. Brit. Col. Anciently it belonged to the Naikun-kegawai, but afterward to the Chawagis-stustae.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Djus-hade (Djus xade', 'people of Djus island'). A division of the Eagle clan of the Haida, living on an island of the same name at the entrance of Tsoskahli, Queen Charlotte ids., and closely related to the Widja-gitunai, Tohla-k-gitunai, and Chets-gitunai. They afterward moved to the mouth of Masset inlet. A branch of the Kuna-lanas received the same name.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 275, 1905. Dsis háedrai'.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898.

Dockmackie. A name of the maple-leaved arrowwood (Viburnum acerifolium). The Indians used this plant for external application in tumors, etc. The terminal -ie suggests that the word came from them first to the Dutch, and from these to English-speakers. According to Miss L. S. Chamberlain (Am. Nat., xxxv, 3, 1901), the Delawares smoked dogekumak. W. R. Gerard (Gard. and For., ix, 262, 1896) says it is from a Mahican word meaning 'it is cooling,' which would be related to the Chippewa takaiamagad, 'it is cool.' A Delaware origin is however more probable. (A. F. C.)

Doestoe ('live where there are large falls of water'). A subdivision of Apache under chiefs Chiquito and Disalin in 1875. Doos-to'-e.—White, Apache Names of Ind. Tribes, MS., B. A. E.

Dog. A former division of the Foxes.

Dog. See Many Horser.

Dog Creek. A Shuswap village or band on upper Fraser r. below the mouth of Chilcotin r., Brit. Col. Pop. 14 in 1904.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1904, pt. 2, 72, 1904.

Dogachamus. A name for Cornus circinata, cited by Gerard (Gard. and For., ix, 263, 1896), who states that it is a corruption of damaganatikuanosi, 'pipe-stem bush,' in the Penobscot dialect of Algonquian. The word is also spelled dogackermie. (A. F. C.)

Dogekumak. See Dockmackie.

Dogl. Mentioned by Lederer (Discov., 2, 1672) as a people who inhabited the piedmont region of Virginia before the appearance of the historic tribes in that section. They were extinct at the time of his journey in 1670. Apparently distinct from the Doeg (Nanticoke).

Tsodi.—Lederer, op. cit.

Do-gitunai (Dô-gitanâ'-i, 'Gitans of the west coast'). A division of the Eagle clan of the Haida. They are said to have branched off from the Mamun-gitunai, and, as the name implies, their towns and camping places were on the w. coast of Queen Charlotte id., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 275, 1905.

Dogs. A band or a secret order of the Hidatsa.—Culbertson in Smithsonian. Rep. 1850, 143, 1851.

Dogs. See Domestication.

Dog Soldiers. See Military societies.

Doguenes. A tribe or division of a tribe met by Cabeza de Vaca about 1527, when they were living on the mainland near the coast, probably in the vicinity of San Antonio bay, Tex. The region was probably occupied by Karankawan people, but the data are too meager to determine the ethnic relations of the Doguenes. See Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., 46, 1891. Aguenes.—Cabeza de Vaca (1555). Dohasan (Dohásin, 'little bluff'; also Dohá, Doháte, 'bluff'). The hereditary name of a line of chiefs of the Kiowa for nearly a century. It has been borne by at least four members of the family, viz: (1) The first of whom there is remembrance was originally called Pá-do-gá'-i or Padógá, 'White-faced-buffalo-bull,' and this name was afterward changed to Dohá or Doháte. He was a prominent chief. (2) His son was originally called A'anón'te (a word of doubtful etymology), and afterward took his father's name of Doháte, which was changed to Dohásin, 'Little Dohate,' or 'Little-bluff,' for distinction. He became a great chief, ruling over the whole tribe from 1833 until his death on Cimarron r. in 1866, since which time no one has had unquestioned allegiance in the tribe. His portrait was painted in 1834 by Catlin, who calls him Teh-toot-sah, and his name appears in the treaty of 1837 as "To-ho-sa, the Top of the Mountain." (3) His son, whose widow is Ankímá, inherited his father's name, Dohásin. He was also a distinguished warrior, and died about 1894. His scalp shirt and war-bonnet case are in the National Museum. (4) The nephew of the great Dohásán II and cousin of the last mentioned (3) was also called Dohásán, and always wore a silver cross with the name "Tohasan" engraved upon it. He was the author of the Scott calendar and died in 1892. Shortly before his death he changed his name to Dánpá, 'shoulder-blade,' from dán, 'shoulder' (?), leaving only Ankímá's husband (3) to bear the hereditary name, which is now extinct. Dohasan II, the greatest chief in the history of the Kiowa tribe, in 1833 succeeded A'dáte, who had been deposed for having allowed his people to be surprised and massacred by the Osage in that year. It was chiefly through his influence that peace was made between the Kiowa and Osage after the massacre referred to, which has never been broken. In 1862, when the Cheyenne, Arapaho, Comanche, Kiowa, and Kiowa Apache were assembled on Arkansas r. to receive annuities, the agent threatened them with punishment if they did not cease their raids. Dohasan listened in perfect silence to the end, when he sprang to his feet, and calling the attention of the agent to the hundreds of tipis in the valley below, replied in a characteristic speech: "The white chief is a fool. He is a coward. His heart is small—not larger than a pebble stone. His men are not strong—too few to contend against my warriors. They are women. There are three chiefs—the white chief, the Spanish chief, and myself. The Spanish chief and myself are men. We do bad toward each other sometimes—stealing horses and taking scalps—but we do not get mad and act the fool. The white chief is a child, and, like a child, gets mad quick. When my young men, to keep their women and children from starving, take from the white man passing through our country, killing and driving away our buffalo, a cup of sugar or coffee, the white chief is angry and threatens to send his soldiers. I have looked for them a long time, but they have not come. He is a coward. His heart is a woman's. I have spoken. Tell the great chief what I have said." In addition to the treaty of 1837 Dohasan was also a signer of the treaty of Ft Atkinson, Ind. T., July 27, 1853, and that of Oct. 18, 1865, on Little Arkansas r., Kansas. See Mooney in 17th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 1, 1898.

Dokis Band. A Chippewa band, so named from their chief, residing on a reservation of 30,300 acres at the head of French r., where it leaves L. Nipissing, Ontario. They have a large admixture of French blood, are Roman Catholics, and obtain a livelihood by hunting and fishing and by working in adjacent lumber camps. The band numbered 62 in 1884 and 78 in 1904. (J. M.)

Dolls. Dolls were common among all the American tribes. They were fashioned from stone, wood, clay, skin, dough, corncocks, plants, and rags. Those used merely as playthings were frequently elaborately dressed by the mother in accordance with tribal costumes. Human hair was sometimes fastened to the head and arranged in the tribal style, the face was painted, the eyebrows were marked, and tattoo lines were indicated. Labrets of bone or shell were put in place among the tribes which used these objects, and the doll was further adorned with earrings, bracelets, and necklaces. The Eskimo father carved the small bone or ivory dolls more or less elaborately, and made them stand upright, to the great delight of the children. Among these people there was a festival in which small figures or dolls were used to represent the dead, at which time the people prepared and partook of food in their presence in memory of the time when those represented were living. The corncock and rag dolls were usually of the child's own manufacture. Those made of dough were used in a social ceremony among the Iroquois. Dolls were provided with cradles, clothing, tents, and vessels and utensils of clay.

In the S. W. and the extreme N. little figures were made for ceremonies in which mythic ancestors or dead relatives were remembered. Travelers have sometimes mistaken these figures for idols. Among the Hopi these little figures are of soft cottonwood, so cut and painted as to indicate in miniature the elaborate head-dress, decorated face, body, and clothing of those who represent kachinas, or impersonations of ancestral "breath bodies" or spirits of men. These dolls are not worshipped, but are made by the priests in their kivas during the great spring ceremonies as presents for the little girls, to whom they are presented on the morning of the last day of the festival by men personating kachinas (Fewkes). In this way the young become familiar with the com-

Dolores (contracted from Span. Nuestra Señora de los Dolores, 'Our Lady of Sorrows'). A mission established among the Pima by Father Kino in 1687, just above Cucurpe on the headwaters of the w. branch of the Rio Sonora, in N. W. Sonora, Mexico. According to Venegas it had 2 visitas (probably Remedios and Cocospera) in 1721. Pop. 29 in 1730.

Dolores. A Spanish Franciscan mission established in California within the site of the city of San Francisco on Oct. 9, 1776. When Gov. Portola, in searching for Monterey, came to the bay of San Francisco, that had remained hidden to all previous explorers, Father Junipero Serra regarded it as a miraculous discovery, for the visitador-general in naming the missions to be established at the havens of the coast had said to the mission president, who was disappointed because the name of the founder of the order was omitted, that if St Francis desired a mission he must show his port. The missionaries impatiently brooked the obstacles that delayed planting a mission at the port that their patron saint had revealed. The site was beside the lagoon of Nuestra Señora de los Dolores, hence the mission of San Francisco de Assisi came to be known as Dolores mission. There were no natives present when the mission was opened. The inhabitants, the Romonan, had been driven from the peninsula by a hostile tribe who burned their rancherías and killed all who did not escape on rafts. When the fugitives returned to find their home occupied by the Spaniards they were disposed to contend for its possession. In the first fight the soldiers fired in the air, in the next they shot a native, upon which the savages begged for peace, but fled when the Spaniards released after a whipping those that they had captured, and were not seen again until spring. The missionaries gradually won their confidence after they returned and in October baptized 17 adults. At the end of 5 years there were 215 converts, and in 1796 they numbered 720. The neophytes when harshly treated could escape easily by water, and after 280 had run away and the soldiers were unable to stay the exodus the head missionary sent out a party of 15 Christian Indians, of whom 7 were slain by the Cuchillones. A priest, Father Fernandez, brought charges against the missionary fathers, and Gov. Borica demanded that they reform their treatment—long tasks, scant rations, and cruel punishments, evidenced by 200 escapes and as many deaths within a year. Although Father Lasuen, the mission president, promised and endeavored to remedy the alleged evils, the Indians continued to run away, and the missionaries, in 1797, sent out another party of neophytes to gather in the lost flock, but the former barely escaped the fate of the preceding party. The Sacian harbored the fugitives and threatened to kill the mission Indians if they continued to work and the soldiers if they interfered. The governor sent a detachment of troops to punish them, and in the fight 2 soldiers were wounded and 7 natives killed. The Cuchian were also attacked and the soldiers returned with 83 of the fugitive Christians. During the decade 1,213 natives were baptized and 1,031 buried, and at the end of the 18th century the neophyte population was 644. The cattle had increased to 8,200 head, and the crop in 1800 was 4,100 bushels, half of it wheat. The land about the mission was sterile, and fields 12 m. distant were planted. The neophytes first dwelt in rude huts of willow poles and tule, but between 1793 and 1798 adobe houses were built for every family and the thatched roofs of the church and mission buildings were replaced with tiles. On looms made by the Indians woolen cloth was produced in quantities sufficient to clothe the converts and blankets were woven for the presidio. In 1796 the manufacture of coarse pottery was begun. In 1820 the neophyte population was 622, but the mortality continued to be greater than in any other mission. In 1830 the population was 219. The sheep fell off to one-fifth of the former number and only a third as much grain was produced as in 1810. The decline was due to the division of the mission when San Rafael was founded in a healthier location in 1817 and San Francisco Solano in 1823. While the baptisms were exceeded only at San José, there were 2,100 deaths at San Francisco Dolores and San Rafael, whither half the neophytes were removed, in the 10 years ending with 1820. Solano, founded with the intention of transferring the entire mission, received half the neophytes of the parent mission, but returned a part when it was constituted an independent establishment. The buildings fell into ruin, except the church, which is still standing as part of the Dolores mission church of San Francisco. The number of neophytes fell to 204 in 1832, and in 1840 there were 89 at San Mateo and about 50 scattered about the district. The civilian administrator found little property in 1834 and soon none was left. The neophytes received nothing; they were never organized in a pueblo, but were apportioned among the settlers and held in servitude against their will. In 1843 the last remnant, 8 aged starvelings, appealed to the Government for help.

The tribes that came first under the influence of the Dolores mission were the Ahwaste, Altahmo, Olhon, Romonan, and Tulomo, all speaking the same language, the Costanoan, as did some other tribes, not so numerous, that lived on or near the thickly peopled shores of San Francisco bay. They subsisted by hunting and fishing. Both sexes often wore their hair short, having the custom of cutting it when afflicted by sorrow or misfortune. Those of the s. allowed their hair to grow and wore the long carefully dressed braids adorned with beads and trinkets wound about the head like a turban. The medicine-men, through their incantations, pretended to be able to bring fish as well as to cure the sick. Of the blubber of stranded whales and of seals they were extremely fond, and they ate nuts, berries, and camas bulbs, and made bread of seeds and acorns. The people who came to the mission from the opposite shore of the bay and the estuary were of lighter hue and more corpulent than the coast Indians. The men went naked, coating themselves with mud on cold mornings; the women wore an apron of sedge or rushes reaching before and behind to the knees and a cloak of the same material over their shoulders. People are said to have married and parted without ceremony, mothers taking their children with them, and men often took whole families of sisters for their wives. These Indians burned their dead.

The following list of rancherias and tribes from which the mission drew its neophytes is adapted from those recorded in the parish books (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861):

Abmactac, Acnagis, Acyum, Aleta, Altahmo, Aluenci, Amutaja, Anamas, Anamon, Anchin, Aramay, Assunta, Atarpe, Cachanegtac, Caprup, Carascan, Cazopo, Chagunte, Chanigtac, Chapugtac, Chayen, Chipisclin, Chipletac, Chiputca, Chuchictac, Chupcan, Churmute, Chutchin, Chynau, Conop, Elarroyde, Flunmuda, Gamchines, Genau, Guanlen, Guloismistac, Halchis, Horocroc, Huimen, Hunctu, Itaes, Joquizar, Josquigard, Juniamuc, Juris, Lamsim, Libantone, Livangebra, Livangelva, Luianeglua, Luidneg, Macsinum, Malvaitac, Mitline, Muingpe, Naig, Naique, Napa, Olestura, Ompivromo, Otoacte, Oturbe, Ousint, Patnetac, Petaluma, Proqueu, Pructaca, Pruristac, Puichon, Purutea, Puycone, Quet, Sadaues, Sagunte, Saraise, Saruntac, Satumuo, Saturaumo, Sicca, Sipanum, Siplichiquin, Siscastac, Sitintajea, Sitlintaj, Sittintac, Ssalayme, Ssichitca, Ssipudca, Seiti, Ssogereate, Ssupichum, Subchiam, Suchui, Sunchaque, Talcan, Tamalo, Tatquinte, Timigtac, Timsin, Titivu, Torose, Totola, Tubisuste, Tuca, Tupuic, Tupuinte, Tuzsint, Uchium, Urebure, Usese, Vagerpe, Vectaca, Yacmui, Yacomui, Zomiomi, Zucigin. The names of the tribes which furnished the early converts were Ahwaste, Bolbone, Chiguan, Cuchilon, Chuscan, Cotejen, Junatca, Karkin, Khulpuni, Olemos, Olhon, Olmolococ, Olpen, Quemelentus, Quirogles, Saclan, Salzon (Suisun), Sanchines, Sacou, Sichican, Uchium, Uquitinac.

Domestication. The Indian learned a great deal from and was helped in his efforts by the actions of animals in their wild state. The period of domestication began when he held them in captivity for the gratification of his desires or they became attached to him for mutual benefit. In this process there are gradations:

1. Commensalism begins when food is left for serviceable animals to devour, so that these may give notice of danger or advantage. The coyote is said to reveal the presence of the mountain lion. Small animals are tolerated for their skins and flesh. Plants would be sown to attract such creatures as bees, and tame animals would be regularly fed at later stages.

2. Confinement is represented by such activities as keeping fish and other aquatic animals in ponds; caging birds and carrying off their young, gallinaceous fowl last; tying up dogs or muzzling them; corraling ruminants, and hobbling or tethering wild horses so as to have them near, keep them away from their enemies, or fatten them for eating. The aborigines had no difficulty in breeding some animals in confinement, but few wild birds will thus propagate, and the Indians could obtain those to tame only by robbing nests. Lawson says of the Congaree of North Carolina that "they take storks and cranes before they can fly and breed them as tame and familiar as dung-hill fowls."

3. Keeping animals for their service or produce, as dogs for retrieving game or catching fish, hawks for killing birds; various creatures for their fleece, hides, feathers, flesh, milk, etc., and taming them for amusement and for ceremonial or other purposes, were a later development. Roger Williams says the Narraganset Indians of Rhode Island kept tame hawks about their cabins to frighten small birds from the fields.

4. Actually breaking them to work, training dogs, horses, and cattle for packing, sledding, hauling travois, and, later, for riding, constitutes complete domestication.

In pre-Columbian times the dog was the most perfectly subdued animal of the North Americans, as much so as the llama in w. South America. But other species of mammals, as well as birds, were in different degrees rendered tractable. After the coming of the whites the methods of domesticating animals were perfected, and their uses multiplied. Moreover, horses, sheep, cattle, donkeys, hogs, and poultry were added to the list, and these profoundly modified the manners and customs of many Indian tribes.

Domestication of animals increased the food supply, furnished pets for old and young, aided in raising the Indian above the plane of low savagery, helped him to go about, multiplied his wants, furnished a standard of property and a medium of exchange, took the load from the back of women, and provided more abundant material for economic, artistic, and ceremonial purposes.

Domestication had a different development in each culture area. In the Arctic region the dog was preeminent; it was reared with unremitting care, the women often suckling the puppies; all its life it was trained to the sled. As the dogs were never perfectly tamed, it was no easy task to drive a team of them; yet by the aid of dogs and sleds, in combination with umiaks, the whole polar area of America was exploited by the Eskimo, who found these an excellent means of rapid transit from Asia to the Atlantic. In recent years the successful introduction of the reindeer among the Alaskan tribes has proved a blessing. The Mackenzie-Yukon district is a canoe country, and domestication of the dog was not vigorously prosecuted until the Hudson's Bay Company gave the stimulus. But southward, among the Algonquian and Siouan tribes of the great lakes and the plains, this animal attained its best as a hunter and a beast of burden and traction. It was also reared for food and for ceremonial purposes. Not more than 50 pounds could be borne by one dog, but twice that amount could be moved on a travois. The coming of the horse (q. v.) to the great plains was a boon to the Indian tribes, all of which at once adopted the new instrument of travel and transportation. The horse was apotheosized; it became a standard of value, and fostered a greater diversity of occupations. But the more primitive methods of domestication were still practised throughout the middle region. In the w. Pacific area dogs were trained to hunt; but here and elsewhere this use of the dog was doubtless learned from the whites. Morice writes of the Athapascan tribes of the interior of British Columbia: "Owing to the semi-sedentary state of those Indians and the character of their country, only the dog was ever domesticated among them in the common sense of the word. This had a sort of wolfish aspect, and was small, with pointed, erect ears, and uniformly gray, circumstances which would seem to imply that the domesticating process had remained incomplete. The flesh of those wolf dogs was relished by the employees of the North western and Hudson's Bay companies, who did not generally eat that of those of European descent. In a broader sense, those aborigines also occasionally domesticated and have continued to domesticate other animals, such as black bears, marmots, foxes, etc., which they took when young and kept as pets, tied up to the tent post or free. Such animals, as long as they remained in a state of subjection, were considered as members of the family and regarded as dogs, though often called by the endearing names of 'sons,' 'daughters,' 'grandsons,' etc. Birds were never caged, but might be seen at times hobbling about with the tips of their wings cut."

In the California-Oregon area birds of gay plumage were caged, plucked, and then set free. On Santa Catalina id. birds called large crows by the Spaniards were kept and worshipped, recalling Boscana's story of the Shoshonean condor cult on the adjacent California coast. In the S. W., the desert area, the whole development of domestication is seen. The coyote was allowed to feed about the camps. The Querecho (Vaquero Apache) of Coronado in 1541 had a great number of large dogs which they obliged to carry their baggage when they moved from place to place (see Travois). Some of the Pueblo tribes practised also the caging of eagles, the rearing of turkeys, and, since the coming of the Spaniards, the herding of sheep, goats, burros, and horses. (O. T. M.)

Donacona. A Huron chief found by Jacques Cartier, in 1535, residing with his people at the junction of St Croix and St Lawrence rs., Canada. Although Cartier was well received and kindly treated by this chief, he managed, partly by stratagem and partly by force, to convey the latter aboard his vessel and carry him to France where he soon died. (C. T.)

Donally's Town. A (Creek?) settlement mentioned in 1793 as situated on Flint r., Ga.—Melton in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., II, 372, 1832.

Doosedoowe ('plover.'—Hewitt). A clan of the Iroquois.

Dostian-lagai (Dō-si-lan-lagāi-'i, 'west-coast rear-town people'). A local subdivision of the Stlenga-lanas, one of the larger Haida divisions on the Raven side, who lived on the n. w. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. A small section of them was called Kaiihl-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1905.

Dotame. A tribe of which Lewis and Clark learned from Indian informants. They were said to speak the Comanche language and to number 30 warriors, or 120 souls, in 10 lodges. No traders had been among them; they trafficked usually with the Arikara, were hostile toward the Sioux, but friendly with the Mandan, the Arikara, and with their neighbors. From the use of the name in connection with Cataka (Kiowa Apache) and Nemousin (Comanche), the Dotame are seemingly identifiable with the Kiowa.

Dotama.—Fisher, New Trav., 26, 1812. Do-ta-ma.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, VI, 102, 1905. Do-ta-ma.—Ibid.

Dotchetonne. An unidentified Texan tribe allied to the Caddo in 1687 (Joutel in Margry, Déc., III, 409, 1878). The ending suggests dinne, tinné, the Athapascan term for 'people,' and hence a possible Apache connection.

Dotle. A Koyukukhotana village on Koyukuk r., Alaska; pop. 12 in 1885.

Dotlakhat.—Allen, Rep. on Alaska, 140, 1887.

Dotakustl (Dō't!ask!asl, 'those who left the west coast'). A subdivision of the Sagua-lanas, a division of the Eagle clan of the Haida. The name seems to imply that they formerly lived on the w. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., but in historical times they were in the town of Kung, in Naden harbor, with the other Sagua-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 275, 1905.

Doughnut stones. See Perforated stones.

Douglas. The local name for a body of Lower Lillooet between Lillooet and Harrison lakes, Brit. Col.; pop. 76 in 1904.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1904, pt. II, 74, 1905.

Doustioni. A tribe, formerly living on Red r. of Louisiana, that from its proximity to the Natchitoches and the Yatasi was probably kindred thereto and belonged to the Caddo confederacy. The people are mentioned by Joutel, in 1687, as allies of the Kadohadacho. Pénicaut, in 1712, met them with a party of Natchitoches, and remarks that for the 5 years previous they had been constantly wandering, and living by the chase (Margry, Déc., v, 488). Their warriors at that time numbered about 200. The cause of the abandonment of their village is unknown, but when in 1714 they accepted the invitation of St Denys to settle near the Natchitoches, and seed was given them, they seem to have returned to their agricultural and village life. In 1719 La Harpe speaks of them as numbering 150 and dwelling on an island in Red r. not far distant from the French post among the Natchitoches. If any survive they are merged with the kindred Caddo in Oklahoma. (A. C. F.)

Dragging-canoe (translation of his Indian name, Tsilyu-ginsfn; known also as Cheucunsene and Kunnesee). A prominent leader of those Cherokee who were hostile to the Americans during the Revolutionary war. He moved with his party to the site of Chickamauga, where he continued to harass the Tennessee settlements until 1782, when the Chickamauga towns were broken up. His people then moved farther down the river and established the "five lower towns," but these also were destroyed in 1794. In accounts of the Creek war Dragging-canoe is mentioned as one of the prominent Cherokee chiefs in alliance with Jackson, and a participant in the last great encoun-

Dramatic representation. Among many tribes ceremonies were dramatic in character. Every religious rite had its dramatic phases or episodes expressive of beliefs, emotions, or desires, but in certain instances the dramatic element dominated and became differentiated from the ceremony. In such cases there were masked and costumed actors with stage setting, effigies, and other properties, and events, historical or mythic, in the cultural history or life of the tribe were represented. The most elaborate of these exhibitions were those of the Pueblo peoples and the tribes of the N. W. coast. Among the Hopi a dramatic representation occurs yearly in March either in the open plaza or in a kiva. The space between the fire and one end of the room is set apart as the stage; at the rear a decorated screen is placed, behind which are men who sound shell trumpets and manipulate the effigies of a plumed serpent, which, at times, are projected through the screen and contend with the actors in front. Marionettes of the Corn-maids are occasionally employed and are skilfully managed; birds walk about and whistle; imitation fields of corn are swept over by serpent effigies, and men representing primal gods struggle with the effigies in an effort to overcome them. The stage setting and personnel are changed for every act, and during the change blankets are held around the fire to darken the kiva.

In the large wooden dwellings of the N. W. myths and legends were dramatized. The performance took place at one end of the house, where concealed openings in the painted wall admitted the actors who personated gods and heroes, and there were devices to give realistic effect to strange and magical scenes. Songs and dances accompanied the dramatic presentation.

Some of the great tribal ceremonies of the inland peoples, while religious in initiative, were social in general character. They portrayed episodes in the past history of the tribe for the instruction of the younger generation. There were societies a part of whose function was to preserve the history of its membership. This was done by means of song and the dramatic representation of the acts the song commemorated.

The Pawnee were remarkable for their skill in sleight-of-hand performances. Seeds were sown, plants grew, blossomed, and yielded fruit; spears were thrust through the body and many other surprising feats performed in the open lodge with no apparent means of concealment. During many dramatic representations, particularly those which took place in the open air, episodes were introduced in which a humorous turn was given to some current event in the tribe. Sometimes clowns appeared and by their antics relieved the tensify of the dramatic presentation. Among the Pueblo Indians these "delight-makers," as Bandelier translates the name of the Koshare of the Queres villagers, constitute a society which performs comedies in the intervals of the public dances. See Ceremony, Dance.

Dreams and Visions. Most revelations of what was regarded by the Indians as coming from the supernatural powers were believed to be received in dreams or visions. Through them were bestowed on man magical abilities and the capacity to foresee future events, to control disease, and to become able to fill the office of priest or of leader. It was the common belief of the Indians that these dreams or visions must be sought through the observance of some rite involving more or less personal privation; an exception is found in the Mohave who believe that the dream seeks the individual, coming to him before birth, or during infancy, as well as in mature life. In general the initiation of a man's personal relations to the unseen through dreams and visions took place during the fast which occurred at puberty, and the thing seen at that time became the medium of supernatural help and knowledge, and in some tribes determined his affiliations. It was his sacred object. It had no reference to his kindred, but was strictly personal in its efficacy, and he painted it on his person or his belongings as a prayer for assistance—a call for help in directing his actions. Any dream of ordinary sleep in which this object appeared had meaning for him and its suggestions were heeded. Men with a natural turn of mind toward the mysterious frequently became shamans and leaders in rites which dealt with the occult. Such persons, from the time of their first fast, cultivated their ability to dream and to have visions; the dreams came during natural sleep, the visions during an ecstasy when the man was either wholly or partially unconscious of his surroundings. It was generally believed that such men had power to bring or to avert disaster through direct communication with the unseen.

Many of the elaborate ceremonies observed among the tribes were said to have been received through visions, the actual performance following faithfully in detail the prefiguration of the vision. So, too, many of the shrines and their contents were believed to have been supernaturally bestowed in a vision upon some one person whose descendants were to be the hereditary keepers of the sacred articles. The time for the performance of rites connected with a shrine, and also other ceremonies, frequently depended on an intimation received in a dream.

The dreams of a man filling an important position, as the leader of a war party, were often regarded as significant, especially if he had carried with him some one of the sacred tribal objects as a medium of supernatural communication. This object was supposed to speak to him in dreams and give him directions which would insure safety and success. Forecasting the future was deemed possible by means of artificially induced visions. The skin of a freshly killed animal, or one that had been well soaked for the purpose, was wound around the neck of a man until the gentle pressure on the veins caused insensibility, then in a vision he saw the place toward which his party was going and all that was to take place was prefigured. In some tribes a skin kept for this special purpose was held sacred and used for divining by means of an induced vision. Some Indians employed plants, as the peyote, or mescal button, for like purposes. That the spirit left the body and traveled independently, and was able to discern objects distant both in time and space, was believed by certain tribes; others thought that the vision came to the man as a picture or in the form of a complete dramatic ceremony.

The general belief concerning dreams and visions seems to have been that the mental images seen with closed eyes were not fancies but actual glimpses of the unseen world where dwelt the generic types of all things and where all events that were to take place in the visible world were determined and prefigured.

Drills and Drilling. The first drill was a development of the primitive awl, a sharp-pointed instrument of bone, stone, or copper which was held in one hand, pressed against the object, and turned back and forth until a hole was bored.

The point was set in a socket of bone or wood. By setting it in a transverse handle increased pressure and leverage were obtained, with increased penetrating power. Artificially perforated objects of bone, fish bones, ivory, pottery, stone, and wood, common to all periods of the world's history, are found in mounds, caves, shell-heaps, and burial places of the Indians.

The holes vary from an eighth to a half inch in diameter, and from a fourth of an inch to 6 in. or more in depth. Shell, bone, and stone were drilled to make beads. Stone pipes with bowl and stem openings of different sizes were common, and whistles were made of stone and bone. Tubes in stone, several inches long, with walls scarcely an eighth of an inch thick, were accurately drilled. The columella of the Busycon shell was bored through for beads. The graceful butterfly-shaped objects found throughout the United States were perforated with surprising accuracy. It has been said that in prehistoric times the natives bored holes through pearls by means of heated copper spindles. The points of drills were made of copper rolled into a hollow cylinder or of pieces of reed, or of solid metal, stone, shell, or wood. Boring by means of hollow drills was usual among all early races of Europe, Asia, and Africa; it was common also in Mexico, and instances are not rare in the mounds of Ohio and elsewhere in the United States, but in North America solid drill points were generally employed. Grass and bristles were also used as drills, being worked by twirling between the thumb and the index finger. Points of hard stone or metal usually cut by direct contact, but where the points were of wood, dry or wet sand proved more effectual. At times the points were separate from the shafts and were firmly attached to the latter by strings of hide or vegetal fiber. The rapidity with which a drill cuts depends on the velocity of the revolution, the weight and size of its different parts, the hardness of the abrading material and of the object drilled, the diameter of the hole, and its depth. The point used is indicated by the form of the perforation. The frequency with which objects are found bored from both sides is proof that the Indian appreciated the advantage of reducing friction. Progress in the elaboration of drills consisted mainly in heightening speed of revolution.

DRILL-POINT OF STONE AND SECTION OF BORING

If the drill-point be of wood much depends on its hardness, for when too hard the wood grinds the sand to powder, while if it be too soft the grains catch at the base of the cavity and cut away the shaft. Only wood of proper texture holds the sand as in a matrix and enables it to cut to the best advantage. The insides of drill holes show by the character of their striae whether the cutting was accomplished by direct pressure or with the aid of sand.

The simplest form of drill was a straight shaft, varying from a fourth to three-fourths of an inch in diameter and from 10 in. to 2 ft in length. This shaft was revolved in alternating directions between the hands, or, when the shaft was held horizontally, it was rolled up and down the thigh with the right hand, the point of the drill being pressed against the object held in the left hand; or at times the object was held between the naked feet while the drill was revolved

SECTION OF HEAD WITH BICONICAL PERFORATION

THE REVOLVING SHAFT DRILL USED BY A MUPA

The strap drill, used both as a fire drill and as a perforator, is an improvement on the shaft drill, both in the number of its revolutions and in the pressure which may be imparted to the shaft. The shaft is kept in position by means of the headpiece of wood, which is held in the teeth. A thong that is wound once round the shaft, one end being held in each hand, is pulled alternately to the right and to the left. The thong was sometimes furnished with hand pieces of bone or bear's teeth to give a firmer grip to the strap.

This drill, apparently known to the cave people of France, as it certainly was to the early peoples of Greece, Egypt, and India, has been used by the Greenlanders from early times and is employed also by the Aleut. To a person using the strap drill the jar to the teeth and head is at first quite severe, but much of the disagreeable sensation disappears with use.

STRAP DRILL USED BY ESKIMO OF ALASKA

ESKIMO BOW DRILL SHOWING PARTS

Closely related to the strap drill, but a great improvement over the latter, is the bow drill, which can be revolved with much greater speed. The head piece of the bow drill is held in position with the left hand, while the strap is attached to the two ends of a bow, and after wrapping around the shaft, as with the strap drill, is alternately revolved by a backward and forward motion of the bow.

The pump drill, still employed in the arts, is said to have been known to the Iroquois and is used by the Pueblo Indians.

USE OF BOW DRILL

This drill consists of a shaft which passes through a disk of stone, pottery, or wood, and across a piece through which the shaft also runs; to each end of the crosspiece is attached a string or buckskin thong having sufficient play to allow it to cross the top of the shaft and to permit the crosspiece to reach close to the disk. This disk is turned to wind the string about the shaft; this raises the crosspiece. By pressing down the crosspiece after a few turns have been taken, the shaft is made to revolve and the disk receives sufficient impetus to rewind the string, which by successive pressure and release, continues the reciprocal movement necessary to cutting. The speed attained by the pump drill is much greater than with the bow drill or the strap drill, and the right hand is left free to hold the object that is being drilled. The pump drill, although long in common use among the Pueblo Indians, is probably of foreign origin.

A remarkable and unique drill was recently used by the Indians of Round valley, Cal., for drilling small holes through hard white shells. Its shaft is of hard wood, the disk taking the place of the crosspiece and the weight of the shaft giving sufficient impetus. The thong of this drill passes over the shaft and through opposite sides of the disk, and is attached to the shaft near the bottom. The disk moves freely up and down the shaft, and the thong is so wrapped that as the string unwinds from the top of the shaft it winds below, and vice versa. This drill revolves little if any faster than the shaft drill, and appears to cut chiefly, but not entirely, with the downward pressure. The use of this drill is apparently confined to a very restricted area. See Shellwork, Stonework.

Dry-painting. An art existing among the Indians, especially those of the S. W., the products of which have been named sand altars, sand pictures or paintings, and sand mosaics by various authors. It is doubtless of aboriginal origin and of great antiquity, but it has come to the knowledge of white people only within the last 25 years. The art has been found among various Pueblo tribes of New Mexico and Arizona, among the wilder Navaho and Apache of the same region, and, in crude form, among the Cheyenne, Arapaho, and Siksika. According to Navaho information, dry-painting was practised also by the Ute and the cliff-dwellers, but the latter may refer to one or more of the Hopi clans that occupied Canyon de Chelly, Arizona, within comparatively recent time (see Asa). There is evidence of a wide extent of the art among the Indians, but it is probable that it has been yet more widely practised in the past, or may even be more widely practised at the present among tribes who have concealed it from civilized men.

So far as can be learned dry-painting has reached its greatest perfection among the Navaho, whose designs are larger, more numerous, and more elaborate than those of any other tribe. These Indians make their pictures almost exclusively in connection with religious ceremonies and draw them of various sizes. Some of their larger pictures, in their great 9 days' ceremonies, are 10 or 12 ft in diameter, and represent, in conventional forms, various gods of their mythology, divine ceremonies, lightning, sunbeams, rainbows, mountains, animals, and plants, having a mythic or traditional significance. Among this people, in order to prepare a groundwork for a sacred picture in the lodge, several young men collect, with ceremonial observances, a quantity of dry sand, which is carried in blankets, thrown on the floor of the lodge, spread over a surface of sufficient size and to the depth of 2 or 3 in., and made smooth and level by means of the broad oaken battens used in weaving. The pigments represent the 5 sacred colors of Navaho mythology—white, blue, yellow, black, and red. For the greater part of the work the white, yellow, and red are made of finely powdered sandstone of these colors; the black of powdered charcoal mixed with a little sandstone to give it stability; and the "blue" (really gray) of black and white mixed. These powders are prepared before the picture is begun and are kept on improvised trays of juniper bark. Sometimes, for certain ornamental parts of the work, more precious pigments than these are used. To apply the pigments the artist picks up a small quantity between his first and second fingers and his opposed thumb and allows it to flow slowly as he moves his hand. When he takes up his pinch of powder, he blows on his fingers to remove aberrant particles and to keep them from falling on the picture out of place. When he makes a mistake he does not brush away the colored powder, but obliterates it by pouring sand on it, then draws the correct design on the new surface. The drawings are begun as near the center as the design will permit, due regard being paid to the points of the compass, which have an established order of precedence in Navaho ceremony. The figures in the periphery of the picture are made last, in order that the operators may not have to step over and thus possibly spoil the finished work. The pictures are drawn according to an exact system, except in certain well-defined cases where the artist is allowed to indulge his fancy. On the other hand, some parts are measured by palms, and not the slightest deviation can be made from the established design. Straight and parallel lines are drawn with the aid of a tightened cord. The naked bodies of the gods are first drawn and then the clothing is put on. The shaman who enacts the part of master of ceremonies does little more than direct and criticize the work. A number of men who have been initiated into the mystery of the ceremony perform the labor, each working on a different part, and often spending many hours on one picture. When it is finished, ceremonies are performed over it, and then with song and ceremony it is obliterated. When no semblance of it remains, the sand of which it was made is gathered in blankets and thrown away at a distance from the lodge. In the ceremonies of the Pueblo Indians a picture is allowed to remain several days, while the Navaho make and destroy a picture in a day. No permanent copies of the dry-paintings are preserved by the Navaho; indeed, until recently they had no means of making such copies. The paintings are not made in the summer, hence their designs must be carried from winter to winter in the fallible memories of men; yet the shamans declare that the pictures have been transmitted unaltered for many generations. Although this declaration may reasonably be doubted, there is some evidence in its favor.

During the Sun-dance ceremony of the Cheyenne a dry-painting is made in a lodge to represent the morning star. The field of the painting is of plain sand, and the design is made in a strictly prescribed manner by the use of black, red, yellow, and white dry paint, in order. Dotted lines representing stars form part of the painting, in this case those in white being drawn first because the white stars appear first in the morning. The unbroken lines are roads; the white represents the lodge-maker and his wife, the red line the road of the Cheyenne, the black the trail of the buffalo, and yellow the path of the sun. The dry-painting made by the Arapaho in their Sun-dance ceremony, while of symbolic significance, is of a much simpler character.

The sand pictures of the Hopi differ considerably from those of the Navaho. Some of the best are made in midsummer during the ceremonies of the Antelope society. In making dry-paintings the Hopi chief of the ceremony commonly begins at the periphery and follows the ceremonial circuit of the cardinal points in the use of pigments—first drawing yellow (north), then green or blue (west), then red (south), and finally white (east). The field of the picture, which is always made secretly in kivas among the Hopi, is valley sand sifted on the floor from a basket. These Indians never use cords or other measuring instruments. When the dry-painting is effaced pinches of the sand used in making it are deposited in prescribed places; e. g., a portion of the sand of an Antelope dry-painting is placed in a shrine of each cardinal point by the Snake chief (Fewkes).

Duabe. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages visited by Ayllon in 1520; probably on the South Carolina coast.

Duano. A former Kawia village on or near the Cahuilla res., s. Cal. (Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Miss. Ind., 18, 1883). Possibly intended for Durazno (Span. 'peach').

Dubois. Mentioned only by McKenney and Hall (Ind. Tribes, III, 79, 1854) in a list of tribes. Possibly intended for Gens des Bois (Hankutchin, Tschantoga, etc.); otherwise unidentified.

Duck Lake. A local name for a band of Okinagan in s. w. British Columbia; pop. 24 in 1901.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1901, pt. II, 166.

Duck tablets. Prehistoric objects of undetermined use, made of wood, bone, and metal, and representing in a conventional manner the figure of a duck. The most typical examples are certain paddle-like objects of wood found by Cushing in excavations at Key Marco, Fla., and connected by him with other similar forms in stone and silver found also in Florida, as well as with various other classes of objects thought to embody the duck motive, such as the bird-stone (q. v.), the banner stone (q. v.), and the calumet (q. v.). Although these tablets were undoubtedly symbolic, the exact significance and manner of use can not be determined, and they are therefore classed with problematical objects (q. v.). See Cushing in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xxxv, 1897. (W. H. H.)

Ducoigne, Jean Baptiste. A Kaskaskia chief at the beginning of the 19th century, noted mainly for his firm adherence to the United States and friendship for the whites. Reynolds (Pion. Hist., III, 22, 1887) describes him as a cunning half-blood of considerable talent. In his Memoirs, Gen. W. H. Harrison, who had dealings with Ducoigne, speaks of him as "a gentlemanly man, by no means addicted to drink, and possessing a very strong inclination to live like a white man; indeed has done so as far as his means would allow." Writing to the Secretary of War, he says: "Ducoigne's long and well-proved friendship for the United States has gained him the hatred of all the other chiefs and ought to be an inducement with us to provide as well for his happiness, as for his safety." According to Reynolds, Ducoigne asserted that neither he nor his people had shed the blood of white men. He was a signer of the treaties of Vincennes, Aug. 7 and 13, 1803; by the latter the United States agreed to build a house and inclose 100 acres of land for him. He had two sons, Louis and Jefferson, and a daughter, Ellen, who married a white man and in 1850 was living in Indian Ter. The name of Louis appears on behalf of the Kaskaskia in the treaty of Edwardsville, Ill., Sept. 25, 1818. Ducoigne's death probably occurred shortly before Oct., 1832, as it is stated in the treaty at Castor Hill, of that date, that there should be reserved "to Ellen Ducoigne, the daughter of their late chief," a certain tract of land. The name is perpetuated in that of the town of Duquoin, Perry co., Ill. (C. T.)

Duestamas. A former Maricopa rancheria about 45 leagues (120 m.) above the mouth of the Rio Gila in s. w. Arizona; visited by Father Sedelmair in 1744.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889.

Santa María del Agua Caliente.—Ibid., 367 (probably the same).

Dugh-sokum. Given as the name of a tribe (Mallet in Ind. Aff. Rep., 198, 1877), but really that of the place where Port Madison, Wash., now stands. (Boulet in letter, Mar. 22, 1886).

Duharhe. A country on the coast of Florida, seen by Lucas Vazquez de Ayllon in 1520, whose people were light in color and had abundant hair. The chief who ruled over this and other provinces was said to have been nourished on a certain food that caused him to grow to a gigantic size.—Barcia, Ensayo, 4, 1, 23.

Dukes, Joseph. An interpreter, the son of half-blood Choctaw parents, born in the old Choctaw country, in the present Mississippi, in 1811. He attended one of the early mission schools at Mayhew, where he made such progress that he often acted as interpreter for Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, the pioneer missionary, who never learned the Choctaw language. After the Choctaw had ceded to the United States their lands in the E., he remained in Mississippi for some years, helping Rev. Cyrus Byington prepare a Choctaw grammar and dictionary. In 1851 or 1852 he preached under the direction of Rev. Allen Wright at Wheelock, Ind. Ter., and assisted Mr Wright in translating the Old Testament. When Mr Wright was succeeded by Rev. John Edwards, in 1853, Dukes taught the latter Choctaw and aided him in translation in addition to his preaching. The first draft of the whole of the Old Testament from Genesis to II Kings, as well as of the Psalms, is attributed to him, and he probably translated also some portions of the New Testament. He died in 1861. He was the author of The History of Joseph and His Brethren (Utica, 1831, repr. 1836).—Pilling, Bibliog. Muskh. Lang., Bull. B. A. E., 1889.

Dulastunyi (Dulastún'yi, 'potsherd place'). A former Cherokee settlement on Nottely r., Cherokee co., N. C., near the Georgia line. A half-breed Cherokee ball captain who formerly lived there, John Butler, or Tsanugásita (Sour John), having been defeated in a ball game, said, in contempt of his men, that they were of no more use than broken pots.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 406, 1900.

Dulchioni. A tribe, probably Caddoan, formerly living in villages on Red r. of Louisiana, 3 leagues below those of the Natchitoches. They were visited by Bienville and St Denys in 1700, when on their journey up Red r. to open trade between the Spanish and French provinces, and by La Harpe in 1719. Further than these brief references little is known of this tribe or of its subsequent fate. (A. C. F.) Dulchanois.—La Harpe (1719) in French, Hist. Coll. La., III, 19, 1861. Dulchinois.—Ibid., 72. Gulchinois.—La Harpe in Margry, Déc., VI, 277, 1886.

Duldulthawaiame ('village where there are plenty of humming insects'). A former village of the Mishikhwutmetunne on Coquille r., Oreg. Dul-dul' ga-wai'-á-má.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folklore, III, 232, 1890.

Dull Knife. A chief of a band of Northern Cheyenne who first came into public notice in 1868 when, as one of the representatives of his tribe, he signed the treaty of Ft Laramie, May 10, made by the Northern Cheyenne and Northern Arapaho with the United States, his name appearing as "Tah-me-la-pash-me, or Dull Knife." In 1875, or early in 1876, Dull Knife's band, numbering about 400 warriors, suddenly attacked Washakie's band of Shoshoni, at that time on Big-horn r. near the mouth of Gray Bull r. In 1876 the Northern Cheyenne, including Dull Knife's band, joined the Sioux under Sitting Bull in their general uprising during this and the following year. They were present at and were participants in the Custer massacre on the Little Bighorn in June, 1876, and according to Chief Gall's statement, at the beginning of the battle the Cheyenne fought Custer's command while the Sioux attacked Reno's force, and after the latter had been driven back, the entire body of warriors turned on Custer's command. On Nov. 25, 1876, the cavalry under Col. Mackenzie attacked Dull Knife's camp at daybreak, destroying 173 lodges and capturing 500 ponies. Although the Indians escaped, with heavy loss, they later surrendered and were moved to Oklahoma and placed with the Southern Cheyenne. Greatly dissatisfied with their new home, an attempt was made by a large party under Dull Knife to escape to the N. in Sept., 1878. They were pursued and a part of them captured and confined at Ft Robinson, Nebr., whence they made a desperate attempt to escape on the night of Jan. 9, 1879, during which most of them, including Dull Knife, were killed. Consult Dunn, Massacres, 1886; Ellis, Ind. Wars, 1892; Ind. Aff. Rep. 1877-79; Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896. See the article Cheyenne. (C. T.)

Durango. A former Tepehuane settlement, now the capital of the Mexican state of the same name.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 318, 1864.

Dustayalunyi (Dústáyalún'yi, 'where it made a noise, as of thunder or shooting,' apparently referring to a lightning stroke). A former Cherokee settlement about the mouth of Shooting cr., an affluent of Hiwassee r., near Hayesville, Clay co., N. C.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 517, 1900.

Dutch influence. The influence of the Dutch on the Indians N. of Mexico was confined to the period (1609-64) from Hudson's visit to the surrender of New Amsterdam and its dependencies to the English. The region in which this influence was exerted lies between the Susquehanna and Connecticut rs., and between the Atlantic and L. Ontario. Ft Orange, now the city of Albany, was a noted trading post of the Dutch, and there they came in contact with the Iroquoian tribes of the N., in addition to the Algonquian tribes of the S. The harsh conduct of Hudson toward the Indians met by him on Hudson r. was in part responsible for many subsequent conflicts between the Dutch and the natives. The Dutch were agents in furnishing brandy to the Indians of their territory and to the surrounding tribes, thereby undoing much of the good sought to be accomplished by the French authorities. The United Company of the New Netherlands, which exercised the first controlling influence in the region of Hudson r., was succeeded in 1621 by the powerful West India Company, and in 1632 was founded the fort on Connecticut r. where is now the city of Hartford. The trade in furs with the Pequot and other tribes was extensive. Disputes soon occurred that proved detrimental to trade, and De Forest (Hist. Inds. of Conn., 73, 1852) considers that it was the loss of the Dutch trade which induced the Pequot to invite the English of Massachusetts bay to settle in Connecticut, an act that led ultimately to their own destruction. Quarrels between the Dutch of New Amsterdam and the Indians, and the savage conduct of Gov. Kieft in 1642, led to much slaughter of natives during the next 2 years, and stirred up many of the Connecticut tribes against both the English and the Dutch. Some of them had engaged in intriguing, now against one, now against the other party of the whites. Friederici (Indianer und Anglo-Amerikaner, 16, 1900) takes a more favorable view of the attitude of the Dutch toward the Indians in general than that entertained by many authorities. The Dutch helped the Iroquois confederacy against the northern Algonquian hordes, and the wars thus initiated were in progress when the English conquest took place. They also aided the Mahican against the Mohawk (Ruttenber, Ind. Tribes of Hudson R., 56, 1872) and the Seneca against the Munsee, to whom the Swedes had supplied arms. Many troubles arose from the cupidity of the traders and settlers who sold firearms and liquors to the Indians, regardless of the general policy of the government (Nelson, Inds. of New Jersey, 1894). An interesting relic of Dutch influence is the title "Kora" given by the modern Iroquois of Canada to the governor-general, or to the King of England, a corruption of Corlaer, the name of one of the Dutch governors of New Amsterdam. (A. F. C.)

D'wamish. A small body of Salish near Seattle, Wash., which city was named from a chief of this and the Suquamish tribes. Their proper seat, according to Gibbs, was at the outlet of L. Washington. In 1856 they were removed to the E. shore of Bainbridge id., but owing to the absence of a fishing ground were shortly afterward taken to Holderness point, on the W. side of Elliot bay, which was already a favorite place for fishing. The name, being well known, has been improperly applied collectively to a number of distinct bands in this neighborhood. Their population about 1856 is variously given from 64 to 312. The remnant is incorporated with the Snohomish and others under the Tulalip school, N. W. Wash., altogether numbering 465 in 1904. (J. Dyes and Pigments. Most of the Indian tribes of North America made permanent dyes from organic materials. The demand for these dyes arose when basketry, quillwork, and other textile industries had reached a considerable degree of advancement, and there was need of diversity of color in ornamentation, as well as permanency of color, which pigments alone could not supply.

Dyes.—The California tribes and many others who made baskets were usually satisfied with natural colors. These are the red and black of bark, the white of grass stems, the pale yellow of peeled rods or rushes, and the brown of root bark. A few dyes were known, however, notably a black or dark gray on splints which had been buried in mud. The Hupa obtained bright yellow from lichens, another color from the roots of the Oregon grape, and a brownish red from alder bark. Most of the tribes of the S. W. use only black for designs on baskets, and, rarely, red dyes. The Hopi, however, have a larger number of native dyes for basketry splints than any other tribe, and the Apache, Walapai, and Havasupai have a number of vegetal dyes that are not used in basketry. The Abnaki and other tribes made fugitive stains from pokeberries and fruits of the blueberry and elder. Lichens, golden-seal, bloodroot, and the bark of the butternut and other trees were also used by the northern and eastern tribes, and in southern regions the prickly pear. The Virginia Indians, according to Hariot, used sumach, a kind of seed, a small root, and the bark of a tree to dye their hair, as well as to color their faces red and to dye mantles of deerskin and the rushes for baskets and mats. The tribes of the N. W. coast employed a number of harmonious vegetal colors in their baskets. Most of the native dyes of the Indians were superseded by others introduced, especially in late years by aniline colors.

Quillwork, formerly widespread, was generally superseded by beadwork, and the native dyes employed in the art have fallen almost into disuse. Some of the N. W. coast tribes, the Eskimo, and the northern Athapascans alone practise quillworking in its purity, but its former range was extensive.

Native vegetal blanket dyes are found in use only among the Chilkat of Alaska, who still retain them in weaving their ceremonial shawls. The Nez Percés and the Navaho formerly used permanent vegetal dyes of pleasing colors for wool. With the latter these dyes have given way so recently to aniline colors that the details of their manufacture have not become lost. The use of dyes required a knowledge of mordants; for this purpose urine was commonly employed by the Navaho, Hopi, and Zuñi, besides an impure native alum, and an iron salt mixed with organic acids to produce black. It has been assumed that, since the weaver's art seems to be accultural with the Navaho, the mordant dyes may have been derived from the Pueblos, who, in turn, may have received them from the Spaniards. Matthews, however, controverts the opinion that the Navaho learned the art of weaving from the Pueblos; and indeed there is no reason why the Indians should not have become acquainted with various mordants through the practise of the culinary art or other domestic arts in which fire is employed.

Pigments.—The inorganic colors used by the Indians were mostly derived from iron-bearing minerals, such as ochers and other ores, and stained earths. These furnished various tints, as brown, red, green, blue, yellow, orange, and purple. The search for good colors was assiduously pursued; quarries were opened and a commerce in their products was carried on. White was derived from kaolin, limestone, and gypsum; black from graphite, powdered coal, charcoal, or soot; green and blue from copper ores, phosphate of iron, etc. Pigments were used for facial decoration, red being most prized, for which reason the vermilion of the trader was eagerly adopted, but the intent of face painting was generally totemic or religious and not merely ornamental. Pigments were rubbed into soft tanned skins, giving the effect of dye, and were mixed with various media for painting the wood and leather of boxes, arrows, spears, shields, tipis, robes, parfleche cases, etc. Among the Southwestern tribes in particular pigments were mixed with sand for dry-paintings (q. v.), while pigments of iron earths or kaolin were employed for decorating pottery. In connection with the preparation and use of pigments are grinding slabs and mullers, mortars and pestles, brushes and paint sticks, and a great variety of pouches and pots for carrying or for preserving them. The media for applying the pigments varied with the objects to be decorated and with tribal or personal usage. In general, face paint was mixed with grease or saliva, while the medium for wood or skin was grease or glue. The N. W. coast Indians put grease on their faces before applying the paint. Among some of the Pueblos, at least, an emulsion of fat seeds was made with the pigment, and this was applied by spurling from the mouth. Eagle. Among the many birds held in superstitious and appreciative regard by the aborigines of North America, the eagle, by reason of its majestic, solitary, and mysterious nature, became an especial object of worship. This is expressed in the employment of the eagle by the Indian for religious and esthetic purposes only. The wing-bones were fashioned into whistles to be carried by warriors or used in ceremonies, and the talons formed powerful amulets or fetishes, having secondary value as ornaments; the feathers were, however, of greatest importance. The capture of eagles for their feathers was a hazardous branch of hunting, requiring great skill. Among some tribes eagle-killing was delegated to certain men. Owing to the difficulty of getting within bowshot of the bird, it was often trapped or the eyrie was visited to secure the young. Eagles are still kept in captivity by the Pueblo Indians as in the time of Coronado (14th Rep. B. A. E., 516, 1896). The striking war-bonnet of the Plains tribes was made of eagle feathers and was highly valued, for it is said that one pony was the price of a perfect tail of 12 feathers of the "war eagle," i. e., the white plumes with black tips. Other varieties, with bars across the feathers, are regarded as inferior (Mooney). Warriors of the Plains tribes usually wore the feathers of the golden eagle only, and it is probable that the customs of many tribes prescribed like discriminations as to feathers of different species. Many tribes wore one or more eagle feathers in the hair, and these feathers were often cut, colored, or otherwise decorated with some cognizance of the wearer (see Heraldry). It was the custom of the Pillager Chipewa to allow a warrior who scalped an enemy to wear on his head two eagle feathers, and the act of capturing a wounded prisoner on the battlefield earned the distinction of wearing five. Fans made of the primary feathers of the eagle formed an accessory to the costume of the Sioux and other tribes. Eagle feathers were also attached as ornaments to the buckskin shirts worn by men, and war costumes and paraphernalia, including shields, were ornamented with them. As one of the prominent totemic animals, the eagle gave its name to many clans and religious fraternities. It is probable that nearly every tribe in the United States recognizing clan or gentile organization had an eagle clan or gens at some period in its history.

The eagle held an important place in symbolic art. It was depicted by all the methods of art expression known to the Indian, appearing on pottery, basketry, textiles, beadwork, quillwork, shields, crests, totem poles, house and grave posts, pipes, rattles, and objects pertaining to cult and ceremony. It was also represented in the primitive drama connected with ceremonies. Many tribes possessed eagle deities, as the Kwahu, the eagle kachina of the Hopi of Arizona, and the Eagle god of the Miwok of California.

Among the Haida, passes made with eagle fans were thought to be effectual in conjuring, and this use reappears in many tribes. The wing-bones were often employed as sucking tubes, with which medicine-men pretended to remove disease. The Tlingit and other North Pacific tribes used eagle down for ceremonial sprinkling on the hair, masks, and dance costume; it was also scattered in the air, being blown through a tube or sprinkled by hand. The Pawnee and other Plains tribes as well as the Pueblos also used the down in ceremonies, and it was probably a general custom. Among the Hopi the eagle is generally associated with the Sky god, and its feathers are used with disks to represent the Sun god (Fewkes).

The use of eagle feathers in religion is nowhere better shown than among the Pueblos, when downy plumes are attached to masks, rattles, prayer-sticks (q. v.), and other cult objects entering into ceremonies. For this purpose a great quantity of feathers is yearly required. The Hopi clans claimed the eagle nests in the localities where they formerly resided, and caught in traps or took from the nests eaglets, whose down was used in ceremonies. The eaglets, when required for feathers, have their heads washed; they are killed by pressure on the thorax, and buried with appropriate rites in special cemeteries, in which offerings of small wooden images and bows and arrows are yearly deposited. The interior Salish also are said by Teit to have property in eagles. Near the present Hopi villages there are shrines in which offerings of eagle eggs carved from wood are placed during the winter solstice for the increase of eagles. Among the Zuni, feathers shed by their captive eagles have special significance, though the feathers are also regularly plucked and form a staple article of trade.

The mythology of almost every tribe is replete with eagle beings, and the widespread thunderbird myth relates in some cases to the eagle. In Hopi myth the Man-eagle is a sky-being who lays aside his plumage after flights in which he spreads devastation, and the hero who slays him is carried to the house in the sky by eagles of several species, each one in its turn bearing him higher. The Man-eagle myth is widely diffused, most tribes regarding this being as a manifestation of either helpful or maleficent power.

Eagle Hills Assiniboin. A band of Assiniboin of 35 lodges living in 1808 between Bear hills and South Saskatchewan r., Assiniboia, Canada.—Henry-Thompson Jour., Coues ed., II, 523, 1897.

Earth lodge. A dwelling partly underground, circular in form, from 30 to 60 ft in diameter, with walls about 6 ft high, on which rested a dome-shaped roof with an opening in the center to afford light within and to permit the egress of smoke. The entrance was a projecting passageway from 6 to 14 ft long. The method of construction was first to draw a circle on the ground and excavate the earth within it from 2 to 4 ft deep. About 1½ ft within the circle were set crotched posts some 8 or 10 ft apart, on which were laid beams. Outside these posts were set others, one end of them braced against the bottom of the bank of earth at the periphery of the circle, and the other end leaning against the beams, forming a close stockade, an opening being left at the E. side for the entrance. Midway between the center of the excavation and the stockade were planted 4, 6, or 8 tall crotched posts, forming an inner circle. In the crotches were laid heavy beams to support the roof. The bark was stripped from all the posts and beams. The roof was formed of long, slender, tapering tree trunks, stripped of bark. The large ends were tied with strings of the inner bark of the elm to the beams at the top of the stockade, and the middle to those resting in the crotches of the inner circle of posts. The slender ends were cut so as to form the circular opening in the center of the roof, 2 or 3 ft in diameter. Outside this framework branches of willow were placed close together across the posts of the wall and the beams of the roof, and bound tightly to each pole, beginning at the ground and continuing upward to the central opening. Over the willow branches a heavy thatch of coarse dried grass was laid, tied in bundles and arranged so that it would shed water. Over the thatch was placed a thick coating of sods, cut so that they could be lapped, and laid like shingles. The wall and roof were afterward carefully tamped with earth and made impervious to rain. The long entranceway was built in the same manner as the lodge, and thatched and sodded at the same time. The grass of the sod continued to grow, and wild flowers brightened the walls and roof of the dwelling. The blackened circle around the central opening in the roof, produced by the heat and smoke, was the only suggestion that the verdant mound was a human abode. Within, the floor was made hard by a series of tappings, in which both water and fire were used. The fireplace was circular in shape and slightly excavated. A curtain of skin hung at the opening from the passageway into the lodge. The outer door was covered with a skin that was stiffened by sticks at the top and bottom, which was turned to one side to give entrance to the passageway. The couches of the occupants were placed around the wall, and frequently were inclosed by reed mats which could be raised or lowered. More than one family sometimes occupied a lodge, and in such case the families took different sides. The back part, opposite the entrance, was reserved for the keeping of sacred objects and the reception of guests. In the winter curtains of skin were hung from the beams of the inner circle of posts, making a smaller room about the fireplace. The shields and weapons of the men were suspended from these inner posts, giving color to the interior of the dwelling, which was always picturesque, whether seen at night, when the fire leaped up and glinted on the polished blackened roof and when at times the lodge was filled with men and women in their gala dress at some social meeting or religious ceremony, or during the day when the shaft of sunlight fell through the central opening over the fireplace, bringing into relief some bit of aboriginal life and leaving the rest of the lodge in deep shadow. Few, if any, large and well-built earth lodges exist at the present day. Even with care a lodge could be made to last only a generation or two.

Ceremonies attended the erection of an earth lodge from the marking of the circle to the putting on of the sods. Both men and women took part in these rites and shared in the labor of building. To cut, haul, and set the heavy posts and beams was the men's task; the binding, thatching, and sodding that of the women.

The earth lodge was used by the Pawnee, Arikara, Omaha, Ponca, Osage, and other tribes. A similar abode was found in the Aleutian ids., on Kodiak id., and in s. w. Alaska. There were habitations among some of the California tribes that had features in common with the earth lodge, and there are evidences of relationship between it, the Navaho hogan, and one form of Pima dwelling.

Among the Pawnee are preserved the most elaborate ceremonies and traditions pertaining to the earth lodge. These tribes are said to have abandoned the grass house of their kindred at some distant period and, under the teaching of aquatic animals, to have learned to construct the earth lodge. According to their ceremonies and legends, not only the animals were concerned with its construction—the badger digging the holes, the beaver sawing the logs, the bears carrying them, and all obeying the directions of the whale—but the stars also exercised authority. The earlier star cult of the people is recognized in the significance attached to the four central posts. Each stood for a star—the Morning and Evening stars, symbols of the male and female cosmic forces, and the North and South stars, the direction of chiefs and the abode of perpetual life. The posts were painted in the symbolic colors of these stars—red, white, black, yellow. During certain ceremonies corn of one of these colors was offered at the foot of the post of that color. In the rituals of the Pawnee the earth lodge is made typical of man's abode on the earth; the floor is the plain, the wall the distant horizon, the dome the arching sky, the central opening the zenith, dwelling place of Tirawa, the invisible power which gives life to all created beings.

The history of the distribution of this kind of dwelling among peoples widely scattered is a problem not yet fully solved. See Grass lodge, Habitations. (A. C. F.)

East Abeika. (Aibeika, 'unhealthful place'). A former Choctaw town at the mouth of Straight cr., an affluent of the Sukenatcha, in Kemper co., Miss. Eastern Indians. A collective term applied by the early New England writers to all the tribes n. e. of Merrimac r. It is used by Hubbard as early as 1680. These tribes, including the Pennacook, Abnaki, Malecite, and Micmac, were generally in the French interest and hostile to the English. (J. M.)

Eastern Indians.—Form used by most early English writers. Eastward Indians.—Winthrop (1700) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 612, 1864. Eastward Indians.—Owaneco (1700), ibid., 614 ("the Nowon-thewog or the Eastward Indians").

Eastern Shawnee. A division of the Shawnee now living in Indian Ter. They formerly lived with the Seneca (Mingo) near Lewistown, Ohio, but sold their lands in 1831 and removed with the latter tribe to Kansas. In 1867 they separated from the Seneca and removed to Indian Ter. under the name of Eastern Shawnee. They are now under the Seneca school and numbered 95 in 1904. (J. M.)

East Greenlanders. The Eskimo inhabiting the e. coast of Greenland. They are divided into two groups: The Angmagsalingmiut, inhabiting the fjords about C. Dan; and the southern group, formerly scattered along the coast southward. They have long lived in complete isolation, three-fourths of them in the Angmagsalik district, others farther s. about Iluilek, C. Bille, and Tingmiarmiut. (Nansen, First Crossing of Greenland, i, 321-371, 1890). They have developed some of the peculiar arts of the Eskimo to their highest perfection, especially the use of harpoons with shafts that become detached and float in the water, while the seal swims off with the line and bladder, and of flexible-jointed lances also for killing the struggling animal. The more easily handled double bladder is their invention. They employ the double-bladed paddle altogether, wear skin-tight garments that fit in the waist of the kaiaik so closely that no water can enter, and when overturned in the sea they are able to right themselves single handed with the paddle. The ornamental arts of the East Greenlanders are neglected, except among one isolated band in the remote N. E. Their winter houses, made of stones and sod, are long and narrow, with family benches on one side, and can be stretched out to accommodate more people than the square houses of Alaska. The large public buildings of the western tribes they know only by tradition. The East Greenlanders numbered 548, comprising 245 males and 303 females, in 1884, not counting a few scattered families of unknown numbers living N. of 68° (Rink, Eskimo Tribes, 1887). The entire southern group of the East Greenlanders, all the pagan Eskimo of Tingmiarmiut and the other places S. of Angmagssalik, 114 individuals altogether, emigrated between 1887 and 1900 to Kernertok, near C. Farewell.

The villages and settlements of the East Greenlanders, past and present, are as follows: Akernivak, Akorninarmiut, Aluik, Aluk, Amivik, Anarnisok, Angmagssalik, Anoritok, Aputitek, Atangime, Auarkat, Estale, Igdluarsuk, Ikatek, Ikerasak, Iluilek, Imarsivik, Ingmikertok, Inigsalik, Inugsuut, Ivimiut, Kangarsik, Kangigdlele, Kemisak, Kernertok, Kialinek, Kikertarsoak, Kinarbik, Koremiut, Kumarmiut, Kutek, Manitsuk, Nanusek, Narsuk, Norajik, Norsit, Nualik, Nunakitit, Okiosorbik, Orkua, Patuterajuit, Pikiutdlele, Sangmisok, Sarkarmiut, Sermiligak, Sermilik, Sivinganek, Sivingarnarsik, Tarsia, Tasiussarsik, Taterat, Tingmiarmiut, Umanak, Umivik, Utorarmiut.

Eastman, Charles Alexander (Ohiyesa, 'the Winner'). A Santee Dakota physician and author, born in 1858 near Redwood Falls, Minn. His father was a full-blood Sioux named Many Lightnings, and his mother the half-blood daughter of a well-known army officer. His mother dying soon after his birth, he was reared by his paternal grandmother and an uncle, who after the Minnesota massacre in 1862 fled with the boy into Canada. Here he lived the life of a wild Indian until he was 15 years of age, when his father, who in the meantime had accepted Christianity and civilization, sought him out and brought him home to Flandreau, S. Dak., where a few Sioux families had established themselves as farmers and homesteaders. Ohiyesa was placed in the mission school at Santee, Nebr., where he made such progress in 2 years that he was selected for a more advanced course and sent to Beloit College, Beloit, Wis. After 2 years spent there in the preparatory department he went to Knox College, Galesburg, Ill., thence to Kimball Academy and Dartmouth College, New Hampshire. He was graduated from Dartmouth in 1887, and immediately entered the Boston University school of medicine, receiving the degree of M. D. in 1890. Dr Eastman was then appointed Government physician to the Pine Ridge agency, S. Dak., and served there nearly 3 years, through the ghost-dance disturbance and afterward. In 1893 he went to St Paul, Minn., and entered there on the practice of medicine, also serving for 3 years as traveling secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association among the Indians. Afterward he was attorney for the Sioux at Washington, and later again Government physician at Crow Creek, S. Dak. In 1903 he was appointed by the Office of Indian Affairs to the special work of revising the allotment rolls and selecting permanent family names for the Sioux. His first book, "Indian Boyhood," appeared in 1902, and "Red Hunters and the Animal People" in 1904. He is an occasional contributor to the magazines and lectures frequently on Indian life and history. In 1891 Dr Eastman married Miss Elaine Goodale, of Massachusetts, and they have 6 children.

Eastman, John (Mahpiyewakankidan, 'Sacred Cloud Worshipper'). A Santee Dakota of three-fourths blood, brother of Charles Alexander Eastman, noted as being a college-bred Presbyterian clergyman; born in Mar., 1849, at Shakopee, Minn. His father was Many Lightnings, a full-blood Sioux, who, on becoming a Christian in 1864, took the name of Jacob Eastman. His mother, Mary Nancy Eastman, was the daughter of Capt. Seth Eastman, an American army officer, and maternal granddaughter of Cloudman, a Sioux chief. He continued with his father, except for one year at Beloit College, Wis., until the latter died in 1876. The same year he was ordained as a Presbyterian minister at Flandreau, S. Dak., and installed as pastor of the Indian church of Flandreau township, which had been organized in 1871 and provided by the Presbyterian Mission Board with a building in 1874. Mr Eastman took charge of a Government school and began teaching the youth of the Santee res. in 1878, but resigned this charge in 1885 in order to accept the position of overseer of the band then living in Flandreau township. He retired from this position in 1896 and now devotes much of his attention to the work of his ministry and the cultivation of a small farm purchased some years ago. His church now numbers 96 communicants. In 1874 Mr Eastman married Miss Mary J. Fari-bault, a half-blood Santee. They are parents of 6 children. Mr Eastman is still active in tribal affairs, and since about 1880 has annually served in the capacity of delegate of his people at Washington.

Eat the Ham. A former Sans Arc band under a medicine-man named Wichasha-wakan.—Culbertson in Smithsonian. Rep. 1850, 142, 1851.

Ebahamo. An extinct tribe formerly dwelling on Matagorda bay, Tex. La Salle constructed his Ft St Louis within the territory of this tribe and of the Quelanhubeches, or Karankawa, who probably were a cognate people. Joutel (1687) states in his narrative (French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 134, 1846) that La Salle recorded a vocabulary of their language, which is very different from that of the Cenie (Caddo) and more difficult; that they were neighbors and allies of the latter people and understood some of their words. "At our fort at St Louis bay," he says, "we made some stay to cultivate the friendship of our Bracamos (as the Indian nation that dwells near our fort is called), in order to leave protectors to the people whom we would have to leave in the fort." Echota (corruption of Itsa'ti, meaning unknown). The name of several Cherokee towns. (1) the most important—often distinguished as Great Echota—was on the S. side of Little Tennessee r., a short distance below Citico cr., in Monroe co., Tenn. It was the ancient capital and sacred "peace town" of the nation. At that place there is a large mound. (2) Little Echota was on Sautee (Itsa'ti) cr., a head-stream of the Chattahoochee, W. of Clarksville, Ga. (3) New Echota, the capital of the nation for some years before the removal, was established at a spot, originally known as Gänsägi, at the junction of Oostanaula and Conasauga rs., in Gordon co., Ga. It was sometimes called Newtown. (4) The old Macedonian mission on Socco cr., of the North Carolina res., is also known to the Cherokee as Itsa'ti, as was also (5) the great Nacoochee mound. Eushaw. See Cushaw.

Edelano. An unidentified village on an island in St Johns r., Fla., in the 16th century.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 287, 1869.

Edenshaw (or Edensaw, from a Tlingit word referring to the glacier). The Haida chief best known to the whites. He succeeded early in the 19th century to the chieftainship of the strong Stustas kinship group which centered in the town of Kioosta on the coast of Graham id. opposite North id., Brit. Col. Shortly after 1860, his people having fallen off in numbers, he moved with them to Kung, at the mouth of Naden harbor, where he erected a large house, which is still standing. Through the exercise of his exceptional abilities in trade and in various other ways he became one of the wealthiest of the Haida chiefs. His relations with the whites were always cordial, and it was through his influence that a missionary was sent to Masset. Among other good offices to the whites, he protected the crew of an American vessel when threatened by other natives. He died about 1885. A monument mentioning his kind treatment of the whites stands in Masset. (J. R. S.)

Edgipiliik.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 46, 1885. Edgipalik.—Keane in Stanford, Comp. Cent. and S. Am., 512, 1878.

Edisto. A small tribe, now extinct, which appears to have occupied lower Edisto r., S. C., which derived its name from that of the tribe. The Huguenots of Ribault's colony were kindly welcomed by them in 1562, and the Spaniards for a time had a mission among them. They were included in the Cusabo group, and are mentioned in connection with the Stono, Westo, and Savannah as still living in the region named in 1670, when English colonization began. With the Westo and Stono they were possibly driven out by the Shawnee in 1680. Gatschet thinks it probable that they spoke the Uchean language. See Moonsey, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894.

Adusta.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., ii, map, 1591. Adusta.—Laudonnière (1567) in Hakluyt, Voy., 379, 1600. Edistee.—Gallatin in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 83, 1836. Edisto.—Adair, Hist. Inds., 325, 1775. Edistow.—Harris, Voy. and Trav., i, map, 1705. Orista.—Fontaneda (ca. 1570) in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., xx, 15, 1841. Oristauna.—Brigstock (1623) quoted by French, Hist. Coll. La., ii, 186, 1876.

Edjao (Edjao*). A Haida town situated around a hill of the same name, at the e. end of Masset village, Queen Charlotte id., Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Aoyaku-Inagai, a branch of the Yaku-lanas, and, according to the old men, consisted in later times of about 6 houses, which would have contained nearly a hundred persons. Later it came to be included within the limits of Masset.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 99, 1905.

Edjao.—Boas, Twelfth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Hä-jü hää.—Krause, Tlinkit-Indianer, 304, 1886 ('people of Edjao'; probably the same).

Edjieretrukenade ('buffalo people'). An Athapascan tribe of the Chipewyan group living along the banks of Buffalo r., Athabasca, Canada.

Edjiera-pou-khé-nadé.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 363, 1891 ('buffalo people').

Education. The aborigines of North America had their own systems of education, through which the young were instructed in their coming labors and obligations, embracing not only the whole round of economic pursuits—hunting, fishing, handicraft, agriculture, and household work—but speech, fine art, customs, etiquette, social obligations, and tribal lore. By unconscious absorption and by constant inculcation the boy and girl became the accomplished man and woman. Motives of pride or shame, the stimulus of flattery or disparagement, wrought constantly upon the child, male or female, who was the charge, not of the parents and grandparents alone but of the whole tribe (Heckewelder). Loekiel (p. 139) says the Iroquois are particularly attentive to the education of the young people for the future government of the state, and for this purpose admit a boy, generally the nephew of the principal chief, to the council and solemn feast following it.

The Eskimo were most careful in teaching their girls and boys, setting them difficult problems in canoeing, sledging, and hunting, showing them how to solve them, and asking boys how they would meet a given emergency (see Child life). Everywhere there was the closest association, for education, of parents with children, who learned the names and uses of things in nature. At a tender age they played at serious business, girls attending to household duties, boys following men's pursuits. Children were furnished with appropriate toys; they became little basket makers, weavers, potters, water carriers, cooks, archers, stone workers, watchers of crops and flocks, the range of instruction being limited only by tribal custom. Personal responsibilities were laid on them, and they were stimulated by the tribal law of personal property, which was inviolable. Among the Pueblos cult images and paraphernalia were their playthings, and they early joined the fraternities, looking forward to social duties and initiation. The Apache boy had for pedagogues his father and grandfather, who began early to teach him counting, to run on level ground, then up and down hill, to break branches from trees, to jump into cold water, and to race, the whole training tending to make him skilful, strong, and fearless. The girl was trained in part by her mother, but chiefly by the grandmother, the discipline beginning as soon as the child could control her movements, but never becoming regular or severe. It consisted in rising early, carrying water, helping about the home, cooking, and minding children. At 6 the little girl took her first lessons in basketry with yucca leaves. Later on decorated baskets, saddle-bags, beadwork, and dress were her care.

On the coming of the whites a new era of secular education, designed and undesigned, began. All the natives, young and old, were pupils, and all the whites who came in contact with them were instructors, whether purposely or through the influence of their example and patronage. The undesigned instruction can not be measured, but its effect was profound. The Indian passed at once into the iron age; the stone period, except in ceremony, was moribund. So radical was the change in the eastern tribes that it is difficult now to illustrate their true life in museum collections.

An account of the designed instruction would embrace all attempts to change manners, customs, and motives, to teach reading and writing in the foreign tongue, to acquaint the Indians with new arts and industries, and to impress or force upon them the social organization of their conquerors. The history of this systematic instruction divides itself into the period of (1) discovery and exploration, (2) colonization and settlement, (3) Colonial and Revolutionary times, (4) the growth of the national policy, and (5) the present system.

Parts of the area here considered were discovered and explored by several European nations at dates wide apart. All of them aroused the same wonder at first view, traded their manufactures for Indian products, smoked the pipe of peace, and opened friendly relations. The Norwegians began their acculturation of Greenland in the year 1000. The Spanish pioneers were Ponce de León, Narvaez, Cabeza de Vaca, Marcos de Niza, De Soto, Coronado, Cabrillo, and many others. The French appeared in Canada and in the Mississippi valley, and were followed by the English in Virginia and in New England, the Dutch in New York, the Swedes in New Jersey, the Quakers in Pennsylvania, and the Russians in Alaska. Instruction, designed and undesigned, immediately ensued, teaching the Indians many foreign industrial processes, the bettering of their own, and the adoption of firearms, and metal tools and utensils. Domestic animals (horses, donkeys, cattle, sheep, goats, poultry) and many vegetables found congenial environment. It was through these and other practical lessons that the missionaries and teachers of the early days, who came to Christianize young Indians and bestow on them an education, were more successful instructors than they knew. By the subtle process of suggestion, the inevitable action of mind upon mind, the Indians received incalculable training in all arts and the fashion of living. Failures to accomplish the most cherished object of the missionaries grew out of the great distance which separated the two races, and of the contrary influences of many of the whites who were first on the spot, not from lack of zeal or ability. The Roman Catholic clergy were at first the most efficient agents of direct instruction; besides carrying on their proper missionary work they exerted themselves to mitigate the harsh treatment visited on the Indian. In the 16th century the expedition of Narvaez to Florida was accompanied by Franciscans under Padre Juan Juarez, and the appearance of Cabeza de Vaca in Mexico prompted Fray Marcos de Niza's journey to the N. as far as Zuni, and of the expedition of Coronado, who left Fray Juan de Padilla and a lay brother in Quivira, on the Kansas plains, as well as a friar and a lay brother at Tiguex and Pecos, respectively, all destined to be killed by the natives. The subsequent history of the S. W. records a series of disasters to the immediate undertakings, but permanent success in practical education.

In 1567 the agricultural education of Indians was tried in Florida by the Jesuit

Early in the 17th century Franciscan missions were established among the Apalachee and neighboring tribes, afterward to be abandoned, but forming the first link in the chain of causes which has brought these Indians through their minority under guardianship to mature self-dependence. Concentration for practical instruction was established in California by the Franciscans (see California, Indians of). The results achieved by the missions in the S. W. were chiefly practical and social. Domestic animals, with the art of domestication and industries depending on their products, were permanently acquired. Foreign plants, including wheat, peaches, and grapes, were introduced, gunpowder was adopted in place of the bow, and new practices and customs, good and bad, came into vogue. The early French missions in North America were among (1) the Abnaki in Maine, (2) the Huron in Ontario, Michigan, and Ohio, (3) the Iroquois in New York, (4) the Ottawa in Wisconsin and Michigan, (5) the Illinois in the middle W., and (6) the tribes of Louisiana. Bishop Laval founded a school at Quebec for French and Indian youth, Father de Smet planted the first Catholic mission among the Salish tribes, and Canadian priests visited the natives on Puget sd. and along the coast of Washington.

One of the objects in colonizing Virginia, mentioned in the charter of 1606 and repeated in that of 1621, was to bring the infidels and savages to human civility and a settled and quiet government (Neill). Henrico College was founded in 1618. The council of Jamestown in 1619 voted to educate Indian children in religion, a civil course of life, and in some useful trade. George Thorpe, superintendent of education at Henrico, gave a cheering account of his labors in 1621. Many youths were taken to England to be educated. William and Mary College was founded in 1691, and special provisions were made in the charter of Virginia for the instruction of Indians (Hist. College of William and Mary, 1874). Braser-ton manor was purchased through the charity of Robert Boyle, the yearly rents and profits being devoted to a boarding-school foundation in William and Mary College. In Maryland no schools were founded, but the settlers and Indians exchanged knowledge of a practical kind. The interesting chapter of Indian education in New England includes, during the 17th century, the offering of their children for instruction, the translation of the Bible (1646-90) into their language by Eliot (see Eliot Bible), the founding of Natick, the appointment of a superintendent of Indians (Daniel Gookin, 1656-86), and the provision for Indian youth in Harvard. The spirit and methods of instruction in the 18th century are revealed in the adoption of Indian children by the colonists (Samson Occum, for example), the founding of Moor's charity school, Bishop Berkeley's gift to Yale, the labors of Eleazer Wheelock (1729), and the founding of Dartmouth College in 1754 (see Fletcher, Ind. Education and Civilization, 1888). In New York and other northern states large sums of money were appropriated for the instruction of Indians, and in Princeton College special provisions were made for their education.

The Moravians, models of thrift and good will, had in their hearts wherever they went the welfare of the aborigines as a private and public burden.

Between 1741 and 1761 began, under Vitus Bering and his successors, the series of lessons given for the acculturation of the Aleut, Eskimo, and Indians of Alaska. Schools were formally opened in Kodiak in 1794, and a little later in Sitka. This chapter in education includes the Russian Company's schools, as well as military, Government, and church schools. Pupils were taught the Russian and English languages, geography, history, arithmetic, geometry, trigonometry, and navigation. Industrial training was compulsory in many cases. Dall (Alaska, 1870) speaks of the great aptness of the Aleuts in receiving instruction. In all areas the voyageur, the trapper, the trader, the missionary, the settler, the school-teacher, and Government authorities were partners in education. The contact, whenever it took place, had its effect in a generation or two. The making of treaties with the Indians afforded an object lesson in practical affairs. Old things passed away whose nature and very existence and structure can be proved now only by impressions on ancient pottery or remains in caverns and graves. The twofold education embraced new dietaries, utensils, and modes of preparing and eating food; new materials and fashions in dress and implements for making clothing; new or modified habitations and their appurtenances and furniture; new productive industries and new methods of quarrying and mining, woodcraft, hunting, trapping, and fishing; the introduction of gunpowder, domestic animals, and foreign handicrafts; the adoption of calendars and clocks, and the habit of steady employment for wages; new social institutions, manners, customs, and fashions, not always for the better; foreign words and jargons for new ideas and activities; new esthetic ideas; changes in the clan and tribal life, and accessions to native beliefs and forms of worship borrowed from the conquerors.

In the Canadian colonies little was done for secular and industrial education by the provincial governments prior to confederation. The Roman Catholic missions inherited from the French, Anglican missions sent from the mother country, the New England Company's missions among the Six Nations and Mohawk, and Methodist schools founded by Lord Elgin and others, as well as those managed by Presbyterians, Baptists, and Congregationalists, all combined common school instruction and training in the practical arts with their special work (see Missions). After the confederation (1867) the subject was taken up systematically and contract schools were established and put into the hands of the Christian denominations. In the older provinces agriculture and other industries had largely taken the place of primitive arts. After the admission of British Columbia, Manitoba, and the Northwest Territory into the Dominion, steps were taken to establish systematic training in those provinces. In 1904 there were 24 industrial, 46 boarding, and 228 day schools in operation. Day schools among the tribes aim to secure the cooperation of parents; the boarding schools especially cultivate industrial training for various bread-winning trades; normal schools and girls' homes have been established to teach self-support under new conditions. Improvement in dwellings has developed a stronger attachment to home, as well as bettered health and raised the moral tone, for when houses are furnished with stoves, beds, tables, chairs, musical instruments, and sewing machines, the tastes of the occupants are elevated and other thoughts stimulated. Indians become individual owners of farms and of flocks and herds and sell the produce; they partake of the benefits of commerce and transportation and acquire thrift. Competition in fairs and exhibitions stimulates proficiency in both the old and the new activities. The purpose of the Canadian government has been to encourage the Indians to emerge from a condition of tutelage and continue voluntarily what they have learned under close supervision. The schools discourage premature marriages and educate the young prospective mothers. Education has made the aborigines law-respecting, prosperous, and contented. Far from being a menace to or a burden upon the commonwealth, they contribute in many ways to its welfare. The able-bodied in the mixed farming districts have become practically self-supporting (Pedley in Can. Ind. Aff. for 1904).

After the establishment of the United States government the following Christian bodies either instituted secular day and boarding schools among the Indians or continued those already in existence, and these schools have borne a large part in Indian education: Roman Catholic and Moravians from colonial times; Friends (Orthodox), 1795; Baptist, 1807; American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, 1810; Episcopal, 1815; Methodist Episcopal, 1816; Presbyterian (North), 1833; Old School Presbyterians, 1837; Methodist Episcopal (South), 1844; Congregational American Missionary Association, 1846; Reformed Dutch, 1857; Presbyterian (South), 1857; Friends (Hicksite), 1869; United Presbyterian, 1869; Unitarian, 1886. Miss Alice C. Fletcher affirms that the missionary labors among the Indians have been as largely educational as religious. Until 1870 all Government aid for this object passed through the hands of the missionaries.

On July 12, 1775, a committee on Indian affairs was appointed in the Continental Congress, with Gen. Schuyler as chairman, and in the following year a standing committee was created. Money was voted to support Indian students at Dartmouth and Princeton colleges. After the War Department was created, in 1789, Indian affairs were left in the hands of its Secretary until 1849, when the Department of the Interior was established and the Indian Bureau was transferred thereto. Gen. Knox, Washington's Secretary of War, urged industrial education, and the President was of the same mind. In his message of 1801 President Adams noted the success of continued efforts to introduce among the Indians the implements and practices of husbandry and the household arts.

The first petition of an Indian for schools among his tribe was made by David Folsom, a Choctaw, in 1816. The Ottawa, in their treaty (1817) and in their address to President Monroe (1822), stipulated for industrial and literary education. In 1819 a first appropriation of $10,000 was made by Congress for Indian education, the superintendents and agents to be nominated by the President. In 1823 there were 21 schools receiving Government aid, and the number was increased to 38 in 1825. The first contract school was established on the Tulalip res., Wash., in 1869, but it was not until 1873 that Government schools proper were provided. In the beginning there were only day schools, later boarding schools on the reservations, and finally boarding schools remote from them. The training in all these schools was designed to bring the Indians nearer to civilized life, with a view to ultimate citizenship by enabling them to assimilate the speech, industrial life, family organization, social manners and customs, civil government, knowledge, modes of thinking, and ethical standards of the whites. The change to agriculture and sedentary industries had a profound effect in developing a sense of continuous responsibility. A school was established at Carlisle, Pa., in 1879, by Capt. R. H. Pratt, U. S. A., for the purpose of educating Indian boys and girls by separating them from their tribal life so as to prepare them to live and labor in contact with white people (see Carlisle School). To this end they are taught in the school as far as the high-school grade, and instruction is given in mechanical trades and domestic work. In order to facilitate association with the white population the "outing system" was adopted, by which pupils are permitted to go out during vacations to earn money. Boys and girls are also placed in families where they may work for their board, and perhaps more, and attend school. Thus the young Indians are trained in home life and associate with white children. Contract schools were abandoned June 30, 1900; the religious societies have since taken care of their own schools, and the appropriation for Indian education is applied under the law entirely to Government schools. About 100 students receive higher instruction in Hampton Institute. One of the latest experiments is that of Rev. Sheldon Jackson in connection with the introduction of domesticated reindeer into Alaska. These are allotted to mission and other schools, and instruction in the care and use of them is a part of the training.

The present scheme of education adopted by the Indian Office is to teach the pupils English, arithmetic, geography, and United States history, and also to train them in farming and the care of stock and in trades, as well as gymnastics. This requires the maintenance of day, boarding, and training schools, 253 now in all, with 2,300 employees, involving an annual expenditure of nearly $5,000,000. Some of these Indian schools are models (see Chillico Indian Industrial School). Allotment of land has been the means of sending Indian children to district schools with white children. Indian teachers are being employed and parents are coming to be interested.

While on some reservations there are still Indian children who never saw a school, the great mass have ceased to be indifferent. The results of a century's efforts are immeasurable. Indians now take their places beside whites in many of the industrial pursuits and in the higher walks as well. The best evidence that the Indian is capable of civilization is the list of those who have succeeded. The Government has been stimulated, advised, and aided all along by associations of benevolent men and women who have freely given their time and means for the education and uplifting of the Indians, with various motives, some seeking the preservation of tribal life, arts, and customs, some their extinction. See Carlisle School, Chillico Indian Industrial School, Dutch influence, English influence, French influence, Spanish influence, etc., Governmental policy, Missions.

Eeh. A band or division of the Iru-waitau of Scott valley, Siskiyou co., Cal.; noted by Gibbs as living with the Watsahewa in 1851.

E-eh.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 171, 1858. E-eh.—McKee (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 171, 1853.

Eeksen (E'ersén). A Salish tribe about Oyster bay, E. coast of Vancouver id., speaking the Comox dialect.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Eel River Indians. A part of the Miami, formerly living in Indiana. Their village was at Thorntown, Boone co., where they had a reservation, which was sold in 1828, the band removing to the Miami res. between the Wabash and Eel rs., in Miami co. They afterward shared the general fortunes of the tribe.

Eesteytoch. Given as a tribe on Cascade inlet, Brit. Col.; probably a village group of the Bellacoola.

Eestey-toch.—Kane, Wand. in N. Am., app., 1859.

Efaca. A Timucua clan belonging to the Acheha phratry.—Pareja (1612-14) quoted by Gatschet in Proc. Am. Philos. Soc., xvii, 492, 1878.

Egan. An Algonquian settlement in Maniwaki township, Ottawa co., Quebec, containing 225 Indians in 1884.

Egedesminde. A missionary station on Davis str., w. Greenland.—Crantz, Hist. Greenland, 1, 14, 1767.

Eguianna-cahel ('water-hole of the mountain'). A rancheria, probably Cochimi, connected with Purisima (Cade-gomo) mission, Lower California, in the 18th century.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 189, 1857.

Ehartsar. A band of the Crows, one of the four into which Lewis divided the tribe.

Eh-art-sar.—Lewis, Trav., 175, 1809. Eh-há-tá.—Long, Exped. Rocky Mts., II, lxxxiv, 1823 (Hidatsa name: 'leaf people').

Ehatisaht. A Nootka tribe on Esperanza inlet, w. coast of Vancouver id., Brit. Col.; pop. 101 in 1902, 95 in 1904. Their principal village is Oke. From their waters came the larger part of the supply of dentalium shells extensively used on the Pacific coast as media of exchange.

Ehouae ('one battered it.'—Hewitt). A village of the Tionontati existing in 1640.

EhSae.—Jes. Rel. 1641, 69, 1858.—Ehwae.—Shea, note in Charlevoix, New France, II, 153, 1866. Saint Pierre et saint Paul.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 96, 1858.

Ehressarenon. The Huron name of a tribe mentioned by Ragueneau in 1640 as living s. of St Lawrence r. (Jes. Rel. 1640, 35, 1858). It can not now be identified with any tribe s. of the St Lawrence. Perhaps Iroquoian, as are some of the tribes mentioned in the same list.

Ehutewa. A Luisefio village formerly in the neighborhood of San Luis Rey mission, s. Cal. (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 11, 1860). Possibly the same as Hatawa.

Eidenu (perhaps an Eskimo rendering of 'I don't know'). A Kinugumiut coast settlement at C. Prince of Wales.

Eider (trans. of Igognak, 'eider duck'). An Aleut village on Captain bay, Unalaska, Alaska, at a point of the same name. Pop. 39 in 1830, according to Veniaminoff.

Igognak.—Kotzebue (1816) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1901 ('eider duck'). Igonok.—Coxe, Russ. Discov., 166, 1787. Paystravakof.—Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 225, 1875. Pestriakof.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1901 (Russian: 'eider duck'). Pestriakovo.—Sarichef (1792) quoted by Baker, ibid. Pestriakowakoje.—Holmberg, Ethnol. Skiz., map, 1855. Pestryakovskoe.—Veniaminoff, Zapiski, II, 202, 1840.

Einake (E-in'-a-ke, 'catchers,' or 'soldiers'). A society of the Ikunuhkatsi, or All Comrades, in the Piegan tribe; it has been obsolete since about 1860, and perhaps earlier.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 221, 1892.

Eiwheelit. A division of the Yuit Eskimo on St Lawrence id., Bering sea. Bogoras says "they are plainly a colony from the nearest [Siberian] shore, probably from Indian point." The villages are Chibukak, Chitnak, Kialegak, Kukulak, Puguviak, and Punuk.

Eiwhue-it.—Bogoras, Chukchee, 20, 1904 (Chukchi name). Kikhté-amüt.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ekoelthaht ('bushes-on-hill people'). A Nootka tribe formerly inhabiting the shores of Barclay sd., w. coast of Vancouver id.; pop. 48 in 1879. They have now joined the Sechart.

E-koelth-aht.—Can. Ind. Aff., 308, 1879. Eki'-lath.—Boas, 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 31, 1890. Ekoelth.—Kelley, Oregon, 68, 1890.

Ekuall. A former rancharia, possibly of the Diegueño, under San Miguel de la Frontera mission; in the mountains of w. Lower California, about 30 m. s. of San Diego, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 18, 1860.

Ekuhkahshatin. A Shuswap village on a small branch of Deadman cr., a N. affluent of Thompson r., Brit. Col. Pop., with Skichistan (q. v.), 118 in 1904. E-kuh-kah'-sha-tin.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1891, sec. II, 44.

Eku. A Nushagamiut village near the mouth of Nushagak r., Alaska. Pop. 112 in 1880; 65 in 1890.

Eku.—Lutke (1828) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1901. Eku.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 17, 1884. Yekuk.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893.

Eku. A Squawmish village community on the right bank of Squawmish r., w. Brit. Col.

Ekuika.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887. Ekuika.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Ekupabeka. A Hidatsa band.

Bonnet.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 159, 1877. E-ku'-pa-be-ka.—Ibid.

Elahsa ('village of the great willows'). A former Hidatsa village on the n. bank of Knife r., N. Dak., about 3 m. from Missouri r.

Hidatsai-Awasie.—Maximilian, Voy. dans l'int. de l'Am., III, 3, 1843. Elah-sa.—Maximilian, Trav., 178, 1843. Hidatsa.—Matthews, Ethnol. Hidatsa, 38, 1877 (see Hidatsai).

Elakulsi (E'lakul'si, referring to ela, 'earth'; or Alagulsa). A Cherokee settlement in N. Georgia about 1800-35. (J. M.) Aligulsa.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887.

Elarroyde. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Eleidlinottine ('people of the fork'). An Etchareottine tribe at the confluence of Liard and Mackenzie rs., whose territory extends to La Martre, Grandin, and Taché Lakes.

Élé-idlin-Gottine.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 363, 1891. Élé-idlin-ottin.—Petitot in Bull. Soc. de Geog. Paris, chart, 1875. Gens de la fourche du Mackenzie.—Petitot, Dict. Déné Dindjé, xx, 1876.

Elephant Mound. A noted effigy mound, 4 m. s. of Wyalusing, Grant co., Wis., first brought to public notice in 1872 through a pencil sketch and brief description by Jared Warner (Smithson. Rep. 1872, 1873). From its massive form and an apparent prolongation of the nose, supposed to be a part of the original mound, giving the tumulus a slight resemblance to an elephant, the name Elephant Mound was applied to it. Although frequently mentioned and illustrated, the figures are copies of Warner's sketch, no reexamination having been made until Nov., 1884, when the Bureau of American Ethnology surveyed and platted the mound; the result of this work appears in its Twelfth Report (91-93, fig. 44, 1894). The immediate situation is a long rectangular depression forming a cul de sac, the level of which is only a few feet above the Mississippi at high water. Although the tract had been cultivated for many years, the mound at the time of the survey distinctly showed the rounded surface, the highest point being at the hip of the effigy, where the height was 4 ft. The measurements were: length, 140 ft; width across the body and to the lower end of the hind leg, 72 ft. At the time of the survey no indication of an elephant-like proboscis was found. After an examination of similar effigies it was determined that this mound was designed to represent a bear, and that the supposed nasal prolongation seen by Warner was accidental, due probably to washed or drifted earth. In addition to the references cited, see Am. Antiq., vi, 178, 1884; Strong (1) in Rep. Wis. Geol. Surv. for

Ehlateese. The principal village of the Uchucklesit (q. v.) at the head of Uchucklesit harbor, Alberni canal, Vancouver id.; pop. 45 in 1902.—Can. Ind. Aff., 263, 1902.

Eliot Bible. The translation of the Scriptures into the Algonquian language of the Massachusetts, made by John Eliot (1604-90), the Apostle to the Indians, was the first Bible printed in America by the English authorities. The first edition of the whole Bible was published at Cambridge, Mass., in 1663, the New Testament having appeared two years before. The books of Genesis and Matthew seem to have been printed in 1655 and a portion of the Psalms in 1658, by which time the translation of the whole Bible was completed. Eliot was the author of other works in the language of the Massachusetts, and of books about the language and the natives (Pilling, Bibliog. Algonq. Lang., Bull. B. A. E., 1891). Trumbull's Dictionary of the Eliot Bible, which is not exhaustive, has been published as the Natick Dictionary (Bull. 25, B. A. E., 1903). The Eliot Bible is one of the monuments of missionary endeavor and prescientific study of the Indian tongues. In his linguistic labors Eliot was assisted by his two sons and by several Indians. See Bible translations, Cockenoe. (A. F. C.)

Eljman. A former Chumashan village described as situated near the windmill of La Patera, near Santa Barbara, Cal. Eljman.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 459, 1874. Eljman.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863. Eljman.—Ibid. Elman.—Bancroft, op. cit. San Marcos.—Taylor, op. cit.

Elks. A mythical people, said by Pidgeon (Traditions of De-coo-dah, 162, 1858), on information said to have been obtained from the Dakota, "to have come from the N., and once held dominion over all this country, from the Mississippi r., E. and N., to the great waters."

Ellijay (from Ellatē, abbr. of Ellatēyt, possibly 'green [verdant] earth'). The name of several former Cherokee settlements. One was on the headwaters of Keowee r., S. C.; another was on Ellijay cr. of Little Tennessee r., near the present Franklin, Macon co., N. C.; another about the present Ellijay in Gilmer co., Ga., and a fourth on Ellejoy cr. of Little r., near the present Maryville, in Blount co., Tenn.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 517, 1900.

Allaga.—Bartram, Travels, 372, 1792. Ellijoy.—Doc. of 1775 quoted by Royce in 6th Report B. A. E., 143, 1887. Ellijay.—Doc of 1799, ibid.

El Morro (Span.: 'the castle'). A prehistoric ruined pueblo, consisting of the remains of two blocks of dwellings, situated on the summit of a rock mesa called El Morro, or Inscription Rock, about 35 m. N. of Zuni, Valencia co., N. Mex. The pueblo is reputed to be of Zuni origin, but there is only legendary testimony of this. The peñol is called El Morro on account of its fancied resemblance to a castle from a distance, and Inscription Rock from the occurrences thereon of numerous inscriptions carved by early Spanish explorers. The earliest in date is that of Juan de Ofiate in 1605. For description see Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 328, 1892; Coues, Garcés Diary (1775-76), 1900; Fewkes in Jour. Am. Ethnol. and Archæol., i, 1890; Hoopes and Broomall in Proc. Del. Co. (Pa.) Inst. of Sci., i, pt. 1, 1905; Lummis, Strange Corners, 164-182, 1892; Simpson, Jour., 121, 1850. (F. W. H.)

El Morro.—Vargas (1692) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 200, 1889 (applied to the peñol). Heshetay'shite.—Hodge, inf., 1895 ('ruins on top or above'; Zuni name). Hesheta Yashok.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 328, 1892 (given as Zuni name).

Elochuteka. A former village, probably Seminole, between Hillsboro and Big Withlacoochee rs., Fla.—H. R. Doc. 78, 25th Cong., 2d sess., map, 768-769, 1838.

Elogio. A Papago settlement, probably in Pima co., s. Ariz., with 66 inhabitants in 1858.—Bailey in Ind. Aff. Rep., 208, 1858.

Eloquale. An unidentified village in N. Florida in 1564.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., ii, map, 1591.

Eloquenes. See Oratory.

Elothes. Given by Kelley (Oregon, 68, 1830) as a Nootka town on Vancouver id. under chief Wickaninish; possibly intended for Ucluelet.

El Paso. A mission established among the Mansos at the present Juarez, Chihuahua, opposite El Paso, Tex., by Fray Garcia de Zuñiga (or de San Francisco) in 1659. The settlement contained also some Piro from Tabira in 1684, and it became prominent as the seat of the New Mexican government during the Pueblo rebellion of 1680-92. (F. W. H.)

Guadalupe del Paso.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 168, 1889. Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe de los Mansos del Paso del Norte.—García (1659) quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 86, 1890. Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe del Paso del Río del Norte.—MS. of 17th century quoted by Bandelier, ibid., iv, 248, 1892. Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe del Paso.—Villa-Señor, Theatro Am., pt. 2, 422, 1748. Paso.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 83, 1855. Paso del Río del Norte.—Arch. Santa Fé, MS. quoted by Bancroft, op. cit. Pasoso del Norte.—Villa-Señor, op. cit., 424.

El Peñon (Span.: 'the large rocky hill or height'). A former small settlement, probably Seminole, on an island 13 leagues N. of Mosquito r., at the entrance of Matanzas r., Fla.

Elquis. A Chumashan village w. of Pueblo de las Canoas (San Buenaventura), Ventura co., Cal., in 1542.—Cabrillo, Nar. (1542) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857.

Elakwatawa. See Tenskwatawa.

El Turco. See Turk.

Eluaxou. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara, Cal.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 459, 1874.

Elwha. A Clallam village at the mouth of the river of the same name in Washington.

El'-hwa.—Eells, letter, B. A. E., Feb., 1886 (own name). Elkwah.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., i, 429, 1865. Elwaha.—Colyer in Ind. Aff. Rep., 191, 1871. Elwha.—Swan in Smithson. Cont., xvi, 50, 1869. Iraqua Indiana.—Lee and Frost, Oregon, 274, 1844.

Emamoueta. An unidentified tribe placed by Marquette on his map of 1673 w. of the Mississippi, apparently on the lower Arkansas.

Emamota.—Marquette, map (1673) in Shea, Discov. Miss. Val., 268, 1862.

Emmanuelito. See Manuelito.

Ematlochee (imatla, 'leader'). A former Creek town on Apalachicola r.; exact location unknown.

Emarhe.—Ex. Doc. 425, 24th Cong., 1st sess., 299, 1836. Ematlochees town.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1833), 578, 1837.

Emet. A small tribe met by De León and Manzanet near lower Guadalupe r., Texas, in 1689. They occupied a village with the Cava Indians near the crossing place, apparently about 15 leagues from the French Fort St Louis on Matagorda bay. To the northward they encountered several other Emet "ranchitos." Within a year these Indians appear to have moved farther e., for in 1690 De León encountered them on that side of the Rio Colorado, living with the Cava, Too, and Toaa Indians, their former neighbors. They were perhaps related to the Karankawa. Possibly the Meghty of Joutel are identical. (H. E. B.)

Emat.—De León MS. (1690) in Texas Archives. Emet.—Manzanet (1689) quoted in Tex. Hist. Quar., viii, 214, 1905.

Emistesigo. Known also as Guristerisgo. An Upper Creek chief and noted warrior who came prominently into notice in the latter part of the 18th century. The British being in possession of Savannah, Ga., in June, 1782, Gen. Wayne was dispatched to watch their movements. On May 21, Col. Brown, of the British force, marched out of Savannah to meet, according to appointment, a band of Indians under Emistesigo, but was intercepted and cut to pieces by Wayne. Meanwhile Emistesigo succeeded in traversing the entire state of Georgia without discovery, except by two boys, who were captured and killed. Wayne, who was not anticipating an attack, was completely surprised by the Indians, who captured 2 of his cannon, but succeeded in extricating his troops from their danger, and, after severe fighting, in putting the Creeks to flight. Emistesigo was pierced by bayonets, and 17 of his warriors fell by his side. He was at this time only 30 years of age, and is described as being 6 ft 3 in. in height and weighing 220 pounds.

(C. T.)

Emitahpahksaiyiks ('dogs naked'). A division of the Siksika.

Dogs Naked.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 208, 1892. E'-mi-tah-pahk-sai-yiks.—Ibid.

Emitaks (E'-mi-taks, 'dogs'). A society of the Ikunuhkahtsi, or All Comrades, in the Piegan tribe; it is composed of old men who dress like, and dance with and like, the Issui, though forming a different society.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 221, 1892.

Empress of the Creek Nation. See Bosomworth, Mary.

Emussa (imusa, 'affluent', 'tributary'). Mentioned as a Lower Creek town formerly on lower Chattahoochee r., Henry co., Ala., 2 m. above Wikaiwa, near the junction of Omussee cr., with 20 inhabitants in 1820. It seems to be equally probable that the settlement, which is not mentioned by early writers, was composed of Yamasi, from whom it derived its name.

Emussa.—Drake, Bk. Inds., vii, 1848. Emussa.—Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 364, 1822.

Encaquilagualcaoa. Mentioned by Oñate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871) as a pueblo of the province of Atitrypi, in the region of the lower Rio Grande, N. Mex., in 1598.

Encinal (Span.: 'oak grove'). Formerly a summer village of the Lagunas, now a permanently occupied pueblo, situated 6 m. n. w. of Laguna, N. Mex. In 1749 an attempt was made by Father Menchero to establish a mission there for the Navaho, but it was abandoned in the following year. (F. W. H.)

Enpantika.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1896 (Laguna name: 'place of the oaks'). Lespaia.—Ibid. (Acoma name). Pun-ye-kia.—Pradt quoted by Hodge in Am. Anthropol., iv, 346, 1891 (another Laguna name: 'house to the west').

Enecappe. A village on middle St Johns r., Fla., belonging to the Utina (Timucua) confederacy in the 16th century.

Enecapen.—Barcia, Ensayo, 48, 1723 (cacique's name). Enecappe.—Laudonnière (1567) in French. Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 243, 1869. Enecap.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., ii, map, 1591. Enecaque.—Laudonnière, op. cit., 305. Enacape.—Laudonnière, op. cit., 287. Enaquaque.—Barcia, op. cit., 72. Helmacape.—Laudonnière, op. cit., 349.

Eneeshur. Shahaptian bands, aggregating 1,200 population in 41 mat lodges, found by Lewis and Clark in 1805 on both sides of Columbia r. near the mouth of the Deschutes, in Washington. The term probably refers more specifically to the Tapanash. (L. F.)

Elocatures.—Robertson in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 30th Cong., 1st sess., 9, 1848. Eivestaura.—Robertson, Oregon, 129, 1846. E-ne-churs.—Clark (1806) in Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, iii, 342, 1906. E-ne-sher.—Lewis and Clark, Exped., ii, map, 1814.

Rep.*, I, 417, 1855. E-ne-shur.—Lewis and Clark, op. cit., I, map. Eneshura.—Ibid., II, 472. Enestura.—Wilkes, Hist. Oregon, 44, 1845.

Enekelkawa. A former Luisefio village near the site of San Luis Rey mission, s. Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 11, 1860.

Enempa. A Calusa village on the s. w. coast of Florida, about 1570.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 19, 1854.

Enfrenado (Span.: 'bridled'). An Indian village about 40 leagues from C. Santa Helena, in s. South Carolina, visited by Juan Pardo in 1565.—Vandera (1567) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., I, 16, 1857.

English influence. The first English visitors to the coast of Virginia-Carolina were well received by the Indians, whom the early chroniclers, as Hariot, for example, describe as peaceful and amiable people. So, too, were in the beginning the natives of the New England coast, but in 1605 Capt. Weymouth forcibly carried off five Indians, and he soon had many imitators. The good character ascribed by Pastor Cushman in 1620 to the Indians of Plymouth colony was forgotten when theological zeal saw in the aborigines of the New World "the accursed seed of Canaan," which it was the duty of good Christians to exterminate (see Lost Ten Tribes). When the political ambitions of the English colonists were aroused conflicts with the Indians soon occurred, and the former came to regard the latter as the natural enemies of the whites in the onward march of civilization. Unlike the French, they paid little attention to the pride of the Indians, despising the heathen ways and institutions more and more as their power grew and their land hunger increased. With a few noble exceptions, like Roger Williams and John Eliot, the clergy of the English colonies were not nearly so sympathetic toward the natives as were the French missionaries in Acadia and New France. Scotchmen, however, in the S., in the W., in the old provinces of Canada, and in the territories handed over to the Hudson's Bay Company have played a conspicuous part as associates and leaders of the Indians. Even men like Canonius were always suspicious of their English friends, and never really opened their hearts to them. The introduction of rum and brandy among the Indians worked infinite damage. Some of the New England tribes, such as the Pequot, for example, foreseeing perhaps the result of their advent, were inimical to the English from the first, and the extermination of these Indians ensued when the whites were strong enough to accomplish it. It appears, however, that the English colonists paid for most of the land that they took from the Indians (Thomas in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 549, 1899). English influence on tribal government and land tenure was perceptible as early as 1641. The success of deliberately planned educational institutions for the benefit of the Indian during the early periods of American history does not seem to have been proportionate to the hopes and ideals of their founders. Harvard, Dartmouth, and the College of William and Mary all began, in whole or in part, as colleges for Indian youth, but their graduates of aboriginal blood have been few indeed, while they are now all high-class institutions for white men (see Education). The royal charter of Dartmouth College (1769) specifically states that it is to be "for the education and instruction of youths of the Indian tribes in this land," and "for civilizing and Christianizing the children of pagans." That of Harvard looked to "the education of the English and Indian youth in knowledge and godliness." Harvard had during the colonial period one Indian graduate, Caleb Cheeshaumuck, of whom hardly more than his name is known (see James, English Institutions and the American Indian, 1894). The aim of the English has ever been to transform the aborigines and lift them at once to their own plane. When commissioners visited the Cherokee they induced these to elect an "emperor," with whom treaties could be made. The Friends, from the time of William Penn (1682) down to the present (see Mooney in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 193, 1898), seem to have furnished many individuals capable, like the Baptist Roger Williams (1636), of exercising great personal influence over the Indians. The Quakers still continue their work, e. g., among the eastern Cherokee (Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 176, 1900) and the Tlingit of Alaska. The New England Company established for the propagation of the gospel in America (1649), whose operations were transferred to Canada in 1822, carries on at the present time work on the Brantford Iroquois reserve and in other parts of Ontario, at Kuper id., Brit. Col., and elsewhere. Its Mohawk institute, near Brantford, has had a powerful influence among the Iroquois of Ontario. The pagan members of these Indians have recently been investigated by Boyle (Jour. Anthropol. Inst. G. B., n. s., III, 263-273, 1900), who tells us that "all for which Iroquois paganism is indebted to European culture" is the possession of some ideas about God or the Great Spirit and "a few suggestions respecting conduct, based on the Christian code of morals." The constant mingling of the young men with their white neighbors and the going of the young women out to service are nevertheless weakening more and more the old ideas which are doomed "to disappear as a system long before the people die out." That they have survived so long is remarkable.

English influence made itself felt in colonial days in the introduction of improved weapons, tools, etc., which facilitated hunting and fishing and made possible the manufacture with less labor and in greater abundance of ornaments, trinkets, and other articles of trade. The supplying of the Indians with domestic animals also took place at an early period. Spinning wheels and looms were introduced among the Cherokee shortly before the Revolution, and in 1801 the agent reported that at the Cherokee agency the wheel, the loom, and the plow were in pretty general use. The intermarriage of Englishmen and Indians has been greater all over the country than is commonly believed, and importance must consequently be attached to the effects of such intermingling in modifying Indian customs and institutions. Clothing and certain ornaments, and, after these, English beds and other furniture were adopted by many Indians in colonial days, as is now being done by the tribes of the N. Pacific coast.

English influence on the languages of some of the aborigines has been considerable. The word Kinjames, 'King James,' in use among the Canadian Abnaki, testifies to the power of English ideas in the 17th century. The vocabularies of the eastern Algonquian tribes who have come in contact with the English contain other loan-words. Rand's English-Micmac Dictionary (1888) contains, among others, the following: Jak-ass; cheesawa, 'cheese'; koppee, 'coffee'; mulugech, 'milk'; gubulnol, 'governor.' Brinton and Anthony's Lenape-English Dictionary (1889), representing the language of about 1825, has amel, 'hammer'; apel, 'apple'; mbil, 'beer'; mellik, 'milk'; skulin, 'to keep school,' which may be partly from English and partly from German. A Shawnee vocabulary of 1819 has for 'sugar' melassa, which seems to be English 'molasses'; and a Micmac vocabulary of 1800 has blaakcet, 'blanket.' The English 'cheese' has passed into the Nipissing dialect of Algonquian as tchis. The Chinook jargon (q. v.) contained 41 words of English origin in 1804, and 57 in 1863, while in 1894, out of 1,082 words (the total number is 1,402) whose origin is known, Eells cites 570 as English. Of recent years "many words of Indian origin have been dropped, English words having taken their places." In colonial days English doubtless had some influence on the grammatical form and sentence-construction of Indian languages, and this influence still continues: the recent studies by Prince and Speck of the Pequot-Mohegan (Am. Anthropol., n. s., vi, 18-45, 469-476, 1904) contain evidence of this. English influence has made itself felt also in the languages of the N. W. Hill-Tout (Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 18, 1902) observes, concerning certain Salishan tribes, that "the spread and use of English among the Indians is very seriously affecting the purity of the native speech." Even the Athapaskan Nahane of N. British Columbia have, according to Morice (Trans. Canad. Inst., 529, 1903), added a few English words to their vocabulary. See also Friederici, Indianer und Anglo-Amerikaner, 1900; MacMahon, The Anglo-Saxon and the North American Indian, 1876; Manypenny, Our Indian Wards, 1880. (A. F. C.)

Engraving. Although extensively employed in pictographic work and in decoration, the engraver's art did not rise to a high degree of artistic excellence among the tribes N. of Mexico. As no definite line can be drawn between the lower forms of relief sculpture and engraving, all ordinary petroglyphs may be classed as engravings, since the work is executed in shallow lines upon smooth rock surfaces (see Pictography). Point work is common on wood, bone, horn, shell, bark, metal, clay, and other surfaces. Each material has its own particular technique, and the designs run the entire gamut of style from graphic to purely conventional representations, and the full range of significance from purely symbolic through esthetic to simply trivial motives.

Perhaps the most artistic and technically perfect examples of engraving are those of the N. W. coast tribes of the present day, executed on slate utensils and on ornaments of metal (Niblack), yet the graphic productions of the Eskimo on ivory, bone, and antler have sometimes a considerable degree of merit (Boas, Hoffman, Murdoch, Nelson, Turner). With both of these peoples the processes employed and the style of representation have probably undergone much change in recent times through contact with white people. The steel point is superior to the point of stone, and this alone would have a marked effect on the execution. The picture writings on bark of many of the northern tribes, executed with bone or other hard points, are good examples of the native engraver's art, although these are not designed either for simply pictorial or for decorative effect. The ancient mound builders were clever engravers, the technical excellence of their work being well illustrated by examples from the mounds and dwelling sites of Ross co., Ohio (Putnam and Willoughby), and by others from the Turner mounds in Hamilton co., Ohio. Shell also was a favorite material for the graver's point, as is illustrated by numerous ornaments recovered from mounds in the middle Mississippi valley.

In decorating their earthenware the native tribes often used the stylus with excellent effect. The yielding clay afforded a tempting surface, and in some cases considerable skill was shown, especially by the ancient potters of the lower Gulf states, who executed elaborate scroll designs with great precision (Moore, Holmes). The point was used for incising, trailing, and in-denting, and among ancient Pueblo potters was sometimes used upon dark-painted surfaces to develop delicate figures in the light color of the underlying paste. Examples of engraving are given by Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 1888; Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 1898; Hoffman in Nat. Mus. Rep. 1895, 1897; Holmes (1) in 2d Rep. B. A. E., 1883, (2) in 20th Rep. B. Ennegahbowh ('The one who stands before his people'). An Indian preacher. He was an Ottawa by birth, but was adopted while young by the Chippewa and was converted to the Methodist faith in Canada, educated at the Methodist mission school at Jacksonville, Ill., and ordained as a preacher with the name of the Rev. John Johnson. In 1839 he accompanied Elder T. B. Kavanaugh to the upper Mississippi, where he was a missionary among the Chippewa for 5 years, when the Methodist church withdrew from that field. In 1852, at Johnson's solicitation, the Episcopal church sent a minister into this section, and a mission and school were established at Gull lake, Minn., in which he served as assistant and interpreter. In 1858 Johnson was admitted by Bishop Kemper to the first order of the Episcopal ministry at Faribault, and in 1859 was left in charge of the mission at Gull lake, where he continued until the Sioux outbreak of 1862, when he alone of the Episcopal missionaries remained in the field. In 1869 the Gull lake mission was removed to the reservation at White Earth, whither Johnson followed and was given charge, bringing into the church a number of his tribesmen and erecting a chapel and parsonage. Here the Rev. Joseph A. Giffilan, who was assigned to White Earth as an Episcopal missionary in 1873, with Johnson's aid established a school for the training of Indian clergy, and in a few years 9 Chippewa were ordained to the ministry. Johnson was living in 1898, at which time he was spoken of as the "aged Indian pastor and co-worker of Bishop Whipple."

Eno. A tribe associated with the Adshusheer and Shakori in North Carolina in the 17th century. Mooney thinks it doubtful that the Eno and the Shakori were of Siouan stock, as they seem to have differed in physique and habits from their neighbors, although their alliances were all with Siouan tribes. Little is known of them, as they disappeared from history as tribal bodies about 1720, having been incorporated with the Catawba on the s. or with the Saponi and their confederates on the n., although they still retained their distinct dialect in 1743. The Eno and Shakori are first mentioned by Yardley in 1654, to whom a Tuscarora described, among other tribes of the interior, living next to the Shakori, "a great nation" called Haynoke, by whom the northern advance of the Spaniards was valiantly resisted (Hawks, N. C., II, 19, 1858). The next mention of these two tribes is by Lederer, who heard of them in 1672 as living s. of the Occaneechi about the headwaters of Tar and Neuse rs. The general locality is still indicated in the names of Eno r. and Shocco cr., upper branches of these streams. In 1701 Lawson found the Eno and Shakori confederated and the Adshusheer united with them in the same locality. Their village, which he calls Adshusheer, was on Eno r., about 14 m. e. of the Occaneechi village, which was near the site of the present Hillsboro. This would place the former not far s. e. of Durham, N. C. Eno Will, a Shakori by birth, was at that time, according to Lawson, chief of the three combined tribes, and at this period the Shakori seem to have been the principal tribe. They had some trade with the Tuscarora. Later, about 1714, with the Tutelo, Saponi, Occaneechi, and Keyauwee, together numbering only about 750 souls, they moved toward the settlements. Lawson includes Eno in his list of Tuscarora villages at that date, and as the Eno lived on the Neuse adjoining the Tuscarora, it was natural that they were sometimes classed with them. In 1716 Gov. Spotswood, of Virginia, proposed to settle the Eno, Sara, and Keyauwee at Eno town, on "the very frontiers" of North Carolina; but the project was defeated by North Carolina on the ground that all three tribes were then at war with South Carolina. From the records it can not be determined clearly whether this was the Eno town of Lawson or a more recent village nearer the Albemarle settlements. Owing to the objection made to their settlement in the n., the Eno moved southward into South Carolina. They probably assisted the other tribes of that region in the Yamasi war of 1715. At least a few of the mixed tribe found their way into Virginia with the Saponi, as Byrd speaks of an old Indian, called Shacco Will, living near Nottoway r. in 1733, who offered to guide him to a mine on Eno r. near the old country of the Tuscarora. The name of Shockoe cr., at Richmond, Va., may possibly have been derived from that of the Shakori tribe, while the name of Enoree r. in South Carolina may have a connection with that of the Eno tribe.

Lederer speaks of the Eno village as surrounded by large cultivated fields and as built around a central plaza where the men played a game described as "slinging of stones," in which "they exercise with so much labor and violence and in so great numbers that I have seen the ground wet with the sweat that dropped from their bodies." This was probably the chunky game played with round stones among the Creeks. Lederer agrees with Yardley as to the small size of the Eno, but not as to their bravery, though they were evidently industrious. They raised plentiful crops and "out of their granary supplied all the adjacent parts." "The character thus outlined," says Mooney, "accords more with that of the peaceful Pueblos than with that of any of our eastern tribes and goes far to indicate a different origin." It should be remembered, however, that Lederer is not a leading authority, as it is doubtful if he was ever in North Carolina. The houses of the Eno are said to have been different in some respects from those of their neighbors. Instead of building of bark, as did most Virginia and Carolina tribes, they used interwoven branches or canes and plastered them with mud or clay, like the Quapaw Indians of E. Arkansas. The form was usually round. Near every house was a small oven-shaped structure in which they stored corn and nuts. This was similar to the storehouse of the Cherokee and some other southern tribes. Their government was democratic and patriarchal, the decision of the old men being received with unquestioned obedience. See Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1896.

Enoqua. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned to Joutel, in 1687 (Margry, Déc., III, 410, 1878), while he was staying with the Kadohadacho on Red r. of Louisiana, by the chief of that tribe, as one of his allies.

Enpishemo (from apishimun.—W. J.). According to Bartlett (Dict. Americanisms, 201, 1877), "a word used w. at the Rocky mts. to denote the housings of a saddle, the blanket beneath it, etc." Another form seems to be 'apishamore'. In the Medicine Lodge treaty made with the Comanche, Kiowa, and others in 1867, Fish-e-more appears as the name of one of the signers. (A. F. C.)

Ensenore. A chief of Wingandacoo (Secotan), N. C., previous to 1585, noted as the earliest chief of the E. coast between Hudson r. and St Helena sd. of whom there is any notice. He was the father of Wingina and Granganimeo (q. v.), and a firm friend of the English colony on Roanoke id. in 1585-86. While he lived he restrained Wingina from wreaking vengeance on Lane's company for killing some of the natives. His death occurred in 1585 or 1586. (c. r.)

Entubur. A former rancheria, probably of the Papago, visited by Kino and Mange in 1694; situated between Tubutama and Busanic, lat. 31° N. W. Sonora, Mexico.—Mange (ca. 1701) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 258, 1884.

Environment. The natural phenomena that surrounded the aborigines of North America, stimulating and conditioning their life and activities, contrasted greatly with those of the European-Asiatic continent. The differences in the two environments do not lie alone in physical geography and in plant and animal life, but are largely meteorologic, the sun operating on air, land, and water, producing variations in temperature and water supply, and as a result entirely new vegetal and animal forms. The planets and stars also affected cultural development, since lore and mythology were based on them. Within the American continent N. of Mexico there were ethnic environments which set bounds for the tribes and modified their industrial, esthetic, social, intellectual, and religious lives. Omitting the Eskimo, practically all the peoples dwell in the temperate zone. Few impassable barriers separated the culture areas, as in Asia. In some respects, indeed, the entire region formed one environment, having easy communications N. and S. and few barriers E. and W. The climate zones which Merriam has worked out for the U. S. Department of Agriculture in regard to their animal and vegetal life correspond in a measure with the areas of linguistic families as delimited on Powell's map (see Linguistic families). The environmental factors that determine cultural development of various kinds and degrees are (1) physical geography; (2) climate, to which primitive peoples are especially amenable; (3) predominant plants, animals, and minerals that supply the materials of drink, food, medicines, clothing, ornaments, houses, fuel, furniture and utensils, and the objects of hunting, war, the industrial arts, and activities connected with travel, transportation, and commerce. Twelve ethnic environments may be distinguished. There are cosmopolitan characters common to several, but in each area there is an ensemble of qualities that impressed themselves on their inhabitants and differentiated them.

(1) Arctic.—The characteristics of this environment are an intensely cold climate; about six months day and six months night; predominance of ice and snow; immense archipelagos, and no accessible elevations; good stone for lamps and tools; driftwood, but no timber and little fruit; polar bear, blue fox, aquatic mammals in profusion, migratory birds, and fish, supplying food, clothing, fire, light, and other wants in the exacting climate.

(2) Yukon-Mackenzie.—This is Merriam's transcontinental coniferous belt, separated from the arctic environment by the timber line, but draining into arctic seas. It has poor material resources, and barren grounds here and there. Its saving riches are an abundance of birch, yielding bark utensils, canoes, binding materials, and houses, and of spruce, furnishing textile roots and other necessities; caribou, muskox, bear, red fox, wolf, white rabbit, and other fur-bearing mammals, and porcupines, migrating birds, and fish. Snow necessitates snowshoes of fine mesh, and immense inland waters make portages easy for bark canoes. Into this area came the Athapascan tribes who developed through its resources their special culture.

(3) St Lawrence and Lake region.—This is a transition belt having no distinct lines of separation from the areas on the N. and S. It occupies the entire drainage of the great lakes and includes Manitoba, E. Canada, and N. New England. It was the home of the Iroquois, Abnaki, Chippewa, and their nearest kindred. The climate is boreal. There are a vast expanse of lowlands and numerous extensive inland waters. The natural products are abundant—evergreens, birch, sugar maple, elm, berries, and wild rice in the W.; maize, squash, and beans in the S.; moose, deer, bear, beaver, porcupines, land and water birds in immense flocks, whitefish, and, on the seacoast, marine products in greatest variety and abundance. Canoe travel; pottery scarce.

(4) Atlantic slope.—This area, occupied principally by tribes allied to the Delawares, but also by detached Iroquoian tribes and perhaps some Siouan and Uchean hands, included the region of the fertile piedmont, poor foothills, rich lowlands, bays and rivers abounding in aquatic life, and vast salt meadows. The low mountains were not ethnic barriers, but the differences in physical conditions on the two sides were marked enough to produce separate cultures. Minerals for tools and weapons were present in great variety, and others, clays, and some copper were found. Plant life was varied and abundant. Forests of hard wood, birch, elm, maple, and evergreens furnished materials for supplying a great diversity of wants. From the soft wood were made dugout canoes. The dense forest growth rendered foot traveling irksome. Nuts, berries, roots, and maize furnished food; flax and tough pliant woods and bark gave textile materials. The life conditions for economic animals were as varied as possible. Beginning with the shallow marshes and numerous salt-water inlets, furnishing clams, oysters, crabs, cod, mackerel, herring, halibut, shad, sturgeon, eels, and terrapin, as shell-heaps attest, it terminated in the trout streams of the mountains. There were birds of the air, like the eagle and wild pigeon, ground birds, like the quail and the turkey, and water birds innumerable. Mammals of the water were the muskrat, otter, and beaver; of the land, moose, elk, deer, bear, rabbit, squirrel, raccoon, opossum, and woodchuck. The wide range of latitude necessitated different dwellings for different climates, as the bark tipi, the mat house, and the arbor house. For clothing, garments of hide, rabbit skin, and feathers were used. Stone was abundant for making tools, for flaking or grinding, but neither materials nor motives for artistic work of a high order were present.

(5) Gulf coast.—The Southern states, from Georgia to Texas, were inhabited by Muskogean tribes and several small linguistic families. The characteristics of this area are a climate ranging from temperate to subtropical, with abundant rain, low mountains, and rich river valleys and littoral with varied and profuse mineral, vegetal, and animal resources. The environment yielded a diet of meat, fish, maize, pulse, melons, and fruits. It was favorable to meager dress and furnished materials and incentives for featherwork and beadwork, stonework, earthwork, and pottery. Traveling on foot and in dugout canoes was easy.

(6) Mississippi valley.—This area includes the states of the Middle West beyond the Great Lake divide, extending to the loosely defined boundary of the great plains. Its characteristics in relation to Indian life were varied climate, abundant rainfall, numerous waterways, fertile lands, alternate timber and prairie, and minerals in great variety and abundance, including clay for pottery. The economic plants were soft and hard woods, and plants yielding nuts, berries, fruits, and fiber. The fertile land was favorable to the cultivation of maize and squashes. Animals of the chase were buffalo, deer, small rodents, and wild pigeons and other land birds; but there was a poor fish supply, and the only shellfish were river mussels. This environment developed hunting and agricultural tribes, chiefly of Algonquian lineage, including sedentary tribes that built remarkable mounds.

(7) Plains.—This environment lies between the Rocky mts. and the fertile lands w. of the Mississippi. To the n. it stretches into Athabasca, and it terminates at the s. about the Rio Grande. The tribes were Siouan, Algonquian, Kiowan, Caddoan, and Shoshonean. The Missouri and Arkansas and many tributaries drain the area. The plants were bois d'arc and other hard woods for bows, cedar for lodge poles, willows for beds, the pomme blanche for roots, etc., but there were no fine textile fibers. Dependence on the buffalo and the herbivorous animals associated with it compelled a meat diet, skin clothing and dwellings, a roving life, and industrial arts depending on the flesh, bones, hair, sinew, hide, and horns of those animals. Artistic and symbolic designs were painted on the rawhide, and the myths and tales related largely to the buffalo. Travel was on foot, with or without snowshoes, and transportation was effected by the aid of the dog and travois. The horse afterward wrought profound changes. The social order and habit of semi-nomadic wandering about fixed centers were the direct result of the surroundings and discouraged agriculture or much pottery. No canoes or other craft than the Mandan and Hidatsa skin boats.

(8) North Pacific coast.—From Mt St Elias to the Columbia mouth, lying along the archipelago and cut off from the interior by mountains covered with snow, was the area inhabited by the Tlingit, Haida, Tsimshian, Nootka, and coast Salish. It has a moist, temperate climate, a mountainous coast, with extensive island groups and landlocked waters favorable to canoe travel. The shores are bathed by the warm current of the N. Pacific. The days in different seasons vary greatly in length. The material resources are black slate for carving and good stone for pecking, grinding, and sawing; immense forests of cedar, spruce, and other evergreen trees for houses, canoes, totem-poles, and basketry; mountain goat and big-horn, bear, beaver, birds, and sea food in great variety and in quantities inexhaustible by savages. This environment induced a diet of fish, mixed with berries, clothing of bark and hair, large communal dwellings, exquisite twined and checkered basketry to the discouragement of pottery, carving in wood and stone, and unfettered travel in dugout canoes, which provided opportunity for the full development of the dispersive clan system.

(9) Columbia-Fraser region.—This includes the adjoining basins of these streams and contiguous patches, inhabited principally by Salishan, Shahaptian, and Chinookan tribes. In the s. is a coast destitute of islands. At the headwaters of its rivers it communicates with the areas lying to the s. across the mountains. Rich lands, a mild climate, good minerals for industries, textile plants, excellent forests, and an abundance of edible roots and fruits, fish, mollusks, and waterfowl ready at hand characterize this environment, with skin and wool for clothing. The manifold resources and varied physical features fostered a great variety of activities.

(10) Interior basin.—This is embraced between the Rocky mts. and the Sierras of the United States, terminating in a regular line in the s., and is the home of the great Shoshonean family. It partly coincides with the arid Sonoran area of Merriam, consisting of partial deserts, with rich wooded patches among the mountains. Good stone for various crafts is present. Timber is scarce, but wild seeds are abundant for food, and excellent woods and roots for basketry. Animals available were buffalo, rabbit, deer, antelope, wolf, mountain sheep, and birds, but fish were scarce. The environment made necessary the brush shelter and the cave dwelling. Little pottery was made, but the sinew-backed bow was developed. Traveling was necessarily done on foot, and carrying effected by dogs and women, as there was no transportation by water.

(11) California-Oregon.—This includes s. Oregon and the greater part of California—that embraced in the drainage basins of the Sacramento, San Joaquin, and smaller rivers flowing into the Pacific. The temperature is mild, neither cold in winter nor hot in summer, and the year is divided into wet and dry seasons. The Sierras form a mountain boundary, and mountain groups of some height are obstructions within the area, but the Coast range is low and broken and not a barrier. Obsidian, steatite, and other good stones for the arts were plentiful. There was clay, but no pottery. The region was well but not heavily timbered, consisting of open plains, with hillsides and ranges covered more or less with brush and scattered oaks, many species furnishing acorns for food. The open spaces alternating with the wooded lands yielded grasses and medicinal herbs. Other useful plants were the buckeye, manzanita, nut pine, redwood, and tule in the s. for balsam, baskets, matting, and houses, and edible and textile roots were also found. The animals entering into Indian economy were the deer, rabbit, bear, coyote, squirrel, jaguar, condor, salmon, sturgeon, eel, trout, smelt, mussel, clam, halibut, and other shellfish whose shells furnished media of exchange. This environment was the Caucasus of North America, where 25 linguistic families were assembled. On Merriam's bio-geographic maps, published by the Department of Agriculture, a great variety of life is shown, due to vertical zones of temperature, only the lower of which were inhabited by Indians. The more elevated of these were just as effectual as boundaries as though they were impassable. Owing to the peculiar nature of materials, the arts of this environment were well defined.

(12) Pueblo country. This area includes s. Utah, s. w. Colorado, all of New Mexico and Arizona together with the Mohave desert, and extends southward into Mexico. It embraces the drainage basin of the San Juan in the n., the Rio Grande and the Pecos in the s., and the Colorado in the w. In physiographic character it ranges from semiarid to desert. There are deep canyons, elevated mesas, narrow fertile valleys, broad stretches of plains, and isolated mountain masses. The climate demands little clothing in the lowlands, but on the plateaus the nights are cold and the summer temperature that of Maine. Rain is irregular and periodic, being plentiful for weeks, followed by months of drought; most of the streams are therefore intermittent. Useful minerals are gypsum, obsidian, varieties of quartz, potter's clay, adobe, ochers, lignite, salt, and turquoise. Plant life, except after rains, is comparatively meager, the species giving rise to native industries being chiefly cactus, yucca, cottonwood, greasewood, willow, scrub oak, conifers, and rushes. Maize, beans, and cotton were cultivated from a very early period. Wild animals hunted or trapped were the rabbit, deer, bear, turkey, prairie dog, mountain lion, wildcat, wood-rat, mountain sheep, coyote, and wolf. Dogs were trained, and burros, sheep, goats, and cattle found a congenial home in this area after their introduction by the Spaniards. Travel was formerly done on foot only, and goods had to be carried chiefly on the heads and backs of men and women, there being few navigable waters. This peculiar environment impelled tribes coming into the region to lead the life of the Pueblo. The outskirts of the region were even less favored with resources, hence the Pueblos were brought into conflict with predatory tribes like the Ute, and later the Navaho, the Apache, and the Comanche, who robbed them and constantly threatened to consume what they raised. These conflicts developed the cliff-dwelling as means of protection. Southwest of the region proper are Piman and Yuman tribes and the Mission Indians, dwelling in oases of the desert that extends into Mexico. Here grow mesquite, ironwood, agave, palo verde, cacti in the greatest variety, and, along the water courses, cottonwood and rushes. The people live a life partly sedentary, housed in shelters of brush and grass. The effects of this environment, where the finding of springs was the chief desideratum in the struggle for existence, were to influence social structure and functions, manners and customs, æsthetic products and motives, lore and symbolism, and, most of all, creed and cult, which were conditioned by the unending, ever-recurring longing for water.

Epanow. One of the first Indians to be taken across the Atlantic by the English from New England—a member of the party forcibly taken from Marthas Vineyard, Mass., by Capt. Harlow in 1611. He was shown in England as a wonder, and managed to escape from the English on the return voyage by pretending to pilot them to a gold mine. In 1619 he was at the island of Capoge, near C. Cod, and in that year a body of Indians under his guidance attacked Capt. Dormer's men while attempting to land on Marthas Vineyard. Epanow is spoken of as artful and daring. He may be the same as Apannow, a signer of the Plymouth treaty of 1621. See Drake, Inds. N. Am., 72, 1880.

Epiminguia. A tribe formerly living on Mississippi r., 20 leagues above Arkansas r. (Coxe, Carolana, ii, 1741); probably a division of the Quapaw.

rior, E. of Michipicoton r., Ontario.—Dobbs, Hudson Bay, 32, 1744.

Episok. An Eskimo settlement in N. W. Greenland.—Kane, Arct. Explor., ii, 278, 1856.

Epley's Ruin. A large prehistoric pueblo ruin on the outskirts of Solomonsville, on the Gila, S. E. Ariz. So called from the owner of the ranch on which it is situated.—Fewkes in 22d Rep. B. A. E., 171, 1904.

Erie (Huron: yěñresh, 'itis long-tailed', referring to the eastern puma or panther; Tuscarora, těñ'rāks, 'lion', a modern use, Gallicised into Eri and Ri, whence the locatives Eri'e, Rigüé, and Rigüé, 'at the place of the panther', are derived. Compare the forms Eriechronon, Eriechronon, and Riquéronon of the Jesuit Relations, signifying 'people of the panther'. It is probable that in Iroquois the puma and the wild-cat originally had generically the same name and that the defining term has remained as the name of the puma or panther). A populous sedentary Iroquoian tribe, inhabiting in the 17th century the territory extending S. from L. Erie probably to Ohio r., E. to the lands of the Conestoga along the E. watershed of Allegheny r. and to those of the Seneca along the line of the W. watershed of Genesee r., and N. to those of the Neutral Nation, probably on a line running eastward from the head of Niagara r. (for the Jesuit Relation for 1640-41 says that the territory of the Erie and their allies joined that of the Neutral Nation at the end of L. Erie), and W. to the W. watershed of L. Erie and Miami r. to Ohio r. Their lands probably adjoined those of the Neutral Nation W. of L. Erie. The Jesuit Relation for 1653, speaking of L. Erie, says that it "was at one time inhabited toward the S. by certain peoples whom we call the Cat Nation; but they were forced to proceed farther inland in order to escape their enemies whom they have toward the W." In this eastward movement of the Erie is probably found an explanation of the emigration of the Awenrehronon (Wenrohronon) to the Huron country in 1639 from the E. border of the lands of the Neutral Nation, although the reason there given is that they had for some unknown reason ruptured their relations with the Neutral Nation, with whom, it is stated, they had been allied, and that, consequently, losing the powerful support of the populous Neutral Nation, the Wenrohronon, were left a prey to their enemies, the Iroquois. But the earlier Jesuit Relation (for 1640-41), referring undoubtedly to this people, says that a certain strange nation, the Awenrehronon, dwelt beyond the Cat Nation, thus placing them at this time E. of the Erie and apparently separate from the Neutral Nation; so that at that time the Wenrothronon may have been either entirely independent or else confederated with the Erie.

Historically little is definitely known of the Erie and their political and social organization, but it may be inferred to have been similar to that of the Hurons. The Jesuit Relations give only a few glimpses of them while describing their last wars with the Iroquois confederation; tradition, however, records the probable fact that the Erie had had many previous wars with these hostile tribes. From the Relations mentioned it is learned that the Erie had many sedentary towns and villages, that they were constituted of several divisions, and that they cultivated the soil and spoke a language resembling that of the Hurons, although it is not stated which of the four or five Huron dialects, usually called "Wendat" (Wyandot) by themselves, was meant. From the same source it is possible to make a rough estimate of the population of the Erie at the period of this final war. At the taking of the Erie town of Riqué in 1654 it is claimed that the defenders numbered between 3,000 and 4,000 combatants, exclusive of women and children; but as it is not likely that all the warriors of the tribe were present, 14,500 would probably be a conservative estimate of the population of the Erie at this period.

The Jesuit Relation for 1655-56 (chap. xi) gives the occasion of the final struggle. Thirty ambassadors of the Cat Nation had been delegated, as was customary, to Sonontouan, the Seneca capital, to renew the existing peace. But through the misfortune of an accident one of the men of the Cat Nation killed a Seneca. This act so incensed the Seneca that they massacred all except 5 of the ambassadors in their hands. These acts kindled the final war between the Erie and the confederated tribes of the Iroquois, especially the Seneca, Cayuga, Oneida, and Onondaga, called by the French the 'upper four tribes', or 'les Iroquois supérieurs'. It is further learned from the Jesuit Relation for 1654 that on the political destruction of their country some Hurons sought asylum among the Erie, and that it was they who were actively fomenting the war that was then striking terror among the Iroquois tribes. The Erie were reputed brave and warlike, employing only bows and poisoned arrows, although the Jesuit Relation for 1656 declares that they were unable to defend one of their palisades against the Iroquois on account of the failure of their munitions, especially powder, which would indicate that they used firearms. It is also said that they "fight like Frenchmen, bravely sustaining the first charge of the Iroquois, who are armed with our muskets, and then falling upon them with a hailstorm of poisoned arrows," discharging 8 or 10 before a musket could be reloaded. Following the rupture of amicable relations between the Erie and the Iroquois tribes in 1653, the former assaulted and burned a Seneca town, pursued an Iroquois war party returning from the region of the great lakes, and cut to pieces its rear guard of 80 picked men, while the Erie scouts had come to the very gates of one of the Iroquois palisaded towns and seized and carried into captivity Annenraes (Annenraes), "one of the greatest captains." All this roused the Iroquois tribes, which raised 1,800 men to chastise the Erie for these losses. A young chief, one of the two leaders of this levy, was converted by Father Simon Le Moine, who chanced to be in the country at the time, and was baptized. These two chiefs dressed as Frenchmen, in order to frighten the Erie by the novelty of their garments. When this army of invaders had surrounded one of the Erie strongholds, the converted chief gently asked the besieged to surrender, lest they be destroyed should they permit an assault, telling them: "The Master of Life fights for us; you will be ruined if you resist him." "Who is this Master of our lives?" the Erie defiantly replied. "We acknowledge none but our arms and hatchets." No quarter was asked or given on either side in this war. After a stubborn resistance the Erie palisade was carried, and the Onondaga "entered the fort and there wrought such carnage among the women and children that blood was knee-deep in certain places." This was at the town of Riqué, which was defended by between 3,000 and 4,000 combatants, exclusive of women and children, and was assailed by about 1,800 Iroquois. This devastating war lasted until about the close of 1656, when the Erie power was broken and the people were destroyed or dispersed or led into captivity. Six hundred surrendered at one time and were led to the Iroquois country to be adopted as one of the constituent people of the Iroquois tribes. The victory at Riqué was won at a great loss to the Iroquois, who were compelled to remain in the enemy's country two months to care for the wounded and to bury the dead.

Only two of the Erie villages are known by name—Riqué and Gentaienton. A portion of the so-called Seneca now living in Indian Ter. are probably descendants of Erie refugees.

Erigoanna. A tribe living near St Louis (Matagorda) bay, Tex., in 1687, and referred to as at war with the Ebahamo, q. v. (Douay quoted by Shea, Discov. and Expl. Miss., 209, 1852). Not identified, unless the same as the Kohani (q. v.). Probably a Karankawa band.

Erlite. A mineral, according to Dana (Text-book of Mineral., 426, 1888), "acicular, wool-like crystals of unknown nature occurring in a cavity in the quartz from Herkimer co., N. Y.": from Erie, the name of a lake, and -lite from the Greek λίθος, a stone. The lake was named from one of the peoples of Iroquoian stock. (A. F. C.)

Erio (E-ri'-o). A name given by the Spaniards to the Pomo living at the mouth of Russian r., Sonoma co., Cal.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 194, 1877.

Eriwonec. A former Delaware village on the E. bank of Delaware r., about Old Man's cr., in Salem or Gloucester co., N. J. The village was next above the Asomoché and 5 m. below the Rancocas. In 1648 the population numbered about 200, but had just been at war with the Conestoga.

Ernivwin (Er'niwîn). An Utkiavimut Eskimo summer camp inland from Pt Barrow, Alaska.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 83, 1892.

Ertlerger. A Yurok village on lower Klamath r., at the mouth of the Trinity, opposite Pekwuten and Weitpus, in Humboldt co., Cal. (A. L. K.)

Erusi (E-rus'-si). A name said by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 194, 1877) to have been applied to the Pomo formerly living near Ft Ross, Sonoma co., Cal., by the Pomo living N. of them. The people referred to now live near Stewart's Point and on the Haupt ranch a few miles E. of that place. Powers suggests that the name is a relic of the Russian occupancy, which is probably correct, as it is not an Indian name. (S. A. B.)

Erviplames. A tribe of central Texas in the 18th century. Domingo Ramón was met by some of them a few leagues W. of Trinity r., not far from the country of the Bidai. They are mentioned in unpublished documents as among the tribes which in company with other northern tribes petitioned for a mission on San Javier r., and they are included among the northern Indians as distinguished from the coast tribes. If they belonged to any of the large recognized divisions in this neighborhood it was probably Tonkawan. (H. E. B.)

Escaba. A former tribe, probably Comhuiltecan, on the lower Rio Grande.

Escabas-Cascates.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., XIV, 340, 1903 (combined with the name of another tribe, the Cascates, and corrupted). Escabas.—Revillagigedo (1793) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 611, 1886.

Escambuit. See Assocumbuit.

Escoba (Oski halba, 'cane-like', referring to reed-brakes). A former Choctaw town, noted by Romans; evidently situated a few miles E. or N. E. of Ayanabi, perhaps on or near Petickfa cr., Kemper co., Miss.—Halbert in Miss. Hist. Soc. Publ., vi, 424, 1902.

Escoumains (probably from ashktmin, or asktmin, 'early berry'.—W. J.). A Montagnais band living on a reserve of 97 acres on the S. W. side of Escoumains r., on the N. shore of the St Lawrence, in Saguenay co., Quebec. They numbered 53 in 1884, 43 in 1904.

Escoumaina.—Can. Ind. Aff. Rep. for 1884, pt. 1, 185, 1885.

Escumawash. A former Chumashan village at San José, about 6 m. from Santa Barbara mission, Cal.—Timeno (1856) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Esekepikabuk. A band of the Crow tribe adopted from the Sishasapa.

Eed Coup.—Culbertson in Smithson. Rep. 1850, 144, 1851. Eed Konera.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 159, 1877.

Ese-kep-ká-buk.—Ibid.

Eshhulup. The name of "the rancheria of the mission of San Buenaventura," Cal. (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860). The native name usually given to San Buenaventura was Mishkanakan, or Mitskanakan, (see Micanaka).

Eshkebugecoshé ('Flat-mouth', 'Wide-mouth'). A chief of the Pillager Chippewa; born in 1774, died about 1860. He belonged to the Awasee gens. In his youth Eshkebugecoshé engaged in distant expeditions, lived among the Cree and Assiniboin, and visited in war or peace the tribes of the upper Missouri, spending some time among the Hidatsa. His father, Yellow-hair (Wasonaunequa), was not a chief by descent, but gained ascendancy over the Pillagers through his knowledge of medicine, and it is said that whoever incurred his hatred died mysteriously. The son was different, enjoying the respect of whites as well as Indians throughout his long life. He was much impressed by the prophecies of Tenskwatwa, and through his influence poisoning ceased among the Pillagers, as among other Chippewa. In the later contests with the Sioux for the headwaters of the Mississippi he bore a valiant part. Although his band at Leech lake, Minn., was decimated in the exterminating war, it continued to grow through accessions of the bravest spirits of the eastern villages. When a political agent sought to enlist the Pillagers in the British interest at the beginning of the war of 1812, Flat-mouth returned the proffered wampum belts, saying that he would as soon invite white men to aid him in his wars as take part in a quarrel between the whites. (F. H.)

Eshpou. A Yurok village on the coast between the mouths of Klamath r. and Redwood cr., at Gold bluff, Cal. The dialect differed slightly from that of the Klamath River Yurok. (A. L. K.)

Eskogawaage. One of the 7 districts of the territory of the Micmac as recognized by themselves. It includes E. Nova Scotia from Canso to Halifax.—Rand, First Micmac Reading Book, 81, 1875.

Eskimaun Family. A linguistic stock of North American aborigines, comprising two well-marked divisions, the Eskimo and the Aleut (q. v.). See Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 71, 1891. (The following synonymy of the family is chronologic.)

Eskimo. A group of American aborigines, forming part of the Eskimaun linguistic stock, which formerly occupied nearly all the coasts and islands of Arctic America from E. Greenland and the N. end of Newfoundland to the westernmost Aleutian Ids., even extending to the E. coast of Siberia, a distance of more than 5,000 m. From remains found in Smith sd. it is evident that bands formerly wintered as far N. as lat. 79° and had summer camps up to 82°. At the present time they have receded from this extreme range and in the S. have abandoned the N. shore of the Gulf of St Lawrence, the N. end of Newfoundland, James bay, and the S. shores of Hudson bay, while in Alaska one Eskimo tribe, the Ugalakmiut, has practically become Tlingit through intermarriage. The name Eskimo (in the form

BUKUUK, A KINUGUMIUT ESKIMO OF ALASKA. (NELSON)

Excomminguois) seems to have been first given by Biard in 1611. It is said to come from the Abnaki Esquimaux, or from Ashkimeq, the Chippewa equivalent, signifying 'eaters of raw flesh.' They call themselves Inuit, meaning 'people.' The Eskimo constitute physically a distinct type. They are of medium stature, but possess uncommon strength and endurance; their skin is light brownish yellow with a ruddy tint on the exposed parts; their hands and feet are small and well formed; their eyes, like those of other American tribes, have a Mongoloid character, which circumstance has induced many ethnographers to class them with the Asiatic peoples. They are characterized by very broad faces and narrow, high noses; their heads are also exceptionally high. This type is most marked among the tribes E. of Mackenzie R. In disposition the Eskimo may be described as peaceable, cheerful, truthful, and honest, but exceptionally loose in sexual morality.

The Eskimo have permanent settlements, conveniently situated for marking certain hunting and fishing grounds. In summer they hunt caribou, musk-oxen, and various birds; in winter they live principally on sea mammals, particularly the seal. Although their houses differ with the region, they conform in the main to three types: In summer, when they travel, they occupy tents of deer or seal skins stretched on poles. Their winter dwellings are made either in shallow excavations covered with turf and earth laid upon a framework of wood or whale ribs, or they are built of snow. Their clothing is of skins, and their personal adornments are few. Among most tribes, however, the women tattoo their faces, and some Alaskan tribes wear studs in openings through their cheeks. Considering their degree of culture, the Eskimo are excellent draftsmen and carvers, their designs usually consisting either of simple linear incisions or of animal forms executed with much life and freedom. The people about Bering strait make some use of paints.

There has always been extensive intertribal communication. The Eskimo have an exceptional knowledge of the geography of their country. Poetry and music play an important part in their life, especially in connection with their religious observances.

The Eskimauan social organization is exceedingly loose. In general the village is the largest unit, although persons inhabiting a certain geographical area have sometimes taken the name of that area as a more general designation, and it is often convenient for the ethnographer to make a more extended use of this native custom. In matters of government each settlement is entirely independent, and the same might almost be said for each family, although there are customs and precedents, especially with regard to hunting and fishing, which define the relations existing between them. Although hardly deserving the name of chief, there is usually some advisory head in each settlement whose dictum in certain matters, particularly as to the change of village sites, has much weight, but he has no power to enforce his opinions.

The men engage in hunting and fishing, while all the household duties fall to the lot of the women—they must cook, make and mend clothes, and repair the kiaiks and boat covers, pitch the tents, and dry the fish and meat and stow them away for the winter. In some tribes skin-dressing is done by the men, in others by the women. Monogamy, polygamy, and polyandry are all practised, their occurrence being governed somewhat by the relative proportion of the sexes; but a second marriage is unusual where a man's first wife has borne him children. The execution of law is largely left to the individual, and blood-revenge is universally exacted.

The Eskimo believe in spirits inhabiting animals and inanimate objects. Their chief deity, however, is an old woman who resides in the ocean and may cause storms or withhold seals and other marine animals if any of her tabus are infringed. Her power over these animals arises from the fact that they are sections of her fingers cut off by her father at the time when she first took up her abode in the sea. The chief duty of angakoks, or shamans, is to find who has infringed the tabus and thus brought down the wrath of the supernatural beings and to compel the offender to make atonement by public confession or confession to the angakok. The central Eskimo suppose two spirits to reside in a man's body, one of which stays with it when it dies and may temporarily enter the body of some child, who is then named after the departed, while the other goes to one of several lands of the souls. Some of the lands of souls lie above the earth's surface, some beneath, and the latter are generally more desirable.

Although the theory of Asiatic origin of the Eskimo was long popular, many of their ethnic peculiarities are opposed to such a notion, and recent researches seem to indicate that their movements have rather been from E. to W. They are peculiar as being the only race of American aborigines who certainly had contact with white people before the days of Columbus, for Greenland was occupied during the 10th and 11th centuries by Norwegians, whose expeditions extended even as far as the American mainland.

Later Frobisher and other European navigators encountered Eskimo along the E. coasts, while the Russians discovered and annexed the W. part of their domain. This occupancy in its earlier period proved disastrous to the Aleut (q. v.) in particular, who were harshly dealt with and whose number was greatly reduced during the Russian domination (see Russian influence). The larger portion of the Greenland and Labrador Eskimo have been Christianized by Moravian and Danish missionaries, while the Alaskan representatives of the family have had Russian missionaries among them for more than a century. Those of the central groups, however, owing to the remoteness of their situation, have always been much less affected by outside influences. The Eskimo have proved almost indispensable assistants to Arctic explorers.

The Eskimauan stock embraces two well-marked divisions, the Eskimo proper and the inhabitants of the Aleutian is., the Aleut. Other divisions are rather geographical than political or dialectic, there being great similarity in language and customs from one end of the Eskimo domain to the other. They can be separated, however, into the following fairly well marked ethnological groups (based on information furnished by Dr Franz Boas):

I. The Greenland Eskimo, subdivided into the East Greenlanders, West Greenlanders, and Ita Eskimo, the last transitional between the Greenland Eskimo proper and the next group.

II. The Eskimo of s. Baffin land and Labrador, embracing the following divisions: Akudnirmiut, Akuliarmiut, Itivirmiut, Kaumauangmiut, Kigiktagmiut, Nugumiut, Okomiut, Padlimiut, Sikosilarmiut, Suhinirmiut, Tahagmiut.

III. The Eskimo of Melville penin., North Devon, N. Baffin land, and the N. W. shore of Hudson bay, embracing the Agomiut, Aivilirmiut, Amitormiut, Iglulirmiut, Inuissuitmiut, Kinipetu, Koungmiut, Pilingmiut, Saunikumiut.

IV. The Sagdirmiut of Southampton id., now extinct.

V. The Eskimo of Boothia Felix, King William land, and the neighboring mainland. These include the Netchilirmiut, Sinimiut, Uglulirmiut, Ukusiksalirmiut.

VI. The Eskimo of Victoria land and Coronation gulf, including the Kangormiut and Kidnelik, which may, perhaps, be one tribe.

VII. The Eskimo between C. Bathurst and Herschel id., including the mouth of Mackenzie r. Provisionally they may be divided into the Kitegareut at C. Bathurst and on Anderson r., the Nageuktor-miut at the mouth of Coppermine r., and the Kopagmiut of Mackenzie r. This group approximates the next very closely.

VIII. The Alaskan Eskimo, embracing all those within the American territory. This group includes the Aglemiut, Chingigmiut, Chnagmiut, Chugachigmiut, Ikogmiut, Imaklimiut, Ingukhimiut, Kaiagligmiut, Kangmaligmiut, Kaniagmiut, Kaviagmiut, Kevalingamiut, Kiatagmiut, Kinugumiut, Kowagmiut, Kukpaurungmiut, Kunmiut, Kuskwogmiut, Mage-miut, Malemiut, Nunatogmiut, Nunivagmiut, Nuwukmiut, Nushagagmiut, Selawigmiut, Sidarumiut, Tikeramiut, Togiagmiut, Ugalakmiut, Unaligmiut, Utukamiut, and Utkiavimiut.

IX. The Yuit of Siberia.

H o l m (1884-85) placed the number of East Greenland Eskimo at 550. The w. coast Greenlanders were given as 10,122 by the Royal Greenland Co. in 1888, and the Ita Eskimo numbered 234 in 1897, giving a total for this group of 10,906. The Eskimo of Labrador were estimated at 1,300 in a recent report by the Government of Newfoundland, and Boas in 1888 gave the number of Eskimo in the central groups as 1,100. According to the census of 1890, there were on the Arctic coast of Alaska from the British border to Norton sd., 2,729 Eskimo; on the s. shore of Norton sd. and in the Yukon valley, 1,439; in Kuskokwim valley, 5,254; in the valley of Nushagak r.; 1,952; on the s. coast, 1,670. The Ugalakmiut of Prince William sd., numbering 154, are reckoned with the Tlingit, but they were originally Eskimo, and for our present purposes are best placed in that category. Adding these, therefore, the total for this group, exclusive of the 968 Aleut, is 13,298. The Yuit of Siberia are estimated by Bogoras at 1,200. The Eskimo proper therefore number about 27,700, and the stock about 28,670.

Ealanagan. A village, supposed to be of the Chalone division of the Costanoan family, but possibly Esselenian, formerly connected with Soledad mission, Monterey co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Eamischue. A former Chumashan village near Purisima-mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Eanispole. A former Chumashan village near Purisima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Eeopus (sip 'river,' -us 'small'). A division of the Munsee that lived along the w. bank of Hudson r. in Greene and Ulster cos., N. Y., above the Minisink, who formed the main division. Eeopus is the old name of Kingston, which was their principal rendezvous. Under this name were included the Catskill, Mamekoting, Waoranec, Warranawongkong, and Wawarsink, sometimes called the five tribes of the Eeopus country. They continued to reside about Kingston until some joined the Moravian Munsee and Mahican in Pennsylvania, and others placed themselves under the protection of the Iroquois. About the year 1775 the remnant were at Oquanga, with fragments of other tribes. (J. M.)

Espachomy. A village on lower Hudson r., N. Y., near Poughkeepsie, under English protection in 1664.—Albany treaty (1664) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iii, 68, 1853.

Espanichkon. A small tribe n. of the St Lawrence in 1643 (Jes. Rel. 1643, 38, 1858), probably about the headwaters of Saguenay or St Maurice r. Not identified.

Espajos (named from their chief Espejo (Span.: 'mirror')). A branch of the Mescaleros inhabiting the plains of Chihuahua, Mexico, about 1859.—Froebel, Seven Years' Trav., 352, 1859.

Espeminkia. A band, apparently part of the Illinois, mentioned with the Tamara and Tapouara (Peoria?).—La Salle (1681) in Margry, Déc., ii, 134, 1877.

Eperien. Given by mistake as the name of one of the Hopi pueblos in 1598.—Ofiate (1598) in Doc. Ind., xvi, 137, 1871.

Espilaima. A former Chumashan village near Purisima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Espirito Santo de Zufiga. A mission established by the Marquis de San Miguel Aguayo, in March or April, 1722, near and under the protection of the newly established fort of Santa Maria de Loreto de la Bahía del Espíritu Santo, commonly called La Bahía, which was built on the site of La Salle's ill-fated Ft St Louis, on Lavaca r., Matagorda bay, Tex., in the territory of the Karankawa. The Spanish mission, of which Fray Agustín Patron was the first missionary, was abandoned before 1726, its priest establishing a new one among the Tamique and Juranames (Aranama), who lived 10 leagues inland, on lower San Antonio r., and in 1749 it was moved upstream opposite the site of the modern Goliad. The presidio of La Bahía was shifted with the mission. In 1768 its population was 300, and to that date there had been 623 baptisms; there were also 1,500 cattle and 100 horses, and it is said once to have had 15,000 cattle. The population, which consisted of Aranama, Tamique, Figuican, Manos de Perro, Kohani, and Karankawa Indians, had dwindled to 116 in 1785 (in which year there were also 3,000 cattle), and to only 33 Indians in 1793. See Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 1886; Garrison, Texas, 1903.

Espopolames. A former tribe, probably Coahuiltecan, in the neighborhood of the lower Rio Grande.

Espopolames.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 341, 1903. Isipopolames.—Revillagigedo (1793) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 611, 1886.

Esqugbaag. Formerly a rancheria, probably of the Sobaipuri, and a visita of the mission of Suamca about 1760-67; situated on or near the Rio San Pedro, near the Arizona-Sonora boundary.

Bads.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 563, 1884.
S. Andrés Esqugbaag.—Ibid.

Esquimalt. The local name for a body of Songish at the s. e. end of Vancouver id., under the Cowichan agency; pop. 15 in 1901, 20 in 1904.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. 2, 66, 1902; pt. 2, 69, 1904.

Esquimaux Point. A Montagnais mission settlement on the n. bank of the St Lawrence, about 20 m. e. of Mingan, Quebec.

Esquimaux Point.—Stearns, Labrador, 271, 1884. Pointe des Esquimaux.—Hind, Lab. Penin., II, 180, 1863.

Esquipomgole. Defined by Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 202, 1877) as "another name for kinnickinnick, or a mixture of tobacco and cornel bark"; said to be an Indian word, possibly Algonquian. (A. F. C.)

Essanape (Algonq.: asinapa 'stone person'.—W. J.). A tribe located by Lahontan (New Voy., I, 114, 1703) on his "Long r.," identified with Minnesota r. His voyage up this stream is probably fictitious, and so may be the tribe, which was certainly not the Assiniboin, as has been suggested, since these under the name Assimpoual were correctly placed by Lahontan in the region of L. Winnipeg. The tribe, if not imaginary, may have been, as Ramsey supposed, the Santee, known as Isanyati, for the Mdewakanton band dwelt at that time on Minnesota r. Essanapes.—Harris, Coll. Voy. and Trav., II, map, 1705. Essanapes.—Barcia, Ensayo, 291, 1723. Essan-a-pia.—Ramsey in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1849, 78, 1850. Essanapes.—Neill in Minn. Hist. Coll., I, 31, 1872. Essanapes.—Vaugondy, map, 1778.

Esselen. A tribe of Californian Indians, constituting the Esselenian family, most of the members of which on the founding of Carmelo mission, near Monterey, in 1770, were brought under civilizing influences, resulting, as was the case with the Indians at all the Californian missions, in their rapid decrease (see California Indians, Mission Indians, Missions). A portion of the tribe seems to have been taken to the mission at Soledad, for Arroyo de la Cuesta (MS., B. A. E.) in 1821 says of an Esselen vocabulary obtained by himself, "Huelel language of Soledad; it is from the Esselenes, who are already few." The original territory of the Esselen lay along the coast s. of Monterey, though its exact limits are diversely given. Henshaw (Esselen MS., B. A. E.) states that they lived on the coast s. of Monterey, in the mountains. The Rumsen Indians of the present day at Carmel and Monterey state (Kroeber, MS., Univ. Cal.) that the Esselen originally lived at Agua Caliente (Tassajara springs), which is near the head of Carmel r., in a line between Sur and Soledad. Powell's map (7th Rep. B. A. E.) makes the Esselen territory comprise Sur r., the head of Carmel r., and the country about as far s. as Santa Lucia peak, which is probably approximately correct. In any case the Esselen territory was confined to a limited area and was bordered only by Salinan and Costanoan tribes. La Perouse's statement that it extended more than 20 leagues s. of Monterey is incorrect. Almost nothing is known of the mode of life and practices of the Esselen, but they were certainly similar to those of the neighboring tribes. What little is known in regard to the Esselen language shows it to have been simple and regular and of a type similar to most of the languages of central California, but, notwithstanding a few words in common with Costanoan, of entirely unrelated vocabulary and therefore a distinct stock.

Taylor gives a list of Esselen villages connected with San Carlos mission, namely: Chachat, Coyo, Fyules, Gilimis, Jappayon, Nennequi, Noptac, Santa Clara, Saponet, Saccorondo, Tebityilat, Triwta, Tushguesta, Xumis, Yampas, and Yancostas. He mentions also Xaseum, 10 leagues from Carmelo, in the sierra, and Pachhepes near Xaseum, among the Esselen. He gives still other names, such as Excellemaks and Eselanagan; but none of the settlements named by him have been proved to be Esselen and not Costanoan. Carmelo Eselenes.—Taylor in Cal. Etchareottine ('people dwelling in the shelter'). An Athapaskan tribe occupying the country w. of Great Slave lake and upper Mackenzie r. to the Rocky mts., including the lower Liard valley, British America. Their range extends from Hay r. to Ft Good Hope, and they once lived on the shores of L. Athabasca and in the forests stretching northward to Great Slave lake. They were a timid, pacific people, called 'the peoples sheltered by willows' by the Chipewyan, indicating a riparian fisher folk. Their Cree neighbors, who harried and plundered them and carried them off into bondage, called them Awokanak, 'slaves,' an epithet which in its French and English forms came to be the name under which they are best known. Early in the 18th century they were dispossessed of their home, rich in fish and game, and driven northward to Great Slave lake whither they were still followed by the Cree, known only as Enna, 'the enemy,' a name still mentioned with horror as far as Great Bear lake. On the islands where they took refuge a fresh carnage took place. The Thlingchadinnah and Kawchodinnah, who speak the same dialect with them and bear a like reputation for timidity, probably comprehended under the name Awokanak by the Cree, began their northerly migration at the same time, probably under the same impulsion (Petitot, La Mer Glaciale, 292, 1887). Petitot found among them a variety of physiognomy that he ascribed to a mixture of races. Many of the males are circumcised in infancy; those who are not are called dogs, not opprobriously, but rather affectionately. The bands or divisions are, Eleidlinottine, Etchaoottine, Etcheridiegottine, Etechesottine, Klodeseottine, and Desnedeysarelottine (Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 363, 1891). In his monograph on the Déné-Dindjé, Petitot restricted the term to the Etcheridiegottine, whom he distinguished from the Slaves proper, making the latter a separate tribe with divisions at Hay r., Great Slave lake, Horn mts., the fork of the Mackenzie, and Ft Norman.

Etcheridiegottine ('people of the rapids'). An Etchareottine division which hunt along Liard r. and neighboring regions to the border of the Etchaoottine country near old Ft Halkett, British America. They have intermarried with the Etchaoottine and with the Tsattine in the s., and have absorbed their manners and customs and adopted their dialectal forms to such a degree that they have been frequently confounded with the one tribe or the other.

Etechesottine ('horn mountain people'). A division of the Etchareottine occupying the country between Great Slave and La Martre lakes, Mackenzie Ter., Can. Franklin erroneously considered them Thlingchadinnah.

Deerhorn mountaineers.—Franklin, Narr., II, 181, 1824. Eti-ches-ottin.—Petitot in Bull. Soc. de Geog. Paris, chart, 1875. Gens de la montagne la Corne.—Petitot, Dict. Déné-Dindjé, xx, 1876. Horn Mountain Indians.—Franklin, Narr., 260, 1, 24.

Etheneldeli ('caribou-eaters'). An Athapaskan tribe living e. of L. Caribou and L. Athabasca, in the barren grounds which extend to Hudson bay (Petitot, Dict. Déné-Dindjé, xx, 1876). Franklin (Journ. Polar Seas, II, 241, 1824) placed them between Athabasca and Great Slave lakes and Churchill r., whence they resorted to Ft Chipewyan. Ross (MS., B. A. E.) makes them a part of the eastern Tinne, their habitat being to the n. and e. of the head of L. Athabasca, extending to the end of Great Slave lake. Rocky r. separates them from the Tatsanottine. In the e. are the barren grounds to which they resort every year to hunt the caribou, which supplies practically all their needs. They were a part of the migrating Chipewyan who descended from the Rocky mts. and advanced eastward from Peace r. to displace the Hudson bay region with the Maskegon and Cree. One of their women who was held in captivity by the Maskegon was astonished at the weapons, utensils, and clothing of European manufacture that she saw among her captors, who told her that they made these articles themselves. Finding at last that they got them in barter for furs at Ft Prince of Wales, she made her escape to the English and told them of her own people on Peace r. who held the choicest furs cheap. The British traders, eager to extend their trade, sent her with a safe conduct to her people, whom she persuaded to migrate to the barren grounds near Hudson bay, where caribou were abundant. They settled around Reindeer, Big, and North Indian lakes, and were called the Northern Indians by the English and the Mangeurs de Caribou by the Canadian French, while the neighboring tribes called them by the same name that they had given to the English, Men of the Stone House. Hearne saw them in 1769 and Petitot found them there still a century later, numbering 900. About 300 traded at Ft Fond d'

Lac at the head of L. Athabasca. There were 248 enumerated at Fond du Lac in 1902, and 368 in 1904.

Caribee eaters.—Ross in Smithsonian. Rep. 1866, 306, 1872. Eastern Folks.—Richardson, Arct. Exped., II, 5, 1851. Ethen-eldali.—Pettitot, Dict. Soc., 651, 1883. Thé-yé-Ottiné.—Pettitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 363, 1891 ('people of the stone fort').

Ethics and Morals. It is difficult for a person knowing only one code of morals or manners to appreciate the customs of another who has been reared in the knowledge of a different code; hence it has been common for such a one to conclude that the other has no manners or no morals. Every community has rules adapted to its mode of life and surroundings, and such rules may be found more rigorously observed and demanding greater self-denial among savages than among civilized men. Notwithstanding the differences which necessarily exist between savage and civilized ethics, the two systems must evidently have much in common, for from the days of Columbus to the present travelers have given testimony of customs and manners of Indians, who were still in the barbarous or the savage stage, which displayed a regard for the happiness and well-being of others.

It is often difficult to tell how much of Indian manners and morals may have been derived from white people; but there are still some tribes which have held aloof from the intrusive race and have been little contaminated by it, and we have the testimony of early writers to guide us. The latter may be narrow in their judgment of Indian conduct while they are accurate in describing it.

To discuss the rise of ethics among primitive peoples would lead too far afield; but it is clear from all that is known of the natives of this continent that there existed among them standards of right conduct and character. Both from folklore and other sources we learn of conscience among the Indians and of their dread of its pangs. The Navaho designate conscience by a term which signifies "that standing within me which speaks to me." Abundant evidence might be adduced to show that Indians are often actuated by motives of pure benevolence and do good merely from a generous delight in the act.

Social ethics obtained among all the tribes, and public opinion was the power that compelled the most refractory to obedience. A system of ethics having once taken shape, the desire for the approval of one's associates and the wish to live at peace furnished sufficient incentive for compliance with the less onerous rules. But these motives were not sufficient in matters of graver import. Some tribes had executive bands, which had limited power to punish offenders in certain cases, such as violation of the orders of the tribal council; but among other tribes there was no established power to punish, nor were there even the rudiments of a court of justice. The pagan Indian is destitute of the faith in heaven and hell, which affords a strong incentive to moral life among many of our own people; but he has faith in good and bad luck, and frequently attaches different imaginary punishments to different offenses. Some regard various inanimate objects as the agents of these punishments. "May the cold freeze you!" "May the fire burn you!" "May the waters drown you!" are their imprecations.

When during the tribal hunt runners were sent out to seek a herd of buffalo, they had to give, on their return to camp, their report in the presence of sacred emblems in attestation of the truth of their statement. Scouts must report accurately or meet disgrace. The successful warrior must not claim more than his due; otherwise he would not be permitted to receive the badge of honors rightfully won. The common punishment for lying in many of the tribes was the burning of the liar's tent and property by tribal sanction. Not to keep a promise deliberately given was equivalent to lying. There are many instances of Indians keeping their word even at the risk of death.

Honesty was inculcated in the young and exacted in the tribe. In some communities the rule was limited in its operation to those within the tribe itself, but it was not uncommon to find its obligations extended to allies and to all friendly tribes. As war removed all ethical barriers, pillage was legitimate. The stealing of horses was a common object of war parties, but only from a hostile tribe. When a theft was committed the tribal authorities demanded restitution; the loss of the property taken, flogging, and a degree of social ostracism constituted the punishment of the thief. Instances could be multiplied to show the security of personal effects in a tribe. The Zuni, for example, on leaving home, close and seal the door with clay, and it remains inviolate. The Nez Percés and many other tribes lean a pole across the door to indicate the absence of the family, and no one molests the dwelling.

Murder within the tribe was always punished, either by exile, by inexorable ostracism and the making of gifts to the kindred of the slain, or by suffering the murderer to become the lawful victim of their vengeance.

Truth, honesty, and the safeguarding of human life were everywhere recognized as essential to the peace and prosperity of a tribe, and social customs enforced their observance; the community could not otherwise keep together, much less hold its own against enemies, for except where tribes were allies, or bound by some friendly tie, they were mutual enemies. An unaccredited stranger was always presumably an enemy.

Adultery was punished. The manner of punishment varied among the tribes, the choice being frequently left to the aggrieved party. Among the Apache it was the common custom to disfigure an erring woman by cutting off her nose.

The care of one's family was regarded as a social duty and was generally observed. This duty sometimes extended to one's relations.

While the young were everywhere taught to show respect to their elders, and while years and experience were supposed to bring wisdom, yet there were tribes among which it was the custom to abandon or to put to death the very old. Where this custom prevailed the conditions of life were generally hard, and the young and active found it difficult to secure food for themselves and their children. As the aged could not take care of themselves, and were an encumbrance to travel, they acquiesced in their fate as a measure of prudence and economy, dying in order that the young might live and the tribe maintain its existence.

The cruel punishment of witchcraft everywhere among the tribes had its ethical side. The witch or wizard was believed to bring sickness or death to members of the community; hence for their security the sorcerer must be put to death. The custom was due to a lack of knowledge of the causes of disease and to mistaken ethics. (A. C. F. W. M.)

Etipsikya (the name of a shrub). A traditional village of the Squash people of the Hopi; situated on the s. side of Rio Colorado Chiquito, on the brink of a canyon, not far from the point where the river is crossed by the Santa Fé Pac. R. R., Arizona.—Stephen and Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 26, 1891.

Etiquette. The interior of most native dwellings was without complete partitions, yet each member of the family had a distinct space, which was as inviolable as a separate apartment inclosed by walls. In this space the personal articles of the occupant were stored in packs and baskets, and here his bed was spread at night. Children played together in their own spaces and ran in and out of that belonging to the mother, but they were forbidden to intrude elsewhere and were never allowed to meddle with anyone's possessions. When more than one family occupied a dwelling, as the earth lodge, the long bark house, or the large wooden structure of the N. W., every family had its well-known limits, within which each member had a place. A space was generally set apart for guests, to which, on entering, a visitor made his way. Among the Plains tribes this place was at the back part of the dwelling, facing the entrance, and the visitor when entering a lodge and going to this place must not pass between his host and the fire. Among many tribes the place of honor was at the w., facing the entrance. If he was a familiar friend, greetings were at once exchanged, but if he had come on a formal mission, he entered in silence, which was unbroken for some little time after he was seated. On such occasions conversation was opened by reference to trivial matters, the serious purpose of the visit not being mentioned until considerable time had elapsed. When a delegation was received, only the older men of the party or of the tribe spoke; the younger members kept silent unless called on to say something. Among all the tribes haste was a mark of ill breeding, particularly during official or ceremonial proceedings. No visitor could leave the dwelling of his host without some parting words to show that his visit was at an end.

Among many tribes etiquette required that when speaking to a person a term of relationship rather than the personal name should be used. An elderly man or woman was usually addressed as grandfather or grandmother, and a similar title was also applied to a man of distinction. Uncle or aunt might be used for persons of about the same age as the speaker, but to a younger man or woman the term of address would signify younger brother or sister. A friendly visitor from outside the tribe was addressed by a term meaning "friend." A member of the tribe, although of a different clan or gens, was spoken to by a term of relationship; among the Iroquois, for example, one of the opposite phratry was greeted as "my father's clansman," or "my cousin."

When the bearer of an invitation entered a lodge, the person invited did not respond if a relative or friend was present, who would accept for him, saying, "Your uncle (or aunt) has heard." Among the Hopi, in entering a kiva, according to Dr Fewkes, one must ask, "Am I welcome?" before his left foot leaves the lowest rung of the ladder. He must always approach the altar on the right and leave it on the left. Among the Zuni a person, whether friend or stranger, on appearing at a doorway is invited to enter and sit; if at meal time, and often at other times, he is offered food.

Among a number of tribes etiquette required that there should be no direct speech between a woman and her son-in-law, and in some instances a similar restriction was placed on a woman addressing her father-in-law. In many tribes also the names of the dead were not likely to be mentioned, and with some Indians, for a space of time, a word was substituted for the name of a deceased person, especially if the latter were prominent. In some tribes men and women used different forms of speech, and the distinction was carefully observed. A conventional tone was observed by men and women on formal occasions which differed from that employed in everyday life.

Etiquette between the sexes demanded that the man should precede the woman while walking or in entering a lodge "to make the way safe for her." Familiar conversation could take place only between relatives; reserve characterized the general behavior of men and women toward each other.

Respect must be shown to elders in both speech and behavior. No one could be interrupted when speaking or forced to speak when inclined to be silent, nor could personal questions be asked or private matters mentioned. During certain ceremonies no one may speak above a whisper. If it was necessary to pass between a person and the fire permission must be asked, and if one brushed against another, or trod upon his foot, an apology must be made. At meal time, if one could not eat all that had been put upon his dish, he must excuse himself to show that it was through no dislike of the food, and when he had finished he must not push away his dish but return it to the woman, speaking a term of relationship, as mother, aunt, wife, which was equivalent to thanks. Among some tribes, if a cooking vessel had been borrowed, it must be returned with a portion of what had been cooked in it to show the owner the use that had been made of the utensil, and also, in courtesy, to share the food.

There was an etiquette in standing and sitting that was carefully observed by the women. They stood with the feet straight and close together, and if the hands were free, the arms hung down, a little toward the front, the fingers extended and the palms lightly pressed against the dress. Women sat with both feet under them, turned to one side. Men usually sat cross-legged.

The training of children in tribal etiquette and grammatical speech began at an early age, and the strict observance of etiquette and the correct use of language indicated the rank and standing of a man's family. Class distinctions were everywhere more or less observed. On the N. Pacific coast the difference between high caste and low caste was strongly marked. Certain lines of conduct, such as being a too frequent guest, were denounced as of low caste. So, too, among the Haida, it was of low caste to lean backward; one must sit on the forward part of the seat in an alert attitude to observe good form. Lolling in company was considered a mark of bad manners among the tribes; and among the Hopi one would not sit with legs extended during a ceremony. Smoking, whether social or ceremonial, had its etiquette; much form was used in exchanging smoking materials and in passing the pipe in smoking and in returning it. In certain societies, when a feast was served, particular parts of the animal belonged by etiquette to the noted warriors present, and these were presented by the server with ceremonial speech and movements. Among some tribes when a feast was given a pinch of each kind of food was sacrificed in the fire before eating. Ceremonial visitors usually made their approach known according to the local custom. Among some of the Plains tribes the visitors dispatched a runner bearing a little bunch of tobacco to apprise their host of their intended visit; should their coming prove to be ill timed, the tobacco could be returned with an accompanying gift, and the visit would be postponed without any hard feeling. There was much and varied detail in the etiquette of family life, social gatherings, and the ceremonies of the various tribes living N. of Mexico. Etishoka (E-tish-sho'-ka, 'hill people'). An Hidatsa band.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 159, 1877.

Etiwaw (Catawba: 'pine tree'). A small tribe, now extinct, forming part of the Cusabo group and living about Ashley and Cooper rs., Berkeley co., S. C., extending E. to the present Monk's Corner, where their hunting grounds bordered the Sewee country. The Santee and Congaree were above them. They were never prominent historically, and in Jan., 1715, had a single village with 240 inhabitants (Rivers, Early Hist. S. C., 84, 1874). Nothing is heard of them after the Yamasi war in 1715, until 1751, when they are mentioned as one of the small tribes for which the South Carolina government made peace with the Iroquois. From this time they seem to have become lost to history. Their name is preserved in Eutaw Springs, and in Pine Tree, another name for Camden, S. C.—Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894.

Etanataek (perhaps á'tanataheg?, 'where the fight, battle, or clubbing took place.'—W. J.). Given as the name of an old fortification said to have stood formerly near the Kickapoo village on Sangamon r., Ill. It is supposed to have been built by the Kickapoo and Foxes, who were defeated there by the combined forces of the Ottawa, Potawatomi, and

Etlenk. An Alaskan Eskimo village in the Kuskokwim district; pop. 25 in 1890. Etahlugamiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 164, 1893.

Etotulga. A former Seminole town, 10 m. E. of the old Mickasuky town, in Florida.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 26, 1826.

Etowah (properly P'itwá', of unknown meaning). A Cherokee settlement that existed, until the removal of 1838, on Etowah r., about the present Hightower (a corruption of P'itwá'), in Forsyth co., Ga. Another settlement of the same name may have been on Hightower cr. of Hiwassee r., in Towns co., Ga.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 522, 1900.

Hightower.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887. I'táwá'.—Mooney, op. cit. (Cherokee name.)

Etowah mound. A large artificial mound on the N. bank of Etowah r., 3 m. S. E. of Cartersville, Bartow co., Ga. With 4 or 5 smaller mounds it is on a level bottom in a bend of the stream, the immediate area, covering about 56 acres, flanked on one side by an artificial ditch which extends in a semicircle from a point on the river above to the river below. The large mound, which is a quadrilateral truncated pyramid, 61 ft. high, has a broad roadway ascending the S. side to within 18 or 20 ft. of the top, and was formerly provided with steps made with crossbeams imbedded in the earth, remains of which were visible as late as 1885. The diameters of the base are respectively 380 and 330 ft., and of the top 170 and 176 ft. The area of the base is a little less than 3 acres, and of the top about seven-tenths of an acre. The solid contents of the mound, including the roadway, are about 4,300,000 cu. ft. On the E. side there is a narrow extension from the summit to the base, which appears to have been a sort of refuse slide. The village situated here was possibly the Guaxule of De Soto's chroniclers (1540), and the large mound the one mentioned by Garcilasso de la Vega (Florida, lib. III, cap. xx, 139, 1723), although Mooney (19th Rep. B. A. E., 520, 1900) is of the opinion that Guaxule was probably about at Nacooche mound in White co.

The earliest description of the Etowah mound in modern times is by Cornelius Silliman's Am. Jour. Sci. and Art., 1st s., 1, 322, 1818). C. C. Jones (Antiq. So. Ind., 136, 1873) and Whittlesey (Smithson. Rep., 624, 1881) also describe and illustrate it. A careful survey of the large mound and group, and a partial exploration of the smaller mounds, were made by the Bureau of American Ethnology and an account thereof was published (5th Rep., 95-105, 1887; 12th Rep., 292, 1894). Cornelius states that "the Cherokees in their late war with the Creeks secured its [the large mound's] summit by pickets and occupied it as a place of protection for hundreds of their women and children." The smallest of the 3 larger mounds, the surrounding space, and 1 or 2 small tumuli have been explored. Parts of 3 or 4 stone images, copper plates with stamped figures bearing some resemblance to Mexican designs, and other copper plates with pieces attached by rivets have been found. Other articles, such as pipes, earthenware, copper celts, stone plates, etc., have also been unearthed. Ets-ee-kin.—Boss in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., 229, 1887.

Etsi-kin.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 65, 1887.

Etskainah (Éts-kai'-nah, 'horns'). A society of the Ikunnhkahtai, or All Comrades, among the Siksika; it is obsolete among the southern Piegan, but still exists with the northern Piegan and the Kainah. It is regarded as having originated with the latter and extended to the other divisions. The Sinopah (Kit-fox) society among the southern Piegan is practically identical with it. The present Etskainah society is said to have taken on some of the functions of the Stumiks (Bulls), now extinct. The members carry a crooked staff and are supposed to have magical powers (Wissler, inf'n, 1906). See Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 221, 1892.

Etsowish-simmesee-itahin ('grizzly-bear standing'). A Kalispel chief in the first half of the 19th century, baptized by Father De Smet about 1842 or 1843 under the name Loyola, by which name he was known to the whites. His early history is not known, but he was distinguished in his later years for his firm adherence to the Roman Catholic religion and his zealous efforts to lead his people to observe the teachings of the missionaries and the services and ordinances of the church. Although strict in repressing disorder, Loyola was highly regarded by his people, who regarded him as a father. He died Apr. 6, 1854, and was succeeded by Victor Alamiken, distinct from Victor of the Flathead (Salish) tribe of about the same period. (c. r.)

Etschaottine ('people who act contrarily'). A Nahane tribe of which one division lives on Francis lake, British Columbia, another in the neighborhood of old Ft Halkett (Hardisty in Smithsonian Rep. 1866, 311, 1872). Their name came from their warlike habits. Ross (MS., B. A. E.) gave their pop. in 1858 as 435.

Etsuk Chukke ('blue wood'). A former Choctaw town near East Abeika, Kemper co., Miss.—Romans, Fla., 309, 1775.

Eudeve. A division of the Opata of Sonora, Mexico, inhabiting the divide of the Rio Sonora and Rio San Miguel, and extending southward from about lat. 30°

30' to the villages of Matape and Nacori on the Rio Matape in lat. 29°, exclusive of Ures, which for the greater part was a Nevome pueblo, although containing some Opata. The language of the Eudeve—also called Heve, Dohme, etc.—is a dialect of the Opata. Like the other Opata, they have almost lost their former customs, religion, and habits, and have become Mexicanized. Population of the division unknown. The villages and settlements that have been mentioned are: Alamos, Bacanora, Batuco, Cucurpe, Matape, Nacori, Opodepe, Robesco, Sacarachi, Sahuaripa,* Soyopa,* Tepuspe, Toape,* and Tonichi.* Those marked with an asterisk were settled in part by Nevome. Eulachon. One of the names of the candle-fish (Thaleichthys pacificus), of the family Salmonidae, closely related to the smelt: from the name of this fish in one of the Chinookan dialects. It is found in the waters of the N. Pacific coast of America and is much used by the Indians of that region for food and the production of grease and oil. Other forms (Christian Union, Mar. 22, 1871) are hoolikan and oolichan, and Irving (Astoria, II) cites the form uthlecan. (A. F. C.)

Eushtat (E'-ushtat). The principal settlement of the Klamath on lower Williamson r., near lower Klamath lake, Klamath co., Oreg.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. 2, 32, 1890.

Evea. A Comanche chief, prominent between 1772 and 1778. In June, 1772, he went to San Antonio Béxar and ratified a treaty with the governor of Texas. Gov. Ripperdá, referring to this event in a letter of July 4, 1772, called him Evea, "capitan" of the Comanche nation, and in a letter written the next day he referred to him as "Pubea ó Evea, principal capitan" of that tribe. He was apparently still chief in 1778, for Mézières tells of meeting in Texas a party of Comanche under the son of Evea, a chief held in high estimation among his people. (H. E. B.)

Evil Peace. A village seen by De Soto's army in 1539, between Utinama and Cholutaha, Fla.—Gentil, of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 130, 1850.

Ewawoos. A Cowichan tribe whose town was Skeltem, 2 m. above Hope, Fraser r., Brit. Col.; pop. 27 in 1904.

Ewahoes.—Can. Ind. Aff., 309, 1879. Ewa-woos.—Ibid., 1901, pt. 2, 158. Ewa'wus.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1891.

Exchange, media of. Before the arrival of Europeans intertribal trade had resulted almost everywhere in America in the adoption of certain standards of value of which the most important were shell beads and skins. The shell currency of the Atlantic coast consisted of small white and black or purplish beads cut from the valves of quahog and other shells and familiarly known as wampum, q. v. These were very convenient, as they could be strung together in quantities and carried any distance for purposes of trade, in this respect having a decided advantage over skins. In exchange two white beads were equivalent to one black one. During the early colonial period wampum was almost the only currency among white people as well; but inferior, poorly finished kinds, made not only out of shell, but of stone, bone, glass, horn, and even wood, were soon introduced, and in spite of all attempted regulation the value of wampum dropped continually until in 1661 it was declared to be legal tender no longer in Massachusetts, and a year or two later the same fate overtook it in the other New England colonies. In New York it appears to have held on longer, its latest recorded use as currency being in 1693. Holm says, speaking of the Delaware of New Jersey: "In trade they measure those strings [of wampum] by their length," each fathom of them being worth 5 Dutch guilders, reckoning 4 beads for every stiver. "The brown beads are more valued than the others and fetch a higher price; a white bead is of the value of a piece of copper money, but a brown one is worth a piece of silver." Holm quotes another authority, however, to the effect that a white bead was worth one stiver and a black bead two. The latter says also that "their manner of measuring the strings is by the length of their thumbs; from the end of the nail to the first joint makes 6 beads."

On the Pacific coast between S. E. Alaska and N. California shell currency of another kind was employed. This was made from the Dentalium pretiosum (money tooth-shell), a slender univalve found on the w. coasts of Vancouver and Queen Charlotte ids. In the Chinook jargon it was called hiagua. The principal place where it was obtained is said to have been the territory of a Nootka tribe, the Ehatiaht, in Esperanza inlet, w. coast of Vancouver id., but it was collected as far N. as Quatsino inlet. The method of procuring it is described in one of the earliest accounts of this region, the Narrative of John Jewitt. According to Boas, a block of cedar was split up at one end so that it formed a kind of brush which opened when pushed down into the water and closed when pulled up, thus entangling the shells. These shells were valued in proportion to their individual lengths. In w. Washington the standard of value was 40 to the fathom, and the value fell off rapidly above that number, while very long single shells were worth more than a dollar. A fathom of 40 was formerly equivalent to a slave, according to Gibbs, and in his time would bring $5. In California and on the plateaus farther n. the shells had incised designs. Among the Hupa of California they are decorated by being wrapped spirally with fish skin or snake skin, and in addition usually bear a tuft of red feathers, probably from the woodpecker's crest. The following further description of these is given by Goddard:

"The individual shells are measured and their value determined by the creases on the left hand. The longest known shells were about 2½ in. long. One of them would reach from the crease of the last joint of the little finger to the crease on the palm opposite the knuckle joint of the same finger. The value of such a piece in early days was about $5. Shells of this length were called dīnket. The next smaller shells were called kike-tákútroi, and measured about 2¼ in. They were worth about $1.50 each. A shell about 1½ in. long was called icvólahit. Their value was from 25 to 50 cents. Shells smaller than these were not rated as money and had no decoration. The length of the shells smaller than the first mentioned was determined by applying them to the creases of the middle and other fingers of the left hand.

"This money was strung on strings which reached from the thumb nail to the point of the shoulder. Eleven of the largest size filled such a string and was therefore called mōanala. Twelve shells of the next smaller size composed a string and were called mōananax. Thirteen shells are called mōanatak, and 14 of the smallest shells, called mōanadiñk, was the largest number placed on a string. These strings are approximately 25 in. long. This, as it appears, was the least common multiple of the individual standard lengths.

"Since all hands and arms are not of the same length, it was necessary for the man, when he reached his maturity, to establish the values of the creases on his hand by comparison with money of known length as measured by someone else. He also had a set of lines tattooed on the inside of the left forearm. These lines indicated the length of 5 shells of the several standards. The measures were subdivided, there being lines of mōanala long and mōanala short, and so on. This was the principal method of estimating the money. The first 5 on the string were measured by holding the tip of the first shell at the thumb nail and drawing the string along the arm and noting the tattooed mark reached by the butt of the fifth shell. In like manner the last and intermediate sets of 5 were measured." This shell money was carried in special elk-horn boxes.

Among the coast tribes n. of Vancouver id., dentalia were not so much in vogue, but were used for ornamental purposes and in trade with the interior Indians. The standard of value among the Kutchakutchin and neighboring tribes consisted of lines of beads 7 ft long joined together at the distance of a foot, and called naki eik ('bead clothing'). The whole naki eik, according to Jones, "is equal to 24 made beaver, and one of the lines is one or more beaver skins, according to the value of the beads."

In central and s. California circular, disk-shaped shell beads were used. Among the Maidu they were counted instead of being measured in strings, although for each 10 beads a stick was laid down as a counter (Dixon). According to Powers the Miwok rated shell beads at $5 a yard, while the Yokuts valued a string reaching from the point of the middle finger to the elbow at 25 cents. These latter sometimes strung with them a section of bone very white and polished, about 2½ in. long, which they rated at 12½ cents. The Miwok strung together other shells which Powers believed to be olivella, valuing them at $1 a yard, as well as fancy marine shells, rated from $3 to $10 or $15 a yard, according to their beauty.

So far inland were these shells carried that dentalia were found among the Dakota, and it is probable that shells from both the Atlantic and the Pacific reached the same tribes.

A more usual standard of value among interior people, however, was the pelt, especially the skin of the beaver. Even on the Atlantic coast it was used from the very earliest times side by side with wampum, and in 1613 the statement is made that it was the basis of all trade between the French of Canada and the Indians. In 1670 (Margry, Déc., 1, 164, 1878) it is learned that a beaver skin was worth a fathom of tobacco, a fourth of a pound of powder, 6 knives, or a portion of little blue beads. According to Hunter it was also the standard of value among the Osage, Kansa, Oto, Omaha, and their neighbors. He adds that 2 good otter skins, from 10 to 12 raccoon, or 4 or 5 wildcat skins were valued at one beaver skin. Here this standard passed out very rapidly with the coming of white men; but in the great fur regions of Canada it remained the basis of value first between French and Indians, and afterward between English and Indians. Up to the present time everything is valued in "skins," meaning beaver skins, but the term has come to have a fixed value of 50 cents in Canadian money.

In former days, before the arrival of the Russians, the unit of value among the Eskimo of the lower Yukon was a full grown land-otter skin, to which was equivalent the skin of the large hair seal. This has now given place to the beaver; and all other skins, furs, and articles of trade are sold as "a skin" and multiples and fractions of "a skin." "In addition to this," says Nelson, "certain small, untanned skins, used for making fur coats or blouses, are tied in lots sufficient to make a coat, and are sold in this way. It requires 4 skins of reindeer fawns, or 40 skins of Parry's marmot or of the muskrat for a coat, and these sets are known by terms designating these bunches." The pelt of a wolf or wolverene is worth several "skins" in trade, while a number of pelts of muskrats or Parry's marmot are required to make the value of "a skin."

Among the northern tribes in the N. Pacific coast area, where dentalia were not so much valued, elk and moose skins seem formerly to have constituted one of the standards of value, although the skins of other animals were no doubt used to some extent as well. In later times all these were replaced by blankets introduced by the Hudson's Bay Company, which were distinguished by points or marks on the edge, woven into their texture, the best being 4-point, the smallest and poorest 1-point. The acknowledged unit of value, at least among the Haida, was a single 2½-point blanket, worth in 1880 a little more than $1.50, but on the coast farther S. it is now rated at about 50 cents. Everything was referred to this unit, according to Dawson, even a large 4-point blanket being said to be worth so many "blankets."

Another standard universal in this region was slaves, and perhaps the remarkable copper plates should also be mentioned, though strictly speaking they were legal tender of varying value which had to be fixed by means of some other standard, such as blankets or slaves. Pieces of cedar bark prepared for roofing sometimes appear as units of value also.

By the interior Salish of British Columbia Indian hemp bark was put up in bundles about 2 ft long and 2 in. in diameter, and tied at both ends, and 6 of these bundles constituted a "package," while dried salmon was generally sold by the "stick," each stick numbering 100 fish (Teit).

In addition to their dentalia the Hupa and the peoples of Klamath r., in N. California, use scalps of woodpeckers. They employ those of both the pileated and smaller woodpecker for this purpose, the present exchange values of which are now $1 and 10 cents, respectively (Goddard). According to Bourke, eagle feathers were an article of commerce with a determinate value among the Pueblo Indians. The Mandan standards were skin corn measures of different dimensions which were kept in the council lodge; and the Arikara measure was a stone mortar. In later years an important unit of value on the great plains was the horse.

The standards among the Hopi and probably other Pueblo tribes were a kind of basket tray, a fixed variety of blue blanket, and turquoise and shell beads.

On the Pacific coast canoes were valued according to the length in fathoms, but among the Hupa, where the length is constant, by their height and breadth, the natives providing themselves with marks on their legs for this particular purpose. Many other long articles seem to have been appraised in the same manner.

Although including the more prominent standards, the foregoing list by no means exhausts their number, for where articles of various kinds were continually bartered, numerous standards of a more or less evanescent nature arose. For a list of comparative valuations in one tribe see Teit, cited below, p. 260. See Beadwork, Commerce, Fur-trade, Horses, Measurements, Shellwork, Wampum.

Eyeish. A tribe of the Caddo confederacy which spoke a dialect, now practically extinct, very different from the dialects of the other tribes; hence it is probable they were a part of an older confederacy which was incorporated in the Caddo when the latter became dominant. The early home of the tribe was on Eyeish cr. between the Sabine and Neches rs. of Texas. Moscoeo led his troops through their country in 1542, encountering herds of buffalo. From the statements of Joutel and Douay, the Eyeish were not on good terms with the tribes w. of them on the Trinity, nor with those on Red r. in the n. at the time the French entered their country late in the 17th century; but, judging from the confusion of names by early writers, it is likely that only some of the subdivisions or villages were represented in the war parties. The mission of Nuestra Señora de los Dolores (q. v.) was established among them by the Franciscans who accompanied Don Domingo Ramon on his tour in 1716-17. They were, however, very little amenable to Spanish influence, for after 50 years of missionary effort, the mission register showed, according to Solis (MS., cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906), only 11 baptisms, 7 interments, and 3 marriages performed at the mission, although the tribe had not been backward in receiving material aid from the missionaries. Solis reported in 1768 that this tribe was the worst in Texas—drunken, thievish, licentious, impervious to religious influence, and dangerous to the missionaries. Their villages were not far from the road between the French post at Natchitoches and the Spanish post at Nacogdoches, and the tribe was thus exposed to the contentions of the period and to the ravages of smallpox, measles, and other new diseases introduced by the white race. In the latter part of the 18th century the Eyeish were placed under the jurisdiction of the officials residing at Nacogdoches; in 1779 Mezières stated that there were 20 families of the "Ays" and that they were hated by both Indians and Spaniards (Bolton, op. cit.). In 1785 there were reported to have been 300 "Ahijitos" on Atoyac r., opposite the Nacogdoches (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 666, 1886). In 1805 Sibley stated that only 20 members of the tribe were then living; but in 1828 (Soc. Geog. Mex., 1870) they were said to number 160 families between Brazos and Colorado rs. These differences in the estimates would seem to indicate that the Eyeish were considerably scattered during this period. Those who survived the vicissitudes which befell the Caddo in the 19th century are with their kindred on the Wichita rs. in Oklahoma. Nothing definite is known of their customs and beliefs, which, however, were probably similar to those entertained and practised by other tribes of the confederacy, and no definite knowledge of their divisions and totems has survived. While in New Mexico in 1540-41 Coronado learned from a Plains Indian known as The Turk, probably a Pawnee, of a province or settlement called Ayas, 6 or 7 days' journey distant, at which the Spanish army could obtain provisions on its way to Copala and Quivira. This place may have been imaginary, or the Eyeish people may have been meant. It was The Turk's intention to lead the Spaniards astray, hence locality plays but little part in the identification. (A. Family. There are important material differences in the organization and in the functions of the family as found respectively in savagery, barbarism, and civilization, and even within each of these planes of culture several marked types of the family, differing radically one from another in many characteristic features, exist.

To determine definitely even the main organic features of the family systems in a majority, not to say all, of the Indian tribes N. of Mexico, is not yet possible, owing to lack of material. In communities like those of the Muskhogean and the Iroquoian tribes, in which the clan system has been so highly developed, two radically different organic groups of persons exist to which the term family may properly be applied; and within each of these groups a more or less complex system of relationships definitely fixes the status of every person, a status that, acquired by birth or adoption, determines the civil or other rights, immunities, and obligations of the person. Among the Iroquois the ohwachira (the common Iroquoian name for the maternal blood family) was becoming merged into the clan (q. v.), so that in specific cases the two are virtually identical, although in other cases several ohwachira are comprised under one clan. The term ohwachira is common to all the known dialects of the Iroquoian stock. On the other hand there are found in these dialects several different names designating the group called a clan, seemingly indicating the probability that the family as an institution existed long before the development of the clan organization, when the several tribes still had a common history and tradition. But it is not strictly accurate to call an ohwachira a family, or a clan a family. The first and larger group includes the entire body of kindred of some one person, who is usually denominated the propositus.

In view of the rights and obligations of the father's clan to a person, in addition to those inherited from the clan of the mother, it appears that the family group among the Iroquois and Muskhogean tribes is composed of the maternal and paternal clans. The clan owes the child of its son certain civil and religious rights, and is bound to the child by obligations which vitally concern the latter's life and welfare, present and future. The youth's equipment for life would not be regarded as complete were the performance of these clan duties neglected. The tutelar of every person is named and made by the members of the paternal clan. The duties just mentioned do not end with the death of the person; if occasioned by war or by murder the loss must be made good by the paternal clan supplying a prisoner or the scalp of an enemy.

Some of the duties and obligations of the clan or clans whose sons have taken wives from a clan stricken by death are to condole with it, prepare the death feast, provide suitable singers to chant the dirges at the wake lasting one or more nights, guard and care for the body lying in state and prepare it for burial, make the bark burial case or wooden coffin, construct the scaffold or dig the grave, and to perform all the other needful duties due from clans bound together by marriage. It was regarded as unseemly for the stricken clan to do anything but mourn until the body of the dead had been placed in its final resting place and until after the feast of "reassociating with the public," held ten days subsequent to the death of the deceased, at which his property was divided among his heirs and friends. In case of the death of a chief or other noted person the clan mourned for an entire year, scrupulously refraining from taking part in public affairs until the expiration of this period and until after the installation of a successor to the dead officer. During the interim the bereaved clan was represented by the clan or clans bound to it by the ties of marriage and offspring.

These two clans are exogamic groups, entirely distinct before the child's birth, and form two subdivisions of a larger group of kindred—the family—of which any given person, the propositus, is the focal point or point of juncture. Strictly speaking, both clans form incest groups in relation to him. Every member of the community is therefore the point of contact and convergence of two exogamic groups of persons, for in these communities the clan is exogamic; that is to say, each is an incest group in so far as its own members are concerned. Within these clans or exogamic groups the members are governed by rules of a more or less complex system of relationships, which fix absolutely the position and status of everyone in the group, and the clan is thus organized and limited. Those, then, who have common blood with one another, or with a third person, belong to the same family and are kindred. Both of these clans owe the offspring the rights and obligations of kindred, but in differing degrees. Thus a person may be said to have two clans, in some measure—that of his mother and that of his father. Both clans exercise rights and are bound by obligations to the household of which he is a member; both have, moreover, in different measure, the rights and obligations of kinship to him.

The second and smaller group, the fireside or household, includes only the husband, his wife or wives, and their children. Where there are several wives from several different families, this group in its family relations becomes very intricate, but is nevertheless under the rigid control of family law and usage.

It is thus apparent that these two groups of persons are in fact radically distinct, for the lesser group is not merely a portion of the larger. The relative status of the husband and his wife or wives and their children makes this evident.

Custom, tradition, and the common law do not regard the wife or wives of the household as belonging to the clan of the husband. By marriage the wife acquires no right of membership in her husband's clan, but remains a member of her own clan, and, equally important, she transmits to her children the right of membership in her clan; and she acquires no rights of inheritance of property either from her husband or from his clan. On the other hand, the husband acquires no rights from his wife or from her clan, and he, likewise, does not become a member of his wife's clan.

But the fireside, or household, is the product of the union by marriage of two persons of different clans, which does not establish between the husband and wife the mutual rights and obligations arising from blood feud and from inheritance. It is precisely these mutual rights and obligations that are peculiarly characteristic of the relations between clansmen, for they subsist only between persons of common blood, whether acquired by birth or by adoption. Therefore, husband and wife do not belong to the same clan or family.

As there is a law of the clan or exogamic kinship group governing acts and relations as between members of the same clan group, so there are rules and usages governing the household or fireside and defining the rights and obligations belonging to its jurisdiction. The relations of the various members of the fireside are affected by the fact that every member of it is directly subject to the general rule of the clan or higher kinship group—the husband to that of his clan, the wife or wives to those of their respective clans, and the children to those of both parents, but in different kind and degree.

The dominating importance of the family in the social organization of a primitive people is apparent; it is one of the most vital institutions founded by private law and usage. In such a community every member is directly obligated to the family, first of all, for the protection that safeguards his welfare. The members of the family to which he belongs are his advocates and his sureties. In the grim blood feud the family defends him and his cause, even with their lives, if need be, and this care ends not with his death, for if he be murdered the family avenges his murder or exacts payment therefor. In the savage and barbaric ages, even to the beginning of civilization, the community placed reliance largely on the family for the maintenance of order, the redress of wrongs, and the punishment of crime.

Concerned wholly with the intimate relations of private life, family custom and law are administered within the family and by its organs; such customs and laws constitute daily rules of action, which, with their underlying motives, embody the common sense of the community. In a measure they are not within the jurisdiction of public enactment, although in specific cases the violation of family rights and obligations incurs the legal penalties of tribal or public law, and so sometimes family government comes into conflict with public law and welfare. But by the increasing power of tribal or public law through centralization of power and political organization the independence of the family in private feuds, regarded as dangerous to the good order of the community, is gradually limited. And when the family becomes a unit or is absorbed in a higher organization the individual acquires certain rights at the expense of the family—the right of appeal to the higher tribunal is one of these.

The wealth and power of a clan or family depend primarily on the dearth or abundance of its numbers. Hence the loss of a single person is a great loss, and there is need that it be made good by replacing the departed with another or by many others, according to the relative standing and importance of the person to be restored. For example, Aharihon, an Onondaga chieftain of the 17th century, sacrificed 40 men to the shade of his brother to show the great esteem in which he held him. But among the Iroquois the duty of restoring the loss does not devolve directly on the stricken clan or exogamic kinship group, but upon all allied to it by the ties of what is termed hontoñnishon'—i. e., upon those whose fathers are clansmen of the person to be replaced. So the birth or the adoption of many men in a clan or exogamic kinship group is a great advantage to it; for although these men become separated through the obligation of marrying into clans or such groups other than their own, the children of such unions are bound in a measure to the clan or exogamic kinship group of their fathers. This is a principle so well established that the chief matron of the paternal clan or exogamic kinship might oblige these offspring of diverse households (as many as might suffice) to go to war in fulfillment of their obligation, as seemed good to her; or she might stop them if they wished to undertake a war which was not, from its expediency, pleasing to her and her advisers. Therefore this chief matron, having decided that the time was at hand "to raise again the fallen tree" or "to put back on the vacant mat" one of the clan whom death removed, would inform one of the children whose fathers were her clansmen, their hoñthoñni, that it was her desire that he form and lead a war party against their enemies for the purpose of securing a prisoner or a scalp for the purpose named. The person whom she selected was one judged most capable of executing her commission. This was soon accomplished. She enforced and confirmed this commission with a belt of wampum. So powerful was this chief matron of a clan that when the council chiefs did not favor the designs of certain ambitious war chiefs in raising levies for military purposes, fearing that they might injure the best interests of the tribe, one of the surest methods they might employ to frustrate these enterprises was to win the chief matrons of the clans whose clansmen were the fathers of the recruits from the other clans, for these chief matrons had only to interpose their influence and authority to bring to naught the best concerted designs and enterprises of these ambitious war chiefs. This is ample evidence that these women had an influence in some degree exceeding that of the council of the ancients and tribal chiefs.

In the blood feud the paternal kin did not interfere except by counsel; but to avenge the death of a clansman of their father was an obligation. Outlaws were denied family and tribal rights. The renunciation of clan kinship entailed the loss of every right and immunity inhering in kinship. The fundamental concept in the organic structure of the family with its rights, immunities, and obligations is that of protection. To exercise the right of feud was lawful only to avenge the guilty murder of a clansman.

The clan or family was made useful by the tribe as a police organization, through which control was exercised over lawless men who otherwise were beyond restraint. Every clan had jurisdiction over the lives and property of its members, even to the taking of life for cause.

The mutual obligations of kindred subsist between persons who can act for themselves; but there are duties of protection by these toward those who can not act for themselves for any reason whatever, for it is a principle of humanity that they who are legally independent should protect those who are legally dependent. The modern law of guardianship of minors and imbeciles is evidently but a survival and extension of this obligation of protection in the primitive family and clan.

Speaking generally of the tribes of the N. W. coast, Swanton (Am. Anthropol., n. s., vii, no. 4, 1905) says that in addition to the "husband, wife, and children, a household was often increased by a number of relations who lived with the house owner on almost equal terms, several poor relations or protégés who acted as servants, and on the N. Pacific coast as many slaves as the house owner could afford or was able to capture."

In tribes where a clan or gentile organization similar to that of the Iroquoian and the Muskogean tribes does not exist, it is known that the incest groups on the maternal and the paternal sides are largely determined by the system of relationships, which fixes the position and status of every person within an indefinite group, and the incest group is reckoned from each propositus. That is to say, marriage and cohabitation may not subsist between persons related to each other within prescribed limits on both the maternal and paternal sides, although kinship may be recognized as extending beyond the prescribed limit. Among the Klamath these relationships are defined by reciprocal terms defining the relation rather than the persons, just as the term "cousin" is employed between cousins.

In speaking of the fierce, turbulent, and cruel Athapascan tribes of the valley of the Yukon, Kirkby (Smithson. Rep. 1864, 1865), says: "There is, however, another division among them, of a more interesting and important character than that of the tribes just mentioned. Irrespective of tribe they are divided into three classes, termed, respectively, Chit-sa, Nate-sa, and Tangee-at-sa, faintly representing the aristocracy, the middle classes, and the poorer orders of civilized nations, the former being the most wealthy and the latter the poorest. In one respect, however, they greatly differ, it being the rule for a man not to marry in his own, but to take a wife from either of the other classes. A Chit-sa gentleman will marry a Tangee-at-sa peasant without the least feeling infra dig. The offspring in every case belong to the class of the mother. This arrangement has had a most beneficial effect in allaying the deadly feuds formerly so frequent among them." As no further data are given, it is impossible to say what, if any, was the internal structure and organization of these three exogamic classes, with female descent, mentioned above. Apparently a similar social organization existed among the Natchez, but no detailed information on the subject is available.

Faraon ('Pharaoh'). A tribe of Apache. From references in early Spanish writings to the "Apache hordes of Pharaoh," it is assumed that the name of the Faraon Apache was thus derived. This tribe, no longer known by name, seems to have formed the s. division of the Querecho of Coronado (1541), the Vaqueros of Benavides (1630) and other 17th century writers, and part at least of the Llaneros of more recent times. Their principal range was that part of New Mexico lying between the Rio Grande and the Pecos, although their raids extended beyond this area. Nothing is known of their ethnic relations, but judging from their habitat, they were probably more closely related to the Mescaleros than to any other of the Apache tribes, if indeed they were not a part of them. They made numerous depredations against the Spanish and Pueblo settlements of the Rio Grande in New Mexico, as well as in Chihuahua, and for a time at least their principal rendezvous was the Sandia mts. in the former territory. Several expeditions were led against them by the Spanish authorities, and treaties of peace were made, but these did not prove to be binding. According to Orozco y Berra (Geog., 59, 1864) their divisions were Ancavistis, Jacomis, Orejones, Carlanes, and Cuampes, but of these the Carlanes at least belonged to the Jicarillas.

Far Indians. A general term used by English writers about the beginning of the 18th century to designate the Indians of any tribe remote from the English settlements of the N. Atlantic coast. It was applied more especially to the tribes of the upper great lakes and to the Shawnee before their removal from the S. The word occurs also as "Farr." (J. M.)

Farmer's Brother. A Seneca chief, known among his people as Honanyawus, of vulgar meaning, born in 1716, or 1718, or 1732, according to varying authorities; died in 1814 (Drake, Biog. and Hist. Inds., bk. v, 108, 1837; Haines, Am. Indian, 579, 1888). He is often mentioned in connection with Red Jacket, but does not appear to have come into prominence until about 1792. One of his most celebrated speeches was delivered before a council at Genesee r., N. Y., in 1798. He signed the treaties of Genesee, Sept. 15, 1797, and Buffalo cr., June 30, 1802. He espoused the cause of the United States in the war of 1812, and although 80 years of age engaged actively in the strife and was present in the action near Ft George, N. Y., Aug. 17, 1813. He died soon after the battle of Lundy's Lane and was buried with military honors by the fifth regiment of U. S. infantry. Farmer's Brother was always an advocate of peace and more than once prevented his tribe from going on the warpath. (C. T.)

Fasting. A rite widely observed among the Indians and practised both in private and in connection with public ceremonies. The first fast took place at puberty, when the youth was sometimes sent to a sequestered place and remained alone, fasting and praying from 1 to 4 days, or even longer (see Child life). At this time or during similar fasts which followed, he was supposed to see in a dream the object which was to be his special medium of communication with the supernatural. Simple garments or none were worn when fasting. Among some tribes clay was put upon the head, and tears were shed as the appeals were made to the unseen powers. At the conclusion of a long fast the quantity of food taken was regulated for several days. It was not uncommon for an adult to fast, as a prayer for success, when about to enter upon an important enterprise, as war or hunting. Fasting was also a means by which occult power was believed to be acquired; a shaman had to fast frequently in order to be able to fulfill the duties of his office.

Initiation into religious societies was accompanied by fasting, and in some of the great ceremonies all the principal actors were obliged to fast prior to taking part. The length of these fasts varied with the ceremony and the tribe, and ranged from midnight to sunset, or continued 4 days and nights. Fasting generally included abstinence from water as well as food. The reason for fasting has been explained by a Cherokee priest as "a means to spiritualize the human nature and quicken the spiritual vision by abstinence from earthly food." Other tribes have regarded it as a method by which to remove "the smell" of the common world. Occasionally chiefs or leaders have appointed a tribal fast in order to avert threatening disaster. See Feasts.

Feasts. Among all tribes there were feasts, ranging in importance from that of the little child to its playmate up to those which were a part of the great sacred ceremonies. These so-called feasts were never elaborate and were simply served, each portion being ladled from the kettle by the hostess, or by one appointed for the task.

Feasts were held at stated times. On the N. Pacific coast the coming of the salmon was celebrated in a feast of thanksgiving by all the tribes able to secure the fish from inlets or rivers. Farther S. the ripening of acorns and other fruits was similarly observed. The maturing of the maize was the occasion for tribal festivities; at that time the Creeks held their 8-days' ceremony known as the Busk (q. v.), when the new corn was eaten, the new fire kindled, new garments worn, and all past enmities forgiven. In November, when the Eskimo had gathered their winter store, they held a feast, at which time gifts were exchanged; by this a temporary relationship was formed between the giver and taker, which tended to good feeling and fellowship. During the full moon of December the Eskimo held a feast to which the bladders of animals killed during the year were brought. These were "supposed to contain the inuaq, or shades of the animals." On the sixth and last day the bladders were taken out to a hole made in the ice, and thrust into the water under the ice. They "were supposed to swim far out to sea and then enter the bodies of unborn animals of their kind, thus becoming reincarnated and rendering game more plentiful" (Nelson). Among the Iroquois a feast was held to keep the medicine alive. Religious ceremonies to insure fruitfulness took place at the planting of the maize, at which time a feast was held.

Feasts were given on the completion of a house, at a marriage, and when a child was named. Feasts in honor of the dead were widely observed. The time which must elapse after a death before the feast could be given varied among the tribes. Among some of the Plains Indians it occurred after 4 days, with the Iroquois after 10 days, and with other tribes after nearly a year. The Eskimo held their memorial feast late in November. The near relatives were the hosts, and the dead were supposed to be present beneath the floor of the dwelling where they enjoyed the festivities in their honor, partaking of the food and water cast there for them, and receiving the clothing put as a gift upon their namesakes. At the feast for the dead held by the tribes on the N. Pacific coast, the spirits of the departed were also supposed to be present, but the portions of food intended for them were passed through the fire and reached them in this manner. The Huron held their ceremonial feast in the fall, when all who had died during the year were disinterred by their kindred, the flesh stripped from the bones, and these wrapped in new robes and laid in the clan burial pit. The feast was one of tribal importance and was accompanied with religious rites.

It was incumbent on an aspirant to tribal honor to give feasts to the chiefs, and one who desired initiation into a society must provide feasts for the society. Respect to chiefs and leading men was expressed by a feast. On such an occasion the host and his family did not eat with their guests; they provided the food and the dishes, but the head chief appointed one of the guests to act as server. At all feasts the host was careful not to include in the food or the dishes used anything that would be taboo to any of his guests; a failure to observe this important point would be considered an insult.

The meetings of secular societies among the Plains tribes, whether the membership was of one or both sexes, were always accompanied with a feast. There was no public invitation, but the herald of the society went to each lodge and gave notice of the meeting. The food was provided by the family at whose lodge the society met, or by certain other duly appointed persons. The preparation for the feast varied in different societies within the same tribe. In some instances the food was brought ready cooked to the lodge, in others it was prepared in the presence of the assembly. The people brought their own eating vessels, for at these feasts one had to eat all that was served to him or take what was left to his home.

In most tribal ceremonies sacred feasts occurred, for which certain prescribed food was prepared and partaken of with special ceremony. Feasts of this kind often took place at the close of a ceremony, rarely at the beginning, although sometimes they marked a particular stage in the proceedings. Among the Iroquois, and perhaps other tribes, the owner feasted his fetish (q. v.), and the ceremony of the calumet (q. v.), according to early writers, was always concluded with a feast, and was usually accompanied by an exchange of presents.

Among the Omaha and cognates there was a gathering called "the fire-place feast." A company of young men or of young women, never of both sexes, met together by invitation of one of their number. When the company took their places around the fire, a space at the w. was left, where a bowl and spoon were placed to represent the presence of Wakan-da, the giver of food.

At every feast of any kind, on any occasion where food was to be eaten, a bit or small portion was first lifted to the zenith, sometimes presented to the four cardinal points, and then dropped upon the earth at the edge of the fire or into the fire. During this act, which was an offering of thanks for the gift of food, every one present remained silent and motionless. See Etiquette, Fasting, Food, Pollatch.

Featherwork. The feathers of birds entered largely into the industries, decorations, war, and worship of the Indians. All common species lent their plumage on occasion, but there were some that were especially sought: in the Arctic regions, water birds during their annual migrations; the eagle everywhere; wild turkeys in their habitat; ravens and flickers on the N. Pacific coast; woodpeckers, meadow larks, crested quail, mallard ducks, jays, blackbirds, and orioles in California; and in the Pueblo region, eagles, hawks, turkeys, and parrots especially. The prominent species in every area were used.

Not willing to depend on the fortunes of the hunt, the Pueblo and Virginia Indians held eagles and turkeys in captivity until such time as their feathers were wanted. Property right in eagles of certain localities were recognized by the Pueblos. In the Arctic regions parkas were made of bird skins sewed together, the feathers forming an excellent barrier against the cold. To the southward the skins of young waterfowl, while covered with down, were sewed together for robes. The historic tribes of the E. cut bird skins into strips and wove them into blankets in the same way that the western tribes used rabbit skins. In the turkey robes described by Capt. John Smith and other early explorers the pretty feathers of these birds were tied in knots to form a network, out of which beautiful patterned cloaks were wrought. Fans and other accessories of dress were made of wings or feathers by the Iroquois and other tribes. The uses of feathers in decoration were numberless. The Western Eskimo sewed little sprays of down into the seams of garments and bags made of intestinal membranes, and the California Indians decorated their exquisite basketry in the same manner. The quills of small birds, split and dyed, were used for beautiful embroidery and basketry in the same way as porcupine quills. For giving directness to the flight of arrows, feathers were usually split so that the halves could be tied or glued to the shaftment in twos or threes. Among the Eskimo and some of the southwestern Indians the feathers were laid on flat. Among California tribes bird scalps were used as money, being both a standard of value and a medium of exchange. The most striking uses of feathers were in connection with social customs and in symbolism. The masks and the bodies of performers in ceremonies of the N. Pacific coast were copiously adorned with down. Feathers worn by the Plains tribes in the hair indicated rank by their kind and number, or by the manner of mounting or notching. The decoration of the stem of the calumet (q. v.) was of feathers, the colors of which depended on the purpose for which the calumet was offered. Whole feathers of eagles were made into war-bonnets, plumes, and long trails for dances and solemnities. In the Pueblo region feathers played an important rôle in symbolism and worship—prayer-sticks, wands, altar decorations, and aspergills were made of them. The downy feather was to the mind of the Indian a kind of bridge between the spirit world and ours. Creation and other myths spring out of feathers.

Feather technic in its highest development belongs to South America, Central America, and Polynesia, but there is continuity in the processes from the N. part of America southward. See Adornment, Art, Clothing, Color symbolism, Eagle, Exchange, Horse, Ornament, Quillwork, Weaving.

Fermentation. Instances are few among the North American tribes of the employment of fermentation for a definite purpose. The phenomena of the "turning" or souring of cooked vegetal food or of ripe fruit must frequently have been observed, but the isolation of a pure culture, the starting and control of its action to furnish a desired product or result, was practically unknown. The rare examples of primitive American brewing and yeast making, however, are instructive as bearing on the development of the knowledge of the process of fermentation. Some Californian tribes prepare manzanita cider by mashing the berries of the Arctostaphylos manzanita, collecting the juice and allowing it to ferment from natural causes—by means of minute organisms, such as yeast and bacteria, which are constantly present in human surroundings and for which the juice of ripened fruit presents a proper medium. This, however, was perhaps not knowingly used as a fermented drink or intoxicant in aboriginal times. A step in advance of this is observed in the preparation of tiwin by the Apache of Arizona; corn is soaked, sprouted, dried, and ground, and this is mixed in water and kept in a warm place to ferment, producing a kind of beer. The fermenting agent is natural, as in the case of the manzanita cider, but the production of malt as a culture for the yeast germs seems to indicate that tiwin is not an Apache invention. The Apache also ferment pine bark by a process more primitive than that employed in the manufacture of tiwin. In the crude fermentations described, the Indians have learned to put their brew in a jar long used for the purpose, and thus retaining in its pores the organisms causing fermentation. What appears to be an approach to the discovery of beer is found in the sour corn gruel made by the Cherokee and other southern tribes, and by the Huron and other tribes of the N. This is a thin gruel of corn meal and water allowed to sour. It was a popular food, and there is no evidence that it had an intoxicating effect. Among the Pueblos is found the highest advance in the process of fermentation—the preparation and preservation of yeast for bread making. This is made by retaining corn meal in the mouth for several hours, when the magma is ejected into the food mass designed to be fermented. By this method the starch of the corn meal is acted on by the ptyalin of the saliva, rendering it a culture medium for the yeast which, once "set," continues its action indefinitely. The Zuni have discovered that by means of salt and lime this saliva yeast may be preserved for future use. Saliva yeast was known to most beer-drinking agricultural tribes of the Old World; in America it is known to various tribes of S. Mexico and of Central and South America, but so far as known the Pueblos and neighboring tribes are the only ones in northern America acquainted with its use. See Food.

Fetish (Portuguese: feitico, 'a charm', 'sorcery', 'enchantment' (whence the English fetish); adjective, 'made by art', 'artificial', 'skillfully contrived'; Latin factitious, 'made by art', 'artful by magic'). Among the American Indians an object, large or small, natural or artificial, regarded as possessing consciousness, volition and immortal life, and especially orenda (q. v.), or magic power, the essential characteristic, which enables the object to accomplish, in addition to those that are usual, abnormal results in a mysterious manner. Apparently in any specific case the distinctive function and sphere of action of the fetish depends largely on the nature of the object which is supposed to contain it. It is the imagined possession of this potent mysterious power that causes an object to be regarded as indispensable to the welfare of its possessor.

In the belief of the Indians, all things are animate and incarnate—men, beasts, lands, waters, rocks, plants, trees, stars, winds, clouds, and night—and all possesses volition and immortal life; yet many of these are held in perpetual bondage by weird spells of some mighty enchantment. So, although lakes and seas may writhe in billows, they can not traverse the earth, while brooks and rivers may run and bound over the land, yet even they may be held by the potent magic power of the god of winter. Mountains and hills may throb and quake with pain and grief, but they can not travel over the earth because they are held in thralldom by the powerful spell of some potent enchanter. Thus it is that rocks, trees, roots, 'stocks and stones', bones, the limbs and parts of the body, and the various bodies of nature are verily the living tombs of diverse beings and spirits. Of such is the kingdom of the fetish, for even the least of these may be chosen. Moreover, a fetish is an object which may also represent a vision, a dream, a thought, or an action.

The following extract from Cushing's Zufi Fetiches (2d Rep. B. A. E., 1883) will show the reputed connection between the object and its quickener, between the object and the thing it represents. In speaking of the Two Sun Children, Cushing says: "Now that the surface of the earth was hardened, even the animals of prey, powerful and like the fathers (gods) themselves, would have devoured the children of men; and the Two thought it was not well that they should all be permitted to live, 'for,' said they, 'alike will the children of men and the children of the animals of prey multiply themselves. The animals of prey are provided with talons and teeth; men are but poor, the finished beings of earth, therefore the weaker.'"

"Whenever they came across the pathway of one of these animals, were he a great mountain lion or but a mere mole, they struck him with the fire of lightning which they carried in their magic shield. Thlu! and instantly he was shriveled and burned into stone.

"Then said they to the animals that they had changed into stone: 'That ye may not be evil unto men, but that ye may be a great good unto them, have we changed you into rock everlasting. By the magic breath of prey, by the heart that shall endure forever within you, shall ye be made to serve instead of to devour mankind.'"

"Thus was the surface of the earth hardened and scorched and many of all kinds of beings changed to stone. Thus, too, it happened that we find, here and there throughout the world, their forms, sometimes large like the beings themselves, sometimes shriveled and distorted. And we often see among the rocks the forms of many beings that live no longer, which shows us that all was different in the 'days of the new.'

"Of these petrifications, which are of course mere concretions or strangely eroded rock forms, the Zufi say, 'Whosoever of us may be met with the light of such great good fortune may see (discover, find) them and should treasure them for the sake of the sacred (magic) power which was given them in the days of the new.' " Such is the Zufi philosophy of the fetish.

FETISH NECKLACE OF HUMAN FINGERS; CHEYENNE.
(BOURKE)

A fetish is acquired by a person, a family, or a people for the purpose of promoting welfare. In return, the fetish requires from its owner worship in the form of prayer, sacrifice, feasts, and protection, and from its votaries it receives ill or good treatment in accordance with the character of its behavior toward them. Some fetishes are regarded as more efficacious than others. The fetish which loses its repute as a promoter of welfare gradually becomes useless and may degenerate into a sacred object—a charm, an amulet, or a talisman—and finally into a mere ornament. Then other fetishes are acquired, to be subjected to the same severe test of efficiency in promoting the well-being of their possessors.

The fetish is clearly segregated from the group of beings called tutelars, or guardian spirits, since it may be bought or sold, loaned or inherited, while, so far as known, the tular is never sold, loaned, or, with the Iroquois, inherited.

Among the Santee and the Muskogean and Iroquoian tribes the personal tutelary, having a different origin, is scrupulously discriminated from all those objects and beings which may be called fetiches. The tutelary has a particular name as a class of beings. Rev. John Eastman says that this is true of the Santee, and it is probably true of many other tribes. Some fetiches are inherited from kindred, while others are bought from neighboring tribes at a great price, thus constituting a valuable article of intertribal commerce. It is also acquired by choice for multifarious reasons.

A person may have one or many fetiches. The name fetish is also applied to most of the articles found in the medicine sack of the shaman, the pindikosan of the Chippewa. These are commonly otter, snake, owl, bird, and other skins; roots, bark, and berries of many kinds; potent powders, and a heterogeneous collection of other things employed by the shaman.

A fetish is not a product of a definite phase of religious activity, much less is it the particular prerogative of any plane of human culture; for along with the adoration of the fetish goes the worship of the sun, moon, earth, life, trees, rivers, water, mountains, and storms as the embodiment of as many personalities. It is therefore erroneous to assign the fetish to the artificial stage of religion sometimes called hecatostheism. The fetish must be carefully distinguished from the tutelary of every person. Among the Iroquois these are known by distinct names, indicative of their functions: ochi-na'tēn'da' for fetish, and oiāron' for the tutelary.

WHALE FETISH OF WOOD; WESTERN

Mooney says, in describing the fetish, that it may be "a bone, a feather, a carved or painted stick, a stone arrowhead, a curious fossil or concretion, a tuft of hair, a necklace of red berries, the stuffed skin of a lizard, the dried hand of an enemy, a small bag of pounded charcoal mixed with human blood—anything, in fact, which the owner's medicine dream or imagination might suggest, no matter how uncouth or unaccountable, provided it be easily portable and attachable. The fetish might be the inspiration of a dream or the gift of a medicine-man, or even a trophy taken from a slain enemy, or a bird, animal, or reptile; but, however insignificant in itself, it had always, in the owner's mind at least, some symbolic connection with occult power. It might be fastened to the scalp-lock as a pendant, attached to some part of the dress, hung from the bridle bit, concealed between the covers of a shield, or guarded in a special repository in the dwelling. Mothers sometimes tied the fetish to the child's cradle.

WILDCAT FETISH OF THE CHASE; ZUŔI. (CUSHING)

"A fetish noted among the Sioux is described as the image of a little man, which was inclosed in a cylindrical wooden case and enveloped in sacred swan's down (Riggs). A hunting and divining fetish among the Cherokee consisted of a transparent crystal, which its owner kept wrapped up in buckskin in a sacred cave and occasionally fed by rubbing over it the blood of a deer. The Pueblo tribes have numerous war and hunting fetiches of stone, small figurines cut to resemble various predatory animals, with eyes of inlaid turquoise and one or more arrowheads bound at the back or side, and smeared with frequent oblations of blood from the slain game. The protective amulet sometimes took the form of a small figurine of a bird or other animal swift in flight, as the hawk; silent in movement, as the owl; or expert in dodging, as the dragonfly. In all tribes the nature and mysterious origin of the personal fetish or 'medicine' were the secret of the individual owner or of the maker, who, as a rule, revealed it only to one formally chosen as heir to the mystic possession and pledged in turn to the same secrecy."

In this battle, Fife, who had joined Jackson with 200 warriors at Talladega, not only saved Coffee's division from defeat when hard pressed by fearful odds, but turned the tide of battle in favor of Jackson's army. "But for the promptness of Fife and his warriors," says Drake (Ind. Chiefs, 104, 1832), "doubtless the Americans must have retreated." Fire-making. Two methods of making fire were in use among the American aborigines at the time of the discovery. The first method, by flint-and-pyrites (the progenitor of flint-and-steel), was practised by the Eskimo and by the northern Athapaskan and Algonquian tribes ranging across the continent from Stikine r. in Alaska to Newfoundland and around the entire Arctic coast, and also throughout New England; as well as by the tribes of the n. Pacific coast. The inference is that this method of fire-making at one time was general in this area, but the observations on which its distribution is based are from widely separated localities in which it is invariably used in connection with fire-making by wood friction. It appears probable that flint-and-pyrites, in view of its distribution in northern Europe, was introduced into America through Scandinavian contact, or is acultural either from Europe or Asia. The flint-and-steel is clearly an introduction of recent times.

The second method, by reciprocating motion of wood on wood and igniting the ground-off particles through heat generated by friction, was widespread in America, where it was the most valued as well as the most effectual process known to the aborigines. The apparatus, in its simplest form, consists of a slender rod or drill and a lower piece or hearth, near the border of which the drill is worked by twisting between the palms, cutting a socket. From the socket a narrow canal is cut in the edge of the hearth, the function of which is to collect the powdered wood ground off by the friction of the drill, as within this wood meal the heat rises to the ignition point. This is the simplest and most widely diffused type of fire-generating apparatus known to uncivilized man. Among the Eskimo and some other tribes the simple two-piece fire drill became a machine by the use of a hand or mouth rest containing a stone, bone, or wood socket for the upper end of the drill, and a cord with two handles or string on a bow for revolving the drill. By these inventions uniform and rapid motion and great pressure were effected, rendering it possible to make fire with inferior wood. The four-part drill consisted of two kinds: (a) The cord drill, which requires the cooperation of two persons in its working, and (b) the bow drill, which enables one person to make fire or to drill bone and ivory. The distribution of these varieties, which are confined to the Eskimo and their neighbors, follows no regular order; they may be used together in the same tribe, or one or the other may be used alone, although the presumption is that the cord drill is the older. The hearth alone embodies two interesting modifications which reflect the environment. In one the canal leads down to a step or projection from the side of the hearth, and in the other the drilling is done on a longitudinal slot in the middle of the hearth, the object in both cases being to prevent the fire from falling into the snow. These features also seem to have an indiscriminate distribution in the area mentioned.

The pump drill has been employed for fire-making only among the Onondaga of Canada, who used it in making sacred fire for the White-dog feast; but the pump drill is of little practical use in fire-making. From the Onondaga also there is an example of the fire plow like that of the Polynesians, in which a stick is held at an angle between the hands and rubbed back and forth along a plane surface, cutting a groove in which the wood meal produced by friction ignites. The appearance of these diverse methods in one tribe, in an area where the simple drill was common, leads to the assumption that they are of recent introduction. There is no other evidence that the fire plow ever existed in the western hemisphere.

The wood selected for the fire drill varied in different localities, the proper kinds and qualities being a matter of acquired knowledge. Thus the weathered roots of the cottonwood were used by the Pueblos; the stems of the yucca by the Apache; the root of the willow by the Hupa and Klamath; cedar by the N. W. coast tribes; elm, maple, and buttonwood by the eastern Indians. In some instances sand was placed in the fire cavity to increase friction; often two men twirled the drill alternately for the purpose of saving labor or when the wood was intractable.

A similar discrimination is observed in the selection of tinder. The Eskimo prized willow catkins; the Indians of the N. W. coast used frayed cedar bark; other tribes used fungi, softened bark, grass, or other ignitable material. Touchwood or punk for preserving fire was obtained from decayed trees, or some form of slow match was prepared from bark. From the striking of a spark to the well-started campfire considerable skill and forethought were required. The glowing coal from the fire drill was usually made to fall into a small heap of easily ignitable material, where it was encouraged by fanning or blowing until actual flame was produced; or the spark with the small kindling was gathered in a bunch of grass or a strip of bark and swung in the air.

Fire-making formed an important feature of a number of ceremonies. New fire was made in the Green-corn ceremony of the Creeks (see Busk), the White-dog feast of the Iroquois, the New-fire and Yaya ceremonies of the Hopi, and among many other tribes in widely separated localities. There are also many legends and myths grouped about the primitive method of obtaining fire at will. The Cherokee and other southern tribes believed that a perpetual fire burned beneath some of the mounds in their country, and the Natchez built their mounds with a view, it is said, of maintaining a perpetual fire. On the introduction of flint-and-steel and matches the art of fire-making by the old methods speedily fell into disuse among most tribes and was perpetuated only for procuring the new fire demanded by religious rites. See Drills and Drilling, Illumination.

Fishhooks. Starting from the simple device of attaching the bait to the end of a line, the progressive order of fishhooks used by the Indians seems to be as follows: (a) The gorge hook, a spike of bone or wood, sharpened at both ends and fastened at its middle to a line, a device used also for catching birds; (b) a spike set obliquely in the end of a pliant shaft; (c) the plain hook; (d) the barbed hook; (e) the barbed hook combined with sinker and lure. This series does not exactly represent stages in invention; the evolution may have been effected by the habits of the different species of fish and their increasing wariness. The material used for hooks by the Indians was wood, bone, shell, stone, and copper. The Mohave employed the recurved spines of certain species of cactus, which are natural hooks.

FISHHOOK AND LINE; HUDSON BAY ESKIMO. (TURNER)

Data on the archeology of the fishhook have been gathered from the Ohio mounds and the shell-heaps of Santa Barbara, Cal., unbarbed hooks of bone having been found on a number of Ohio sites and gorge hooks at Santa Barbara. The fishhook of recent times may be best studied among the N. Pacific tribes and the Eskimo of Alaska. The Makah of Washington have a modified form of the gorge hook, consisting of a sharpened spine of bone attached with a pine-root lash to a whalebone. British Columbian and Alaskan tribes used either a simple hook of bent wood having a barb lashed to a point, or a compound hook consisting of a shank of wood, a splint of pine-root lashed at an angle of 45° to its lower end, and a simple or barbed spike of bone, wood, iron, or copper lashed or set on the outer end of the splint. Eskimo hooks consisted frequently of a shank of bone with a curved, sharpened spike of metal set in the lower end, or several spikes were set in, forming a gig. Usually, however, the Eskimo hook had the upper half of its shank made of stone and the lower half of ivory, in which the unbarbed curved spike of metal was set, the parts being fastened together by lashings of split quill. A leader of quill was attached to the hook and a bait of crab carapace was hung above the spike. This is the most complex hook known in aboriginal America.

with the customs of the fishermen, the habits of the fish, and the environment. The Eskimo used lines of knotted lengths of whalebone quill, hair, or sinew; the N.

Pacific tribes, lines of twisted bark, pine root, and kelp; and other tribes lines of twisted fiber. Short poles or none were used by the Eskimo and N. Pacific tribes. In other regions it is probable that long poles of cane or saplings were used. In some regions, as on the N. W. coast, a trawl, consisting of a series of hooks attached by leaders to a line, was used for taking certain species of fish. The Haida, according to Swanton, made a snap hook, consisting of a hoop of wood, the ends of which were held apart by a wooden peg. This peg was displaced by the fish on taking the bait, and the ends of the hoop snapped together, holding the fish by the jaw. (See Fishing.)

Fishing. At the first coming of the Europeans the waters of this continent were found teeming with food fish, the great abundance of which quickly attracted fleets of fishermen from all civilized parts of the Old World. The list of species living in American waters utilized by the Indians would fill a volume. The abundance or scarcity of this food on the Atlantic coast varied with the season. In spring the fish made their appearance in vast shoals in the spawning beds of the coast and in the bays and rivers. Capt. John Smith relates, in his History of Virginia, early in the 17th century, that on one occasion fish were encountered in such numbers in the Potomac as to impede landing from his boat. The annual spring run of herring above Washington is still almost great enough to warrant the assertion. Fish life varied with locality and season. On the northern and eastern coasts the fish disappeared to a great extent when the waters became cold at the approach of winter, and many northern fishes went to more southerly waters. Among the better known food products furnished by the waters of the country may be mentioned the whale, sea lion, seal, otter, swordfish, sturgeon, porpoise, cod, haddock, halibut, pollock, salmon, trout, herring, shad, perch, bass, mackerel, flounder, eel, plaice, turbot, white-fish, catfish, smelt, pike, dogfish, and all varieties of shellfish. By some tribes, as the Apache, Navaho, and Zuni, fish were tabu as food; but where fish was used at all by the Indians, practically everything edible that came from the water was consumed. The salmon of the Pacific coast are still found in enormous schools, and in the canning industry hundreds of persons are employed. Lobsters and crabs furnished no inconsiderable food supply, while the vast deposits of shells along all tidewater regions, as well as many of the interior rivers, testify to the use made of shellfish by the aborigines; they not only supplied a large part of the daily food of the people but were dried for time of need. Shellfish were dug or taken by hand in wading and by diving. Salmon and herring eggs formed one of the staple articles of diet of the tribes of the N. Pacific coast. To collect herring eggs these tribes laid down under water at low tide a row of hemlock branches, which were held in position with weights; then branches were fastened together, and a float was fixed at one end, bearing the owner's mark. When these boughs were found to be covered with eggs they were taken into a canoe, carried ashore, and elevated on branches of a tree stripped of its smaller limbs, where they were left to dry. When first placed in position the eggs adhered firmly to the boughs, but on taking them down great care had to be exercised, because they were very brittle and were easily knocked off. Those not immediately consumed were put up in the intestines of animals and laid aside for winter use. It is recorded in the Jesuit Relations that many eels came to the mouth of St Lawrence r. and were trapped by the Indians, who made long journeys to get the season's supply.

On the middle and s. Atlantic coast fish are found during the greater portion of, if not throughout, the year, while farther n. fishing is confined more to the spawning seasons and to the months when the waters are free of ice. Experience taught the natives when to expect the coming of the fish and the time when they would depart. In methods of capturing seafood the native had little to learn from the white man, even in killing the whale (which was treated as royal game on the coast of Vancouver id.), the sealion, or the seal, or in taking shellfish in the waters of the ocean and in the smallest streams.

Large fish and marine mammals were captured by means of the harpoon, while the smaller ones were taken by the aid of bow and arrow, gigs, net, dull, trap, or weir. Fires or torches were used along the shore or on boats, the gleam of which attracted the game or fish to the surface, when they were easily taken by hand or with a net. Among the Cherokee, Iroquois, and other tribes, fish were drugged with poisonous bark or other parts of plants; in parts of California extensive use was made of soap root and other plants for this purpose. Carved fishhooks (q. v.) of shell and bone have been found in shell-heaps and graves in the interior. In shape these resemble the hooks of metal from Europe, though the natives of the Pacific coast used fishhooks of wood and bone combined, made in so primitive a manner as to indicate aboriginal origin. Another ingenious device employed along the N. Pacific coast for catching fish consisted of a straight pin, sharp at both ends and fastened to a line by the middle; this pin was run through a dead minnow, and, being gorged by another fish, a jerk of the string caused the points to pierce the mouth of the fish, which was then easily taken from the water. Artificial bait, made of stone and bone combined, was used as a lure, and was quite as attractive to fish as is the artificial bait of the civilized fisherman.

Still another ingenious way of catching fish was by "pinching," by means of a split stick, which, like the gig, held the fish fast.

In shallow rivers low walls were built from one side of the stream to the other, having a central opening through which fish were forced into a trap. Brushwood mats were also made, which were moved along like seines, so as to drive the fish into shallow or narrow places, where they were readily taken by the hand or with dipnets. Along the shores of rapid streams men stationed themselves on rocks or staging and speared fish as they passed up or downstream. During winter, when the northern waters were frozen, holes were cut in the ice, and through these fish were shot, speared, or netted.

Probably the most primitive of all methods of fishing, however, by which many salmon were and doubtless are still captured, was that of knocking them on the head with a club. After a great run of fish had subsided, single ones were caught in shallow water by any of the above methods. There are still indications that from an early period a trade existed between the fishing Indians and those of the interior who gained their livelihood by other means. Great supplies of fish were cured by drying in the sun or over fires, and sometimes the product was finely ground and packed in skins or baskets for future use. See Food.

Five Civilized Tribes. A term used both officially and unofficially in modern times to designate collectively the Cherokee, Chickasaw, Choctaw, Creek, and Seminole tribes in Indian Ter., applied on account of the advance made by these tribes toward civilized life and customs. The term appears in the reports of the Indian Office as early as 1876, when the agent reported (p. 61) that each tribe "had a constitutional government, with legislative, judicial, and executive departments, conducted upon the same plan as our State governments, the entire expenses of which are paid out of their own funds." There was, however, at that date no court with jurisdiction to try cases where an Indian was one party and a citizen of the United States or a corporation was the other, but this lack has since been supplied. Some of the tribes, notably the Cherokee, have had their laws and the acts of their councils printed.

These five tribes differed from most others in the fact that their lands were held not on the same basis as reservations but by patents or deeds in fee simple, with certain restrictions as to alienation and reversion—those conveyed to the Cherokee Nation, Dec. 31, 1838, forever upon condition that they "shall revert to the United States if the said Cherokee Nation becomes extinct or abandons the same"; those to the Choctaw Nation, Mar. 23, 1842, in fee simple to them and their descendants, "to inure to them while they shall exist as a nation, and live on it, liable to no transfer or alienation, except to the United States or with their consent"; those to the Creek tribe, Aug. 11, 1852, "so long as they shall exist as a nation and continue to occupy the country hereby conveyed to them." Although the lands were held in fee simple, the right to alienate them except to the United States or with its consent does not appear to have passed to the grantees. The title is defined as a "base, qualified, or determinable fee, with only a possibility of reversion to the United States (U. S. v. Reese, 5 Dill., 405). The right of these tribes to cut, sell, and dispose of their timber, and to permit mining and grazing within the limits of their respective tracts was for a time limited to their own citizens, but this right has been somewhat extended, though the exercise of it is still subject to approval by the proper United States authorities. The title of the Chickasaw Nation to their lands in Indian Ter. was obtained from the Choctaw in accordance with treaties with the United States, while that of the Seminole was obtained from the Creeks, these two tribes being granted their lands on the same basis and with the same title and privileges as the United States granted the lands to the Choctaw and the Creeks. The territory thus assigned to these five tribes within the limits of Indian Ter. amounted to 19,475,614 acres, or about 30,431 sq. m., an area equal to that of South Carolina, and equivalent to 230 acres for each man, woman, and child of the entire population (84,507) of the five tribes.

The treaties of 1866 with the several tribes all provided for the holding of a general council to be composed of delegates from each tribe in Indian Ter., and the Choctaw and Chickasaw treaty also provides that this general council shall elect a delegate to Congress whenever Congress shall authorize the admission into its body of an official who shall represent Indian Ter. Although some of the tribes have made an effort to bring about the results contemplated in these treaty stipulations, nothing effectual in this direction has been accomplished. By act of Congress Feb. 8, 1887, every Indian born in the United States who receives land in allotment and takes up "his residence separate and apart from any tribes of Indians therein and has adopted the habits of civilized life," is declared a citizen of the United States; but the Five Civilized Tribes were excepted from the provisions of this act. By act of Mar. 3, 1901, however, this section was amended by inserting after the words "civilized life" the words "and every Indian in Indian Territory," thus declaring every Indian of that territory to be a citizen of the United States. By act of May 2, 1890, the laws of Arkansas, so far as applicable, were extended over Indian Ter. until Congress should otherwise provide. United States courts and courts of special jurisdiction have also been established in the Territory. By sec. 16 of the act of Mar. 3,

1893, the President was authorized to appoint three commissioners (subsequently changed to five), to negotiate with the five tribes for the allotment in severalty of their lands, thus extinguishing the tribal title thereto. (See Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes.)

On the abolition of slavery the problem of determining the status and relations of the freedmen in the Five Civilized Tribes became a difficult one, though by treaties of 1866 it was agreed that they should be subject to the same laws as the Indians and be entitled to a portion of the land (the rights in this respect differing in the different tribes); but questions respecting other matters, as school privileges, have proved troublesome factors. In some of the tribes negroes have separate schools, and by the act of Congress of June 28, 1898, the freedmen were excluded from participating in the royalties on coal and asphalt, or in the school funds arising therefrom. By the same act and the acts of Mar. 1, 1901, and July 1, 1902, the tribal governments of these tribes were to cease Mar. 4, 1906, but by resolution of Feb. 27, 1906, the time was extended one year. Freedmen are, however, citizens in all the tribes. Consult the articles on the tribes composing the Five Civilized Tribes. (c. r.)

Flakes. The term flake is often used by archeologists synonymously with chip and spall, but it is most commonly applied to the long, thin slivers of flint or other brittle stone designed for use as cutting implements or produced without particular design in the ordinary course of implement making. When systematically made in numbers for use as knives or scrapers or for other purposes, a roughly cylindrical or somewhat conical piece of fine-grained material was selected or made, and the the flakes were removed by strokes with a hammer delivered on one of the ends near the margin, the fracture extending the entire length or most of the length of the core and producing a flake, flat or slightly convex on the inside, sharp on the edges, and having an outer surface or back with one or more angles or facets according to the previous contour of the particular part of the original surface of the core removed. The manufacture of flakes for knives, extensively carried on by the ancient Mexicans, is described as being accomplished by abrupt pressure with a wooden implement, one end placed against the shoulder of the operator and the other set upon the core at the proper point. The exact manner of utilizing the flake blades by the northern tribes is not known, but they were probably set in suitable handles as knives, or employed in making small arrowheads, scrapers, and the like. Flakes and chips are produced by identical implements, the latter term being generally applied to the shorter, more abrupt flakes or bits produced in the ordinary work of shaping implements by both percussion and pressure processes. The expression "chipped implements" is however very generally applied to all forms shaped by fracture processes. See Cores, Flaking implements, Hammers, Stonework. (W. H. H.)

Flaking implements. The shaping of stone by fracture processes is one of the earliest as well as one of the most important arts of primitive men. Two distinct classes of processes as well as two widely differing classes of implements are employed. Fracture by percussion is accomplished by means of hammers of stone or other hard material (see Hammers, Stonework), and fracture by pressure employs a number of devices, perhaps the most usual among the northern tribes being bits of hard bone, antler, or ivory, somewhat resembling an awl in shape and often set in handles of wood or other suitable material. These are employed where the edges of the stone under treatment are sharp and rather thin. In using them the edge is firmly placed crosswise on the sharp edge of the brittle stone, or the point is set near the edge, and by a quick movement accompanied with strong pressure the flake is driven off. This operation is rapidly repeated, passing along the outline of the implement, alternating the sides, until the desired form is produced. The pieces under treatment may be held in various ways; for deep notching, which requires strong force, they are often laid flat on a pad of buckskin or other yielding material supported on a stable surface, and the bone point is made to remove the chips by a quick downward movement. Implements of metal are effectual in this particular form of the chipping work. Other devices mentioned by some writers are notched bones and pincers of bone, by means of which the sharp edge of the flint was chipped. For heavier work various contrivances enabling the operator to apply greater force were employed, but these are not well understood. It appears that a punch-like tool of bone or antler was sometimes used, the point being set, at the proper point, on the stone to be fractured, while the other end was struck with a hammer or mallet to remove the flake. For writings on the subject, see Stonework. (W. H. H.)

Flathead. A name applied to several different tribes usually owing to the fact that they were accustomed to flatten the heads of their children artificially. In s. e. United States the Catawba and Choctaw were sometimes designated by the term Flatheads, and the custom extended to nearly all Muskogean tribes as well as to the Natchez and the Tonika. In the N. W. the Chinook of Columbia r., many of the Vancouver id. Indians, and most of the Salish of Puget sd. and British Columbia were addicted to the practice, and the term has been applied to all as a body and to some of the separate divisions. Curiously enough, the people now known in official reports as Flatheads—the Salish proper (q. v.)—never flattened the head. Dawson implies (Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1891, sec. II, 6) that they were so named (Têtes-Plates) by the first Canadian voyageurs because slaves from the coast with deformed heads were among them. For the names of the tribes to which the term has been applied, see Flatheads in the index; consult also Artificial head deformation. (J. R. S.)

Flint. Until recently the use of the term flint was restricted to nodular concretions found in chalk beds of Cretaceous age mainly in England, France, and other European countries, but recently obtained from Cretaceous strata in Arkansas and Texas. Although flint is classed as a variety of chalcedony, the name has been extended in popular usage to include various forms of chalcedonic minerals, as chert, hornstone, basanite, jasper, agate, and the like. The principal constituent of all these minerals is silica, and notwithstanding their great dissimilarity the distinctions are due almost entirely to manner of formation and included foreign substances. Such impurities, though they make up a very small percentage of the stone, produce upon exposure to atmospheric influences an infinite variety of coloring and great diversity of texture. The flints as thus defined were extensively employed by the aborigines in the manufacture of chipped implements, and the implements themselves are sometimes referred to as "flints." See Chalcedony, Chert, Quartz, Mines and Quarries. (G. F. W. H. H.)

Flint disks. Flattish objects of circular, elliptical, or almond-like outline produced by chipping away the outer portions of nodules having these approximate forms. The question has been earnestly debated whether these and kindred forms were for any practical or economic use, or whether they had some occult significance as votive offerings. They are very seldom found in graves and infrequently on village sites or about shops where implements were made. Many of them are of the blue nodular hornstone found in s. Illinois, in the vicinity of Wyandotte cave in s. Indiana, and in w. Kentucky and Tennessee, but no record has yet been made of the discovery in large numbers of such disks in any of these localities except the first. The range in size is generally from 3 to 8 in. in length or diameter, though a few exceed the latter dimension. The finest specimen known is from Tennessee; it is almost exactly circular, made of the Stewart co. flint, about 1 in. thick and 9 in. across. Flint disks as well as the more leaf-like blades are usually found in deposits or caches containing numerous nearly identical specimens. See Cache disks and blades, Storage and Caches. (W. H. H.)

Florida Indians. A term almost as vague as the ancient geographic conception of Florida itself, used (Doc. Col. Hist. N. Food. The areas occupied by the Indians may be classed as supplying, predominantly, animal food, vegetal food, and mixed diet. No strict lines separate these classes, so that in regions where it is commonly said that the tribes are meat eaters exclusively, vegetal food is also of importance, and vice versa. Vegetal food stuffs are (1) preagricultural, or the gathering of self-sown fruits, nuts, seeds, and roots; and (2) agricultural, or (a) the raising of root crops, originating in the harvesting of roots of wild plants, and (b) of cereal products, consisting chiefly of maize (q. v.) grown by the majority of the tribes, and wild rice (q. v.) in the area of the upper lakes, where a sort of semiagriculture was practised to some extent. (See Agriculture.)

Animal food was obtained from the game of the environment, and the settlement and movements of some tribes depended largely on the location or range of animals, such as the buffalo, capable of furnishing an adequate food supply; while on the other hand, the limit of habitat of water animals, as the salmon, tended to restrict the range of other tribes to the places where the supply could be gathered. No pure hunter stage can be found, if it ever existed, for while the capture of animals devolved on the man and the preparation of food on the woman, the latter added to the diet substances derived from the vegetal kingdom. Similarly no purely agricultural stage with exclusively vegetal diet existed, and no aboriginal domestication (q. v.) of animals n. of Mexico is found except in the case of the turkey and the dog.

In general, in the n. portion of the continent the diet was three-fourths animal food; in the s. part it was three-fourths vegetal; while with the tribes of the coast, mountains, lakes, and plains, it varied according to the food supply. The absence of milk food, other than the maternal lactation, to a considerable extent limited the natural increase of population. The food supply also changed with the seasons, causing the diet at different periods of the year to vary in its ratio of animal to vegetal constituents, and another feature depended on religious customs and habits which modified or regulated the food used. For example, the Apache and Navaho will not eat fish or the flesh of the bear or beaver, and other tribes had tabu or totemic animals which, though useful for food, were not eaten (see Tabu). In inhospitable regions, such as that inland from the Texas coast in the 16th century, the natives subsisted on whatever they could find. Cabeza de Vaca wrote of the Yguazas: "Their support is principally roots, which require roasting two days; many are very bitter. Occasionally they take deer, and at times take fish; but the quantity is so small and the famine so great, that they eat spiders and the eggs of ants, worms, lizards, salamanders, snakes, and vipers that kill whom they strike; and they eat earth and wood, and all that there is, the dung of deer, and other things that I omit to mention; and I honestly believe that were there stones in that land they would eat them. They save the bones of the fishes they consume, of snakes, and other animals, that they may afterward beat them together and eat the powder." Almost as much may be said of the Maidu of California who, in addition to consuming every edible vegetal product, ate badgers, skunks, wildcats, and mountain lions; practically all birds except the buzzard; yellowjacket larvae, grasshoppers, locusts, and crickets, and even salmon bones and deer vertebrae (Dixon).

Vegetal food comprised a vast array of the products of plant life, of which roots and seeds were the most valuable. The most important food plant possessed by the Indians was maize (q. v.) which formed and still forms their principal subsistence. Following maize in order of importance came beans, peas, potatoes, squashes, pumpkins, melons, and chile, which were grown in variety. Uncultivated plants also entered into the dietary, as seeds, roots, and flowers of grasses and other plants, or parts of plants used as greens, for flavoring, etc. In numberless cases wild plants have preserved tribes from starvation when cultivated crops failed. In the S. W., cactus and yucca fruits, mesquite beans, and the agave were most important elements of the food supply. As in Mexico, the roasted fleshy leaves and leaf matrix of the agave were prized as sweet, nourishing food (see Mescal). Tuckahoe and other fungi were used for food by the eastern Indians; "tuckahoe bread" was well known in the S. The n. Pacific tribes made much use of the sweet inner bark of the hemlock and spruce. Savors, flavors, and condiments, as well as sweets, were valued by the Indian, who was also fond of chewing gum. While salt was tabued by the Onondaga and lye substituted by some of the southern Indians, the former was in general use. In some cases salt was made by the evaporation of the water of salt springs; in other localities it was obtained in crystal form from salt lakes and springs, and commerce in this product was widespread. Chile, which is of Mexican origin, became known throughout the S. W., and saffron, an introduced plant, is still in use there to flavor and color food, as are also the yellow flowers of the squash vine. Throughout New England and s. e. Canada sugar was produced by the evaporation of maple sap (see Maple sugar); in the S. W. it was derived from the willow and the agave. In some localities clay was eaten, either alone or mixed with food or taken in connection with wild potatoes to mitigate the griping effect of this acrid tuber. In general, buffalo, the deer family, and fish were the animals most useful for food. Some woodland tribes depended on deer, while the coast and river tribes usually made special use of fish and other products of the waters. Amphibious mammals sustained the Eskimo, while the porcupine is said to have been the chief food animal of the Montagnais. The range of game animals influenced the range of man in America quite as much as the distribution of food plants predetermined his natural diffusion.

Contrary to popular belief the Indians, as a rule, preferred cooked food. The Eskimo, whose name signifies 'eaters of raw flesh', ate uncooked meat only when absence of fuel prohibited cooking, or as a side dish. Vegetal food especially requires the agency of fire to render it fit for human digestion, whereas animal food may be consumed in a raw state, certain parts, as the liver, often being eaten in this way. All the edible portions of the animal were put to use, and in many cases both animal and vegetal substances advanced toward putrefaction were preferred, as salmon eggs which were stored in sand, by the Alaskans, and immature corn in the ear which the Hurons are said to have soaked in water until it became putrid, when soup was made of it.

Among the Pueblo Indians cooking is carried to a remarkable degree of proficiency, approaching in variety and methods the art among civilized peoples. Most tribes knew how to prepare savory and nourishing dishes, some of which have been adopted by civilized peoples (see Hominy, Maize, Samp, Succotash, etc.). The methods of cooking among the meat-eating tribes were, in order of importance, broiling, roasting, and boiling, the last-named process often being that known as "stone boiling." The tribes whose diet was approximately vegetarian practised all the methods.

STONE-BOILING—REMOVING THE STONES FROM THE BOILING-BASKET; CALIFORNIA INDIANS. (HOLMES)

The preparation of maize as food involved almost numberless processes, varying with the tribes. In general, when maize reached the edible stage the ears were roasted in pit ovens, and after the feasting the surplus of roasted ears was dried for future use. The mature grain was milled raw or parched, the meal entering into various mushes, cakes, pones, wafers, and other bread. The grain was soaked in lye obtained from wood ashes to remove the horny envelope and was then boiled, forming hominy; this in turn was often dried, parched and ground, reparched and reground, making a concentrated food of great nourishing power in small bulk, which was consumed dry or in water as gruel. Pinole, consisting of ground parched corn, forms the favorite food of S. W. desert tribes. The fermentation of corn to make beer was not generally practised, and it is doubtful if the process was known in America before the discovery. A yeast formed by chewing corn has long been known to the Zuni and Hopi at least, and the former know how to preserve it through the agency of salt. (See Fermentation.)

The Iroquois and other eastern tribes cooked maize with beans, meat, or vegetables. The Pueblos add wood-ash lye to their "paper bread," and prepare their bread and mushes with meat, greens, or oily seeds and nuts, besides using condiments, especially chile.

Vegetal food stuffs were preserved by drying, and among the less sedentary tribes were strung or tied in bundles for facility of transportation or storage. The preservation of maize, mesquite beans, acorns, etc., gave rise to granaries and other storage devices. Animal food, from its perishable character, was often dried or frozen, but at times was preserved by smoking. Dried meat was sometimes pulverized and mixed with berries, grease, etc., forming pemmican (q. v.), valued for use on journeys on account of its keeping properties. Fruits were pulped and dried for preservation. Nuts were often ground before being stored, as were also maize, grass seeds, and the legumes. Tubers were frequently stored in the ground or near the fireplace; the Virginian tribes preserved tubers for winter use in this way. (See Agriculture, Storage.)

Infusions of leaves, roots, etc., of various herbs were drunk by the Indians as medicine (see Black drink), but no stimulating beverage of the character of tea or coffee has been observed. Drinks made from fruit, as cider from manzanita berries, used by the tribes of California, and a beverage made from cactus fruit by the Pima and neighboring tribes of Arizona, are the fermented beverages best known.

Footprint sculptures. Among relics of undetermined use and significance left by the vanished tribes are numerous representations of human footprints, often regarded as actual footprints made while the rock material was still plastic. They are sculptured in slabs or masses, generally of sandstone, and show varying degrees of skill in execution. Representations of tracks of men and beasts also occur frequently in pictographs painted and sculptured on rock surfaces (see Track rock). In this connection they probably served to designate particular creatures or beings, the direction of their movements, the number of individuals, etc., but the larger well-sculptured footprints represented in museum collections probably had special significance as the reputed tracks of ancestors, of giants, or monsters, and may have been designed by cunning persons to deceive the uninitiated. The carvings represent sometimes a single footprint and again two or more in association, and are usually shallow, being rarely more than an inch in depth (see Pictography, Problematical objects). Consult Rau in Smithsonian. Cont., xxii, 22, 1876. (w. h.)

Fort Ancient. A prehistoric Indian fortification in Warren co., Ohio. It is situated on a headland, from 260 to 280 ft high, which projects from a plateau and overlooks the e. bank of Miami r. The slopes are mostly steep and in several places precipitous. The place is naturally a strong one, the elevated area being flanked by two ravines that approach each other some distance back from the point of the bluff, forming a peninsula of this front part with a narrow isthmus behind it. This divides the fort into two unequal portions, the smaller one embracing the peninsula known as the "Old Fort," the other, known as the "New Fort," extending back and eastwardly on the plateau to a second but wider neck of land. The total area is estimated at about 100 acres.

FORT ANCIENT EMBANKMENT

The wall, which is chiefly of earth, follows closely the zigzag course of the bluff, except where it crosses the level neck of land in the rear of the fort. The work has been often described and figured, the first notice and plan being that given in the "Portfolio" (1809), from which Atwater's plan and description (Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., i, 1820) appear to have been in large part copied. About 20 years later a survey was made by Locke, whose description and plat appear in Trans. Assn. Am. Geologists, i, 1843. Locke's plat was copied by Squier and Davis, and is the one from which most subsequent figures have been taken; it is accurate in the main, but the elements have somewhat changed the configuration in subsequent years, additional ravines having been formed by water breaking through the wall at certain points. Evidences of wearing are observable at some of the ravines crossed by the wall, and a few of the smaller gullies appear to have been worn since the wall was built, although in most cases the adaptation of the wall to the slopes shows that these existed when it was erected. That gaps were left in the wall at the bottom of the few deep ravines that it crosses is evident from the form of the wall at these points, but nothing remains to indicate how these gaps were closed in case of attack. Although the wall is built chiefly of earth (mostly of clay) cast up from an inside ditch, it is partially underlaid at numerous points with stone. The total length of the wall, following all the bends, is 18,712 ft, or a little more than $3\frac{1}{2}$ m.; the height varies from 6 to 10 ft, except across the neck at the back of the fort where it reaches 18 or 19 ft. The solid contents probably do not exceed 3,000,000 cu. ft.

That Ft Ancient, so called, is a work of defense is evident from its character and situation, exhibited especially by the different methods adopted for defending its more vulnerable points. The only level approach was at the rear, which was protected by a high wall. On the n. the points more easily approached are usually narrow, sloping ridges, generally crossed at the upper terminus by a wall of ordinary height, the ridge immediately outside being cut down several feet in order to present a steep slope corresponding to the outer slope of the wall. On the other hand, where similar ridges form approaches from the s., and at some other points, the defenses are formed by raising the wall considerably above the normal height. The most vulnerable point appears to be at the isthmus separating the two forts, where the opposite walls have their nearest approach. Here a short space was undefended, though the ascent is by no means difficult. A short distance n. of the posterior wall of the new fort are two small mounds, a short distance apart, from each of which extends a low wall, or road as Atwater terms it, elevated about 3 ft, running nearly parallel about $\frac{1}{4}$ m., and forming an irregular semicircle about another small mound. A part of the area between these walls was paved with flat stones, remains of which now lie at a depth of 2 ft in the soil. Several small mounds and a number of stone graves which contained human remains were within the fort; these were explored by Moorehead, but nothing of special interest was found except the human remains. The greater portion of the area included in this inclosure is now the property of the State of Ohio and has been made a reservation under the care of the Ohio Archaeological and Historical Society.

The first purchase was made in accordance with an act of the legislature, Apr. 28, 1890, and the second purchase in pursuance of the act of Apr. 16, 1896.

MAP OF FORT ANCIENT, OHIO. (SQUIER AND DAVIS)

Fortification and Defense. The simplest defenses were furnished to the Indians by nature. In the forest regions battles were fought in the shelter of trees, and in stony sections from sheltering rocks. That war was waged and defensive measures were necessary in prehistoric times is shown by the remains of fortifications in the mound area of the United States. These are of different types, the most common being the so-called hill forts, where defensive walls of earth or stone surround a peak or hilltop or skirt a bluff headland, as at Ft Ancient (q. v.), Ohio. There are also circular, square, octagonal, and other inclosures on the lowlands which are generally supposed to have been built for defensive purposes, but they could hardly have been effectual unless stock-aded. There are, or were until recently, earthen embankments and inclosures in New York which, as Squier has shown, mark the sites of palisaded forts similar to those of the Iroquois observed by Champlain and Cartier. These were often polygonal, of double or triple stockades, as that at Hochelaga which Cartier says was of "three courses of rampires, one within another." Some were strengthened by braces and had beams running round them near the top, where stones and other missiles were placed ready to be hurled upon besiegers. The walls of some of these fortifications were 20 ft high. One of the polygonal forts in w. New York, however, was overlooked by a hill from which arrows could easily be shot into the inclosure. Most of the early figures of these forts represent them as having a single entrance between overlapping ends of the stockade; there is one, however (Underhill, News from America, 1638), which shows two overlappings. When first seen by the whites most of the villages from Florida to the Potomac were protected with surrounding stockades, which are represented in De Bry as single with one opening where the ends overlap. The construction of these surrounding palisades was practically the same, whether they inclosed a single house or 50 houses. In some sections a ditch was usually dug, both within and outside of the palisade. A few of the forts in s. New England were square, but the circular form generally prevailed (Willoughby in Am. Anthropol., viii, no. 1, 1906). The fortress built by King Philip in the swamp at South Kensington, R. I., consisted of a double row of palisades, flanked by a great abatis, outside of which was a deep ditch. At one corner a gap of the length of one log was left as an entrance, the breastwork here being only 4 or 5 ft high; and this passage was defended by a well-constructed blockhouse, whilst the ditch was crossed by a single log which served as a bridge. Stockaded villages were also common as far w. as Wisconsin. Stone walls, which C. C. Jones considered defensive, have been observed on Stone mtn., Mt Yona, and other peaks of n. Georgia. De Soto found strongly fortified villages in his passage through the Gulf states and Arkansas.

Vancouver (Voy., iii, 289, 1798) mentions villages on Kupreanof id., situated on the summits of steep, almost inaccessible rocks and fortified with strong platforms of wood laid upon the most elevated part of the rock, which projected at the sides so as to overhang the declivity. At the edge of the platform there was usually a sort of parapet of logs placed one upon another. This type, according to Swanton, was quite common on the N. W. coast. The Skagit tribe, according to Wilkes, combined dwellings and forts, and a similar custom was followed by some of the Haida clans. Wilkes mentions also inclosures 400 ft long, which were constructed of pickets about 30 ft long thrust deep into the ground, the interior being divided into roofed lodges. The Clallam also had a fort of pickets, 150 ft square, roofed over, and divided into compartments for families. No stockades seem to have been used by the Ntlakyapamuk, but fortresses or fortified houses were at one time in use in a few places. These defenses, according to Boas, consisted of logs placed lengthwise on the ground one above another and covered with brush and earth, loopholes being left at places between the logs. According to the same authority, some of the stockades of British Columbia were provided with underground passages as a means of escape. It has been a general custom of the Indians of the plains, when in danger of being attacked by a superior force, to dig a pit or pits in the loose, generally sandy soil, throwing the earth around the margin to increase the height of the defense, the bank of a creek or a gully being selected when within reach, as defense of one side only was necessary. Native drawings of some of these defenses are given by Mooney (17th Rep. B. A. E., 271-274, 1898). In the S. W. the cliff-dwellings (q. v.) were places of security, easy of defense. The large compound structures known as pueblos (q. v.), in which the lower stories formerly had few or no wall openings, were fortifications as well as habitations, while in some cases the mesas on which they are built are in themselves well-nigh impregnable. In the drainage area of the Gila and Salado of s. Arizona there were defensive structures, as shown by their massive walls, in which the former inhabitants could take refuge in time of danger. Many of the isolated peaks of s. Arizona, n. Sonora, and Chihuahua contain the remains of stone breastworks and fortifications. See Architecture, Casa Grande, Cliff-dwellings, Habitations, Mounds, Pueblos, War and War discipline.

Foxes (trans. in plural of wagosh, 'red fox,' the name of a clan). An Algonquian tribe, so named, according to Fox tradition recorded by Dr. William Jones, because once while some Wagohûg', members of the Fox clan, were hunting, they met the French, who asked who they were; the Indians gave the name of their clan, and ever since the whole tribe has been known by the name of the Fox clan. Their own name for themselves, according to the same authority, is Mësh-kwa'kihûg', 'red-earth people,' because of the kind of earth from which they are supposed to have been created. They were known to the Chippewa and other Algonquian tribes as Utûgamig, 'people of the other shore'.

When they first became known to the whites, the Foxes lived in the vicinity of L. Winnebago or along Fox r., Wis. Verwyst (Missionary Labors, 178, 1886) says they were on Wolf r. when Allouez visited them in 1670. As the tribe was intimately related to the Sauk, and the two were probably branches of one original stem, it is probable that the early migrations of the former corresponded somewhat closely with those of the latter. The Sauk came to Wisconsin through the lower Michigan peninsula, their traditional home having been n. of the lakes, and were comparatively newcomers in Wisconsin when they first became known to the French. One of their important villages was for some time on Fox r. The conclusion of Warren (Hist. Ojibways, 95, 1885) that the Foxes early occupied the country along the s. shore of L. Superior and that the incoming Chippewa drove them out, has the general support of Fox tradition. Nevertheless there is no satisfactory historical evidence that the Foxes ever resided farther n. than Fox r. in Wisconsin, and in none of their treaties with the United States have they claimed land n. of Sauk co. This restless and warlike people was the only Algonquian tribe against whom the French waged war. In addition to their disposition to be constantly at strife with their neighbors, they had conceived a hatred of the French because of the aid which the latter gave the Chippewa and others by furnishing firearms, and because they gathered the various tribes for the purpose of destroying the Foxes. The proposal to exterminate them was seriously considered in the French councils, and their destruction would earlier have been attempted but for the pleas interposed by Nicolas Perrot. Their character is briefly described by Charlevoix (Shea trans., v, 305, 1881) when he says they "infested with their robberies and filled with murders not only the neighborhood of the Bay [Green bay], their natural territory, but almost all the routes communicating with the remote colonial posts, as well as those leading from Canada to Louisiana. Except the Sioux, who often joined them, and the Iroquois, with whom they had formed an alliance, . . . all the nations in alliance with us suffered greatly from these hostilities." It was this tribe that in 1712 planned the attack on the fort at Detroit, and but for the timely arrival of friendly Indians and the bravery of the French commandant, Buisson, would undoubtedly have destroyed it. They were almost constantly at war with the Illinois tribes s. of them, and finally succeeded, in conjunction with the Sauk, in driving them from a large part of their country, of which they took possession. From their earliest known history they were almost constantly at war with the Chippewa dwelling n. of them, but usually without decided success, though often aided by the Sioux. It was by the Chippewa, together with the Potawatomi, Menominee, and the French, that their power was finally broken. About 1746, and perhaps for some few years previous, the Foxes lived at the Little Butte des Morts on the w. bank of Fox r., about 37 m. above Green bay. They made it a point, whenever a trader's boat approached, to place a torch upon the bank as a signal for the traders to come ashore and pay the customary tribute, which they exacted from all. To refuse was to incur their displeasure, and robbery would be the mildest penalty inflicted. Incensed at this exaction, Morand, a leading trader, raised a volunteer force of French and Indians, and after inflicting severe punishment on the Foxes in two engagements drove them down Wisconsin r. They settled on the n. bank about 20 m. from the mouth. About 1780, in alliance with the Sioux, they attacked the Chippewa at St Croix falls, where the Foxes were almost annihilated. The remnant incorporated with the Sauk, and although long officially regarded as one, the two tribes have preserved their identity.

According to Dr William Jones (inf'n, 1906) the culture of the Foxes is that of the tribes of the eastern woodlands with some intrusive streaks from the plains. They were acquainted with wild rice, and raised corn, beans, squashes, and tobacco. They lived in villages in summer, the bark house being the type of the warm-weather dwelling; in winter they scattered and dwelt in oval flag-reed lodges. The social organization is rigid and is based on gentes with marriage outside of the gens. The gens and, with some exceptions, the name, followed the father. The Fox gentes are the Bear, Fox, Wolf, Elk, Big Lynx, Buffalo, Swan, Pheasant, Eagle, Sea, Sturgeon, Bass, Thunder, and Bear Potato. The mythology of the Foxes is rich. Beast fable prevails. The deities are many and some have clear definite character. The principal deity is Wissakä, the culture hero. His brother is Kiyapa'tä, or Chipayaboswä, who presides over the spirit world at the setting of the sun. The belief in a cosmic substance called münlöwüwä, or münlöwüwäni, is an essential element in their philosophy. Objects, animate or inanimate, imbued with this substance become the recipients of marked adoration. The Foxes practise many ceremonies, the principal one being the feast festival of the gentes. There is probably no other Algonquian community within the limits of the United States, unless it be that of the Mexican band of Kickapoo in Oklahoma, where a more primitive state of society exists.

Besides being warlike, the Foxes were described by neighboring tribes as stingy, avaricious, thieving, passionate, and quarrelsome; their bravery, however, was proverbial. Like most of the tribes of the region of the great lakes they were polygamists. They were familiar with both dug-out and birch-bark canoes. Spears and clubs were among their weapons of war. Schoolcraft states that a band of warriors seen by him wore headdresses consisting of red-dyed horsehair tied in such manner to the scalplock as to present the shape of the decoration of a Roman helmet. The rest of the head was completely shaved and painted. They wore breech-cloths, moccasins, and leggings, and the upper part of their bodies was painted; often the print of a hand in white clay was marked on the back or shoulder. They bore flags of feathers. Their "coat of arms" is described by Lahontan in heraldic terms: "A meadow sinople, crossed by a winding pale, with two foxes' gules at the two extremities of the river, in chief and point"—in other words, as his figure shows, an oblique mark representing a stream, with a fox at each end on opposite sides. He explains this "coat of arms" as the mark or symbol which, after a victory or successful raid, they paint on trees. (See Owen, Folk-lore of the Musquakie Inds., 1904.)

Guignés estimated them in 1728 at 200 warriors, but most of the estimates before the last half century give them from 1,500 to 2,000 souls. Lewis and Clark estimated them at 300 warriors, or 1,200 souls, in 1805. Since about 1850 the two tribes have been enumerated together. The 345 "Sauk and Fox of Mississippi" still (1905) in Iowa are said to be all Foxes. There are also 82 "Sauk and Fox of Missouri" under the Kickapoo school in Kansas. See Sauk.

Foxes. A gens or secret order of the Hidatsa, according to Culbertson (Smithsonian Rep., 1850, 143, 1851), but properly one of the war and dance societies.

Francisco. A Yuma chief. The Tonto Apache who murdered Royce Oatman and most of his family at the Gila bend, Ariz., Mar. 18, 1850, carried off Olive and Mary, the youngest children, 12 and 7 years of age, into slavery, and in 1852 sold them to the Mohave. These Indians treated them better than had the Tonto until a famine came, during which Mary died from starvation and cruelty. Young Lorenzo Oatman, who had escaped after being left for dead, endeavored to interest people in California in the fate of his sisters, but a searching party sent out from Ft Yuma returned without finding trace of them. Finally Francisco, who happened to be at the fort in Jan., 1856, betrayed knowledge of the lost girls, and, impressed with fear of the troops, said he would bring the surviving captive if he had four blankets and some beads to pay for her. When Francisco came to the village the Mohave denied having Olive, having stained her skin with berries, but she spoke out and told who she was. Francisco then addressed them with such eloquent conviction that they consented to release the girl, and on the day set he brought her to the fort, where she was soon joined by her brother. Owing to his service in saving his tribe from chastisement by the militia, or to the rewards and praise he received from the whites, Francisco was chosen chief. He grew overbearing, but remained friendly to the whites. To this friendship his people attributed the ill luck that befell them in a raid that the river tribes undertook in 1857 against the Maricopa. The latter, reinforced by the Papago, won the battle at Maricopa wells, Ariz. Of 75 Yuma warriors all were slain save 3, and when the day turned against them they are believed to have killed the chief who led them to disaster. (F. H.)

French Indians. A term used by early English writers to designate the tribes in the French interest, especially the Abnaki and their congeners on the New England frontier.

French influence. The influence of the French colonists on the Indians began very early. The use of glass beads in barter gave an impetus to the fur trade, and the speedy introduction of other commodities of trade led to long-continued associations with the Iroquoian tribes in particular. The influence of the French missionaries on many of the Indian tribes was marked; for example, the Montagnais and the Huron in the early days. The supply of peltries was increased by furnishing the Indians with firearms, which enabled them to travel with impunity and gave them a superiority over the neighboring tribes which they were not slow to take advantage of; hence almost from the beginning the French settlers and the government of New France came into more or less sympathetic contact with several tribes of the country. This state of affairs arose both from the peaceful efforts of the missionaries and from the desire of the authorities to use the aborigines as a bulwark against the power of the English in North America. To her alliances with the Algonquian tribes of the great lakes and the region s. and e. of them, including New France and Acadia, France owed in great part her strength on this continent, while on the other hand the confederacy of the Iroquois, the natural enemies of the Algonquian peoples, contributed largely to her overthrow. The French character impelled the colonists to see in the Indian a fellow human being, and it is no wonder that the greatest intermixture between the Indian and the European, n. of the Mexican boundary, is represented by the mixed-bloods of Canada and the N. W. and their descendants, who form no small element in the population of these regions of civilized America (see Mixed-bloods). The French recognized the Indian's pride and prejudices, and won his confidence by respecting his institutions and often sharing in his ceremonies. They ruled while seeming to yield. Least of all did they despise the languages of the aborigines, as the rich records of the missionaries abundantly prove. The existence of a large number of mixed-bloods able to speak both their own tongue and French was a distinct advantage to the colonists. The relations between the French and the Acadian Indians, as pictured by Lescarbot, were, to use the word of Frederici, "idyllic," though there is doubtless some exaggeration in these old accounts.

Several words of French origin crept very early into the eastern Algonquian tongues, such as Montagnais, Nascapi, and Micmac, and later a corresponding French element is to be found in the Algonquian languages of the region beyond Montreal (Chamberlain in Canad. Indian, Feb., 1891). The Chippewa vocabulary (Carver, Trav., 421, 1778) contains the word kapotewian, 'coat,' which is the French capote, with the Chippewa radical suffix -waian, 'skin.' In a Mississauga vocabulary of 1801 appears napané, 'flour.' The French bon jour! in the form boju! is now the salutation in several Algonquian dialects. From (les) anglais is supposed to be derived the word for 'English' in a number of these languages: Micmac aglaséōōo, Montagnais agaleshu, Nipissing oganesha, formerly angalesha, Chippewa shaganash, Cree akaydiw, etc. Another example of French influence is the contribution of Canadian French to the Chinook jargon (q. v.). There is also a French element in the modern tales and legends of the Indians of the Canadian Northwest and British Columbia, partly due to missionary teaching, partly to the campfires of the trappers, voyageurs, coureurs de bois, etc. In tales of the n. Pacific coast appears 'Shishé Tlé' (i. e., Jésus Christ), and in some of those of Indians on the e. side of the Rocky mts., 'Mani' (i. e., the Virgin Mary). The French are also the subject of many Indian stories from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Among the Abnaki intermixture began very early. With them the term for mixed-blood is malouidit, 'of (St) Malo,' indicative of the source of the fathers in most of these marriages. The wheat introduced from France was termed maloumenal, 'grains of (St) Malo.' In the 17th century the Abnaki called peas wenutsiminar, 'French seeds.' The Micmac term for apple is wenjoosoon, 'French cranberry.' In the Iroquoian languages an example of French influence is seen in Onontio ('Big Mountain'), the term applied by the Mohawk to the kings of France, which seems to translate Montmagny, the name of Champlain's successor as governor of Canada. Another example, noted by Hewitt, is that the Mohawk of Caughnawaga and other settlements on St Lawrence r. speak far more rapidly than do their brethren on Grand River res., Ontario, and they also have a more copious lexicon of modern terms.

Under the leadership of Mgr. de Laval the clergy of New France made strenuous opposition to the sale of liquor to the Indians, and succeeded in getting Colbert to prohibit the traffic; but the necessities of the political schemes of Frontenac and the fact that the Indians turned to the English and Dutch, from whom they could easily procure rum and brandy, caused the reversal of this policy, against the protests of missionaries and the church. To salve their feelings the matter was referred to the Sorbonne and the University of Toulouse, the former pronouncing against the sale of liquor to the Indians, the latter declaring it permissible. Finally a sort of theoretical prohibition but actual toleration of liquor selling resulted.

Fresnal (Span.: 'ash grove'). A Papago village, probably in Pima co., s. Ariz.; pop. about 250 in 1863.—Poston in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1863, 385, 1864.

Friedenshuetten (German: 'huts of peace'). A village formerly on Susquehanna r. a few miles below Wyalusing, and probably in Wyoming co., Pa. It was established in 1765 by Mahican and Delaware converts under direction of the Moravian missionaries, and seems to have been on the site of an older town. In 1770 the Indians removed to Friedensstadt, in Beaver co. According to Loskiel (Miss. United Breth., pt. 3, 1794) the name Friedenshuetten was also applied to a temporary village adjoining Bethlehem in Northampton co., settled in 1746 by Moravian converts from Shecomico, who soon afterward removed to Gnadenhuetten in Carbon co. (J. M.)

Frogtown (trans. of Waldsi'yá, 'frog place'). A former Cherokee settlement on a creek of the same name, n. of Dahlonega, Lumpkin co., Ga.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 545, 1900.

Fugitive. A former Kaniagmiut Eskimo village at Hobson harbor, Sitkalidak id., near Kodiak, Alaska.—Lisiansky, Voy., 178, 1814.

Furniture. There was little regular furniture among the Indians, as home life was simple and wants were few. The furniture of the tipi differed from that used in the communal dwelling, for the character of the habitation controlled its furnishing. In all classes of habitations seats were generally arranged along the walls. Mats of plaited bark or of woven rushes and skins dressed only on one side were spread as seats, and pillows, formerly having skin cases, were stuffed with feathers, the hair of the deer or elk, in some cases scrapings from the hide, or, as in the S., the long gray Spanish moss, and used as cushions to sit on. Among some tribes a bearskin was the seat of honor. In the pueblo seats were of stone, or were rectangular stools made from a single block of wood, in addition to a nasonry bench extending round or partly round the room. In n. California stools were circular in form. In the houses of the N. W. coast long settees were placed facing the fire, against the partitions that marked a family's space in the communal dwelling.

In the earth lodge and similar habitations stationary couches, which served as seats by day and as beds by night, were arranged against the walls. These were made by planting in the floor four tall posts on which were supported two shelves, or bunks, of wattled twigs, on which the bedding was placed. Sometimes both shelves were used as beds, but generally the upper one was used for storing the property of the person to whom the compartment belonged. In the lodges of some tribes, hung on a rod fastened across the two front poles was a reed curtain, which could be rolled up or dropped to give seclusion to the occupant of the berth. Another form of bed consisted of a mat of willows stretched upon a low platform, its tapering ends raised and fastened to tripods which formed head and foot boards. The skin of an animal, as the buffalo bull, killed in winter, was trimmed to fit the bed and served as the mattress, on which robes or blankets were spread as bedding. Pillows such as are described above were used, but in N. California were of wood and were used only in the men's sleeping lodge. Little children occupied cradles (q. v.), which varied in form and ornamentation, but were all constructed on the general plan of a portable box and adapted to the age of the child. Among some tribes a hammock, made by folding a skin about two ropes, was hung between posts and used to swing children to sleep. A crotched stick was thrust slanting into the edge of the fireplace, and from the crotch hung one or more smaller crotched sticks directly over the fire, serving as hooks for kettles in cooking. The household meal was often served on a mat. In the dwellings of the corn-growing Plains Indians the wooden mortar used for pounding maize was set at the right of the entrance and held firmly in place by sinking its pointed base well into the earthen floor. In every habitation a suspended pole or rack was placed near the fire for the drying of moccasins or other clothing. In the Pueblo house the mealing trough occupied a corner of the room, and was set at a sufficient distance from the wall to permit the women to kneel comfortably at their work and face the apartment. The trough was of stone and generally contained three metates, varying in coarseness, for hulling, cracking, and mealing the grain. Niches in the walls served as shelves or closets. Utensils varied with the methods of cooking in the different parts of the country; they were baskets, wooden and pottery vessels, and later metal kettles. Household utensils, for cooking, eating, and drinking, were usually kept in or near the space belonging to the housewife, and consisted of baskets, boxes, platters, and bowls of wood or pottery, spoons of horn, wood, gourd, or pottery, and ladles. Some of the household utensils were ornamented with carving or painting, and not infrequently were treasured as heirlooms. Brooms of coarse grass or twigs were used to sweep the floor, and the wing of a bird served as a brush to keep the central fireplace tidy. The Pueblos tied a bunch of coarse grass near the middle, using the butt end for brushing the hair and the other for sweeping the floor. Some of the Plains and Rocky mtn. tribes used a wooden spade-like implement to remove the snow from the ground about the entrance of the lodge, and the Pueblos employed a similar implement for passing bread in and out of the ovens. The Plains tribes stored their food and other articles in packs made of parfleche and ornamented with painted designs; for preserving feathers until needed the Pueblos used wooden receptacles cut from a single stick, usually of cottonwood, and provided with a counter-sunk lid; on the N. W. coast elaborately carved boxes and trays were made for this purpose.

Mural decoration was confined to the Pueblos and the houses on the N. Pacific coast. Frequently in the latter the posts, beams, and doors were carved and painted, as were also the screens, which served several purposes, domestic and ceremonial.

In the lodges of the Plains tribes the ornamented shields, weapons, saddles, bridles, and various accouterments were always hung on the posts within the lodge, and gave color and decorative effect to the otherwise plain interior of the native dwelling. In winter painted or embroidered skins were suspended between the inner circle of posts of the earth lodge and, like an arras, inclosed the space about the fire, adding much to the attractiveness of this picturesque habitation. Among the Eskimo the stone lamp was the essential article of the household. It furnished light and heat and served as a stove for cooking. Such lamps, cut from steatite or basalt, cost much labor, and were handed down from one generation to another. See Boxes and Chests, Dishes, Habitations, Implements.

Fur trade. The fur trade was an important factor in the conquest and settlement of North America by the French and the English. Canada and the great W. and N. W. were long little more to the world than the "Fur Country." Lahontan (New Voy., i, 53, 1703) said: "Canada subsists only upon the trade of skins or furs, three-fourths of which come from the people that live around the great lakes." Long before his time the profit to be gained in the fur traffic with distant tribes encouraged adventurers to make their way to the Mississippi and beyond, while the expenses of not a few ambitious attempts to reach Cathay or Cipangu through a n. w. passage to the South sea were met, not out of royal treasures, but from presents and articles of barter received from the Indians. The various fur and trading companies established for traffic in the regions w. of the great lakes and in the Hudson bay country exercised a great influence upon the aborigines by bringing into their habitat a class of men, French, English, and Scotch, who would intermarry with them, thus introducing a mixed-blood element into the population. Manitoba, Minnesota, and Wisconsin in particular owe much of their early development to the trader and the mixed-blood. The proximity of hunting grounds to the settlements beyond the Alleghanies favored the free hunter and the single trapper, while the remote regions of the N. W. could best be exploited by the fur companies. The activity of the free trapper and solitary hunter meant the extermination of the Indian where possible. The method of the great fur companies, which had no dreams of empire over a solid white population, rather favored amalgamation with the Indians as the best means of exploiting the country in a material way. The French fur companies of early days, the Hudson's Bay Company (for two centuries ruler of a large part of what is now Canada), the Northwest Company, the American Fur Company (in the initiation of which patriotism played a part), the Missouri Fur Company, the Russian-American Company, the Alaska Commercial Company, and others have influenced the development of civilization in North America. The forts and fur-trading stations of these companies long represented to the Indian tribes the white man and his civilization. That the Hudson's Bay Company abandoned its line of forts on the seacoast and went to the Indian hunting grounds, ultimately taking possession of the vast interior of Canada, was due largely to the competition of rival fur traders, such as the Northwest Company. Intimate contact with Indian tribes was thus forced on rather than initiated by the Hudson's Bay Company. The pioneers of the fur trade were the solitary trappers and buyers, whose successors are the free traders on the upper Mackenzie today. They blazed the way for canoe trips, fur brigades, trading posts, and, finally, settlements. It was often at a portage, where there were falls or rapids in a river, that the early white trader established himself. At such places afterward sprang up towns whose manufactures were developed by means of the water power. The Indian village also often became a trading post and is now transformed into a modern city. Portages and paths that were first used by the Indian and afterward by the fur trader are now changed to canals and highways, but other routes used by fur traders are still, in regions of the far N., only primitive paths. Some, like the grande route from Montreal to the country beyond Hudson bay, are followed by white men for summer travel and pleasure. In the N. W. the fur trade followed the course of all large streams, and in some parts the leading clans derived much of their power from the control of the waterways.

The appearance and disappearance of fur-bearing animals, their retreat from one part of the country to another, influenced the movements of Indian tribes. This is particularly true of the movements of the buffalo (q. v.), though the decrease of other large game was often the compelling motive of tribal migration. The hunt of the buffalo led to certain alliances and unions for the season of the chase among tribes of different stocks, a few of which may have become permanent. Thus the Kutenai, Sarsi, Siksika, and Atsina have all hunted together on the plains of the Saskatchewan and the upper Missouri. The occasional and finally complete disappearance of the buffalo from these regions has weighed heavily upon the Indian tribes, the buffalo having been to some of them what the bamboo is to the Malay and the palm to the West African, their chief source of food, fuel, clothing, and shelter. The extermination of the wild buffalo caused the discontinuance of the Kiowa sun dance (Mooney in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 346, 349, 1898) and affected likewise the ceremonies of other tribes. In several tribes the buffalo dance was an important ceremony and buffalo chiefs seem to have been elected for duty during the hunting season. The importance of the northern hare, whose skin was used to make coats and tipis by certain Indians of the Canadian Northwest, is shown in the designation "Hareekins" for one of the Athapascan tribes (Kawchogottine). The Tsattine, another Athapascan tribe, received their name for a like reason. The Iroquois war against the Neutral nation was partly due to the growing scarcity of beavers in the Iroquois country. The recent inroads of the whites upon the muskox of arctic Canada are having their effect upon the Indian tribes of that region. Bell (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, xvi, 74, 1903) has noted the advance of the free trader on Athabasca r. and lake, giving rise to a barbarous border civilization, like that of the whaler on the shores of Hudson bay and the rancher and miner on the Peace and other mountain streams, which is having its due effect on the natives: "The influx of fur traders into the Mackenzie r. region, and even to Great Bear lake, within the last two years, has, I believe, very much altered the character of the northern Indians." The effect upon the Indians of the s. Atlantic region of the coming of the white trader was early noted by Adair and others. Here, too, the trader not infrequently married into the tribe and became an agent in modifying aboriginal culture by the introduction of European ideas and institutions.

Before the advent of the Europeans the fur trade had assumed considerable proportions in various parts of the continent (Mason, Rep. Nat. Mus., 586-589, 1894). In the 16th century the Pecos obtained buffalo skins from the Apache and bartered them again with the Zuni. The people of Acoma obtained deerskins from the Navaho. The trade between Ottawa r. and Hudson bay was well known to the Jesuit missionaries in the beginning of the 17th century. In the time of Lewis and Clark the Arikara obtained furs from other tribes and bartered them with the whites for various articles, and the Skiloot used to get buffalo skins from tribes on the upper Missouri to barter off with other Indian tribes. The Chilkat proper and the Chilkoot even now act as middlemen in the fur trade between the whites and other Indian tribes. The tribes about the mouth of the Columbia were also middlemen, and their commerce influenced the conditions of their social institutions, making possible, perhaps, slavery, the existence of a class of nobles, certain changes in the status of women, etc. The trade in furs between the Eskimo of Alaska and the peoples of extreme n. e. Asia existed long before the advent of Europeans. At Kotzebue sd. there is still held a summer fair (Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 229, 1899). Fur-trading voyages are common in this region.

The development of intertribal commerce among the Plains Indians was much stimulated by the hunt of the buffalo and its material rewards. By inducing the natives to trap and hunt the wild animals of the northern part of the continent on a large scale for the sake of their valuable skins the fur companies stimulated the aboriginal talent in the production and use of snares and other devices, even if they did not improve the morals of the Indians. The introduction of the horse (q. v.) and the gun led to the extermination of the buffalo by Plains Indians and whites. In certain parts of the continent skins were a basis of value—primitive money. A Kutenai, when he draws a beaver, produces a picture, not of the animal, but of its cured skin. With the Eskimo of the Yukon, even before the advent of the Russians, the unit of value was "one skin"; that is, the skin of the full-grown land otter, and of late years this has been replaced by the skin of the beaver (Nelson, op. cit., 232). Skins of sea otters, beavers, and other animals were the basis of the wealth, also, of many tribes of the n. Pacific coast, until the practical extermination of some of these species made necessary a new currency, provided in the blankets of the Hudson's Bay Company, which were preferred to most other substitutes that were offered by white men. Toward the interior the beaver skin was the ruling unit, and to-day in some parts such unit is the skin of the muskrat. Among the Kutenai of s. e. British Columbia the word for a quarter of a dollar is khanko ('muskrat'). English traders reckoned prices in skins and French traders in "plus" (pelus, peaux). Indians counted their wealth in skins, and in the potlatch of some tribes the skin preceded the blanket as a unit of value in the distribution. During the colonial period furs were legal tender in some parts of the country; also at various times and places during the pioneer occupancy of the W. and N. Altogether the fur trade may be considered one of the most important and interesting phases of the intercourse between the Europeans and the North American Indians. Fu Sang. A land E. of China which, according to Chinese annals, was visited in a voyage made by Buddhist monks in the 5th century A. D. Some have sought to identify it with America; there is good reason to believe that Fu Sang was Corea, Japan, Sakhalin, or the Liu-kiu ids., or all of them. Japan has played a part in the myths of the Chinese similar to the garden of the Hesperides in Greek story. De Guignes was an early propagator of the Fu Sang theory; more recent advocates were C. G. Leland (Fu-Sang, 1875) and Vining (An Inglorious Columbus, 1885). Arguments on the other side have been advanced by W. H. Dall in Science, Nov. 5, 1886; H. Mueller in Verh. d. Berl. Ges. F. Anthr., 1883, and A. F. Chamberlain in Am. Notes and Queries, II, 84, 1888, but the whole matter has been effectually disposed of by the authoritative investigations of Gustav Schlegel, an eminent Chinese scholar, in his Fou-Sang (1892). Schlegel attributes what is not mythical in the Chinese legends to the island of Sakhalin, etc.

Fusualgi. The Forest Bird (?) clan of the Creeks.

Bird.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 161, 1878. Fusualgi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 155, 1884. Tus-wi.—Morgan, op. cit. (misprint).

Fwah.—Hewitt in Am. Anthropol., n. s., VI, 431, 1904. Fwa-ha'.—Hodge, ibid., IX, 350, 1896.

Fyules. A former village in California, said to have been Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Gaandowanang (Gá'-án-do-wá-nān, 'it is a great tree.'—Hewitt). A former Seneca village on Genesee r., near Cuylerville, N. Y.

Big Tree.—Morris deed (1797) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 627, 1832. Chenondasah.—Johnson (1754) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VI, 899, 1856. Gá'-án-do-wá-nān.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886 (Seneca name). Gá-un-do-wá-na.—Morgan, League Iroq., 468, 1851. Kanvagen.—Pouchot, map (1798) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Gabacamanini. A rancheria, probably Cochimi, connected with Purisima (Cade-gomo) mission, Lower California, in the 18th century.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 190, 1857.

Gabrielesño. A Shoshonean division and dialectic group which formerly occupied all of Los Angeles co., Cal., s. of the San Bernardino mts., with the probable exception of a strip of coast from Santa Monica westward, and Orange co. to Alisos cr.; the territory did not extend very far E. of the Los Angeles co. line. Santa Catalina id. also was occupied by them, and possibly San Nicolas id. The name has been loosely applied by the Spanish inhabitants from the name of the mission of San Gabriel, near Los Angeles, where many were at one time collected. This, in the absence of an appropriate native term, may be accepted as the most convenient designation. Their rancherias were: Acuragna, Ahapchingas, Alyeupkigna, Awigna, Azucsagna, Cahuenga, Chokishgna, Chowigna, Cucumogna, Hahamogna, Harasgna, Houtgna, Hutucgna, Isanthcogna, Kowanga, Mauga, Nacangna, Okowvinja, Pascegna, Pasinogna, Pubugna, Pimocagna, Saway-yanga, Sibagna, Sisitcanogna, Sonagna, Suangna, Taybipet, Techahet, Tibahagna, and Yangna.

Gabrielesño.—Loew in Ann. Rep. Chief of Eng., pt. III, 542, 1876. Kij.—Hale, Ethnog. and Philol., 222, 1846. Kish.—Ibid., 569; Gatschet in Rep. Chief of Eng., III, 556, 1876 (trans. 'houses'). Playanac.—Hoffman in Bull. Essex Inst., XVII, 26, 1885 (seems to be applied to the California Shoshoni living in the lowlands, and especially near the coast in the region of Los Angeles). San Gabriel.—Hale, op. cit., 222. Tobikhar.—Gatschet, op. cit., 556 (said to mean 'settlers', but probably taken from Tobohar, the mythical first man). Tumangamulm.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (Lulesño name: 'north-erners').

Gachigundae (Gatchigu'nda-i, 'village always moving to and fro'). A Haida town on the N. E. shore of Alliford bay, Moresby id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., occupied by a socially low branch of the Djahui-skwahladagai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Gachwechnagechga ('islanders.'—Hewitt). The name applied to the Lehigh Indians formerly on Lehigh r., Pa.; so called, according to Pyrlaeus, after the island they occupied.

Gachwechnagechga.—Gatschet in Am. Antiq., IV, 75, 1881-82. Lecha.—Ibid. Lehigh.—Ibid.

Gadaho (Gá'-dā'-ho, 'sand bank.'—Hewitt). A former Seneca village that occupied the site of Castile, Genesee co., N. Y.

Gá'dā'ho.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886 (Seneca form). Gá-dā'-o.—Morgan, League Iroq., 435, 1851. Gardeau.—Morris deed (1797) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 627, 1832. Gardow.—Morgan, op. cit., 467. Guarden.—Conover, Kanadega and Geneva MS., B. A. E.

Gadinchin ('rush', 'reed grass'). Given as a clan of the Pinal Coyotero living in 1881 at San Carlos agency, Ariz.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890.

Gado (Gádó'). A Haida town said to have stood on the S. side of De la Beche inlet, Moresby id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. Another town of the same name is said to have stood on the E. side of Lyell id., near the town of Hikia.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Gaedi (Gá'-idi, the name of a fish). A Haida town on the N. E. shore of a small inlet just N. E. of Huston inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It belonged to the Tadjilanas, a band of Ninintins.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Gaesigusket (Ga-inga's-q'eil, 'strait town where no waves come ashore'). A Haida town on Murchison id., at a point opposite Hot Springs id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. So named because it fronted on smooth water. It belonged to the Hagilanas of the Ninintins.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Gagihetnas-hadai (G'egihet-nas-had'ái, 'land-otter house people'). Given by Boas (5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 27, 1889) as the name of a subdivision of the Yaku-lanas, a division of the Raven clan of the Haida in Alaska. It is in reality only a house name belonging to that band. The Gagihet (Gagixi't) is a human being who, in native mythology, has been made insane by land otters. (J. R. S.)

Gahato ('floating branch.'—Hewitt). A village, probably of the Seneca, in Chemung co., N. Y., which was burned by Sullivan in 1779. (J. M.)

Chameng.—Pemberton (ca. 1792) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., II, 175, 1810. Chemeng.—Ibid., 176. Chemung.—Brown (1803), ibid., IX, 120, 1804 (probably the Delaware name). Gähä'te.—Morgan, League Iroq., 469, 1851.

Gahayanduk (Gä-häyā-yā'n-dä'k, 'there was a forest, or orchard.'—Hewitt). A Seneca village destroyed by Deconville's expedition in 1687.—Shea, note in Charlevoix, New France, III, 289, 1868.

Gahko ('crane'). A Mahican clan.

Gahlinskun (Gä'lnskun, 'high up on a point'). A Haida town N. of C. Ball, on the E. coast of Graham id., Brit. Col., occupied by the Naikun-kegwai. Work assigned to it 120 people in 9 houses in 1836-41. A-se-guang, the name given by him, is said to have been applied to some high land back of the town.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

A-se-guang.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, V, 489, 1855 (after Work, 1836-41). A-se-guang.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859 (misprint from Work). Gä'lnskun.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Gaigunkun (Gaigä'n kun). A Haida town said to have stood near Hot Spring id., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Gaibanipitea. Apparently a former settlement of the Pima or of an allied tribe, possibly the Sobaipuri, described as situated on a hill on the W. bank of the Rio San Pedro. Visited by Father Kino in 1697. Probably identical with the ruins known as Santa Cruz, a few miles W. of Tombstone, s. Ariz.

Jaibanipitea.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 274, 1884. Santa Cruz de Gaibanipitea.—Bernal (1697) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 277, 1856. Santa Cruz del Cuervo.—Bancroft, No. Mex. Gakhulin ('village on a stream'). One of the 4 Kansa villages in 1820.

Gaqüli.—Dorsey, Kansa MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Gakhulinulinbo. A former Kansa village near the head of a s. tributary of Kansas r., on which a trading post was established.

Gaqüli uli'be.—Dorsey, Kansa MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Gakpomute ('little turtle'). A Mahican clan.

Galena. The ore of lead occurs in beds, pockets, and in true veins in connection with various geological formations in the United States and in British America, being especially abundant in Illinois and Missouri. The Indians of the Mississippi valley, especially the mound builders, seem to have prized this ore very highly in the form in which it usually occurs—masses of blue-gray, glistening cubical crystals. It was probably valued for its beauty, as was also the yellow crystals of iron pyrites, and possibly had special significance with the mound-building tribes, as it is found among the articles placed upon the sacrificial altars. In some cases the heat of the altar fires has been sufficient to melt part of the ore, but it does not appear that the Indians had learned to make any practical use of the lead. Squier and Davis found 30 pounds of the ore, in pieces varying from 2 ounces to 3 pounds, on an altar in one of the Mound City mounds in Ohio; and it is at times found also on pueblo sites. Galena was sometimes shaped into the simpler forms of ceremonial objects, such as spheres, hemispheres, cones, plummets, and boat-stones (q. v.). Consult Moorehead in The Antiquarian, I, 1897; Rau in Smithsonian Rep. 1872, 1873; Squier and Davis in Smithsonian Cont., I, 1848. (W. H. H.)

Galiano Island. A band of the Penelakut (q. v.) who speak a Cowichan dialect, residing in s. E. Vancouver id.; pop. 32 in 1904.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1904, pt. II, 69, 1905.

Galilali (Galilali, 'the houses'; i. e., ancient cave houses). A Tarahumare rancheria in the Sierra Madre, w. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Galisteo. A former Tano pueblo $1\frac{1}{2}$ m. N. E. of the present hamlet of the same name, and about 22 miles S. of Santa Fé, N. Mex. Identified by Bandler (Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 122, 1892) with the Ximena of Coronado, who visited the village in 1541, when it consisted of 30 houses. Galisteo was the seat of a Franciscan mission perhaps as early as 1617—certainly in 1629—and in 1680 contained 800 neophytes and a fine church; San Cristóbal was a visita at this date. In the revolt of the Pueblos in August of the latter year the Indians of Galisteo killed the resident priest, besides the father custodian of New Mexico, the missionaries of San Marcos and Pecos, who were on their way to give warning, and several colonists. After the remaining Spanish colonists had been driven out of the country the Tano of Galisteo removed to Santa Fé and erected a village on the ruins of the old Palace, but were expelled by Vargas in 1692. In 1706 the town was reestablished with 90 Indians by the governor of the province under the name Nuestra Señora de los Remedios de Galisteo, but it was also called Santa María. It remained an inconsiderable village until between 1782 and 1794, when the inhabitants, decimated by smallpox and by the persistent hostilities of the Comanche, removed to Santo Domingo pueblo, where their descendants still live, preserving the language of their ancestors and in part their tribal autonomy. At one time, according to Bandelier, Galisteo probably had a population of 1,000. In 1712 it numbered 110 souls; in 1748, 50 families, and but 52 souls in 1782 just before its abandonment. (F. W. H.)

Gall (Pizi). A chief of the Hunkpapa Teton Sioux, born on Moreau r., S. Dak., in 1840; died at Oak cr., S. Dak., Dec. 5, 1894. He was of humble parentage, but was well brought up, receiving the usual consideration of his people for an orphan, his mother being a poor widow. As a young man he was a warrior of note, and that he was possessed of military genius of high order was shown by the disposition he made of his forces at the battle of the Little Bighorn, June 25, 1876, where he led the Sioux. He was the lieutenant of Sitting Bull, but had the quality of leadership in the field that was lacking in his chief. He fled to Canada with Sitting Bull after the Custer affair, but in 1880 he and Crow Chief withdrew from the Sitting Bull following, leaving the latter with but few people. With his followers he surrendered to Maj. Ilges at Poplar r. camp, Mont., Jan. 1, 1881, and settled as a farmer on Standing Rock res., N. and S. Dak. He denounced Sitting Bull as a coward and a fraud and became a friend to the whites, wielding a potent influence in procuring the submission of the Indians to the plan of the Government for the education of the children. He was a man of noble presence and much esteemed for his candor and sagacity by the whites with whom he came in contact. He was influential in bringing about the ratification of the act of Mar. 2, 1889, the last agreement with the Sioux by which their great reservation was divided into separate reservations and certain portions were ceded to the United States. From 1889 he was a judge of the court of Indian offenses at Standing Rock agency. (J. M' L.)

Galley. A Cherokee settlement of about 12 families in 1819 (Nuttall, Arkansas, 122, 1821), on the Galley hills, in Yell co., Ark., about midway between Danville and Dardenelle. (J. M.)

it is applied. It was given by the Spaniards of San Rafael mission to the Pomo from the vicinity of Healdsburg and Santa Rosa, Sonoma co., Cal., on the occasion of their being brought into the mission in the early part of the 19th century. The name is now used to designate in particular the few remaining Indians whose former homes were in the Russian r. valley from the vicinity of Healdsburg s. to the southern limit of the territory occupied by the Pomo, or a point about halfway between Santa Rosa and Petaluma. In a still broader sense it is made to include the remainder of the people speaking the same dialect and formerly living about Cloverdale and the upper part of Dry cr. The name is not of Indian origin and its significance is not known.

Games. Indian games may be divided into two general classes: games of chance and games of dexterity. Games of pure skill and calculation, such as chess, are entirely absent. The games of chance fall into one of two categories: (1) games in which implements corresponding with dice are thrown at random to determine a number or numbers, the counts being kept by means of sticks, pebbles, etc., or upon an abacus or counting board or circuit; (2) games in which one or more of the players guess in which of two or more places an odd or particularly marked counter is concealed, success or failure resulting in the gain or loss of counters. The games of dexterity may be designated as (1st) archery in its various modifications; (2d) a game of sliding javelins or darts upon the hard ground or ice; (3d) a game of shooting at a moving target consisting of a netted hoop or a ring; (4th) the game of ball in several highly specialized forms; and (5th) the racing games, more or less interrelated and complicated with the ball games (q. v.). In addition, there is a sub-class, related to the game of shooting at the moving target, of which it is a miniature form, corresponding with the European game of cup-and-ball. Games of all the classes designated are found among all the Indian tribes of North America, and constitute the games, par excellence, of the Indians. The children have a variety of other amusements such as top spinning, mimic fights, and similar imitative sports (see Amusements); but the games first described are played only by men and women, youths and maidens, not by children, and usually at fixed seasons as the accompaniment of certain festivals or religious rites. A well-marked affinity exists between the manifestation of the same game even among the most widely separated tribes; the variations are more in the materials employed, due to environment, than the object or method of plays. Precisely the same games are played by tribes belonging to unrelated linguistic stocks, and in general the variations do not follow the differences in language. At the same time there appears to be a progressive change from what seems to be the older forms of existing games from a center in S. W. United States along lines radiating from the same center southward into Mexico. There is no evidence that any of the games above described were ever imported into America; on the contrary, they appear to be the direct and natural outgrowth of aboriginal American institutions. They show no modification due to white influence other than the decay which characterizes all Indian institutions under existing conditions. It is probable, however, that the wide dissemination of certain games, as, for example, the hand game, is a matter of comparatively recent date, due to wider and less restricted intercourse through the abolition of tribal wars. Playing cards and probably the simple board game, known by the English as merrels, are practically the only games borrowed by the Indians from the whites. On the other hand we have taken lacrosse in the N. and racket in the S., and the Mexicans of the Rio Grande play all the old Indian games under Spanish names. In the dice games, it appears, the original number of dice was four, and that they were made of canes, being the shaftments of arrows painted or burned with marks corresponding with those used to designate the arrows of the four world-quarters. In one of the earliest forms of the guessing game the number of the places of concealment was four, and the implements used in hiding were derived from the four marked arrow shaftments. In general, in all Indian games, the arrow or the bow, or some derivative of them, is found to be the predominant implement, and the conceptions of the four world-quarters the fundamental idea. From this it became apparent that the relation of the games to each other in the same area, and of each to its counterpart among all the tribes, was largely dependent on their common origin in ceremonies from which games produced as amusements were uniformly derived. Back of each game is found a ceremony in which the game was a significant part. The ceremony has commonly disappeared; the game survives as an amusement, but often with traditions and observances which serve to connect it with its original purpose. The ceremonies appear to have been to cure sickness, to cause fertilization and reproduction of plants and animals, and, in the arid region, to produce rain. Gaming implements are among the most significant objects that are placed upon many Hopi altars, and constantly reappear as parts of the masks, headdresses, and other ceremonial adornments of the Indians generally. These observations hold true both of the athletic games as well as of the game of chance. The ball was a sacred object not to be touched with the hand, and has been identified as symbolizing the earth, the sun, or the moon. In the ring-and-pole game, the original form of the ring was a netted hoop derived from the spider web, the emblem of the Earth mother. The performance of the game was bound up with ceremonies of reproduction and fertility. In the kicked-stick and ball-race games of the S. W., the primary object seems to have been to protect the crops against sand storms within the circuit traversed.

Following are brief descriptions of the principal games played by the Indians N. of Mexico:

Arrow games.—A variety of games was played with actual arrows. In one of the commonest, an arrow was tossed with the hand by one of the players and the others then threw at it and endeavored to cause their arrows to fall across it.

Ball games.—The two common ball games which are widely distributed are racket ball, a man's game played with one or two netted bats or rackets, and shinny, commonly played by women.

In addition, women had a game with a double or tied ball which was tossed with long slender rods. In all of these it was not permitted to touch the ball with the hands.

Among the Plains tribes the women played with a small buckskin-covered ball of buffalo hair. (See Ball play.)

SHINNY BALL AND STICK

DOUBLE BALL AND STICK

Bowl game.—A kind of dice game widely played by women among the Algonquian, Iroquois, Sioux, and other northern tribes. The dice consist of bone disks, or of peach or plum stones, which are tossed in a wooden bowl or a basket. Some California tribes use a large flat basket.

BOWL GAME

Cat's cradle.—The trick of weaving patterns with string upon the fingers, which we call cat's cradle, is very generally known, but the designs are different and much more intricate.

BASKET DICE GAME

The Zuñi and Navaho attribute the origin of this amusement to the spider and associate the figures with the spider-web net shield of the war gods.

Children's games.—Indian children play a variety of games, which are practically identical with those played by the children of civilization. They are all mimetic in their character, and have no relation to the ceremonial and divinatory games of their elders, except so far as they may be imitations of them. (See Amusements, Child life.)

Chunkey.—The ring-and-pole game of the Creeks and neighboring tribes, in which a stone ring or disk was employed. From specimens of the stones found in the mounds it is shown that this form of the game had a wide distribution. Stone rings were used until recently in a similar game by some of the tribes on the N. W. coast.

Cup-and-pin game.—An amusement analogous to the cup-and-ball, or bilboquet, of Europe. The game is universal among the Indians, and exists in a great variety of forms, all of which may be referred to the spider-web shield. Among the Dakota the game is called the 'deer-toe game' and played with a string of phalangeal bones which are caught on a needle. The Eskimo use solid bone or ivory objects which are caught in the same way.

Football.—The game commonly spoken of as football is a ball race, chiefly confined to the S. W., in which a small wooden or stone ball is kicked around a long course, the original object having been the magical protection of the fields against sand storms. The Tarahumare derive their name from this game. Football proper exists among the Eskimo.

Four-stick game.—A game in which 4 marked sticks or billets of two different sizes are hidden under a flat basket, the object being to guess their relative positions.

Hand game.—The commonest and most widely distributed of Indian guessing games. Two (or four) bone or wooden cylinders, one plain and one marked, are held in the hands by one player, the other side guessing in which hand the unmarked cylinder is concealed. The game is commonly counted with sticks and is played to the accompaniment of songs or incantations.

HAND GAME

Hidden-ball game.—The common guessing game of the Southwestern tribes, played with four wooden tubes or cups, under one of which a ball or stick is hidden. The opposing side endeavors to guess where the object is concealed. The four cups or tubes refer to the four world-quarters, and the game is sacred to the war gods.

HIDDEN-BALL GAME

Hoop-and-pole.—A widely distributed athletic game in which a hoop or ring, frequently covered with network, is rolled along the ground and shot at with arrows or javelins, the counts being determined by the way in which the latter fall with reference to the ring. The game exists in a great variety of forms, all more or less related to and associated with ideas of fertility and generation.

HOOP-AND-POLE GAME

Juggling.—Juggling with balls, sometimes made of clay especially for the purpose, is practised by the women of some tribes. They keep two or more in the air at one time, and endeavor to see which can thus maintain them longest.

Kicked stick.—A game of the Southwestern Indians, notably the Zuni, in which two small painted sticks are kicked in a race around a ceremonial circuit inclosing the fields beyond the village.

KICKED STICK GAME

Moccasin game.—A common guessing game of the northern tribes. Four moccasins are commonly employed and a small object, such as a bullet, or a ball of buffalo hair, is hidden in one of them. The opposing side endeavors to guess where it is concealed. The game is counted with sticks, and is clearly a derivative of the hidden-ball game played with wooden tubes.

Patol.—The Spanish or Mexican name of the stick-dice game among the Hopi Indians and some of the Pueblos of the Rio Grande. Derived from the Aztec word patolli, which the old Mexicans are described as having played on a painted mat, using beans as dice.

Snow snake.—A gaming implement, sometimes carved to represent a snake, which is hurled along the ice or frozen ground, the object being to see whose 'snake' will go farthest.

Stick game.—A common guessing game of the tribes of California and the N. Pacific coast, one that extends entirely across the continent to Canada and the Atlantic.

STICK GAME

The sticks, probably originally arrow shaftments, are shuffled and divided, the object being to guess in which bundle either the odd or a particularly marked stick is concealed. (See Straw game, below.)

Stick dice game.—A widely distributed game in which several 2-faced lots are tossed in the air like dice, the counts being kept on a diagram or with sticks. The number of the dice ranges from 3 upward, 4 being the most common.

Stilts.—Stilt-walking is a children's sport among the Hopi and Shoshoni, and from its existence in Mexico is probably indigenous among the Indians.

Straw game of.—The name given by early writers to a guessing game played by Huron and other tribes of the Atlantic slope. The implements consisted of fine splints or reeds, and the object of the game was to guess the number, odd or even, when the bundle was divided at random.

Tops.—The top is almost universal as a child's plaything among the Indian tribes of the United States and appears to be indigenous. The common form is a whip top made of horn, bone, stone, or wood, spun on the ice or on frozen ground.

Gantlet. See Captives, Ordeals.

Gaodjaos (Gaodja'os, 'drum village'). A Haida town on the s. shore of Lina id., Bearskin bay, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., occupied by the Hlgaiu-lanas family. It is often referred to in the native stories.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Gao-haidagai ('inlet people'). The name by which the Haida of Masset inlet and of the n. coast of Queen Charlotte ids. generally were known to those farther s. (J. R. S.)

Gaouge (Gā-on'-sage-on), 'place of bass-wood.'—Hewitt). Probably a former Seneca village, located by Morgan on Niagara r., N. Y.

Gā-o-tā'-ge.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886. Gā-o-s-geh.—Morgan, League Iroq., map, 1851.

Gapkaliptona. A Malemiut Eskimo village on Norton bay, Alaska.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., xxi, map, 1850.

Garabato (a Spanish term with various meanings, but here referring to the pictographs). A cave in a gorge on the w. slope of Arroyo Garabato, which drains into the Rio Chico, in the Sierra Nacori, w. of the Rio Casas Grandes, in n. w. Chihuahua, that contains the well-preserved remains of an ancient aboriginal habitation on the walls of which are numerous paintings that give the cave its name. The remains are possibly those of the Tarahumare.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., i, 103, 1902.

Garakonthie (Ga-ra'-kón-ti-e, 'Moving Sun'), Daniel. An Onondaga chief during the middle of the 17th century; died at Onondaga, N. Y., in 1676. When the French missionaries fled from Onondaga in 1658, Garakonthie aided them, perhaps secretly, to make their escape, but soon openly became the protector of the Christians and an advocate of peace. In 1661 he induced the Onondaga to send an embassy to Quebec and to return 9 French captives with a view of establishing peace. He accompanied the prisoners to Montreal, where he was well received, and obtained the release of a number of his people. In 1662 he succeeded in temporarily checking the chiefs who wished to make war on the French, and frustrated a plot to kill the missionary Le Moyne. During the war that followed he exercised his authority in protecting the French in his country. He declared himself a convert and was baptized in 1669 in the cathedral at Quebec, receiving the name Daniel. Garakonthie was not only an able, humane leader, but an orator of considerable ability; his strong attachment to the whites lessened his influence with the more warlike element of his tribe, yet when an embassy was to be sent either to the French or to the English, his services were in demand. (C. T.)

Garangula. See Grangula.

Garomisopona. A Chumashan village between Goleta and Pt Conception, Cal., in 1542.—Cabrillo, Narr. (1542) in Smith, Coloc. Doc. Fla., 183, 1857.

Gash. The winter town of the Sanyakoan (q. v.), a Tlingit clan near C. Fox, s. Alaska. Most of the people have now moved to Ketchikan. (J. R. S.)

Falls Village. Morgan, League Iroq., 466, 1851 (common English name). Gá'-sko'-sá-dá'.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886.

Gaspesien (Gaspé is from gachepe, or kéchi, 'the end.'—Vetromile). A name given by early French writers to a part of the Micmac living about Gaspé bay on the Gulf of St Lawrence, Quebec province. Their dialect differs somewhat from that of the other Micmac. They frequently crossed the gulf and made war on the Eskimo and Papinachois. In 1884 the "Micmacs of Gaspé" numbered 71 persons. (J. M.)

Gaspesians. Lahontan, New Voy., I, 230, 1703 (common English form). Gaspesies.—Hennepin, New Discov., map, 1698.

Gatagetagauning (probably for Ká'-tágitigáning, 'at the ancient field.'—W. J.). A former Chippewa village on Lac (Vieux) Desert or Gatagetagauning, on the Michigan-Wisconsin state line. The present Vieux Desert Chippewa in Michigan numbered, with the L'Anse band, 668 in 1903.

Ga-ta-gé-te-gaun-ing.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v. 38, 1885. Gé-té-kítigán.—Baraga Eng.-Ojib. Dict., 185, 1878. Ká-tágitigáning.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906 (correct Chippewa form). Old Field.—Ibid. Vieux Desert.—Ibid. Vieux Desert band.—La Pointe treaty (1854) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 223, 1873.

Gawababiganikak.—Gatschet, Ojibwa MS., B. A. E., 1882. Káwápabikán'kág.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1905. White Earth band.—Common name.

Gawunena. A band of the Arapaho, q. v.

Gayagaanhe (Gá-yá'-gá'-á'-hé, 'its body is inclined.'—Hewitt). The former principal village of the Cayuga, situate near the e. shore of Cayuga lake, 3½ miles s. of Union Springs, N. Y. St Joseph's mission was established there in 1668, and the settlement was destroyed by Gen. Sullivan in 1779. (J. M.)

Cayuga Castle.—Machin, map (1779), cited by Conover, Kanadesaga and Geneva MS., B. A. E. Gá-yá'-ga-an'-ha.—Morgan, League Iroq., 423, 1851. Gá-yá'-gá'-á'-hé.—Hewitt, inf'n, 1886. Goigouin.—See Cayuga. Gwa-u-gweh.—Morgan, League, Iroq., map, 1851. Saint Joseph.—Jes. Rel. for 1670, 63, 1858.

Gayanthwahgeh, Gayehtwahgeh, Gayenthwahgih. See Cornplanter.

Gay Head. A village, probably of the Wampanoag, formerly on the w. end of Marthas Vineyard, off the s. e. coast of Massachusetts. It contained 260 souls in 1698, and in 1809 there were still 240 Indian and negro mixed-bloods, who probably represented the entire Indian population of the island. (J. M.)

Gearksutite. A fluorine mineral resembling kaolin, found in Greenland. The word is compounded of arkutite (q. v.) and the Greek γῆ, 'earth.' (A. F. C.)

Geguep. A former Chumashan village near Santa Inez mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Geies (or Gier). One of the non-Caddoan tribes reported by Father Damian Massanet, comisario for the missions of Texas, on the road from Coahuila (probably the presidio rather than the province) to the Tejas (Texas) country in the 18th century.—Dictamen Fiscal, Mexico, Nov. 30, 1716, cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906.

Gelelemukpechuenk. A Delaware village in Ohio in 1770-73 and the residence of Netawatwees, the principal chief of the tribe. Perhaps identical with White Eyes' town. It was abandoned in 1773 or 1774, the inhabitants removing to Coshocton, on the E. side of the Muskingum, which Netawatwees henceforth made his chief residence.—Loskiel, Missions, 1794.

Gelelemend ('leader'). A Delaware chief, born about 1722; known also as Killbuck, the name borne by his father, one of the best educated Indians of his time. He was chosen on the death of White Eyes, about 1778, to succeed him as acting chief of the nation during the minority of the hereditary sachem of the Turtle or Unami division, having in the council won a reputation for sagacity and discretion. Like his predecessor he strove to maintain friendship with the whites, and was encouraged in this by the Indian agents and military commandants at Pittsburgh, who promised the aid of the American Government in the uplifting and civilization of the Indians if lasting peace could be effected. The war party, led by Hopocan, prevailed, however, in the council. Gelelemend was therefore invited by the officer commanding the garrison to remove with others of the peace party to an island in Allegheny r., where they could be under the protection of the soldiery, but they were not protected from a party of murderous white men that fell upon them when returning from the massacre of nearly 100 Christian Delawares at Gnadenhuetten in 1782, when the young chief and all the others except a few were slain. Gelelemend made his escape by swimming, but the documents that William Penn had given to the Indians were destroyed. His services were of value in bringing about a general peace, but the Munsee held him responsible for the misfortunes that had befallen the Delawares, and to escape their vengeance he remained with his family at Pittsburgh long after peace was proclaimed. He joined the Moravian Indians in the end and lived under the protection of the settlement, still sedulously avoiding his vindictive foes. He was baptized by the name of William Henry and lived till Jan., 1811.

Génau. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Genega's Band (named from its chief, Genega, 'Dancer'). A Paviotso band formerly living at the mouth of Truckee r., w. Nevada, said to number 290 in 1859. They are no longer recognized under this name.

Dancer band.—Burton, City of Saints, 472, 1862. Genega's band.—Dodge in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 374, 1860. Genega.—Burton, op. cit.

Geneseo (Tyo'nesi'yo', 'there it has fine banks'.—Hewitt). An important Seneca settlement formerly situated about the site of Geneseo, N. Y. In 1750 it contained 40 or more large houses. It was destroyed by Sullivan in 1779.

Genesio.—Ft Johnson conf. (1757) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Genizaros (Span. transl. of Turkish yēñi-cheri (Eng. janizary), lit. 'new troops', referring to a former body of Turkish infantry largely recruited from compulsory conscripts and converts taken from Christian subjects). A term applied to certain Indians who were purchased or captured from predatory tribes and settled by the Spaniards in villages along the Rio Grande, N. Mex. One of these "pueblos de Genizaros" was established at Abiqui before 1748; another at Tome, farther down on the Rio Grande, at a subsequent date, and a third apparently at Belen. See Villa-Señor, Theatro Am., 416, 1748; Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Pap., iii, 197, 1890; iv, 54, 1892. (F. W. H.)

1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871.

Xenopus.—Ibid., 123.

Gens. See Clan and Gens.

Gens de la Sapinière (French: 'people of the fir tree'). A numerous tribe formerly living n. w. of L. Superior and trading with the English on Hudson bay. Du Lhut, in 1684, endeavored to draw their trade to the French. They were distinct from the Cree, Chippewa, and Assiniboin, and may have been a part of the Maskegon.—La Chesnaye (1697) in Margry, Déc., vi, 7, 1886.

Gens de Païse (corruption of French Gens du Pais, 'people of the land'; or of Gens du Panse, 'band of the paunch'). Given as a band of Sioux at the Mandan subagency, N. Dak., in 1832 (Ex. Doc. 90, 22d Cong., 1st sess., 63, 1832), but probably intended for the Hidatsa, q. v.

Gens de Pied (French: 'foot people'). A former band of Assiniboin in 33 lodges w. of Eagle hills, Assiniboia, Canada.—Henry (1808) in Coues, New Light, ii, 491, 1897.

Foot Assiniboines.—Ibid., 523.

Gens des Lacs (French: 'people of the lakes'). One of the 5 tribes into which Badin (Ann. de la Prop. de la Foi, iv, 536, 1843) in 1830 divided the Sioux nation. What people he includes has not been ascertained, possibly only the Mdewakanton. Prichard (Phys. Hist. Mankind, v, 140, 1847) uses the term Gens du Lac as equivalent to People of the Leaves, and includes the 4 most easterly Dakota tribes, not only the Mdewakanton (the true Gens des Lacs), but the Wahpeton (Leaf villages), Wahpekute (Leaf-shooters), and Sisseton.

Gens du Large (French: 'wandering people'). One of the two divisions of the Dakota, as given by Long (Expéd. St Peters r., i, 380, 1824), comprising the following tribes: Kahra (a Sisseton band), Miakchakessa (Sisseton), Tetoans (Teton), Wahkpakota (Wahpekute), Wahkpatoan (Wahpeton), Yanktoanan (Yanktonai), Yanktoan (Yankton). It embraces all the group except the Mdewakanton, his Gens du Lac.

Dacota errans.—Balbi, Atlas Ethnog., 55, 1826.
Roaming Dakotas.—Long, op. cit., i, 380.

Gentaienton ('meadows lying together'.—Hewitt). One of the chief villages of the Erie, q. v. Its location is not known, but the name indicates that it was on a plain.

German influence. German influence on the aborigines n. of Mexico has made itself felt in three particular regions—among the Eskimo of Labrador and Greenland; among the Delawares, Mahican, and some of the Iroquois in Pennsylvania, New York, and Ontario; and among the Cherokee of South Carolina. In those regions Moravian missionaries have endeavored to convert the natives with considerable success. The Moravian missions in Greenland began in 1721 under Egede. The station of Ny Herrnhut dates from 1734. From the account given by Thompson (Moravian Missions, 211, 1890) the native Christians in Greenland number some 1,500, and their customs and habits have been much changed for the better, especially where the influence of whalers and traders has not been too strong. The Moravian efforts in Labrador began at Hopedale in 1752 under Ehrhardt, but the first successful establishment was made in 1771. The general result has been to modify considerably the dress, implements, habits, and beliefs of the natives, and particularly their sexual morality (Delabarre in Bull. Geog. Soc. Phila., 145–151, 1902). The disappearance of the Eskimo pirates, who once infested the straits of Belleisle, and the general improvement of Arctic navigation have been brought about through the change in Eskimo life and character. Turner observed that some of the Eskimo children of the Labrador missions use the German words for numbers up to 10 in their counting-out games, having caught them from the missionaries. Much of what the Moravians have accomplished in Greenland has been done in spite of the Danish authorities rather than with their cooperation. Moravian missionaries in the 18th century and the early years of the 19th, labored among the Mahican of N. New York (Rauch having begun the work in 1740), among the Delawares and other tribes of Pennsylvania, Zeisberger being "the apostle of the Delawares," and among the Iroquois in parts of Pennsylvania, New York, and Canada (Thompson, op. cit., 287–341). They exercised restraint on the Indians during the French-English and Revolutionary wars, when their converts generally were illtreated by all sorts of white men. According to Thompson (p. 276) the Moravian mission of 1735 to Georgia was the first company from any quarter that reached the shores of America with the express and leading object of evangelizing natives. Their labors began among the Creeks. Moravian missions were established also among the Cherokee (Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 83, 1900). According to some the father of Sequoya, the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet, was a German of the Georgia colony. (A. F. C.)

Geronimo (Spanish for Jerome, applied by the Mexicans as a nickname; native name Goyathlay, 'one who yawns'). A medicine-man and prophet of the Chiricahua Apache who, in the latter part of the 19th century, acquired notoriety through his opposition to the authorities and by systematic and sensational advertising; born about 1834 at the headwaters of Gila r., N. Mex., near old Ft Tulerosa. His father was Taklishim, 'The Gray One,' who was not a chief, although his father (Geronimo's grandfather) assumed to be a chief without heredity or election. Geronimo's mother was known as Juana. When it was decided, in 1876, in consequence of depredations committed in Sonora, of cant. During 1884-85 he gathered a band of hostiles, who terrorized the inhabitants of s. Arizona and New Mexico, as well as of Sonora and Chihuahua, in Mexico. Gen. Crook proceeded against them with instructions to capture or destroy the chief and his followers. In Mar., 1886, a truce was made, followed by a conference, at which the terms of surrender were agreed on; but Geronimo and his followers having again fled to the Sierra Madre across the Mexican frontier, and Gen. Miles having been placed in command, active operations were renewed and their surrender was ultimately effected in the following August. The entire band, numbering about 340, including Geronimo and Nachi, the hereditary chief, were deported as prisoners of war, first to Florida and later to Alabama, being finally settled at Ft Sill, Okla., where they now reside under military supervision and in prosperous condition, being industrious workers and careful spenders. (J. M. C. T.)

Gewauga (Odji'wagén, 'it is bitter, salty.'—Hewitt). A Cayuga village on the site of the present Union Springs, town of Springport, on the e. side of Cayuga lake, N. Y. It was destroyed by Sullivan's troops, Sept. 22, 1779. (J. N. B. H.)

Ghost dance. A ceremonial religious dance connected with the messiah doctrine, which originated among the Paviotso in Nevada about 1888, and spread rapidly among other tribes until it numbered among its adherents nearly all the Indians of the interior basin, from Missouri r. to or beyond the Rockies. The prophet of the religion was a young Paiute Indian, at that time not yet 35 years of age, known among his own people as Wovoka ('Cutter'), and commonly called by the whites Jack Wilson, from having worked in the family of a ranchman named Wilson. Wovoka seems already to have established his reputation as a medicine-man when, about the close of 1888, he was attacked by a dangerous fever. While he was ill an eclipse spread excitement among the Indians, with the result that Wovoka became delirious and imagined that he had been taken into the spirit world, and there received a direct revelation from the God of the Indians. Briefly stated, the revelation was to the effect that a new dispensation was close at hand by which the Indians would be restored to their inheritance and reunited with their departed friends, and that they must prepare for the event by practising the songs and dance ceremonies which the prophet gave them. Within a very short time which the Mexican government complained, to remove the Chiricahua from their reservation on the s. frontier to San Carlos, Ariz., Geronimo and others of the younger chiefs fled into Mexico. He was arrested later when he returned with his band to Ojo Caliente, N. Mex., and tilled the ground in peace on San Carlos res. until the Chiricahua became discontented because the Government would not help them irrigate their lands. In 1882 Geronimo led one of the bands that raided in Sonora and surrendered when surrounded by Gen. George H. Crook's force in the Sierra Madre. He had one of the best farms at San Carlos, when trouble arose in 1884 in consequence of the attempt of the authorities to stop the making of tiswin, the native intoxicant.

the dance spread to the tribes E. of the mountains, where it became known commonly as the Spirit or Ghost dance. The dancers, men and women together, held hands, and moved slowly around in a circle, facing toward the center, keeping time to songs that were sung without any instrumental accompaniment. Hypnotic trances were a common feature of the dance. Among the Sioux in Dakota the excitement, aggravated by local grievances, led to an outbreak in the winter of 1890-91. The principal events in this connection were the killing of Sitting Bull, Dec. 15, 1890, and the massacre at Wounded Knee, Dec. 29. The doctrine has now faded out, and the dance exists only as an occasional social function. In the Crow dance of the Cheyenne and Arapaho, a later development from the Ghost dance proper, the drum is used, and many of the ordinary tribal dances have incorporated Ghost-dance features, including even the hypnotic trances.

The belief in the coming of a messiah, or deliverer, who shall restore his people to a condition of primitive simplicity and happiness, is probably as universal as the human race, and takes on special emphasis among peoples that have been long subjected to alien domination. In some cases the idea seems to have originated from a myth, but in general it may safely be assumed that it springs from a natural human longing. Both the Quichua of Peru and the Aztec of Mexico, as well as more cultured races, had elaborate messiah traditions, of which the first Spanish invaders were quick to take advantage, representing themselves as the long-expected restorers of ancient happiness. Within the United States nearly every great tribal movement originated in the teaching of some messianic prophet. This is notably true of the Pontiac conspiracy in 1763-64, and of the combination organized by Tecumseh (q. v.) and his brother, the prophet Tenskwatawa (q. v.), shortly before the War of 1812. Of similar nature in more recent times is the doctrine formulated on Columbia r. by Smohalla. See Mooney, Ghost Dance Religion, 14th Rep. B. A. E., pt. II, 1896. See Dance, Mythology, Religion. Giants. See Popular fallacies.

Gidanemuk (or Gikidanum). A band of Serranos (q. v.) living on Tejon and neighboring creeks in the Tehachapi mts., S. Cal. The term is that which they apply to themselves. (A. L. K.)

Giguay. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with San Juan Bautista mission, Cal.—Engelhardt, Franciscans in Cal., 398, 1897.

Gila Apache. The name Gila, or Xila, was apparently originally that of an Apache settlement W. of Socorro, in S. W. New Mexico, and as early as 1630 was applied to those Apache residing for part of the time on the extreme headwaters of the Rio Gila in that territory, evidently embracing those later known as Mimbresños, Mogollones, and Warm Springs (Chiricahua) Apache, and later extended to include the Apache living along the Gila in Arizona. The latter were seemingly the Arivaipa and Chiricahua, or a part of them. There were about 4,000 Indians under this name in 1853, when some of their bands were gathered at Ft. Webster, N. Mex., and induced by promise of supplies for a number of years to settle down and begin farming. They kept the peace and made some progress in industry, but were driven back to a life of pillage when the supplies were stopped, the treaty not having been confirmed. They are no longer recognized under this name. The term Gileños has also been employed to designate the Pima residing on the Gila in Arizona. (F. W. H.)

Gilitis. A former village, said to have been Esselen, connected with San Carlos mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Gimiels. A band of almost pure Yuma in N. Lower California (Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 53-54, 1869). Perhaps the Comeya.

Gipuy. A village occupied by the ancestors of the present Queres of Santo Domingo pueblo, 1½ m. E. of Thornton, on the brink of Arroyo de Galisteo, N. central N. Mex. In consequence of a flood which destroyed a portion of the pueblo, Gipuy was abandoned prior to 1591, and another village bearing the same name was built 4 m. W., nearly on the site of the present Santo Domingo. It was the latter Gipuy that was visited and named Santo Domingo (q. v.) by Castaño de Sosa in 1591; but after 1605 this pueblo was also destroyed by a freshet, the inhabitants moving farther w., where they built another village on the banks of the Rio Grande, naming it Huashpa Tzena. See Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 185-187, 1892.

Girty's Town. A Shawnee village in 1795 on St Marys r., E. of Celina reservoir, Auglaize co., Ohio. It took its name from Simon Girty, an Indian trader living with the Shawnee. (J. M.)

Gist, George. See Sequoya.

Gitin-gidjats (Gitin-gi'djats, 'servants of the Gitins'). A family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. This family, who are of low social rank and are distributed among the houses of the Gitins of Skidegate, once had a town in connection with the Lana-chaadus, on Shingle bay, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., but people of Kloo enslaved so many of them that they gave up their town and independent family organization, entering the different houses of the Gitins as servants.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 273, 1905.

Gittingits'ata.—Boas, Twelfth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 24, 25, 1898. Gyit'ingyits'ata.—Boas, Fifth Rep., ibid., 26, 1889.

Gitinka-lana (G'itnq'a-lā'na). A town of the Yagunstan-inagai of the Haida, on the N. shore of Masset inlet, Brit. Col., where it expands into the inner bay.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Gitins (Giti'ns). An important subdivision of the Eagle clan of the Haida. Gitins is a synonym for Eagle clan, and the name of the subdivision would naturally have been Hlgaiu-gitinai, but the family was so prominent that, as in a similar case at Masset, it came to be called simply Gitins. This was the subdivision or family that owned the town of Skidegate, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was divided into two principal branches—Nayunns-haidagai and Nasagas-haidagai. Subordinate branches were the Lagalaiguahl-lanas and the Gitin-gidjats.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 273, 1905.

Gila'psh-i.—Boas, Chinook Texts, 260, 1891.

Gitans (Gitans, dialectic variant of Gitins). An important family group of the Haida, living at Masset, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. Its prominence at Masset, like that of the Gitins at Skidegate, was such that no further designation was used. Two principal subdivisions recognized were the Mamun-gitunai and the Undlakadjins-gitunai; inferior divisions were the Tees-gitunai and the Sadjugahl-lanas. (J. R. S.)

Glen-Vowell Band. A band of Kitksan living on the right bank of upper Skeena r., 4 m. above Hazelton, Brit. Col.; pop. 73 in 1904.—Can. Ind. Aff., 209, 1902; 212, 1904.

Glenaxenqu. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863.

Glikhikan. A Delaware warrior and orator. He was one of the chief captains of the Delawares, who, in an argument with the French priests in Canada had, in the opinion of the Indians, refuted the Christian doctrine. Thinking to achieve a similar victory and win back to paganism the Christian Delawares, he challenged the Moravian missionaries to a debate in 1769. To the dismay of his admirers he was himself converted to Christianity, and in the following year went to live with the United Brethren. In the Revolutionary war his diplomacy saved the Christian settlements from destruction at the hands of the Hurons under Half-King in 1777, and when the latter, on Sept. 4, 1781, captured him and the German missionaries, their chief interfered to save Glikhikan from the wrath of his Munsee tribesmen who were with the Hurons. Glikhikan was murdered and scalped at Gnadenhuetten on Mar. 8, 1782, by the white savages under Col. David Williamson.

Gnacstares. A tribe, supposed to be imaginary, mentioned by Lahontan as living, about 1690, on a long river emptying into the Mississippi in Minnesota, in about the same latitude as Minnesota r. Gnacstares.—Lahontan, Voyages, I, 119, 1703. Gnacstaries.—Janson, Stranger in Am., 277, 1807. Gnacstaries.—Coxe, Carolana, 19, 1741. Gnacstares.—Dobbs, Hudson Bay, map, 1744.

Gnadenhuetten (German: 'huts of grace'). The name of several mission villages (5, according to Brinton) established at different periods among the Mahican, Munsee, and Delawares by the Moravian missionaries. The first was settled in 1746 by Moravian Mahican from Shecomeco and Scaticook on the N. side of Mahoning cr., near its junction with the Lehigh, about the present Lehighton, Carbon co., Pa. In 1754 it was abandoned for a new village, called New Gnadenhuetten, on the site of Weiss-port, Carbon co., Pa. Delawares and Mahican occupied the village together. Soon after removing here the old village was burned by hostile Indians in 1755, and the new place was for a time deserted. In 1763 the Indians abandoned the settlement for a short time on account of the troubles arising from Pontiac's war. The last and best known village of the name was established on the Muskingum, about the site of the present Gnadenhuetten, Tuscarawas co., Ohio, in 1772. Toward the close of the Revolution the inhabitants were removed to Sandusky by the hostile Indians, and on returning to gather their corn were massacred by the Americans in 1782. Consult Heckewelder, Narr., 1820; Howells, Three Villages, 1884; Loekiell, Hist. Miss. United Brethren, 1794. (J. M.)

Godbout. A trading station of the Montagnais and Nascepee at the mouth of Godbout r., on the St Lawrence, Quebec. In 1904 the Indians there numbered 40, the population having been stationary for 20 years.

Godthaab. The chief Danish residence and Eskimo missionary station on the w. coast of Greenland, about lat. 64°.—Crantz, Hist. Greenland, I, map, 1767.

Goggles. Inventions related to the visor and eyeshade, to reduce the amount of sunlight penetrating the eye. After the long Arctic winter comes the trying season of the low sun which, glancing over the snow and Arctic waters, nearly blinds the hunter and fisher. All northern peoples wear visors of some kind, but it is not enough that the Eskimo should have his eyes shaded; he must have a device through which the eyes look out of narrow slits or small elliptical holes. Indeed, in many localities the shade and goggles are united. From E. to the farthest W. the Eskimo have succeeded in perfecting such apparatus. The Eskimo and Aleut spend much pains and skill in the manufacture of their goggles. They differ in materials, form, workmanship, method of attachment, and amount of foreign acculturation according to locality and exposure. Goggles or eyeshades were rarely worn by the Indians. Gohate. A former Maricopa rancheria on the Rio Gila in s. Arizona; visited by Sedelmair in 1744 (Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 366, 1889). Apparently distinct from Cohate.

Gohlkahin (Go'lkáhn, 'prairie people'). A division of the Jicarillas. See Guhl-kainde. (J. M.)

Going Snake (P'nddú-na't, signifying that a person is 'going along in company with a snake'). A Cherokee chief, prominent about 1825.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 522, 1900.

Goiogouen (Guéñio' guén, 'place where locusts were taken out of a liquid.'—Hewitt). One of the chief towns of the Cayuga in 1870, and from which the tribe took its name, situated at this time on the e. side of Cayuga lake, on Great Gully brook, about 4 m. s. of the present Union Springs, and 4 leagues from the town of Tiohero (Kiohero), lying at the n. end of Cayuga lake, and 6 leagues from Onnon-tare, these three being the principal towns of the Cayuga when first known. The inhabitants of Goiogouen were composed in part of Cayuga and in part of adopted captives from the Hurons, the Conestoga, and the Neutral Nation. This town or 'Bourg d'Oïogouen,' in 1668, according to the Jesuit Relation for 1669, contained more than 2,000 souls and could muster more than 300 warriors. While the Cayuga were proud-spirited, the missionaries found them more tractable and less fierce than were the Onondaga and the Oneida. At this town Father de Carheil dedicated the mission of St Joseph on Nov. 9, 1668, and 7 days later witnessed the horrible spectacle of the burning and the eating of a captive Conestoga woman. Archeologic evidence indicates, what is usual in regard to the permanency of Indian village sites, that this town has been removed from site to site within a radius of 10 miles or more.

In 1779 Gen. Sullivan's army found three places named Cayuga; namely, (1) Cayuga Castle, containing about 15 very large houses of squared logs, superior to anything seen before among these Indians; the troops destroyed here 110 acres of corn; (2) Upper Cayuga, containing 14 houses, situated about 1 m. s. of the Castle; (3) East Cayuga, 'Old Town,' containing about 13 houses, situated about 1 m. N. E. from the Castle. In these towns the troops found apples, peaches, potatoes, turnips, onions, pumpkins, squashes, cucumbers, watermelons, and vegetables of various kinds in great abundance. These with other hamlets of the Cayuga were burned and the fruit and vegetables destroyed by the troops, Sept. 23-24, 1779.

Gold. Although gold in the form of nuggets occurs in more than one section of the continent N. of Mexico, the tribes in general were practically without knowledge of its use. In a few cases objects of gold have been obtained from mounds in the Ohio valley, notably in the Turner group, Hamilton co., Ohio, where a small copper pendant was found retaining traces of a thin plating of gold, and bits of the filmy sheet were also found in the débris (Putnam). This plating with thin sheet gold is suggestive of well-known Mexican work, and along with other evidence obtained from mounds in Ross co., Ohio, tends to strengthen the belief that the mound-builders of this region had more or less indirect intercourse with the people of central Mexico. Some rudely shaped and perforated gold beads were found in one of the Etowah mounds in Georgia (Jones), and finds of slight importance are reported from other localities.

The most interesting objects of gold found in connection with native remains come from Florida, and several of these have been published by Kunz. One of the specimens described was obtained from a mound in Orange co.—a flat rectangular pendant notched at the upper end for the attachment of a cord. It was associated with a human skeleton, and had been worn as a pendant in connection with a necklace of glass beads. Its weight is 75½ dwts. A second specimen is a pendant ornament 2½ in. in length and nearly 1 in. wide, and weighing 61½ dwts. It is convex on one face and flat on the other, and is grooved at the upper end for the attachment of a cord. A third specimen is a disk of thin sheet gold, 3½ in.

in diameter and weighing 19 dwts., with repoussé embellishment about the edge and a circular boss at the center. It was found in a mound in Orange co., and in appearance closely resembles gold ornaments found in large numbers in the Isthmian region. A fourth specimen, also from an Orange co. mound, is a plain disk of thin metal nearly 2½ in. in diameter and having a central perforation. A very interesting object of gold, or rather of gold-silver alloy, was obtained from a mound in Manatee co., s. Fla., and is described by Rau. It is cut from a piece of thin gold plate, and graphically represents the head of a crested bird, probably the ivory-bill woodpecker, the neck being prolonged in a thin knife-like blade. The conventional treatment of the bird is characteristically Floridian, and the object is almost certainly of native make. The alloy consists of 893 parts of gold to 107 of silver, and may be of Spanish origin, although it is more likely to have been derived from Central America or Mexico.

Although the early Spanish explorers of Florida found some gold in possession of the natives and were led to believe that it had been mined in the mountains to the N., the evidence on this point is unsatisfactory, and it seems highly probable, as stated Sir John Hawkins, that most of the gold observed in Florida had been derived from Spanish vessels wrecked on the coast on their homeward voyage from the gold-producing districts of middle America.

Gorgetts. A term applied to objects worn in some proximate relation with the gorge or throat. They may be suspended from a string or chain encircling the neck, or may be attached to the dress. They may be simple ornaments not differing materially in form or significance from those used to embellish the ears, hair, wrists, or waist, or they may have special significance as symbols, insignia, charms, etc. They may be plain, or embellished with designs, significant, ornamental, or trivial. They may be natural objects selected because of their beauty, or they may be made of any material presenting an attractive appearance. On account of its beauty of color and its probable sacred significance as being a product of the water, shell was a favorite material and the numerous engraved disks obtained from burial mounds in the middle Eastern states are typical pendant gorgets (see Shellwork). Sheet copper was extensively employed by many of the tribes (see Copper), and stone was in universal use. Gorgets may have one or two marginal perforations for suspension, or they may be pierced centrally or otherwise for attachment, against a supporting surface, as illustrated by the pierced tablets much used by the former Eastern tribes. The name gorget is also applied to composite ornaments of various kinds suspended on or fixed against the chest, the showy breast ornament composed of two rows of bone beads or tubes employed by the Plains tribes being a good example (see Adornment). Gorgets are described in various publications on ethnology and archeology, and a somewhat extended discussion of these and allied ornaments and other objects, by Peabody and Moorehead, appears in Bull. II, Dept. of Archaeol., Phillips Acad., 1906. See Pendants, Pierced tablets, Problematical objects. (W. H. H.)

Gosiute (from Gossip, their chief, + Ute). A Shoshonean tribe formerly inhabiting Utah w. of Salt and Utah lakes, and E. Nevada. Jacob Forney, superintendent of Indian affairs for Utah, reported in 1858 that he had visited a small tribe called the Go-sha-utes, who lived about 40 m. w. of Salt Lake City. "They are," he says, "without exception, the most miserable looking set of human beings I ever beheld. I gave them some clothing and provisions. They have heretofore subsisted principally on snakes, lizards, roots, etc." Writing in 1861, Burton (City of Saints, 475, 1862) says: "Gosh Yuta, or Goshia Ute, is a small band, once protégés of the Shoshonee, who have the same language and limits. Their principal chief died about 5 years ago, when the tribe was broken up. A body of 60, under a peaceful leader, were settled permanently on the Indian farm at Deep cr., and the remainder wandered 40 to 200 m. w. of Great Salt Lake City. During the late tumults they have lost 50 warriors, and are now reduced to about 200 men. Like the Ghuzw of Arabia, they strengthen themselves by admitting the outcasts of other tribes, and will presently become a mere banditti." The agent in 1866 said they "are peaceable and loyal, striving to obtain their own living by tilling the soil and laboring for the whites whenever an opportunity presents, and producing almost entirely their own living." In 1868 the superintendent at Utah agency wrote of them: "These Indians range between the Great Salt lake and the land of the western Shoshones. Many of them are quite industrious, maintaining themselves in good part by herding stock and other labor for the settlers." It appears that later they cultivated land to some extent, being scattered over the country in spots where springs and streams afforded arable land. It is asserted by some authors that they are a mixture of Shoshoni and Ute. Their language indicates a closer relationship with the Shoshoni proper than with the Ute and Paiute, though they affiliate chiefly with the latter and have largely intermarried with them. According to Powell they numbered 460 in 1873; in 1885 they were said to number 256.

Gouges. Stone implements resembling celts or adzes, with one face hollowed out, giving a curved edge. Early writers speak of their use as spiles, in some sections, for tapping sugar-maple trees, the sap running through the groove into the vessel placed beneath. Examples grooved for hafting are rare. Held in the hand and struck with a mallet, or hafted after the manner of a hoe or an adz, they would be serviceable for hollowing out wooden canoes, troughs, mortars, and other vessels, especially in connection with charring. The distribution of these implements does not favor the theory of their use in making canoes, as they are most numerous in the N. where these vessels were mostly of birch-bark, and are rare in the S. where the dugout was the prevailing craft. The gouge is of somewhat rare occurrence w. of the Alleghanies. See Adzes, Celts.

Gourds. The shells of gourds were employed by the Indians for storage and carrying, as water jugs, dippers, spoons, and dishes, and for mixing bowls, pottery smoothers, rattles, sounders for the rapping stick, roof-drains, masks, parts of ornaments, and other purposes, and the flowers were used as food, coloring material, and in ceremonies. A number of species and varieties were commonly raised, producing fruit of different shapes and sizes—globose, lenticular, pyriform, and tubular, with necks of varying length and curve, or without necks, but all of value for the general or special purpose for which they were selectively grown. Gourds were sometimes shaped by pressure or bandaging while growing. Wild species were eaten green, or were used as medicine, but these were rarely made into utensils, while the larger and varied gourds, which were early distributed, like corn, from regions to the S. or derived during the historic period from the Old World, adapted themselves more fully to Indian needs. Aside from their use as domestic utensils they were extensively made into rattles, those E. of the Rocky mts. being almost universally of pyriform gourds, while the shape of the Pueblo gourd rattles is globular, lenticular, and pyriform. The Pueblos also made of gourd-shell heads for certain effigies, noses for masks, the bell ends of flageolets, ornaments for paraphernalia, and resonators for the notched rattle; and the Hopi imitate with a gourd trumpet behind a ceremonial altar the supposed sound made by the mythical plumed serpent. Gourd rattles for ceremonial use by various tribes were sometimes painted, burnt, or etched in symbolic designs. A Navaho specimen bears the outlines of several constellations scratched on the surface. Among the Iroquois gourd rattles were the special sacred objects of the medicine societies. The Cherokee, according to Mooney, fastened hollow gourds to tops of long poles set up near their houses so that the black house-martin might build their nests in them and frighten away the crows. Some of the Pueblos have Gourd or Calabash clans. See Dishes, Rattles, Receptacles.

Government. Government is the basis of the welfare and prosperity of human society. A government is an organic institution formed to secure the establishment of justice by safeguarding rights and enforcing the performance of duties in accordance with the experience and the established customs and rules of conduct of the governed. The superlative measure of justice obtainable by government is found in the care and protection of the young and the aged, the ready assistance rendered to comrades and the unfortunate, the maintenance of peace, the preservation of the equivalency of rights, the recognition of the equality of persons, the liberty of judgment and personal activity, and the substitution of mercy for vengeance in the punishment of crime. Among primitive folk rules of conduct, formulated by common consent or by customs derived from high ancestral usage, are observed, and these are enforced ultimately by corrective punitive measures. But justice is not secured thereby, and so some other method whereby causes in contention may be more promptly adjudicated is devised, and governments are organized.

Among the Indians of North America there are found many planes of culture, every one of which is characterized by widely differing forms of government—from the simplest family group and village community to the most complex confederation of highly organized tribes. In this area there are scores of distinct political governments, all differing widely in degrees of structural complexity. These differences in organization are determined largely by the extent to which the functions of government are discriminated and by the correlative specialization of organs thus made necessary. For most of the tribes of North America a close study and analysis of the social and political organization are wanting, hence the generalizations possible may as yet be applied safely only to those peoples that have been most carefully studied. However, it may be said in general that kinship, real or fictitious, is the basis of government among the Indians of North America, for the fundamental units of the social structure are groups of consanguine kindred, tracing descent of blood through the male or the female line.

The known units of the social and political organization of the North American Indians are the family, the clan or gens, the phratry, the tribe, and the confederation (q. v.). Of these the tribe and the confederation are the only units completely organized. The structures of only two or three confederations are known, and that of the Iroquois is the type example. The confederation of tribes was not usual, because the union of several tribes brought together many conflicting interests which could not be adjusted without sacrifices that appeared to overbalance the benefits of permanent confederation, and because statesmanship of the needed breadth and astuteness was usually wanting. Hence tribal government remains as the prevailing type of social organization in this area. In most tribes the military were carefully discriminated from the civil functions. The civil government was lodged in a chosen body of men usually called chiefs, of whom there were commonly several grades. Usually the chiefs were organized in a council exercising legislative, judicial, and executive functions in matters pertaining to the welfare of the tribe. The civil chief was not by virtue of his office a military leader. Among the Iroquois the civil chief in order to go to war had to resign his civil function during his absence on the warpath.

In tribal society every structural unit has, so far as known, the right to hold a council. The ohwachira (q. v.) can hold a council, the family can hold a council, and the united ohwachira councils with their officers form the council of the clan or gens. The clan or gens has the right to hold a council. The chiefs of the clans and gentes are the tribal chiefs, who form the tribal council; but on occasions of great emergencies a grand council is held, composed of the chiefs and subchiefs, the matrons and head warriors of the ohwachira, and the leading men of the tribe. Besides, there is the council of the confederation. So there are family councils, clan councils, gentile councils, tribal councils, and confederation councils, respectively exercising sway in separate and independent jurisdictions.

In some regions nature is so niggard of her bounties to man that savagery and barbarism had not devised means to enable their sons to dwell there in organized political communities; hence here may be found some of the lowest forms of social organization, if such it may be named. Kroeber says: "In general rudeness of culture the California Indians are scarcely above the Eskimo; and whereas the lack of development of the Eskimo on many sides of their nature is reasonably attributable in part to their difficult and limiting environment, the Indians of California inhabit a country naturally as favorable, it would seem, as might be. If the degree of civilization attained by people depends in any large measure on their habitat, as does not seem likely, it might be concluded from the case of the California Indians that natural advantages were an impediment rather than an incentive to progress" (Univ. Cal. Publ., Am. Archaeol. and Ethnol., II, no. 3, 81, 1904). This question of the effect of environment on the activities and development of peoples is one still requiring much scientific study.

Dixon (Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., XVII, pt. 3, 1905), in treating of the northern Maidu of California, describes a state of society largely similar to that of the Hupa as noted in general terms by Goddard. Among the Maidu he finds no trace of gentile or totemic grouping. Aside from the village communities there was no definite organization. Every village or group of small villages had a headman or chief (the office being in no case hereditary), who was chosen largely through the aid of the shaman, who was thought to reveal to the electors the choice of the spirits. Mature years and wealth, ability, and generosity were strong recommendations in making a selection. Tenure of office lasted only during good behavior. The functions of the chief were largely advisory, although force of character and ability might in some cases secure a larger measure of respect and obedience. There also appears to have been "a rather indeterminate council, composed of the older members of the Secret Society."

Goddard (Univ. Cal. Publ., Am. Archaeol. and Ethnol., I, no. 1, 1903) says there were no organization and no formalities in the government of the village or tribe among the Hupa. "Formal councils were unknown, although the chief might, and often did, take the advice of his men in a collected body." Each village had a headman, whose wealth gave him the power of a chief and maintained him in that power, and he was obeyed because from him food was obtained in times of scarcity. If trouble arose, he settled the dispute with money. While the people obeyed him, whatever he had was at their service. "His power descended to his son at his death, if his property also so descended. On the other hand, anyone who, by industry or extraordinary abilities, had acquired more property might obtain the dignity and power." The family and the village communities were the units of the social organization.

According to Powers (Overland Mo., VIII, 530, 1872), among the Karok of California the chief exercises no authority beyond his own village, wherein his functions are chiefly advisory. He can state the law or the custom and the facts, and he may give his opinion, but he can hardly pronounce and execute judgment.

Kroeber (op. cit., 83), in speaking of the Indians of California generally, says that the social structure was simple and loose, there being no trace of a gentile organization and that it is hardly correct to speak of tribes. Above the family the only units of organization were the village and the dialect; the common bond was similarity of language or frequency and cordiality of intercourse; in most cases the larger groups were nameless, while the village communities were usually named from localities; the lack of organization generally made the systematic classification of the divisions of any large body of Indians difficult; in population and social life the village approximated a localized clan, but, being the largest political unit, it corresponded in a measure to a tribe. In so simple a condition of society difference of rank naturally found but little scope. The influence of chiefs was small, and no distinct classes of nobles or slaves were known.

Mooney says that the Kiowa government was formerly lodged in a council of chiefs, composed of the presiding chief, the chiefs of the several bands, and the war chiefs. Women had no voice in the government. The Cheyenne have no head chief, but instead have a council composed of 40 chiefs and 4 ex-chiefs.

Some of the tribes, like the Five Civilized Tribes, the eastern Cherokee, and the Seneca of New York, have written constitutions patterned largely after European ideas. That of the Seneca is confirmed by the legislature of New York.

Governmental policy. The policy of the several governments toward the Indians and their methods of pursuing it were often at variance, and therefore should not be confused. The policy itself may have been just, equitable, and humane, while the method of carrying it into effect by those to whom this duty was intrusted was sometimes unjust, oppressive, and dishonest. The governments, other than those of the United States and the colonies, which have had control of parts of the territory N. of Mexico are Great Britain, France, Spain, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, and the Netherlands. Although the policy adopted by them in their dealings with the Indians differed in some important respects, all agreed in assuming the right of dominion, based on discovery, without regard to the natives. In all the contests between the European nations regarding their claims to territory in the New World the rights of the Indians nowhere were allowed to intervene. The earliest charters, as those to Raleigh and Gilbert, make no allusion to the natives, while most of those of the 17th century call briefly for their Christianization, and efforts to this end were made to some extent in most of the colonies. The questions of most importance in the relations of the whites with the Indians were those relating to the title to the soil. Although each government insisted on the right of dominion in its acquired territory and that of granting the soil, the rights of the original inhabitants were in but few instances entirely disregarded, though they were necessarily to a considerable extent curtailed (Johnson and Graham's lessee v. McIntosh, 8 Wheaton, 583 et seq.). The Indians were admitted to be the rightful occupants of the lands, with right of possession over so much as was necessary for their use; yet the policy of the various governments differed in the extent to which the exercise of this right was conceded. While Spain limited it to the lands actually occupied or in use (Recop. de Leyes de los Reynos de las Indias, i, lib. ii, 1774), the United States usually allowed it to the land claimed, whenever the boundaries between the different tribes were duly recognized.

It was the usual policy of the United States and other governments, as well as of the colonies, in dealing with the Indians to treat them as tribes. The Articles of Confederation gave to Congress the "sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians" not under State jurisdiction. By the Constitution, the power of Congress in this respect is briefly expressed as follows: "To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." The authority to act in this respect must therefore be found in this clause, in that relating to the making of treaties, and in the general powers granted to Congress and the Executive. The term "tribes" in the clause quoted would indicate that the framers of the Constitution contemplated dealing with the Indians as autonomous groups, through treaties; this was the method followed by the United States until it was changed by the act of Mar. 3, 1871, and was that of the colonies and the mother country. The effect of the act cited was to bring under the immediate control of Congress, as specified in art. i, section 8, clause 3, of the Constitution, all transactions with the Indians, and to reduce to simple agreements what before had been accomplished by solemn treaties. Laws were enacted in the various colonies, and also by the United States, forbidding and rendering void the sale of lands by Indians to individuals. By the act of Congress of Feb. 8, 1887, the later policy of the Government, that the Indian tribes should cease to exist as independent communities and be made part of the body politic, found legislative expression. This act permits tribal lands, including reservations, to be divided so as to give to each man, woman, and child of the tribe an individual holding and, after a limited probation, confers citizenship upon the allottees, and makes them subject to the laws of the states or territories within which they live. Previous, however, to this final step intervened the reservation policy. The plan of forming Indian reservations was adopted from the necessity of bringing tribes under the more complete control of the Government and of confining them to definite limits for the better preservation of order, and aimed especially to restrict them to less territory in order that the whites might obtain the use of the residue. This was a most important step in the process of leading the natives to abandon the hunter stage and to depend for their subsistence on agriculture and home industries (see Reservations). The same policy was followed in Canada under both French and English rule, and to some extent by the colonies, and it was inaugurated by the United States in 1786. An incident indicative of one phase of the policy of the colonies in their dealings with and management of the Indians is that Indian captives were held as slaves in some of the colonies, while, under various pretexts, during a period in the history of South Carolina Indians were forced to submit to the same fate. In 1702 the Virginia assembly decreed that no Indian could hold office, be a capable witness, or hunt over patented land; an Indian child was classed as a mulatto, and Indians, like slaves, were liable to be taken on execution for the payment of debt (Hening, Stat. Va., III, 224, 250-252, 298, 333, 447). In 1644 the county courts of Massachusetts were invested with jurisdiction over the Indians in their respective districts (Rec. Mass., II, 134). Through the efforts of John Eliot and Thomas Mayhew many Indians in Massachusetts were brought under religious influence and gathered into towns on lands set apart for them by the General Court in accordance with the act of 1633 (Thomas and Homans, Laws of Colonial and State Govts., 9, 1812). In 1655 the Indians were placed nominally under law and required to pay taxes.

Though the brief rule of the Dutch in New York was marked chiefly by an irregular and vacillating policy in their dealings with their Algonquian neighbors, they established a trading post at Albany in 1615 and entered into treaties with the Iroquois that were never broken. In 1664 New Netherlands passed under English control, and the ill-advised English policy relative to the Indians of the northern districts prevailed until 1765, when, through the efforts of Sir William Johnson, a more satisfactory and practical method of dealing with the Indians, especially as to their territorial rights, was adopted.

Preeminent among the difficulties in the way of carrying out a just, humane, and consistent policy has been and is still the antagonism, born of the ignorance of both races of each other's mode of thought, social ideals and structure, and customs, together with persistent contention about land, one race defending its birthright, the other race ignoring native claims and regarding the territory as vacant. As a result a dual condition has existed—on the one side, a theoretic Government plan, ideal and worthy; on the other, modifications of this plan in compliance with local ignorance and greed. The laws and regulations of the U. S. Government applying to the Indian tribes, with few exceptions, have been framed to conserve their rights. The wars, which have cost much blood and treasure, the enforced removals, the dishonest practices and degrading influences that stain the page of history have all come about in violation of these laws and of solemn compacts of the Government with native tribes. In spite of adverse circumstances the theoretic purpose of the Government policy has slowly made headway. On July 13, 1787, an ordinance was passed by the Continental Congress for the government of the territory of the United States n. w. of the Ohio r., in which article 3 provides: "The utmost good faith shall always be observed toward the Indians; their land and property shall never be taken from them without their consent; and in their property, rights, and liberty they shall never be invaded or disturbed, unless in just and lawful wars authorized by Congress; but laws founded in justice and humanity shall from time to time be made, for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preserving peace and friendship with them" (U. S. Stat., I, 52, 1854). This ordinance was confirmed by the act of Aug. 7, 1789 (ibid., 50). Acts organizing the following states and territories contain an article reaffirming the above ordinance: Alabama, Colorado, Dakota, Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

The Republic of Texas in its need made solemn treaties which were afterward repudiated; consequently no tribe within its limits could claim tribal lands. When Texas was admitted into the Union it retained its laws and the control of its public lands. The Indian tribes appealed to the U. S. Government for protection, and for their relief they were removed to reservations set apart for them in what was then a part of the Indian Ter., and there the remnant of them are now, holding their lands in severity, subject to the laws and regulations of Oklahoma.

In 1792 the Russians established a school at Kodiak, and in 1805 one at Sitka, the Government and the church cooperating in behalf of education for the mixed-bloods and natives. When the transfer of Alaska to the United States took place in 1867 the teachers were recalled to Russia and the schools were closed. Within a month the American residents voted to establish schools, but little was accomplished. After 10 years of persistent effort Dr John Eaton, Commissioner of Education, assisted by Dr Sheldon Jackson, secured the first Presidential appeal to Congress for civil government and schools for the "self-supporting natives of the territory." Four years later Congress passed the needed law in which the natives' "right of occupancy" was recognized, the sale of liquor prohibited, and education ordered to be provided for the children of school age "without reference to race." In the following year public schools were opened and some of the mission schools were turned over to the Government. The sufferings of the Eskimo consequent upon the decline of the whaling industry and the killing of the fur animals prompted the introduction of reindeer from Siberia in 1892. In the following year the Government made its first appropriation for the purchase of reindeer. Herds have been placed in charge of some of the schools, and Laplanders were imported to instruct the natives in the care and breeding of reindeer, which have very largely multiplied. Not only has a new vocation thus been opened to the natives, but a valuable means of support has been given to the rapidly increasing population of the territory (see Jackson, Rep. on Introd. of Reindeer, 1904).

On May 22, 1792, the following declaration was made in instructions given to Brig. Gen. Rufus Putnam, who was sent to negotiate with the lately hostile Indians near L. Erie: "That the United States are highly desirous of imparting to all the Indian tribes the blessings of civilization, as the only means of perpetuating them on the earth; that we are willing to be at the expense of teaching them to read and write, to plow and to sow in order to raise their own bread and meat with certainty, as the white people do" (Am. State Papers, I, 235). The first treaty providing for any form of education was made on Dec. 2, 1794, with the Oneida, Tuscarora, and Stockbridge Indians, who had faithfully adhered to the colonies during the Revolution. Two persons were to be employed to instruct them in the "arts of the miller and sawyer" (U. S. Stat., II, 48). The Committee on Indian Affairs reported to the House of Representatives on Jan. 22, 1818, in favor of increasing the number of trading posts and establishing schools on or near the frontier for the education of Indian children as measures that "would be attended with beneficial effects both to the United States and to the Indian tribes" (Am. State Papers, II, 151). In 1819 the first general appropriation ($10,000 a year) for Indian education was made. The maintenance of shops, supported, however, by tribal funds, was one of the means used for industrial training, and many tribes through treaty stipulations supported and still support the schools on their reservations. The money appropriated by the Government for Indian education from 1819 to 1873 was mainly expended with the cooperation of various missionary societies that had established missions. From 1873 to the present time the Government has maintained public schools for the Indians.

About 1875 the Indians began to modify the tribal form of government by depriving chiefs of power and transferring their authority to a representative council, limited in number. The movement met with opposition in some tribes, but was accepted in others as a means of countervailing undue conservatism and giving to the progressive element a voice in the management of tribal affairs. About the same time Congress passed a law prohibiting agents from distributing supplies and ammunition to able-bodied Indians, between 18 and 45 years of age, except after the performance of some service "for the benefit of themselves or the tribe, at a reasonable rate to be fixed by the agent in charge and to an amount equal in value to the supplies to be delivered." The Secretary of the Interior might "by written order except any particular tribe or portion of tribe from the operation of this provision when he deems it proper or expedient" (U. S. Stat., XVIII, 176, 448, 1875).

A court of Indian offenses was instituted in 1882 in order to familiarize the Indian with some of the methods which his white neighbors use in trying and punishing offenders. Though the practice of this court has been crude, it has yet assisted in preparing the Indian to conform to the general customs of the country. The judges are appointed by the Indian bureau to serve one year. No compensation is given. The agents all report faithful service on the part of the Indian judges.

The method of establishing reservations has not been uniform, some having been created by treaty, some by Executive order, and others by act of Congress; but those established by Executive order without an act of Congress were not held to be permanent before the general allotment act of 1887 was passed. The various Indian titles recognized by the Government are (1) the original right of occupancy, alienable to the Government only; (2) the title to reservations, which differs from the original title chiefly in the fact that it is derived from the United States. The tenure since the act of 1887 is the same as before, and the power to alienate or transfer is subject to the same limitation, the absolute title being in the Government. Another class of titles is (3) where reservations have been patented to Indian tribes, as those to the Cherokee, Choctaw, and Creek nations, or where grants made by Spain have been confirmed by treaty, as in the case of the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico. The right of the Indians on reservations to sell timber or to grant mining privileges has been restricted, though it is now being gradually extended.

The policy of the United States in dealing with the Indians has, as a rule, been humane and just. The chief exceptions are: First, that arid or semi-arid lands have been selected for some of the reservations, defeating the effort to change some tribes from the hunter to the agricultural stage and entailing misery and death; second, that the pressure brought to bear by white settlers to eject the Indians from their favorite sections, where they were promised permanent homes, has too often been successful. Grand Soleil (French: 'Great Sun'). The title of a noted Natchez chief, whose individual name is unknown, in the first half of the 18th century. He was a friend of the whites until the French commandant demanded the site of his village, White Apple, situated a few miles s. w. of the present Natchez, Miss., which the Natchez had occupied, as their chief replied, for more years than there were hairs in the governor's peruke. The haughty commandant, Chopart, would not allow them to have even their growing crops until it was agreed to compensate him for the concession. The chief then sent out bundles of sticks to the Natchez villages to indicate, ostensibly, their quota of the promised tribute, but really the number of days that were to elapse before making a concerted attack on the French. The docile and submissive Natchez were not suspected, even though a Natchez woman warned the French officers. On Nov. 30, 1729, the Indians massacred every white person in the settlement, 700 in number, and with his allies the Grand Soleil went on laying waste French plantations in Louisiana until the governor of the French colony assembled a force of French and Choctaw with which he recaptured the fort at Natchez. Then the chief ostensibly agreed to terms of peace that were offered, but in the night he and his people disappeared in different directions. One division he led 180 miles up Red r., where he built a fort and an expedition found him a year later. His warriors sallied out to attack the French, who drove them back into the fort and bombarded them there until the great chief and some others surrendered themselves. The chief was taken to New Orleans and probably executed with most of his warriors, while the women and children who did not die of an epidemic that befell them were transported to Haiti to labor as slaves on the French plantations. The title "Great Sun" was always borne by the head chief of the Natchez to distinguish him from other members of the class of nobles, all of whom were called "Suns."

Grand Traverse. A former settlement of the Chippewa near the site of Flint, Genesee co., Mich.; so named by French traders because at this point was the great ford of Flint r. on the Indian trail from the Saginaw to Detroit. The place became a popular hunting place and camping ground, game and fish being abundant in the neighborhood.

Granganameo. A son of Ensenore and brother of Wingina, chiefs of Wingandacoe (Secotan), N. C., and leading man of the tribe in 1585. He is noted chiefly for the friendly aid shown by him to Amidas and Barlow and to Grenville and the accompanying English sent out by Sir Walter Raleigh in the year named. His residence was on Roanoke id., Albemarle sd. As Wingina was confined to his house by a wound when Amidas and Barlow arrived, Granganameo, as acting sachem, received the adventurers kindly and, according to the account given by them, sent them "commonly every day" deer, rabbits, fish, and sometimes various fruits and vegetables. Unfortunately for the English colonists he died before a year expired. (C. T.)

Grangula (from French grande gueule, 'big mouth'). An Onondaga chief, whose right name was Haaskouan ('His mouth is large'), but who was also known as Otreouati. The governor of Canada equipped an army in 1684 to crush the Five Nations because they interfered with French trade. Sickness among the troops having prevented the expedition, Governor de la Barre crossed L. Ontario to offer peace, which he sought to make conditional on the restoration to French merchants of the trade that the Iroquois had diverted to the English. Grangula, representing the Five Nations, replied defiantly that the Iroquois would trade with English or French as they chose, and would continue to treat as enemies French traders who supplied the Miami, Illinois, Shawnee, and other tribes with arms and ammunition to fight them.

Granite. A term applied to igneous rocks consisting essentially of quartz and orthoclase feldspar, with mica, hornblende, and other accessories. The name, however, is often made to include a variety of siliceous rocks with similar structure, as the coarser gabbros and diabases, gneiss, syenite, etc. These rocks are generally massive in structure, and were much used by the Indian tribes for their heavier implements, such as sledges for quarry work, hammers for breaking up stone and roughing out implements, and for axes, celts, mortars, pestles, mullers, discoidal stones, and the larger varieties of so-called ceremonial objects. On account of the toughness of these rocks they were difficult to fracture or to flake, and were therefore shaped almost exclusively by the pecking and grinding processes. Very generally the natives selected water-worn fragments approximating the form of the implement to be made, so that the minimum of shaping work was necessary. (W. H. H.)

Grape Island. A former Missisauqua settlement, probably in N. Minnesota.—Jones, Hist. Ojeb. Inds., 138, 1861.

Gravetine Town. A former village, perhaps belonging to the Delawares, situated 8 m. up Captina cr., Belmont co., Ohio.—Washington (1770) in Rupp, West Pa., app., 397, 1846.

Graphic art. With the tribes N. of Mexico the arts that may be comprehended under the term graphic are practically identical with the pictorial arts; that is to say, such as represent persons and things in a manner so realistic that the semblance of the original is not entirely lost. Graphic delineations may be (1) simply pictorial; that is, made to gratify the pictorial or esthetic impulse or fancy; (2) trivial, intended to excite mirth, as in caricature and the grotesque; (3) simply decorative, serving to embellish the person or object to which they are applied; (4) simply ideographic, standing for ideas to be expressed, recorded, or conveyed; (5) denotive, including personal names and marks of ownership, distinction, direction, enumeration, etc.; and (6) symbolic, representing some religious, totemic, heraldic, or other occult concept. It is manifest, however, that in very many cases there must be uncertainty as to the motives prompting these graphic representations; and the significance attached to them, even where the tribes using them come directly under observation, is often difficult to determine.

The methods of expression in graphic art are extremely varied, but may be classified as follows: (1) Application of color by means of brushes and hard or soft points or edges, and by developing the form in pulverized pigments (see Dry painting, Painting); (2) engraving, which is accomplished by scratching and pecking with hard points (see Engraving); (3) indenting and stamping where the surfaces are plastic (see Pottery); (4) tattooing, the introduction of coloring matter into designs pricked or cut in the skin (see Tattooing); (5) textile methods, as in weaving, basketry, beadwork, featherwork, and embroidery (see Textile arts); and (6) inlaying, as in mosaic, where small bits of colored material are so set as to form the figures (see Mosaic). The figures are drawn in outline simply, or are filled in with color or other distinctive surfacing. The elaboration or embellishment of sculptured or modeled figures or images of men and beasts by adding details of anatomy, markings, etc., in color or by engraving, thus increasing the realism of the representation, comes also within the realm of the graphic as here defined. In recent times, as the result of contact with the whites, much progress has been made by some of the native tribes in the pictorial art; but the purely aboriginal work, although displaying much rude vigor, shows little advance toward the higher phases of the art. Aboriginally, there was little attempt at effective grouping of the subject save as required in decoration, and light and shade and perspective were entirely unknown. Portraiture and landscape belong apparently to much more advanced stages of culture than have been reached by any of the northern tribes. When the delineations are devoted to the presentation of non-symbolic ideas merely, as in pictography and denotive devices, there is a tendency in frequently recurring use to progressive simplification; the picture as such has no reason to be perpetuated, and this simplification in time reaches a stage where a part takes the place of the whole, or where semblance to the original is entirely lost, the figure becoming the formal sign of an idea. The graphic art of the northern tribes, however, shows no very significant progress in this kind of specialization, unless modern alphabets, like those of the Micmac, or certain inscriptions of somewhat problematical origin, as the Grave Creek Mound tablet (see Grave Creek Mound) and the Davenport tablet (Farquharson), are considered.

Graphic delineations are most extensively employed by the tribes in pictography (q. v.), examples of which, engraved or painted on rock surfaces, are found in nearly every section of the country. Similar work was executed by many of the tribes on dressed skins, on birch-bark, and on objects of wood, ivory, bone, horn, and shell. The delineation of life forms in decorative and symbolic art is hardly less universal than in simple pictography, and is especially exemplified in the work of the more advanced peoples, as the pottery of the mound builders and Pueblos, the utensils and the carvings of the tribes of the N. Pacific coast, and ceremonial costumes, and walls and floors of sacred chambers among various tribes. The graphic work of the Eskimo has a peculiar interest, since it seems to have been somewhat recently superposed upon an earlier system in which simple geometric figures predominated, and is much more prevalent where these people have been for a long time in contact with the whites, and more especially with the Athapascans and other Indian tribes skilled in graphic work (Hoffman). A special feature of the art of the Eskimo is the engraving of various kinds on objects of ivory and bone—works paralleled among the Indian tribes in the S. by such examples as the Thruston tablet (Thruston, Holmes), the Davenport tablet (Farquharson), and the battle and hunting scenes of the Plains tribes (Mallery, Mooney).

Skill in graphic work was highly regarded among many of the tribes, and the artist took particular pride in his work, and when especially successful became in a sense professional. Usually decorative designs were executed without pattern or copy, and with much directness. The most intricate patterns, applied to earthenware vessels and other objects, were not sketched out but were drawn at once, and often with remarkable skill. Among the N. W. coast tribes, however, patterns were often cut out of cedar bark and the conventional life forms worked in their handsome blankets and capes were drawn out full size on a pattern board. The native artist did not draw directly from nature, but kept in view rather the presentation of the idea, delineating it in the conventional form common to his tribe. He might have been able to produce a portrait, for example, but the desirability of portraiture does not seem to have occurred to him. He might have delineated a species of animal with accuracy, but was apparently content to suggest the particular subject of his thought in a striking and forcible though conventional manner. See Art, Basketry, Ornament, Painting, Pottery.

A dwelling having the shape of an old-fashioned beehive, often described by Spanish and French travelers of the 16th and 17th centuries, which was the typical habitation of the Caddoan tribes, except the Pawnee and Arikara. Its construction was begun by drawing a circle on the ground, and on the outline setting a number of crocheted posts, in which beams were laid. Against these, poles were set very closely in a row so as to lean inward; these in turn were laced with willow rods and their tops brought together and securely fastened so as to form a peak. Over this frame a heavy thatch of grass was laid and bound down by slender rods, and at each point where the rods joined an ornamental tuft of grass was tied. Two poles, laid at right angles, jutting out in four projecting points, were fastened to the apex of the roof, and over the center, where they crossed, rose a spire, 2 ft high or more, made of bunches of grass. Four doors, opening to each point of the compass, were formerly made, but now, except when the house is to be used for ceremonnial purposes, only two are provided, one on the e. to serve for the morning, and one on the w. to go in and out of when the sun is in that quarter. The fireplace was a circular excavation in the center of the floor, and the smoke found egress through a hole left high up in the roof toward the e. The four projecting beams at the peak pointed toward and were symbolic of the four points of the compass, where were the paths down which the powers descend to help man. The spire typified the abode in the zenith of the mysterious permeating force that animates all nature. The fireplace was accounted sacred; it was never treated lightly even in the daily life of the family. The couches of the occupants were placed against the wall. They consisted of a framework on which was fitted a woven covering of reeds. Upon this robes or rush mats were spread. The grass house is a comely structure. Skill is required to build it, and it has an attractive appearance both without and within. It is adapted to a warm climate only, and is still in use among the Wichita. Temporary dwellings of poles covered with grass were common among the Plains tribes, and similar houses for storage purposes were used by tribes on the coast of Oregon (Boas). Grasswork. The Indian found the widely diffused grasses of the United States of great value, almost a necessity, and adapted them in numerous ways to his needs. The obvious needs supplied by loose grass were for house building (see Grass house), bedding, for lining caches, etc.; it was also worked into baskets (southern Indians, Hopi, Pima, Tlingit, Aleut, Eskimo), mats, leggings (Ntlakyapamuk), socks, towels (Eskimo), and other articles. The polished yellow or white stems were used by various tribes to ornament basketry, and by the Hupa of California as fringes of garments. Stiff stems were gathered into bundles and used as hair and floor brushes by the Pueblos and cliff-dwellers. Slender, flat grass stems, sometimes dyed, were applied to dressed skins by some tribes with sinew thread for ornamental purposes, just as were porcupine quills (Grinnell).

Grass was generally found useful as tinder; some species furnished excellent fiber for cord, and some were employed as perfumery. The Cheyenne burned grass and mixed the ashes with blood and tallow to produce paint. So far as is known the Indian invented no implements for cutting grass; basketry fans, gathering baskets, etc., were used in harvesting seeds for food. In ceremony grass had an important place. It was a component of various prayer-sticks and wands of the Hopi, and the sacred buffalo skull of some of the Plains tribes was thought to be made to live by stuffing balls of grass into the eye sockets and nose. Sweet grass was also burned to produce consecrating smoke and for lighting the pipe in sacred rites of the Plains Indians. The sod used in the Hako altar of the Pawnee, described by Miss Fletcher (22d Rep. B. A. E., 1903) was in Indian thought a symbol of life and growth. (W. H.)

Grave Creek mound. A noted prehistoric Indian mound, situated near Moundsville, Marshall co., W. Va., at the point where Grave cr. unites with Ohio r. It was visited as early as 1734, as appears from this date cut on a tree growing from its summit, but was first described by

GRAVE CREEK MOUND AND SECTION. (SQUIER AND DAVIS)

Hart in 1797 (Imlay, Topog. Desc. W. Ter. N. Am., 296-304), since which time it has been repeatedly described and figured, attention of scholars having been called to it chiefly by an inscription on a small stone which was reputed to have been found in the mound during its excavation. The mound is conical in form, being probably the largest example of this type in the United States, having a diameter at the base of about 320 ft, a height of 70 ft, and 1,870,000 cu. ft of solid contents. It is symmetrical in form and has a dish-shaped depression in the top. It was excavated in 1838 by the proprietor, who first carried a horizontal drift at the base to the center and a shaft from the top to connect with the drift. Two burial vaults were discovered, one at the base and another 30 ft above, each constructed of logs and covered with stones, which had sunk as the wood decayed, leaving the depression in the summit. Squier and Davis (Anc. Mon., 169, 1848) assert that under the center of the mound there was a slight natural elevation into which the lower vault had been sunk. This vault contained two human skeletons, the upper vault but one. Accompanying the skeletons were 3,000 to 4,000 shell beads, ornaments of mica, several copper bracelets, and various articles of stone, including the inscribed stone mentioned, the inscription on which has received various interpretations. An illustration of this inscription was first published in the Cincinnati Chronicle, Feb. 2, 1839; another in the American Pioneer, II, no. 5, 1843. Rafn, whose tendency was to give a foreign interpretation to Indian inscriptions, inclined to the opinion that the inscribed characters were Anglo-Saxon runes, while Schoolcraft concluded that they belonged to some 8 or 9 different alphabets, as old Greek, Etruscan, etc. A committee of the Ohio Archaeological and Historical Society in 1877 reached the following conclusions: "1. The inscription is not necessarily to be regarded as alphabetical. 2. If it is assumed to be alphabetical, it can not be referred to any known language. 3. It is precisely of such a character as would be the result of an ordinary attempt to manufacture an inscription. 4. Its manufacture is within the capacity of any laborer of ordinary intelligence who may have been employed in the work of exploring the mound. 5. At the time of its discovery there was no proper scrutiny of the inscription to determine whether it was of recent manufacture or not. 6. The evidence that it came from the mound is by no means conclusive. 7. Its history is such that the subsequent discovery of unquestioned ancient inscriptions with similar characters would warrant us in concluding that this also is ancient. 8. Until its authenticity is thus fully established, it ought not to be regarded as any evidence of the character, ethnical relationship, or intellectual culture of the builders of the mounds." Whittlesey, in 1872, expressed the belief that the inscription was a forgery.

Gray Village. A former Natchez village.

Grays.—Dumont in French, Hist. Coll. La., v, 49, 1868. Gray Village.—Ibid., 48.

Greasy Faces. A band of the Arapaho, q. v.

Great Island Village. A former settlement, probably of the Delawares, on the Susquehanna opposite the present Lock Haven, Clinton co., Pa.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Pa. map, 1899.

Great Mortar (Yayatustennuggee). A Creek chief; an ally of the French in the Seven Years' war. When the English superintendent of Indian affairs called a council of the Creeks with the object of winning them over, he refused the pipe of peace to Great Mortar because the chief had favored the French, and the latter withdrew with his followers, confirmed in his hostility to the British. He received a commission from the French, and after killing or driving out the English traders and settlers took up a position on the border, where he could raid the Georgia settlements, obtaining his arms and supplies from the French fort on Alabama r. Many Creeks and Cherokee joined him there until the Chickasaw surprised the camp and put his warriors to flight. He settled at another place whence he could resume his depredations and continued to ravage the scattered settlements, including Augusta, Ga. In 1761 Col. James Grant, at the head of 2,600 Americans and friendly Indians, brought all the hostiles to terms, and a peace was made which fixed the watershed of the Allegheny mts. as the boundary between the British colonies and the lands of the natives.—Drake, Aborig. Races, 384, 1880.

Greentown. A former Delaware village on the Black fork of Mohican r., near the boundary of Richland and Ashland cos., Ohio. See Treaty of Maumee Rapids (1819) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 204, 1873; Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Ohio map, 1899.

Greeting. See Salutation.

Grenadier Squaw's Town. A Shawnee village situated in 1774 on Scioppo cr., Pickaway co., Ohio. The name was derived from Grenadier Squaw, a sister of Cornstalk, the Shawnee chief, who made this her home. (J. M.)

Gray Eagle Band. One of the Dakota bands below L. Traverse, Minn. (Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 102, 1860), evidently taking its name from the chief; not identified.

Grigras. A French nickname and the only known name of a small tribe already incorporated with the Natchez confederacy in 1720; it was applied because of the frequent occurrence of grigra in their language. There is uncertainty in regard to the language and ethnic relations, but unless affiliated with the Tonica, the tribe was evidently distinct from every other, since, as indicated, by the sound grigra, their language possessed an r.

Grigas.—Richebourg (1718) in French, Hist. Coll. La., III, 248, 1851. Grigas.—Le Page du Pratz, Hist. La., II, 222, 1758.

Grinaiches. Mentioned by Baudry de Lozières (Voy. Louisiane, 242, 1802) in a list of tribes with no indication of habitat. Probably a misprint of some well-known tribal name.

Grinding stones. See Abrading implements.

Gros (Les). A Wea village on the Wabash in 1718 (Memoir of 1718 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 891, 1855); perhaps in Tippecanoe co., Ind.

Grosse Tête (Fr.: 'big head'). A former Chitimacha village in Louisiana.

Grosse Tête namu.—Gatschet in Trans. Anthropol. Soc. Wash., II, 152, 1883 (namu = 'village').

Gros Ventres (French, 'big bellies') A term applied by the French, and after them by others, to two entirely distinct tribes: (1) the Atsina (q. v.), or Hitunena, a detached band of the Arapaho, and (2) the Hidatsa (q. v.), or Minitari. In the Lewis and Clark narrative of 1806 the former are distinguished as Minitarées of Fort de Prairie and the latter as Minitarées of the Missouri, although there is no proper warrant for applying the name Minitari to the Atsina. The two tribes have also been distinguished as Groeventres of the Missouri (Hidatsa) and Gros-ventres of the Prairie (Atsina). The name as applied to the Atsina originates from the Indian sign by which they are designated in the sign language—a sweeping pass with both hands in front of the abdomen, intended to convey the idea of 'always hungry,' i. e., 'beggars.' A clew to its application to the Hidatsa is given in the statement of Matthews (Hidatsa, 43, 1877) that the Hidatsa formerly tattooed parallel stripes across the chest, and were thus sometimes distinguished in picture writings. The gesture sign to indicate this style of tattooing would be sufficiently similar to that used to designate the Atsina to lead the careless observer to interpret both as "Gros Ventres." The ordinary sign now used by the southern Plains tribes to indicate the Hidatsa is interpreted to mean 'spreading tipis' or 'row of lodges.'

Big-bellies.—Gass, Journal, 76, 1807. (J. M.) Big-bellies.—Mackenzie, Voy., lxi, 1801. Bigbellies.—Lewis and Clark, Exped., I, 132, 1814. Big Pauah.—Lewis and Clark, Travels, 15, 1807 (misprint). Big Pauah.—Lewis and Clark, Discov., 18, 1806. Gos ventres.—De Smet, Letters, 62, 1843. Great Belly Indians.—Writer of 1786 in Mass. Groton. A former Mohegan village about the present Groton, New London, Conn. In 1825 the population was reduced to 50 souls. (J. M.)

Gua. A Chumashan village w. of Pueblo de las Canoas (San Buenaventura), Ventura co., Cal., in 1542. In the Muñoz manuscript of Cabrillo's narration (Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857) this name is united, probably correctly, with the prefix Quannu, forming Quannugua.

Guacata. An inland Calusa village on L. "Mayaimi," or Okechobee, s. Fla., about 1570. Elsewhere in his memoir Fontaneda refers to it as a distinct but subordinate tribe.

Guacata.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 19, 1854. Guasaca.—Fontaneda in French, Hist. Coll. La., 2d s., II, 245, 1875.

Guacaya. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages on or in the general vicinity of the South Carolina coast, visited by Ayllon in 1520.

Guachochic ('place of the blue herons'). A rancharia of "civilized" Tarahumare on the headwaters of Rio Fuerte, about lat. 26° 50', long. 106° 55', in a Chihuahua, Mexico; entire population 1,147 in 1900. The inhabitants gain a livelihood mainly as servants of the Mexicans.—Lumholtz (1) in Scribner's Mag., xvi, 32, 39, 1894; (2) Unknown Mexico, I, 194, 205, 1902.

Guachoya. A palisaded village, probably of the Quapaw, containing 300 houses in the 16th century, on the w. bank of the Mississippi, apparently a short distance below the mouth of the Arkansas. It was here De Soto died, May 21, 1542.

Guachois.—Shipp, De Soto and Florida, 432, 1881. Guachoya.—Gentil, of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 186, 1850. Guachoyanque.—Biedma (1544) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 107, 1850.

Guadalupe. Mentioned as a Navaho settlement in 1799 (Cortez in Pac. R. R. Rep., III, pt. 3, 119, 1856), but more likely the Spanish name of a locality, as the Navaho are not villagers.

Guadelupe.—Domenech, Deserts of N. A., II, 7, 1860.

Guadalupe. A Papago village about 10 leagues s. of Areitorae, in Sonora, Mexico. Guadalupe.—Box, Adventurers, 264, 1869. Guadalupe-Pa-Pagos.—Ibid. (i. e., "Papago").

Guadalupe y Ocotan.—A Huichol pueblo near Rio Chapalagana, Jalisco, Mexico. See Lumholtz (1) Huichol Indians, 5, 1898; (2) Unknown Mexico, II, 16, map, 1902.

Guaes. A people of whom Coronado learned in 1542. They evidently lived e. of Quivira, the Wichita country of e. central Kansas, of whose people they were enemies. The name bears a resemblance to Kaws, but as this is the French traders' contraction of Kansas, first applied not earlier than the first quarter of the 19th century, the two peoples were probably not the same, Guas or Guaes being apparently a Wichita or Pawnee name, or a corruption thereof. (F. W. H.) Guaas.—Castañeda (ca. 1560) in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 508, 1896. Guaa.—Ibid., 529. Guyaa.—Castañeda in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., ix, 194, 1838 (misprint).

Guagejohe.—Given as one of the Comanche divisions, living about 1857 on the plains N. of Texas. Possibly a misprint Spanish form of Kuahari, q. v. Gaa-gé-hé.—Butcher and Lyendecher, MS. Comanche vocab., B. A. E., 1867.

Guaguala. An unidentified people described early in the 17th century, by the Acoma and Jemez Indians of New Mexico, as resembling the Mexicans in language and dress, and as living in straw-covered houses in a mild country somewhere to the westward of the Navaho, toward the Pacific. The name suggests the pueblo of Awatobi, q. v.

Guaguala.—Zarate-Salmeron (ca. 1629), Rel., in Land of Sunshine, 183, Feb., 1900. Guaputu.—Ibid.

Guahate. A fertile province, probably in the present S. W. Arkansas, heard of by De Soto in 1541 at Quipana as being 8 days S. of that place.—Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., II, 182, 1850.

Gualope. A subdivision of the Varohio in W. Chihuahua, Mexico. They lived with the Chinipa in the pueblo of San Andres Chinipas.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 325, 1864.

Guainonost. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863.

Gualisac. A former Chumashan village near Santa Inez mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Guajochic ('place of the guajo,' a small variety of mosquito). A small rancheria of the Tarahumare, not far from Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mexico, I, 218, 1902.

Gualala. A name applied by Powers to the Pomo living along Gualala r., in Sonoma co., Cal. The people living along this stream belong to two dialectic groups, one occupying the territory chiefly along the lower course of Russian r., the other that along the immediate coastline W. of Gualala r.; but as Powers' statements are not explicit, it is not possible to say whether the people speaking one or the other of these dialects is meant. The name itself comes undoubtedly from uadali, a name applied to the point at which the waters of any two streams flow together, or at which any stream flows into the ocean. (S. A. B.)

Gua-la-la.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 186, 1877. Walhalla.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 362, 1874.

Guale. The Indian name by which the Spaniards knew the present Amelia id.,

N. coast of Florida, and a part of the adjacent Florida and Georgia coast, in the 16th century. There is strong probability that the tribe in occupancy was that known later as Yamasi. In 1597 the son of the chief of Guale led a revolt against the missions that had been established by the Spanish Franciscans a few years before. There were then on the island at least 3 mission villages—Asao, Asopo, and Osopo. The missions were reestablished in 1605 and may have continued until their destruction by the English and their Indian allies in 1704-06. (J. M.)

Gualape.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 16, 1854. Guale.—Ibid. Guale.—Fontaneda in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., xx, 16, 1841. Quate.—Fontaneda misquoted by Shipp, De Soto and Fla., 585, 1881.

Gualta. Given by the Yavapai to Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776 as the name of a tribe, possibly in the vicinity of the Rio Colorado.—Garcés, Diary (1775-76), 405, 1900.

Guamua. The Yavapai name of a tribe evidently on or in the vicinity of the Rio Colorado in Arizona or California, in the 18th century.—Garcés (1775-76), Diary, 404, 1900. Cf. Gueymura.

Guamoa.—Cortez (1799) in Pac. R. R. Rep., III, pt. 3, 126, 1856.

Guanabepe. The Yavapai name of a tribe, evidently Yuman, on the lower Colorado in Arizona or California, in the 18th century.

Guanabepe.—Garcés (1776), Diary, 404, 1900. Guanavepe.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 349, 1864 (after Garcés).

Guanacos (Span.: Los Guanacos.) A group of ruined pueblos 8 m. S. of Tempe, in the Salt River valley, Ariz. So named from a number of figurines, resembling the guanaco, found there.—Cushing in Compte-rendu Internat. Cong. Am., VII, 178, 1890.

Guancano. Mentioned by Garcilasso de la Vega (Florida, 201, 1723) as a province visited by De Soto's army in 1542. Situated probably in S. W. Arkansas, near Naguatex, q. v.

Guacano.—Shipp, De Soto and Florida, 430, 1881.

Guanipas. A former Coahuila tribe, belonging perhaps to the Coahuiltecan stock.—Revillagigedo (1793) quoted by Orozco y Berra, Geog., 306, 1864.

Guanlen. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Guarungunve ('town of weeping'). A Calusa village on one of the keys of the S. W. coast of Florida, about 1570. Brinton (Floridian Penin., 114, 1859) thinks the word is another name for Old Matacumbe (Metacumbe) key, described by Romans (1775) as one of the last refuges of the Calusa Indians. (J. M.)

Guaragunve.—Fontaneda quoted by Ternaux-Compans, Voy., xx, 10, 1841. Guargunve.—Fontaneda quoted by French, Hist. Coll. La., 2d s., II, 262, 1875 (misprint). Guarugumbe.—Fontaneda quoted by Ternaux-Compans, op. cit., 32. Guarugave.—Fontaneda Mem. (ca. 1576), Smith trans., 13, 1854. Guarungave.—Ibid., 19. Guarungave.—Fontaneda quoted by Ternaux-Compans, op. cit., 22. Metacumbe.—Present map form for the key. Old Metacumbe.—Romans, Fla., app., xxxiv, 1775 (the key; same?).

Guasamota. A Cora pueblo on the upper Rio Jesus Maria, on the e. slope of the Sierra de Nayarit, in the n. part of the territory of Tepic, Mexico (Lumholtz, Unknown Mexico, i, 487; ii, 16, map, 1902). Orozco y Berra records it as a Tepehuane settlement.

Guasamota.—Lumholtz, op. cit. Guasamota.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 281, 1864. Santa Maria Guasamota.—Ibid., 318-319.

Guasas. A tribe mentioned in Spanish narratives and reports on Texas in the latter part of the 18th century as enemies of the "northern Indians," particularly of the Comanche. According to one narrative they were the only people able to defeat the latter. They are described as having lived in permanent villages defended by adobe towers; they called their warriors together by means of drums in time of danger. They were reputed to be of great stature and of remarkable skill in horsemanship. Although many of the things told about them are entirely fabulous, a real tribe appears to be referred to, probably one of those which erected earth lodges. This may have been the Osage (Wasash) or, since an annotator of a letter written by Ripperdá in 1772 enumerates "Guasers" and Osage separately, possibly they were the Kansa or the Pawnee. (J. R. S.)

Guasas.—Prieto, Hist. de Tamaulipas, 137, 1873. Guasas.—Annotator of a letter of Ripperdá, 1772, MS. cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906. Guasas.—Report of council at San Antonio in 1778, MS. cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906.

Guasco. A province, possibly Caddoan, visited in 1542 by Moscoso, of De Soto's army, who there found much maize; situated probably in s. w. Arkansas or n. w. Louisiana. See Gentl. of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., ii, 199, 1850.

Guasigochic ('a flat'). A small rancheria of the Tarahumare, n. e. of Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Guasalaque. A former Chumashan village near Purisima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Guatitriti. Mentioned by Ofiate in 1598 (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871) as a pueblo of the Jemez in New Mexico. It has not been identified with the present native name of any ruins in the vicinity of Jemez. In Ofiate's second list of Jemez villages (ibid., 102) Fiapuzi and Triyti are given. Comparison shows the first name to be a misprint of the name of the preceding pueblo mentioned ('Trea'), improperly compounded with a misprint ('puzi') of 'Guati,' the first part of the name Guatitriti; the other pueblo mentioned in the second list ('Triyti') being a corruption of the latter portion ('truti') of the name Guatitriti. (F. W. H.)

Friyti.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 136, 1889 (misprint). Guatitriti.—Columbus Memorial Vol., 155, 1893 (misprint). Triyti.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 207, 1892 (misquoting Ofiate). Triyti.—Ofiate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 102, 1892.

Guasanoek. A Kwakiutl tribe living on Drury inlet, Brit. Col. The gentes are Gyigyilkam, Kwakowenok, and Kwikoanok. Summer villages are Hohopa and Kunstamish. Pop. 46 in 1885.

Guasanoek.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 55, 1890. Guasanoek.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus., 331, 1895. Kwasanoek.—Boas in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., 228, 1887. Kwi-wa-ai-nuk.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. ii, 73, 1887. Kwi-wa-a-nuk.—Ibid. Qual-inoongh.—Brit. Col. map, 1872. Qual-ai-nu.—Kane, Wand. in N. Am., app., 1869. Guasanoek.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 130, 1887.

Guazule. A village, apparently of the Creeks, visited by De Soto in 1540. Coxé seems to locate it near the head of Mobile r.; Shipp places it on the Chattahoochee, and Thomas (12th Rep. B. A. E., 649, 1894) near Cartersville, in Bartow co., Ga. The Spaniards were entertained so well at this place that to the army its name became a synonym for good fortune. See Elowah mound.

Guazoula.—Shipp, De Soto and Florida, 368, 1881. Guazoula.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 620, 1900 (given as an early form). Guazoula.—Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, 57, 1894. Guasuli.—Mooney in 19th Rep., op. cit. Guasula.—Ibid. Guasuli.—Biedma (1544) in Hakluyt Soc. Pub., ix, 182, 1851. Guazula.—Coxé, Carolana, 23, 1741. Guazula.—Gentleman of Elvas (1557) in French, Hist. Coll. La., ii, 147, 1850.

Guaya. A former village of the Calusa confederacy near the s. end of Florida (Fontaneda, ca. 1575, in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., xx, 22, 23, 1841). The village is not given in B. Smith's translation of Fontaneda's narrative.

Guayabas. A Huichol rancheria and religious place, containing a temple; situated about 2½ m. s. w. of San Andres Coamiata, q. v.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., ii, 52, 1902.

Temolikhita.—Lumholtz, ibid. ('where trees and flowers are budding': native name).

Guaycones. An unidentified tribe visited by Cabeza de Vaca (Smith trans., 84, 1851) during his sojourn in Texas in 1528-34.

Guadicones.—Barcia, Historiadores, i, 1749.

Guaynamota. A former Cora pueblo and the seat of a mission, situated on the e. bank of Rio San Pedro, lat. 22° 30', Jalisco, Mexico.

S. Ignacio Guaynamota.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 280, 1864.

Guayogua. Mentioned by Ofiate in 1598 (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871) as a pueblo of the Jemez in New Mexico. It has not been identified with the present native name of any ruins in the vicinity of Jemez. In Ofiate's second list (ibid., 207) Yxcaguayo and Quiamera are mentioned. The names are obviously mis-printed, the latter part of the first name and a misprint of the first part of the other forming "Guayoquia."

Guayotri. Apparently a Tigua pueblo in New Mexico in 1598. Mentioned by Ofiate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871) in connection with Puaray. See Tigues.

Guayusta. A village of the Rumsen division of the Costanoan family, formerly at Pt Pinos, near Monterey, Cal., the inhabitants of which were connected with San Carlos mission.

Guayusta.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860. Pt Pinos.—Ibid.

Guazapar. A division of the Tarahumare occupying the village of Guazapares, w. Chihuahua, Mexico. It includes also the Temoris who inhabit the pueblos of Santa María Magdalena, Nuestra Señora del Valle Humbroso, and Cerocahui. The Guazapar dialect is said to resemble more closely the Tarahumare proper than the Varohio. (F. W. H.)

Guazapar.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., map, 1864. Guazapare.—Ibid., 58.

Guazapares. A village of the Guazapar division of the Tarahumare in the district of Arteaga, w. Chihuahua, Mexico; pop. 542 in 1900.

Guazayapo.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 324, 1864. Santa Teresa de Guazapares.—Ibid.

Guazarachic. A Tarahumare settlement in the Hidalgo district, Chihuahua, Mexico.

Guazarachic.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 322, 1864.

Guazarachic.—Ibid., 59 (given as Apache, but doubtless Piman).

Guasavas (probably from Opatá guasaca, 'where the (pitahaya) fruit ripens first.'—Rudo Ensayo).

A former Coguínachi Opatá pueblo, containing also some Apache, and the seat of a Spanish mission founded in 1645, on Rio Bavispe, about lat. 29° 40', Sonora, Mexico. Its inhabitants numbered 632 in 1678, and 191 in 1730. A new church was built in 1764. The place is now civilized, but 50 Yaqui were settled in and about the town in 1900. (F. W. H.)

Guasabab.—Ribas (1645) quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 56, 1890. Guasavas.—de Croix (1769) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., II, 25, 1856. Guasavas.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 343, 1864. Guasavas.—Hamilton, Mex. Handbook, 47, 1883. Guasava.—Doc. of 1730 quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 506, 1892. Guasava.—Mange (ca. 1700) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 233, 1894. Guasabab.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Guasave. A subdivision of the Vaco-regue, formerly occupying the pueblos of San Pedro Guasave and Tamazula, on Rio Sinaloa, about lat. 25° 45', N. W. Sinaloa, Mexico. The Vacoregue were also sometimes known as Guasave. A Jesuit mission was established among them in 1600, but the natives burned the church and fled. They were brought back, however, and the offenders hanged. Between 1646 and 1649 they again threatened trouble, but they later became Christianized and noted for their faith in the new religion. Orozco y Berra (Geog., 332, 1864) says: "In Guasave were united several factions, and although they were known as Guasaves they speak the Mexican tongue between themselves; this is the civilized language in all parts." (F. W. H.)

Gubo. A former rancheria, probably of the Papago, visited by Father Kino in 1694; situated 13 leagues E. of Sonoita, which was on the Rio Salado of Sonora, just below the Arizona boundary.

Gubo.—Kino (1694) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 252, 1856. Guvoverde.—Kino (1699) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 257, 1884.

Gypsum. A mineral (hydrous sulphide of calcium) embracing three principal varieties—gypsum, satin-spar, and selenite—and occurring in both crystallized and massive forms in connection with stratified rocks. The light-colored compact forms are known as alabaster, a name sometimes erroneously applied to certain forms of travertine and stalagmite. Having no considerable degree of hardness, gypsum was not used for implements by the aborigines, but the pleasing colors and translucent effects made the massive forms valuable for ornaments and carvings generally. Selenite, which has the foliate structure, is readily separated into thin sheets and until recent years was used for window lights instead of glass by some of the Pueblo tribes. The same people crush the gypsum and use it as whitewash on the walls of their houses, generally using a piece of sheep skin as a brush. The Plains Indians, according to Mooney, roast the blocks of gypsum and use the resulting powder to clean and whiten dressed skins and to whiten the gummed tips of feathers in decorative work. (W. H. H.)

Gyusiwa. Formerly one of the western group of Jemez pueblos, $\frac{1}{2}$ m. n. of Jemez hot springs, on a slope descending to the river from the e., in Sandoval co., New Mexico. Judging from the extent of the ruins of the village, it at one time contained probably 800 inhabitants. It was the seat of the Spanish mission of San Diego de Jemez, and had a chapel, erected probably previous to 1617, at which date it was the principal Jemez village. The pueblo was abandoned in 1622 on account of the persistent aggressiveness of the Navaho, who had succeeded in scattering the Jemez tribe; but in 1627 Fray Martin de Arvide gathered the scattered members and resettled them in Gyusiwa and Amushungkwā (Patoqua?) pueblos. The latter was deserted prior to 1680, but Gyusiwa was occupied when the pueblos revolted in that year. It was, however, finally abandoned shortly afterward. The walls of the ruined church, in some places 8 feet thick, are still standing. See Bandelier, cited below; Holmes in Am. Anthropol., VII, no. 2, 1905.

Habitations. The habitations of the Indians of northern America may be classed as community houses (using the term

ANCIENT CLIFF-DWELLING, MESA VERDE, COLORADO

"community" in the sense of comprising more than one family) and single, or family, dwellings. "The house architecture of the northern tribes is of little importance, in itself considered; but as an outcome of their social condition and for comparison with that of the southern village Indians, is highly important" (Morgan). The typical community houses, as those of the Iroquois tribes, were 50 to 100 ft long by 16 to 18 ft wide, with frame of poles and with sides and triangular roof covered with bark, usually of the elm; the interior was divided into compartments and a smoke hole was left in the roof. A Mahican house, similar in form, 14 by 60 ft, had the sides and roof made of rushes and chestnut bark, with an opening along the top of the roof from end to end. The Mandan circular community house was usually about 40 ft in diameter; it was supported by two series of posts and cross-beams, and the wide roof and sloping sides were covered with willow or brush matting and earth. The fireplace was in the center. Morgan thinks that the oblong, round-roof houses of the Virginia and North Carolina tribes, seen and described by Capt. John Smith and drawn by John White, were of the community order. That some of them housed a number of families is distinctly stated. Morgan includes also in the community class the circular, dome-shaped earth lodges of Sacramento valley and the L-form, tent-shaped, thatched lodges of the higher areas of California; but the leading examples of community houses are the large, sometimes massive, many-celled clusters of stone or adobe in New Mexico and Arizona known as pueblos (q. v.). These dwellings vary in form, some of those built in prehistoric times being semicircular, others oblong, around or inclosing a court or plaza. These buildings were constructed usually in terrace form, the lower having a one-story tier of apartments, the next two stories, and so on to the uppermost tier, which sometimes constituted a seventh story. The masonry consisted usually of small, flat stones laid in adobe mortar and chinked with spalls; but sometimes large balls of adobe were used as building stones, or a double row of wattling was erected and filled in with grout, solidly tamped. By the latter method, known as pisé construction, walls 5 to 7 ft thick were sometimes built (see Adobe, Casa Grande). The outer walls of the lowest story were pierced only by small openings, access to the interior being gained by means of ladders, which could be drawn up, if necessary, and of a hatchway in the roof. It is possible that some of the elaborate structures of Mexico were developed from such hive-like buildings as those of the typical pueblos, the cells increasing in size toward the S., as suggested by Bandelier. Chimneys appear to have been unknown in North America until after contact of the natives with Europeans, the hatchway in the roof serving the double purpose of entrance and flue.

DWELLINGS, PUEBLO OF HANO, ARIZONA

Other forms, some community and others not, are the following: Among the Eskimo, the karmak, or winter residence, for which a pit of the required diameter is dug 5 or 6 ft deep, with a frame of wood or whalebone constructed within 2 or 3 ft above the surface of the ground and covered with a dome-shaped roof of poles or whale ribs, turfed and earthed over.

Entrance is gained by an underground passageway. The temporary hunting lodge of the Labrador Eskimo was sometimes constructed entirely of the ribs and vertebrae of the whale. Another form of Eskimo dwelling is the hemispherical snow house, or igloo, built of blocks of snow laid in spiral courses. The Kaniagmiut build large permanent houses, called barabara by the Russians, which accommodate 3 or 4 families; these are constructed by digging a square pit 2 ft deep, the sides of which are lined with planks that are carried to the required height above the surface and roofed with boards, poles, or whale ribs, thickly covered with grass; in the roof is a smoke hole, and on the eastern side a door. The Tlingit, Haida, and some other tribes build substantial rectangular houses with sides and ends formed of planks and with the fronts elaborately carved and painted with symbolic figures. Directly in front of the house a totem pole is placed, and near by a memorial pole is erected.

SNOW HOUSE OF CENTRAL ESKIMO. a, FRONT VIEW; b, GROUND PLAN; c, SECTION. (BOAS)

These houses are sometimes 40 by 100 ft in the Nootka and Salish region, and are occupied by a number of families. Formerly some of the Haida houses are said to have been built on platforms supported by posts; some of these seen by such early navigators as Vancouver were 25 or 30 ft above ground, access being had by notched logs serving as ladders. Among the N. W. inland tribes, as the Nez Percés, the dwelling was a frame of poles covered with rush matting or with buffalo or elk skins. The houses of the California tribes, some of which are above noted, were rectangular or circular; of the latter, some were conical, others dome-shaped. There was historical and early historical times. Another kind of dwelling, in use in Arkansas before the discovery, was a rectangular structure with two rooms in front and one in the rear; the walls were of upright posts thickly plastered with clay on a sort of wattle.

also formerly in use in various parts of California, and to some extent on the interior plateaus, a semisubterranean earth-covered lodge known among the Maïduas as kum.

The most primitive abodes were those of the Paiute and the Cocopa, consisting simply of brush shelters for summer, and for winter of a framework of poles bent together at the top and covered with brush, bark, and earth. Somewhat similar structures are erected by the Pueblos as farm shelters, and more elaborate houses of the same general type are built by the Apache of Arizona. As indicated by archeological researches, the circular wigwam, with sides of bark or mats, built over a shallow excavation in the soil, and with earth thrown against the base, appears to have been the usual form of dwelling in the Ohio valley and the immediate valley of the Mississippi in pre-

With the exception of the Pueblo structures, buildings of stone or adobe were unknown until recent times.

The dwellings of some of the tribes of the plains, as the Sioux, Arapaho, Comanche, and Kiowa, were generally portable skin tents or tipis, but those of the Omaha, Osage, and some others were more substantial (see Earth lodge, Grass lodge). The dwellings of the Omaha, according to Miss Fletcher, "are built by setting carefully selected and prepared posts together in a circle, and binding them firmly with willows, then backing them with dried grass, and covering the entire structure with closely packed sods. The roof is made in the same manner, having an additional support of an inner circle of posts, with crotchets to hold the cross logs which act as beams to the dome-shaped roof. A circular opening in the center serves as a chimney and also to give light to the interior of the dwelling; a sort of sail is rigged and fastened outside of this opening to guide the smoke and prevent it from annoying the occupants of the lodge. The entrance passage-way, which usually faces eastward, is from 6 to 10 ft long and is built in the same manner as the lodge." An important type is the Wichita grass hut, circular, dome-shaped with conical top. The frame is built somewhat in panels formed by ribs and crossbars; these are covered with grass tied on shingle fashion. These grass lodges vary in diameter from 40 to 50 ft. The early Florida houses, according to Le Moyne's illustrations published by De Bry, were either circular with dome-like roof, or oblong with rounded roof like those of Secotan in North Carolina, as shown in John White's figures. The frame was of poles; the sides and roof were covered with bark, or the latter was sometimes thatched. The Chipewas usually constructed a conical or hemispherical framework of poles, covered with bark. Formerly caves and rock shelters were used in some sections as abodes, and in the Pueblo region houses were formerly constructed in natural recesses or shelters in the cliffs, whence the designation cliff-dwellings. Similar habitations are still in use to some extent by the Tarahumare of Chihuahua, Mexico. Cave houses with several rooms were also hewn in the sides of soft volcanic cliffs; so numerous are these in Verde valley, Arizona, and the Jemez plateau, New Mexico, that for miles the cliff face is honeycombed with them. As a rule the women were the builders of the houses where wood was the structural material, but the men assisted with the heavier work. In the Southern states it was a common custom to erect mounds as foundations for council houses, for the chief's dwelling, or for structures designed for other official uses.

The erection of houses, especially those of a permanent character, was usually attended with great ceremony, particularly when the time for dedication came. The construction of the Navaho hogan, for example, was done in accordance with fixed rules, as was the cutting and sewing of the tipi among the Plains tribes, while the new houses erected during the year were usually dedicated with ceremony and feasting. Although the better types of houses were symmetrical and well proportioned, their builders had not learned the use of the square or the plumb-line; the unit of measure was also apparently unknown, and even in the best types of ancient Pueblo masonry the joints of the stonework were not "broken."

The Indian names for some of their structures, as tipi, wigwam, wickiup, hogan, and iglu, have come into use to a greater or less extent by English-speaking people. See Adobe, Archeology, Architecture, Cliff-dwellings, Earth lodge, Fortification and Defense, Grass lodge, Hogan, Kiva, Mounds, Pueblos, Tipi.

Hachos (prob. Span.: a fagot or bundle of straw or grass covered with resin). Mentioned as a wild tribe of New Mexico in the 18th century.—Villa-Señor, Teatro Am., pt. 2, 412, 1748.

Hackensack (Ackinkas-hacky, 'the stream that unites with another in low level ground.'—Heckewelder). A former division of the Unami Delawares, occupying the territory designated by the Indians Ackinkashacky, embracing the valleys of Hackensack and Passaic rs. in n. New Jersey. Their principal village was Gamoenaps, usually known as Communipaw. They took a prominent part in the events of 1643-44, but subsequently appear as mediators through their chief Oritany (Oratamy, Oratam, etc.), who enjoyed, to a ripe old age, the confidence of his people and the surrounding chieftaincies, as well as that of the whites. The lands of the tribe embraced Jersey City, Hoboken, a part of Staten island, Weehawken, Newark, Passaic, etc. Their number was estimated at 1,000 in 1643, of which 300 were warriors, probably an exaggeration (Ruttenber). (J. M. C. T.)

Hadley Indians. A small body or band, possibly Nipmuc, which, at the time of King Philip's war in 1675, occupied a small fort about a mile above Hatfield, on the w. side of Connecticut r., in Hampshire co., Mass. They abandoned their village to join Philip's forces and thereafter ceased to be known under the name above given. (J. M.)

Hadsapoke's Band (from the name of its chief, "Horse-stopper"). A Paviotso band formerly at Gold canyon, Carson r., w. Nev., said to number 110 in 1859. Had-sa-poke's band.—Dodge in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 373, 1860.

Hadutitashi ('touches no green corn husks'). A former subgens of the Hanga gens of the Omaha.

Ha-yu-it'ajl.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 227, 1897.

Haena. A former Haida town on the e. end of Maude id., Skidegate inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It is said to have been occupied in very early times by the Djahui-skwahladagai, and in recent years it was reoccupied by the west coast Haida, who desired to be nearer the traders, but after a comparatively short occupancy the people moved to Skidegate about 1880. There are said to have been 13 houses, which would indicate a population of about 150. (J. R. S.)

Khina Haada.—Harrison in Proc. and Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 125, 1895 (Khina = Haena). New Gold Harbour Village.—Dawson, Queen Charlotte Ids., 168B, 1880. Xa'ina.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1906.

Haeser. A former tribe near the lower Rio Grande, living with the Gueiquezales, Manos Prietas, Bocores, Pinanaca, Escaba, Cacastes, Cocobipta, Cocomaque, Codame, Contotores, Colorados, Babiamares, and Taimamares. Probably Coahuiltecan.

Siaeser.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 340, 1903. Xaeser.—ibid., 344.

Hagi (Xā'gi, said to mean 'striped'). A Haida town on or near the largest of the Bolkus ids., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It derived its name from a reef which, in local mythology, was the first land to appear above the waters of the flood, bearing the ancestress of all the Raven people upon it. The town was occupied by a Ninistints division of the same name.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Hagi-lanas (Xāgi-lā'nas, 'people of striped (?) town'). A subdivision of the Haida, belonging to the Raven clan and occupying the town of Hagi, on Hagi id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. From the circumstance attending their supposed origin (see Hagi) the family claimed to be the oldest on the islands, but it is now represented by only two or three individuals. There were two subdivisions, the Huldangats and the Keda-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 268, 1905.

Haglli. A Yuman tribe or division which in 1604-05 occupied 5 rancherias on the lower Rio Colorado, between the Cohuanas (Yuma) and the Halligumayas, of which latter (identifiable with the Quigyuma) they apparently formed a part.

Haeli.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 110, 1890. Haglli.—Zarate-Salmeron (ca. 1629), Rel., in Land of Sunshine, 106, Jan. 1900. Tlaglli.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 156, 1889.

Hagochenda. A former Iroquois town, probably belonging to the people of Tequenondahi, and situated in 1535 not far from the junction of Jacques Cartier r. with the St Lawrence. The chief of this town gave a small girl to Cartier on his second voyage, and placed Cartier on his guard against the machinations of the chiefs of the peoples dwelling around Stadacona and elsewhere on the St Lawrence. For this reason Cartier, in his third voyage, in 1540, gave this chief 2 small boys to learn the language, and also a "cloak of Paris red, which cloak was set with yealow and white buttons of Tinne, and small belles." See Cartier, Bref Récit, 67, 1863. (J. N. B. H.)

Hagwilget (Tsimshian: 'well dressed'). The chief village of the Hwotsotenne, on Bulkley r., 3 m. s. e. of Hazelton, Brit. Col.; pop. 500 in 1870, 161 in 1904.

Achwilget.—Horetzky, Canada on Pac., 103, 1874. Ahwilgate.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 1879-80, 208, 1881. Hagwilget.—Scott in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1869, 563, 1870. Hagwilget.—Can. Ind. Hahamatsee ('old mats'). A subdivision or sept of the Lekwiltok, a Kwakiutl tribe. They received their name because they were slaves of the Wiwekæ sept. Recently they have taken the name of Walitsum, 'the great ones.' Pop. 53 in 1901, 43 in 1904.

Chahamatsee.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887. H'ah'amatsee.—Boas in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., 230, 1887. Kahk-ah-mah-tsis.—Can. Ind. Aff., 119, 1880. Kakamatia.—Brit. Col. map, 1872. Qā' qamātsee.—Boas, 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 55, 1890. Wā'-lit-sum.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., v, sec. II, 65, 1887. Wau-lit-sah-moak.—Sprout in Can. Ind. Aff., 149, 1879. Waw-lit-sum.—Can. Ind. Aff., 189, 1884. Xā'zamataza.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus., 331, 1895.

Hahamogna. A former Gabrieleno rancheria in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a locality later called Rancho Verdugos.—Ried (1852) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Hahas. A former Chumashan village at the principal port of Santa Cruz id., Cal., probably at Prisoners' harbor.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Hahatonwanna ('small village at the falls'). A former Sioux village or division at the Falls of St Anthony, Minn.; mentioned doubtfully by Dorsey (1880). Given by Lewis and Clark in 1804 as a subdivision of the Yankton of the north, of which Mahpeondotak was chief. The name may refer to an incorporated Chipewewa band.

Hahatouadeba.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776. Hah-har-tones.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, vi, 99, 1906. Har-har-tones.—Lewis and Clark, Discov., 34, 1806. Horheton.—De l'Isle (1701), map in Neill, Hist. Minn., 164, 1858. Horheton.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776. Horheton.—La Tour, Am. Sept., map, 1779 (misprint).

Hahokolati (Hā'héqoln, descendants of Hakolati'). A subdivision of the Lalauitlela, a gens of the Tlatlasikoala (q. v.), a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus., 332, 1895.

Hahumias. A Kwakiutl tribe living on Wakeman sd., Brit. Col.; pop. 63 in 1901, the last time they were officially reported. They are divided into three gentes: Gyeksem, Gyigyilkam, and Haalilikyause.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus., 331, 1895.

Ah-knaw-ah-mish.—Can. Ind. Aff., 189, 1884. Ah-knaw-ah-mish.—Ibid., 314, 1892. Ah-wah-mish.—Ibid., 364, 1897. A-kwā'-amish.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1887, sec. Haida (Xa'ida, 'people'). The native and popular name for the Indians of the Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., and the s. end of Prince of Wales id., Alaska, comprising the Skittagetan family (q. v.). By the natives themselves the term may be applied generally to any human being or specifically to one speaking the Haida language. Some authors have improperly restricted the application of the term to the Queen Charlotte islanders, calling the Alaskan Haida, Kaigani (q. v.). Several English variants of this word owe their origin to the fact that a suffix usually accompanies it in the native language, making it Hā'de in one dialect and Haidaga'i in the other.

On the ground of physical characteristics the Haida, Tlingit, and Tsimshian peoples should be grouped together. Language and social organization indicate still closer affinities between the Haida and Tlingit.

According to their own traditions the oldest Haida towns stood on the e. shore, at Naikun and on the broken coast of

HAIDA MAN. (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

Moresby id. Later a portion of the people moved to the w. coast, and between 150 and 200 years ago a still larger section, the Kaigani, drove the Tlingit from part of Prince of Wales id. and settled there. Although it is not impossible that the Queen Charlotte ids. were visited by Spaniards during the 17th century, the first certain account of their discovery is that by Ensign Juan Perez, in the corvette Santiago, in 1774. He named the n. point of the islands Cabo de Santa Margarita. Bodega and Maurelle visited them the year after. In 1786 La Perouse coasted the shores of the islands, and the following year Capt. Dixon spent more than a month around them, and the islands are named from his vessel, the Queen Charlotte. After that time scores of vessels from England and New England resorted to the coast, principally to trade for furs, in which business the earlier voyagers reaped golden harvests. The most important expeditions, as those of which there is some record, were by Capt. Douglas, Capt. Jos. Ingraham of Boston, Capt. Etienne Marchand in the French ship Solide, and Capt. Geo. Vancouver (Dawson, Queen Charlotte Ids., 1880).

The advent of whites was, as usual, disastrous to the natives. They were soon stripped of their valuable furs, and, through smallpox and general immorality, they have been reduced in the last 60 years to one-tenth of their former strength. A station of the Hudson's Bay Company was long established at Masset, but is now no longer remunerative. At Skidegate there are works for the extraction of dog-fish oil, which furnish employment to the people during much of the year; but in summer all the Indians from this place and Masset go to the mainland to work in salmon canneries. The Masset people also make many canoes of immense cedars to sell to other coast tribes. The Kaigani still occupy 3 towns, but the population of 2 of them, Kasaan and Klinkwan, is inconsiderable. Neighboring salmon canneries give them work all summer.

Mission stations are maintained by the Methodists at Skidegate, by the Church of England at Masset, and by the Presbyterians at Howkan, Alaska. Nearly all of the people are nominally Christians.

The Haida, Tlingit, and Tsimshian seem to show greater adaptability to civilization and to display less religious conservatism than many of the tribes farther s. They are generally regarded as superior to them by the white settlers, and they certainly showed themselves such in war and in the arts. Of all peoples of the N. W. coast the Haida were the best carvers, painters, and canoe and house builders, and they still earn considerable money by selling carved objects of wood and slate to traders and tourists. Standing in the tribe depended more on the possession of property than on ability in war, so that considerable interchange of goods took place and the people became sharp traders. The morals of the people were, however, very loose.

Canoes were to the people of this coast what the horse became to the Plains Indians. They were hollowed out of single logs of cedar, and were sometimes very large. Houses were built of huge cedar beams and planks which were worked out with adzes and wedges made anciently of stone, and put together at great feasts called by the whites by the jargon word "potlatch" (q. v.). Each house ordinarily had a single carved pole in the middle of the gable end presented to the beach (see Architecture). Often the end posts in front were also carved and the whole house front painted. The dead were placed in mortuary houses, in boxes on carved poles, or sometimes in caves. Shamans were placed after death in small houses built on prominent points along shore. Among the beliefs of the Haida reincarnation held a prominent place.

An estimate of the Haida population made, according to Dawson, by John Work, between 1836 and 1841, gives a total of 8,328, embracing 1,735 Kaigani and 6,593 Queen Charlotte islanders. Dawson estimated the number of people on the Queen Charlotte ids. in 1880 as between 1,700 and 2,000. An estimate made for the Canadian Department of Indian Affairs in 1888 (Ann. Rep., 317) gives 2,500, but the figures were evidently exaggerated, for when a census of Masset, Skidegate, and Gold Harbor was taken the year after (Ann. Rep., 272) it gave only 637. This, however, left out of consideration the people of New Kloo. In 1894 (Ann. Rep., 280), when these were first added to the list, the entire Haida population was found to be 639. The figures for the year following were 593, but from that time showed an increase and stood at 734 in 1902. In 1904, however, they had suffered a sharp decline to 587. Petroff in 1880-81 reported 788 Kaigani, but this figure may be somewhat too high, since Dall about the same time estimated their number at 300. According to the census of 1890 there were 391, and they are now (1905) estimated at 300. The entire Haida population would thus seem to be about 900.

The Alaskan Haida are called Kaigani. By the Queen Charlotte islanders they are designated Kets-hade (Q'ets rä'dē), which probably means 'people of the strait.' The people of Masset inlet and the s. end of Queen Charlotte ids. generally are called by their southern kinsmen Gao-haidagai (Gao rä'-ida-ga-i), 'inlet people,' and those living around the southern point of the group are called Gunghet-haidagai (Gä' äret-rä'-idaga-i), from the name of one of the most southerly capes in their territory. All of these latter finally settled in the town afterward known to whites as Ninistints, and hence came to be called Ninistints people.

The entire stock is divided into two "sides" or clans—Raven (Hoya) and Eagle (Got)—each of which is subdivided and resubdivided into numerous smaller local groups, as given below. (The braces indicate that the families grouped thereunder were related. Theoretically each clan was descended from one woman.)

The principal towns known to have been occupied by large bodies of people in comparatively recent times, although not always contemporaneously, are the following, the Kaigani towns being marked with an asterisk: Chaahl (on Moresbyid.), Cumshewa, Dadens, Gahlinskun, Haena, Hlielung, Howkan, *Kaisun, Kasaan, *Kayung, Kiusta, Klinkwan, *Kloo, Kung, Kweundlas, *Masset, Naikun, Ninstints, Skedans, Skidegate, Sukkwan, *Tigun, Yaku, and Yan. Of these only Howkan, Kasaan, Kayung, Klinkwan, Masset, and Skidegate are now inhabited.

In addition there was formerly an immense number of small towns hardly distinguishable from camps, places that had been occupied as towns at some former time, and mythic or semimythic towns. The following is a partial list of these: Aiodjus, Atana, Atanus, Chaahl (on North id.), Chatchini, Chets, Chuga, Chukey, Dadjingits, Dahua, Daiyu, Djigogiga, Djigua, Djihuagits, Edjao, Gachigundae, Gado (2 towns), Gaedi, Gaesigusket, Gaigunkun, Gaodjaos, Gasins, Gatgainans, Gitinkalana, Guhlga, Guhlglidjing, Gwaeskun, Hagi, Heudao, Hlagi, Hlakeguns, Hlgadun, Hlgaeliin, Hlgahet, Hlgai, Hlgaiha, Hlgaiu, Hlgihla-ala, Hlgadun, Hlkia, Hluin, Hotao, Hotdjihoas, Hoya-gundla, Huados, Kadadjans, Kadusgo, Kae, Kaidju, Kaidjudal, Kigani, *Kasta, Katana, Kesa, Ket, Kil, Koagaogit, Koga, Kogalskun, Kostunhana, Kundji (2 towns), Kungga, Kungielung, Kunhalas, Kunkia, Kuulana, Lanadagunga, Lanagahlkehoda, Lanahawa (2 towns), Lanahilduns, Lanas-lagai (3 towns), Lanaungsuls, Nagus, Sahldungkun, Sakaedigitalas, Sgigli, Sindaskun, Sindatahla, Singa, Skae, Skaito, Skaos, Skena, Skudus, Stlindagwai, Stunhlai, Sulustins, Ta, Te, Tigunghung, Tihingus, Tohlka, Widja, Yagun, Yaogus, Yastling, Yatza, Youahnoe(?) Haiglar. The principal chief of the Catawba about the middle of the 18th century, commonly known to the English colonists as King Haiglar. It is probable that he became chief in 1748, as it is stated in Gov. Glenn's letter of May 21, 1751, to the Albany Conference (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., vi, 722, 1855), that the Catawba king had died a year and a half before that time. This must refer to Haiglar's predecessor. Haiglar, though disposed to peace, offered his services to the governor of South Carolina when war with the Cherokee broke out in 1759. He joined Col. Grant's forces and took an active part in the severe battle of Etchoe (Itseyi), assisting materially in gaining the victory for the whites. He is described as a man of sterling character, just in his dealings and true to his word, acting the part of a father to his people, by whom he was greatly beloved. Seeing that strong drink was injuring them, he sent a written petition to Chief Justice Henley, May 26, 1756, requesting him to put a stop to the sale of spirituous liquors to the members of his tribe. In 1762 the Shawnee waylaid, killed, and scalped him while he was returning from the Waxaw attended by a single servant. Col. Samuel Scott, who was a chief in 1840, and signed the treaty of Mar. 13 in that year with South Carolina, was Haiglar's grandson. (C. T.)

Hainai. A tribe of the Caddo confederacy, otherwise known as Inie, or Ioni. After the Spanish occupancy their village was situated 3 leagues w. of the mission of Nacogdoches, in E. Texas; it contained 80 warriors, the same number assigned to the Hainai by Sibley in 1805, who perhaps obtained his information from the same sources. Sibley places their village 20 m. from Natchitoches, La. In manners, customs, and social organization the Hainai do not appear to have differed from the other tribes of the Caddo confederacy (q. v.), whose subsequent fate they have shared. By Sibley and others they are called "Tachies or Texas" (see Texas), as if that term applied to them particularly. The "great nation called Ayano, or Cannohatinnu," according to the narrative of the La Salle expedition in 1687, were not the Hainai, as has been sometimes supposed, or any tribe at all, properly speaking. Ayano, or hayano, is merely the Caddo word for 'people,' while Kano-hatino (q. v.) is the Caddo equivalent for 'Red river,' presumably the same stream now so called. The Indians simply informed the explorer that many people lived on Red r., a statement which the French, in their ignorance of the language, construed to contain the definite name and synonym of a powerful tribe. Haines Mission. A missionary post among the Chilcat at Deshu (q. v.), in Portage cove, near the head of Lynn canal, Alaska; pop. (entire) 85 in 1900.

Hair. See Anatomy.

Hair dressing. Many tribes had a distinctive mode of cutting and dressing the hair, and the style occasionally suggested the nickname by which the people were called by other tribes, as, for instance, in the case of the Pawnee, who cut the hair close to the head, except a ridge from the forehead to the crown, where the scalp-lock was parted off in a circle, stiffened with fat and paint, made to stand erect, and curved like a horn, hence the name Pawnee, derived from pariki, 'horn.' The same style of shaving the head and roaching the hair was common among eastern and western tribes, who braided and generally hung the scalp-lock with ornaments. The Dakota and other western tribes parted the hair in the middle from the forehead to the nape of the neck, the line, usually painted red, being broken by the circle that separated the scalp-lock, which was always finely plaited, the long hair on each side, braided and wrapped in strips of beaver or otter skin, hanging down in front over the chest. The Nez Percés of Idaho and neighboring tribes formerly wore the hair long and unconfined, falling loosely over the back and shoulders. In the E. W. among most of the Pueblo men the hair was cut short across the forehead, like a "bang," and knotted behind. The Eskimo wore the hair loose.

There was generally a difference in the manner of wearing the hair between the men and women of a tribe, and in some tribes the women dressed their hair differently before and after marriage, as with the Hopi, whose maidens arranged it in a whorl over each ear, symbolizing the flower of the squash, but after marriage wore it in simple braids. Aside from these ordinary modes of hair dressing

there were styles that were totemic and others connected with religious observances or with shamanistic practices. Among the Omaha and some other tribes the child from 4 to 7 years of age formerly had its hair cut in a manner to indicate the totem of its gens; for instance, if the turtle was the totem, all the hair was cut off close, except a short fringe encircling the head, a little tuft being left on the forehead, one at the nape of the neck, and two tufts on each side; the bald crown above the fringe represented the shell of the turtle and the tufts its head, tail, and four legs. Generally speaking, the mode of wearing the hair was in former times not subject to passing fancies or fashions, but was representative of tribal kinship and beliefs.

ZUNI HAIR-DRESSING. (STEVENSON)

The first cutting of the hair was usually attended with religious rites. Among the Kiowa and other southern Plains tribes a lock from the first clipping of the child's hair was tied to the forelock (Mooney). Among many tribes the hair was believed to be closely connected with a person's life. This was true in a religious sense of the scalp-lock. In some of the rituals used when the hair was first gathered up and cut from the crown of a boy's head the teaching was set forth that this lock represents the life of the child, now placed wholly in the control of the mysterious and supernatural power that alone could will his death. The braided lock worn thereafter was a sign of this dedication and belief, and represented the man's life. On it he wore the ornaments that marked his achievements and honors, and for anyone to touch lightly this lock was regarded as a grave insult. As a war trophy the scalp-lock had a double meaning. It indicated the act of the supernatural power that had decreed the death of the man, and it served as tangible proof of the warrior's prowess in wresting it from the enemy. The scalp, however, was not always the killer or the first striker. The latter had the chief credit, and frequently left others to do the killing and scalping. With the Eastern or timber tribes, the scalp was usually the killer, but this was not so often the case among the Plains Indians. The scalp was frequently left on the battle ground as a sacrifice. Among the Dakota a bit of the captured scalp-lock was preserved for a year, during which period the spirit was supposed to linger near; then, when the great death feast was held, the lock was destroyed and the spirit was freed thereby from its earthly ties (see Scalp). There are many beliefs connected with the hair, all of which are interwoven with the idea that it is mysteriously connected with a person's life and fortune. One can be bewitched and made subservient to the will of a person who becomes possessed of a bit of his hair; consequently combings are usually carefully burned. According to Hrdlicka the Pima, after killing an Apache, purified themselves with smoke from the burnt hair of the victim.

HEAD OF SEMINOLE MAN. (MACCAULEY)

Personal joy or grief was manifested by the style of dressing the hair (see Mourning). Young men often spend much time over their locks, friends assisting friends in the toilet. The Pueblo and Plains tribes commonly used a stiff brush of spear grass for combing and dressing the hair, while the Eskimo and the N. W. coast tribes used combs. A pointed stick served for parting it and painting the line. These sticks were often carefully wrought, ornamented with embroidery on the handle, and kept in an embroidered case. Perfumes, as well as oils, were used, and wisps of sweet-grass were concealed in the hair of young men to add to their attractions. The Pima and Papago paint or stain the hair when it becomes bleached by the sun (Hrdlicka in Am. Anthropol., viii, no. 1, 1906), and the former, as well as other tribes of the arid region, often coated the hair completely with river mud to destroy vermin.

Early French travelers in Texas and other Southern states mention a custom of the hostess to hasten to wash the head of a visitor with warm water, as a sign of good will and welcome. Among the Pueblo Indians the washing of the hair with the pounded root of the yucca plant prior to a religious rite was attended with much ceremony, and seems to correspond to the purification observances of the sweat lodge, which always preceded sacred rites among the tribes of the plains. See Adornment. (A. C. F.)

Hairwork. One of the most useful materials known to the Indians of the United States was hair, which, as a textile material, was generally more available than vegetal fibers. Hair was obtained from the dog, buffalo, mountain sheep, mountain goat, moose, deer, reindeer, elk, antelope, opossum, rabbit, beaver, otter, lynx, and other animals, and human hair was also sometimes employed.

In more modern times horsehair was used to stuff balls, drumsticks, dolls, pads, pillows, etc., and tufts of it, frequently dyed, were attached as ornaments to costumes, pouches, harness, ceremonial objects, etc. False hair was worn by the Crows, Assiniboin, Mandan, Mohave, and Yuma; and ceremonial wigs of black wool and bangs of natural or dyed hair, especially horsehair, were made by the Pueblos. Twisted or sometimes braided into cord, hair had a most extensive use, satisfying the multifarious demands for string or rope of great tensile strength, and was combined with other fibers in the warp or weft of textiles and basketry. According to Grinnell cowskin pads stuffed with the hair of elk, antelope, buffalo, or mountain sheep were commonly used instead of saddles by some of the Plains tribes in running buffalo and in war. Bourke (9th Rep. B. A. E., 474, 1892) says that mantles made of votive hair are mentioned as having been in use among the Lower California or southern California tribes in the 18th century, and quotes Parkman (Jesuits in North America, lxxxiv, 1867) to the effect that the Algonquians believed in a female manito who wore a robe made of the hair of her victims, for she caused death. See Adornment, Featherwork, Hair dressing, Quillwork. Consult Holmes in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 25, 37, 1896. (W. H.)

Half Breed Band. Mentioned by Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. 1850, 143, 1851) as a local band of the Cheyenne (q. v.) in 1850, probably named from a chief; or perhaps the Sutaio.

Half-breeds. See Métis, Mixed-bloods.

Half King (Scruniyatha, Seruniyattha, Tanacharison, Tannghrison, etc.). A Seneca chief; born about 1700; died at the house of John Harris, at the site of Harrisburg, Pa., Oct. 1, 1754. He appears to have first come into notice about 1748, at which time he lived at or in the vicinity of Logstown, Pa. (q. v.). According to some statements his residence was in this village, but according to others it was on Little Beaver cr., about 15 m. distant. It was to Half King that most of the official visitors to the Indians of the Ohio region, including Weiser, Gist, Croghan, and Washington, applied for information, advice, and assistance, Logstown being their stopping place for this purpose. He accompanied Washington both on his journey of 1753 and on his expedition of 1754.

Half King claimed that he killed Jumonville, the French officer, during the skirmish at Great Meadows, Pa., May 28, 1754, in revenge of the French, who, he declared, had killed, boiled, and eaten his father; and it was he who had advised Ensign Ward, when summoned by Contraceur, the French officer, to surrender Ft Necessity, at the site of Pittsburg, Pa., to reply that his rank did not invest him with power to do so, thus obtaining delay. Half King was a prominent figure on the Indian side in the treaty with the Virginia commissioners in 1752, and for this and other services was decorated by Gov. Dinwiddie and given the honorary name "Dinwiddie," which, it is said, he adopted with pride. On the advice of Croghan, he with other Indians removed to Aughquick (Oquaga) cr., Pa., in 1754. Half King has been confused with the Huron Half King of Sandusky, Ohio, known also as Pomoacan, also with Schoroyady (Scarouady, etc.), the Oneida Half King, and with Monakatuatha (Monacatotha, etc.). See Drake, Aborig. Races, 531, 1880; Rupp, Hist. West. Pa., 71, 1846; Dinwiddie Papers, i, 148, 1883; Col. Records Pa., v, 358, 1851. (c. r.)

Half King (Petawontask, Dunquad, Dunquat, Daunghquat; Delaware name, Pomoacan). A Huron chief of Sandusky, Ohio, who flourished during the latter part of the Revolutionary war. Under employment by the British he aided the Delawares in their resistance to the encroachment of the white settlements beyond the Allegheny mts., and it was through his intervention that the Moravians of Lichtenau were saved from massacre by the Indians in 1777. According to Loskiel (Missions United Brethren, pt. 3, 127, 1794) he was joined by a large number of warriors, including Hurons, Ottawa, Chippewa, Shawnee, and others, besides some French, and his influence as a disciplinarian was such that he kept this mixed assemblage in good order, permitting no extravagance on their part. Sometimes more than 200 warriors lay all night close to Lichtenau, but they behaved so quietly that they were hardly perceived. Loskiel also says that Half King "was particularly attentive to prevent all drunkenness, knowing that bloodshed and murder would immediately follow." He insisted on the removal of the Christian Indians from the vicinity of Sandusky, believing it to be unsafe for them to remain there; he also protected the Moravians and their converts from maltreatment when the missionaries were sent to Detroit. Under the name Daunghquat he signed the treaty of Ft McIntosh, Ohio, Jan. 21, 1785. The treaties of Greenville, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1795; Ft McIntosh, July 4, 1805; Greenville, July

22, 1814, and Spring Wells, Sept. 8, 1815, were signed by Haroenyou (Harrowenyou), his son, not by himself; but the name "Dunquad or Half King" is appended to the treaty of Miami Rapids, Ohio, Sept. 29, 1817. (c. r.)

Halona (Háloná Ptiwána, 'middle place of happy fortune', 'middle ant-hill of the world', 'the ant-hill at the navel of the Earth Mother'.—Cushing). A former pueblo of the Zuñi and one of the Seven Cities of Cibola of the early Spanish chroniclers, said to have been situated on both sides of Zuñi r., on and opposite the site of the present Zuñi pueblo, W. N. Mex. Only the mound on the S. side of the stream is now traceable, and a part of this is occupied by modern buildings erected by white people. While there seems to be no question that Halona was inhabited by the Zuñi at the time of Coronado in 1540, it was not mentioned by name until Nov. 9, 1598, when the Zuñi made a vow of obedience and vassalage to Spain at Hawikuh, Halona being designated as Halonagu (Halona-kwin, 'Halona-place'). A Franciscan mission was established there in 1629, but the murder by the Zuñi of their missionary in 1632 impelled the Indians to flee for protection to Thunder mtn., a mesa 3 m. away, where they remained for about 3 years. The mission was rehabilitated some time after 1643, and continued until the Pueblo outbreak of Aug., 1680, when the Zuñi murdered Fray Juan de Bal, the Halona missionary, and burned the church. The Zuñi again fled to Thunder mtn., where they remained until after the reconquest by Diego de Vargas in 1692. Meanwhile the pueblos in the valley, including Halona, had fallen in decay, and none of them was rebuilt. The present village of Zuñi was reared on the N. bank of Zuñi r., partly on the site of Halona, about the close of the 17th century. The population of Halona at the time of the revolt of 1680 was about 1,500, and Matsaki and Kiakima were visitas of its mission. See Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 1889; Bandelier (1) *Doc. Hist. Hammers. Few implements are of so much importance to primitive men as the stone hammer and the several closely allied forms—the sledge, the maul, and the stone-head club, which may be described here rather than under the caption Clubs. All of these implements are employed, like the ordinary club, in striking blows that stun, break, crush, or drive, the only distinction to be drawn between the hafted hammer and the club being that the one carries the weight chiefly in the extremity or head, which is usually of heavier or harder material than the handle, while the other has the weight distributed along the shaft. Although the several implements comprised in this group have many features in common, they are somewhat clearly differentiated in shape and use. All are made of hard, heavy, tough materials, including stone, bone, ivory, antler, shell, and metal. Some are never hafted, while perhaps nearly all on occasion are used unhafted, one or both hands being employed according to the weight of the implement. Haftings vary with the form and use of the object as well as with the region and the people.

PITTED HAMMER. (ABOUT 1-5)

Hammers employed in shaping stone, especially in the more advanced stages of the work, are usually unhafted and are held tightly in the hand for delivering heavy blows, or lightly between the thumb and fingertips for flaking or pecking.

They may be natural pebbles, bowl-ers, or fragments, but by prolonged use they assume definite shapes or are intentionally modified to better fit them for their purpose. Globular and discoidal forms prevail, and the variety employed in pecking and for other light uses often has shallow depressions centrally placed at opposite sides to render the finger hold more secure. The pecking and flaking work is accomplished by strokes with the periphery, which is round or slightly angular in profile to suit the requirements of the particular work.

HEAVY HAMMER; BRITISH CO-LUMBIA. (LENGTH 8-9
IN.)

Hammers intended for breaking, driving, and killing are generally hafted to increase their effectiveness. Sledge hammers, used in mining and quarrying, were usually heavy, often rudely shaped, and the haft was a pliable stick or withe bent around the body of the implement, which was sometimes grooved for the purpose. The fastening was made secure by the application of thongs or rawhide coverings. In the flint quarries and copper mines great numbers of hammers or sledges were required; indeed, it may be said that in and about the ancient copper mines of McCar-golscove, Isle Royale, Mich., there are to be seen tens of thousands of wornout and abandoned sledge heads. In an ancient paint mine in Missouri, recently exposed by the opening of an iron mine, upward of 1,200 rude stone sledges were thrown out by the workmen. Heavy grooved and hafted hammers, resembling somewhat the mining sledges, though much more highly specialized, were in general use among the tribes of the great plains and served an important purpose in breaking up the bones of large game animals, in pounding pemmican, flint, and seeds, in driving tipi pegs, etc. A lighter hammer, usually referred to as a war-club, was and is in common use among the western tribes. It is a globular or doubly conical stone, carefully finished and often grooved, the haft being strengthened by binding with rawhide. Closely allied to this weapon is a kind of slung hammer, the roundish stone being held in place at the end of the handle by a covering of rawhide that extends the full length of the haft. These are very effectual implements, and decked with streamers of horsehair and other ornaments have been devoted, at least in recent years, to ceremony and show.

Heavy hammers, often tastefully carved, were and are used by the tribes of the N.W. for driving wedges in splitting wood, for driving piles, and for other heavy work; they are usually called mauls, or pile-drivers. Many of the larger specimens have handles or finger holes carved in the stone, while others are provided with handles of wood. The Eskimo also have hammers for various purposes, made of stone, bone, and ivory, with hafts ingeniously attached.

The literature of this topic is voluminous, but much scattered, references to the various kinds of hammers occurring in nearly all works dealing with the archeology and ethnology of N. America. For an extended article on the stone hammer, see McGuire in Am. Anthropologist, IV, no. 4, 1891. (W. H. H.)

Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute. A school for negroes and Indians, situated 2 m. from Fort Monroe and Old Point Comfort, Va. Established in 1868 by Gen. S. C. Armstrong for the industrial and agricultural education of freedmen, it was the first school in the United States of a practical industrial nature. After 10 years of success in training and establishing negroes as teachers and farmers, it responded to the call of 14 young Indians, who had been prisoners of war at St Augustine, Fla., for three years, and thus opened its doors to the Indian race. Since then 1,100 Indian girls and boys have had more or less training at Hampton, and to-day five-sixths of those now living are industrious and civilized, working with their own hands for the support of themselves and their families.

The school is not a government institution, but is controlled by a board of 17 trustees, and is entirely nonsectarian in character. It is supported by the income of a partial endowment and by certain government funds distributed by the state of Virginia, but its chief support is derived from the donations of its friends.

The academic course covers a period of 4 years, and includes English branches in both grammar and high school grades.

Normal courses are given in business, agriculture, and the trades, as well as in kindergarten and public school teaching. Agriculture begins in the primary department of the training school, and becomes so important a branch of the academic work that at the end of the course the student is prepared to conduct intelligent farming. In addition to the model farm, dairy, orchards, poultry yards, and experiment garden, the school has a dairy and stock farm of 600 acres a few miles away. The trades taught the boys are carpentry, wood turning, bricklaying, plastering, painting, wheelwrighting, blacksmithing, machine work, steam fitting, tailoring, shoe and harness making, tinsmithing, upholstering, and printing. A large and well equipped trade school, with mechanical-drawing room, offers excellent facilities for the practical instruction given. The domestic-science building and the school kitchens and laundries give opportunity for instruction in all kinds of domestic work, and each girl is required to complete a practical course in every branch of housekeeping, cooking, dairying, and gardening.

The school has about 60 buildings for housing and educating its 900 boarding students. These include a church, library, dormitories, recitation halls, trade school, domestic science and agricultural building, hospital, printing office, greenhouses, barn, workshops, laundry, offices, and dwellings for the officers and teachers. All the young men receive instruction in military tactics, which has proved of great value in instilling habits of promptness, neatness, and obedience.

The Government pays $167 a year for each of its 120 Indian pupils; all expenses in excess of this must be provided by philanthropic friends. The Indians and colored students have separate dormitory buildings, and the pupils of the two races also occupy separate tables in the dining rooms, but work together in classes and shops with mutual good feeling and helpfulness.

The record of Indians returned to their homes is carefully kept. For the year ending in May, 1906, there were 183 doing an excellent grade of work as teachers in schoolroom, shop, or on farms; as doctors, lawyers, or ethnologists; 306 were living civilized lives, setting examples of industry and temperance; 80 were doing fairly well under hard conditions; 28 were doing poorly, and 4 were bad. This gives so large a proportion of satisfactory results that Hampton considers her work for Indians in every way a success.

The school publishes a monthly magazine called The Southern Workman, devoted to the interests of the negro and the Indian. The Indians publish a small paper, Talks and Thoughts, now in its nineteenth year; all its contributors are Indians, and many of the articles are valuable additions to Indian literature and ethnology. (C. M. F.)

Hamtsit (Hámstít, 'having food', named from an ancestor). A Bellacoola division at Talio, Brit. Col.—Boas in 7th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 3, 1891.

Han. An unidentified tribe living on a part of the island of Malhado (Galveston id.), Texas, on which Cabeza de Vaca suffered shipwreck in 1528. The language of the Han differed from that of their neighbors, the Capoque (probably Coaque), but they had customs in common. They possibly formed the westernmost band of the Attacapa. Hano (contracted from Anopi, 'eastern people.'—Fewkes). The easternmost pueblo of Tusayan, N. E. Ariz., and familiarly spoken of as one of the Hopi villages; it is, however, occupied by Tewa people, whose ancestors, early in the 18th century, migrated from the upper Rio Grande, in New Mexico, principally from an ancient pueblo known as Tsawarii, above the present town of Santa Cruz, where the hamlet of La Puebla now stands (Hodge). The Hano people have largely intermarried with the Hopi. In 1782 the population was 110 families; in 1893 it numbered 163 individuals, including 23 husbands of Hano women. In addition, there were 16 Hano people living in the Hopi pueblos. The clans represented at Hano are the Ke (Bear), Kun (Corn), Sa (Tobacco), Tenyo (Pine), Okuwa (Cloud), Nang (Earth), Kachina, and Tang (Sun). Formerly there were also the Kapulo (Crane), Pe (Timber), Kopeli (Pink conch), Pohulo (Herb), Kuyanwe (Turquoise ear pendant), Ku (Stone), and Ta (Grass) clans, but these have become extinct since the Hano people settled in Tusayan. Harahey. One of the various forms of the name of a province of which Coronado, while among the New Mexico pueblos in 1540-41, learned from a native thereof who said that it lay beyond Quivira (the Wichita country of e. central Kansas), and contained much gold. This Indian, who was known as The Turk (q. v.) and who served as a guide to Coronado's army, became a traitor to the Spaniards by leading them astray on the buffalo plains of Texas. After 12 days' journey from Pecos r. in New Mexico the Spaniards, then on the Staked plain, were informed by The Turk that Haxa, or Haya, was one or two days' journey toward sunrise. A party was sent forward to find it, and although settlements of Indians were found, amongst them Cona, occupied by the Teya (Texas?), Haxa does not appear to have been reached; it is therefore possible that Haxa, or Haya, is but another form of Harahey, which was far n. of where the Spaniards then were. Arriving at Quivira, Coronado learned more of Harahey, which was the next province beyond. The Spaniards did not visit it, but sent for their chief, named Tatarraz, who came with 200 warriors, "all naked, with bows, and some sort of things on their heads." From the characteristic head-dress of The Turk and the other members of the tribe, and their proximity and apparent relationship with the Quivira, or Wichita, the Harahey people may have been the Pawnee, and their habitat at this date (1542) in the vicinity of Kansas r. in e. Kansas. See Brower, Quivira, 1898; Hodge, Coronado's March, in Brower, Harahey, 1899; Winship, Coronado Exped., 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896. (F. W. H.)

Harpaha. A former Timucua village near the mouth of St Johns r., Fla.—Laudonnière (1565) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 349, 1869.

Harpoons. Piercing and retrieving weapons with a movable head—probably the most ingenious and complicated device invented by the North American aborigines. Before the natives came into contact with the whites, they made harpoons of wood, bone, walrus ivory, shell, stone, sinew, and hide. The several structural parts consisted of the shaft, foreshaft, loose shaft, ice pick, head, hinge, connecting line, assembling line, main line, hand rest, eyelet, float, and detachere. Besides these there were a multitude of accessories, such as stools, decoys, ice scoops, and canoes. The technique of every part represented the Indian's best skill in a number of handicrafts—wood working, bone and ivory carving, chipping and grinding stone; shredding, twisting, and braiding sinew; and dressing hides or floats, canoes, and the toughest possible thongs or lines, and other parts.

There are two quite different varieties of harpoons, based on the shape of the head—the barbed harpoon and the toggle harpoon. The head of the barbed harpoon is attached to the shaft by means of a connecting line tied to the butt or tang of the head. The toggle head is attached to the line or sling by means of a hole bored through the body; the head is driven entirely into the animal, and, toggling under the skin, gives firm hold. These two types merge into each other, and some harpoons possess the characteristics of both.

The parts of a barbed harpoon are:

Head.—Of various materials, the specific characters being the same as those of barbed arrows; they differ in that the tang fits loosely into a socket and is roughened, notched, or pierced for the hinging or connecting line.

Foreshaft.—That of the harpoon, as compared with the arrow, is heavier, and has a socket in front for the wedge-shaped, conical, or spindle-shaped tang of the head.

Shaft.—Length, from a few inches to many feet; thickness, from one-fourth of an inch to an inch or more; outer end spliced or socketed to the foreshaft; center of gravity furnished with hand rest; inner end pointed, pitted for hook of throwing stick, notched for a bowstring, with or without feathers, or furnished with ice pick.

Connecting line.—Of string or thong rudely tied to head and shaft or, in the finest specimens, attached at one end through a hole in the tang, the other end being bifurcated and fastened like a martingale to the ends of the shaft. When the animal is struck by the hurled harpoon the head is withdrawn, the foreshaft sinks by its gravity, and the shaft acts as a drag to impede the progress of the game (see Nat. Mus. Rep. 1900, pl. 11).

The parts of a toggle harpoon are:

Toggle head.—Consisting of body; blade of slate, chipped stone, ivory, or metal, usually fitted into a slit in front; line hole or opening through the body for the sling or leader of hide on which the toggle head hinges; line grooves channeled backward from the line hole to protect the leader; barbs projecting backward at the butt of the toggle head to catch into the flesh and make the head revolve 90 degrees, forming a T with the line; shaft socket, a conoid pit in the butt of the toggle head to receive front end of loose shaft; and leader or sling, not always separate, but when so, either spliced to the main line or joined by an ingenious detach-er, which is sometimes prettily carved.

Loose shaft.—A spindle-shaped piece of ivory socketed to toggle head and fore-shaft and attached as a hinge to the leader or the foreshaft. Its object is to catch the strain caused by convulsive movements in the game and to render certain the speedy detach-ment of the toggle head.

One of the most interesting studies in connection with harpoons is environment in relation to culture—the play between the needy and ingenious man and the resources of game, materials, and tools. In E. Greenland is found the hinged toggle by the side of old forms; in W. Greenland a great variety of types from the very primitive and coarse to those having feathers of ivory and the hooks on the shaft. In the latter area are also throwing sticks of two kinds. On the W. side of Davis strait harpoons are heavy and coarse, showing contact of the natives with whalers, especially the Ungava Eskimo examples. There also are flat types suggestive of N. Asia. From the Mackenzie r. country the harpoons are small and under the influence of the white trader. The harpoons of the Pt Barrow Eskimo are exhaustively discussed by Murdoch, and those from Pt Barrow southward by Nelson.

From Mount St Elias southward, within the timber belt, wherewood is easily obtainable, harpoon shafts are longer, but all the parts are reduced to their simplest form. For example, the Ntlakyapamuk of British Columbia make the toggle heads of their two-pronged harpoons by neatly lashing the parts together and to the sennit leaders. The Makah of Washington formerly made the blade of the head from shell, but now use metal; the leader is tied to a large, painted float of sealskin, the shaft being free. The Quinaielt of Washington have the bifurcated shaft, but no float. The Naltunne of Oregon have a barbed harpoon, with prongs on the blade as well as on the shank, while their cousins, the Hupa of N. California make the toggle, as do the Vancouver tribes, by attaching the parts of the head to a strip of rawhide.

Hatchcalamocha. A former Seminole village near Drum swamp, 18 m. w. of New Mickasuky town; probably in the present Lafayette co., Fla.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Hatchets. These implements, made of iron or steel, and hafted with wood, were an important factor in the colonization of northern America, and the value of the hatchet, as well as that of the ax, was soon recognized by the natives, who obtained these tools through trade. Large numbers of hatchets and axes of both French and English manufacture are obtained from aboriginal dwelling sites. It is not known with certainty just what aboriginal implements and weapons were supplanted by the European hatchet, but it probably superseded, in large part, the grooved ax, the celt, and probably the tomahawk or war club among tribes that used these implements. So far as can be judged by the forms, the term "hatchet" may be applied with equal propriety to both the hafted ax and the hafted celt, as both were wielded usually with one hand and were equally effectual in war and in the arts of peace. So far as colonial literature refers to the uses of these implements, it would appear that the tomahawk or club, among the eastern tribes, was the weapon of war par excellence, while the ax and the celt were employed more especially in domestic work and for other ordinary industrial purposes (McCulloch). Both the hatchet and the war club doubtless rose on occasion to the dignity of ceremonial objects.

COMMON FORM OF HATCHET—A SHARPENED BOWLDER; VIRGINIA

It is clear, not only from the practice of the living tribes and of primitive peoples generally, but from traces of handles remaining on both stone and copper specimens obtained from the mounds, that the celt was hafted after the manner of the hatchet. An interesting group of implements showing that this was the archaic method of hafting celt-like objects, are the monolithic hatchets in which the blade and the handle are carved of a single piece of stone. Several specimens of this type are on record; one, found by

MONOLITHIC HATCHET OF GREENSTONE, FROM A TENNESSEE MOUND. LENGTH 13 1/2 IN. (JONES)

Joseph Jones, in Tennessee, is made of greenstone, and is 13 1/2 in. in length; another, from a mound in York district, S. C., now in the National Museum, is also of greenstone; the third is from Mississippi co., Ark., and is owned by Mr Morris of that county (Thruston); the fourth, from a mound in Alabama, and now in possession of Mr C. B. Moore, of Philadelphia, is 11 1/2 in. long, of greenstone, and a superb example of native lapidarian work. Specimens of this class are much more numerous in the Bahamas and the West Indies. As all are carefully finished, some being provided with a perforated knob or projection at the end of the handle for the insertion of a thong, it is probable that they served as maces or for some other ceremonial use. On the Pacific coast the stone war club sometimes took the form of a monolithic hatchet (Niblack).

MONOLITHIC HATCHET OF GREENSTONE, FROM A MOUND AT MOUNDVILLE, ALA. LENGTH 11 1/2 IN. (MOORE)

The combination of the iron hatchet with the tobacco pipe as a single implement, often called the tomahawk pipe, became very general in colonial and later times, and as no counterpart of this device is found in aboriginal art, it was probably devised by the whites as a useful and profitable combination of the symbols of peace and war. To "take up the hatchet" was to declare war, and "to bury the hatchet" was to conclude peace. According to some authors the hatchet pipe was a formidable weapon in war, but in the forms known to-day it is too light and fragile to have taken the place of the stone ax or the iron hatchet. It has passed entirely out of the realm of weapons. See Axes, Calumet, Cells, Pipes, Tomahawks.

Hatchichapa ('half-way creek'). A former branch settlement of the Upper Creek town Kailaidshi, between Coosa and Tallapoosa rs., Ala. Hawkins states that the Creeks hostile to the United States burned it in 1813, but it was probably rebuilt as it is mentioned in Parsons' census list of 1832 as having 62 heads of families.

Hathawekela. A principal division of the Shawnee, the name of which is of uncertain etymology. They emigrated from the S. about 1697, together with other Shawnee bands, and settled with them, partly on Susquehanna and partly on Allegheny r., Pa., where they are mentioned in 1731. Sewickley, Pa., probably takes its name from them. According to W. H. Shawnee, an educated member of the tribe, the proper form is Ha-tha-we-ke-lah, and they constitute one of the original 5 principal divisions of the Shawnee. Together with the Bicowetha (Piqua) and Kispokotha (Kispococoke) divisions they removed about 1793 to what was then Spanish territory in E. Missouri, thence into Arkansas, and in 1832 into Texas, where with other tribes they settled for a time near Saline r. Being afterward driven out by the new Texas government they removed to the present Oklahoma, where the 3 united bands are now known as Absentee Shawnee, from having been absent from the more recent treaties made with the rest of the tribe. The Hathawekela claim to be the "elder brothers" among the Shawnee, as being the first created of the tribe. The band formerly under Black Bob (q. v.) are a portion of this division. Hatteras. An Algonquian tribe living in 1701 on the sand banks about C. Hatteras, N. C., e. of Pamlico sound, and frequenting Roanoke id. Their single village, Sandbanks, had then only about 80 inhabitants. They showed traces of white blood and claimed that some of their ancestors were white. They may have been identical with the Croatan Indians (q. v.), with whom Raleigh's colonists at Roanoke id. are supposed to have taken refuge. (J. M.)

w. Arizona. Whipple (Pac. R. R. Rep., III, pt. 1, 82, 1856) was informed in 1850 that the "Cosminos" roamed from the Sierra Mogollon to the San Francisco mts. and along the valley of the Colorado Chiquito. The tribe is a peculiarly interesting one, since of all the Yuman tribes it is the only one which has developed or borrowed a culture similar to, though less advanced, than that of the Pueblo peoples; indeed, according to tradition, the Havasupai (or more probably a Pueblo clan or tribe that became incorporated with them) formerly built and occupied villages of a permanent character on the Colorado Chiquito E. of the San Francisco mts., where ruins were pointed out to Powell by a Havasupai chief as the former homes of his people. As the result of war with tribes farther E., they abandoned these villages and took refuge in the San Francisco mts., subsequently leaving these for their present abode. In this connection it is of interest to note that the Cosnino caves on the upper Rio Verde, near the N. edge of Tonto basin, central Arizona, were named from this tribe, because of their supposed early occupancy by them. Their present village, composed of temporary cabins or shelters of wattled canes and branches and earth in summer, and of the natural caves and crevices in winter, is situated 115 m. N. of Prescott and 7 m. S. of the Grand canyon. The Havasupai are well formed, though of medium stature. They are skilled in the manufacture and use of implements, and especially in preparing raw material, like buckskin. The men are expert hunters, the women adept in the manufacture of baskets which, when lined with clay, serve also as cooking utensils. Like the other Yuman tribes, until affected by white influences during recent years, their clothing consisted chiefly of deerskin and, for the sake of ornament, both men and women painted their faces with thick, smooth coatings of fine red ochre or blue paint prepared from wild indigo; tattooing and scarification for ornament were also sometimes practised. In summer they subsist chiefly on corn, calabashes, sunflower seeds, melons, peaches, and apricots, which they cultivate by means of irrigation, and also the wild datila and mescal, in winter principally upon the flesh of game, which they hunt in the surrounding uplands and mountains. While a strictly sedentary people, they are unskilled in the manufacture of earthenware and obtain their more modern implements and utensils, except basketry, by barter with the Hopi, with which people they seem always to have had closer affiliation than with their Yuman kindred. Their weapons in war and the chase were rude clubs and pikes of hard wood, bows and arrows, and, formerly, slings; but firearms have practically replaced these more primitive appliances. The gentile system of descent or organization seems to be absent among the Havasupai, their society consanguineally being patriarchal. They are polygamists, the number of wives a man shall have being limited apparently only by his means for supporting them. Betrothals by purchase are common, and divorces are granted only on the ground of unfaithfulness. The Havasupai occupy a reservation of about 38,400 acres, set aside by Executive order in 1880 and 1882. Their population was 300 in 1869, 233 in 1902, 174 in 1905. (H. W. H.)

Haverstraw (Dutch: haverstroo, 'oat-straw'). The name applied by the Dutch to a small tribe or band (according to Rutenber, a division) of the Unami Delawares, formerly living on the w. bank of the lower Hudson, in Rockland co., N. Y. The name they applied to themselves is lost, but it may have been Re-weghnome or Rumachenanek.

Hawaiian influence. The establishment of the whale and seal fisheries of the N. Pacific coast led to the presence in that region of sailors and adventurers of the most diverse races and nationalities, many of whom came into more or less lasting contact with the natives of the country. Toward the middle of the 19th century (Hale, Oregon Trade Language, 19, 1890) the Hawaiian language was spoken by about 100 Sandwich Islanders employed as laborers about Ft Vancouver, Wash. Doubtless some intermixture of these with the Indians took place. In 1891 there lived among the Kutenai an Indian nicknamed Kanaka. Murdoch (9th Rep. B. A. E., 55, 1892) notes that several Hawaiian words have crept into the jargon as used by the western Eskimo and white whalers and traders who come into contact with them, and one or two of these words have even come to be employed by the Pt Barrow Eskimo among themselves; but there is no evidence that the Chinook jargon contains a Hawaiian element. Swanton suggests that it is barely possible that the Haida custom of tattooing may have come from some Polynesian island, as its introduction is always said by the natives to be recent. Whether the idea of a ladder made of a chain of arrows, which occurs among the myths of Polynesians and the people of the N. W. coast, could have had a similar origin may be doubted, but it is nevertheless possible. The theory of Polynesian-American contact has been maintained by Ratzel, Schultz, and others, stress being laid on resemblances in art as exemplified by clubs, masks, etc., and in other ways. (A. F. C.)

Hawikuh (have 'leaves', wiku 'gum'). A former pueblo of the Zuñi and one of the Seven Cities of Cibola of early Spanish times, situated about 15 m. s. w. of the present Zuñi pueblo, N. Mex., near the summervillage of Ojo Caliente. Hawikuh was seen in 1539 by Fray Marcos de Niza, who viewed it from an adjacent height a few days after the murder, by the Zuñi of Hawikuh, of Estevanico, the former negro companion of Cabeza de Vaca. Fray Marcos referred to it by the name of Aha-cus. In the following year Francisco Vasquez Coronado visited the pueblo with his advance guard, and as its inhabitants offered resistance, the village was stormed and captured, most of its people fleeing for safety to Taaiyalone, a mesa e. of the present Zuñi. Coronado referred to Hawikuh, under the name Granada, as the chief pueblo of Cibola, containing about 200 houses, and from there wrote his account of the journey to the viceroy Mendoza, Aug. 15, 1540. A Franciscan mission was established at Hawikuh in 1629, at which time the pueblo contained about 110 houses. Owing to Navaho or Apache depredations in Oct., 1670, when many of the Zuñi as well as the missionary of Hawikuh were killed, the pueblo was abandoned and never afterward permanently occupied. It is said that the roof timbers of the old church at Zuñi, which was erected about 1705, were those used previously in the Hawikuh chapel. A portion of the adobe walls of the latter building were still standing until about 1894, when the adobes were taken by the Indians to Ojo Caliente and there used in the construction of new houses. Health and Disease. There is little evidence to show what diseases prevailed among the Indians n. of Mexico prior to the advent of white people. The traditions of the Indians, the existence among them of elaborate healing rites of undoubtedly ancient origin, their plantlore, in which curative properties are attributed to many vegetal substances, and the presence among them of a numerous class of professed healers, honored, feared, and usually well paid, would seem to indicate that diseases were not rare, but actual knowledge and even tradition as to their nature are wanting. The condition of the skeletal remains, the testimony of early observers, and the present state of some of the tribes in this regard, warrant the conclusion that on the whole the Indian race was a comparatively healthy one. It was probably spared at least some of the epidemics and diseases of the Old World, such as smallpox and rachitis, while other scourges, such as tuberculosis, syphilis (precolumbian), typhus, cholera, scarlet fever, cancer, etc., were rare, if occurring at all. Taking into consideration the warlike nature of many of the tribes and the evidence presented by their bones (especially the skulls), injuries, etc., particularly those received by offensive weapons, must have been common, although fractures are less frequent than among white people.

At the time of the discovery the Indians on the whole were probably slowly increasing in numbers. Frequent wars, however, had a marked effect in limiting this increase. Since their contact with whites most of the tribes have gradually diminished in strength, while some of the smaller tribes have disappeared entirely. Very few tribes have shown an increase or even maintained their former numbers. The most remarkable example of steady gain is the Navaho tribe. The causes of decrease were the introduction of diseases (particularly smallpox), the spread of alcoholism, syphilis, and especially tuberculosis, destructive wars with the whites, and increased mortality due to changes in the habits of the people through the encroachment of civilization. During recent years a slow augmentation in population has been noticed among a number of tribes, and as more attention is paid to the hygienic conditions of the Indians, an increase comparable to that in whites may be expected in many sections. The least hopeful conditions in this respect prevail among the Dakota and other tribes of the colder northern regions, where pulmonary tuberculosis and scrofula are very common. (See Population.)

While preserving much of their robust constitution, the Indians—particularly those of mixed blood—are at present subject to many disorders and diseases known to the whites, although the pure bloods are still free from most of the serious morbid conditions and tendencies due to defective inheritance. They suffer little from insanity, idiocy, and rachitis. Cretinism is exceedingly rare, and general paresis, with a large number of serious nervous affections, has not yet been recorded among them. Diseases of the heart, arteries, and veins, serious affection of the liver and kidneys, as well as typhoid and scarlet fever are infrequent. Congenital malformations are very rare, although it is commonly heard among the Indians themselves that they do sometimes occur, but that the afflicted infants are not allowed to live. Fractures, and diseases of the bones in general, as well as dental caries, are less frequent than among the whites. There is considerable doubt whether cancer occurs in any form. Venereal diseases, while predominant among the more degraded Indians, are more or less effectually guarded against by others.

The most common disorders of health now experienced among Indians generally are those of the gastro-intestinal tract, which in infancy are due to improper feeding and particularly to the universal consumption of raw, unripe fruit and vegetables, and in later life to the lack of or overindulgence in food, irregular meals, the preference for fat, crudely prepared food, and, recently, the misuse of inferior baking powders and excessive use of coffee. While most of the disorders thus introduced are of a minor character, others, particularly in infants, are frequently fatal. Other more common diseases are various forms of malaria, bronchitis, pneumonia, pleurisy, and measles in the young. Whooping cough is also met with. Inflammation of the conjunctivæ is common and often leads to ulceration, opacity, and defect in or even total loss of vision. Defective hearing is occasionally found in the aged, and there are rare instances of deaf mutes. Eczema, favus, and acnæ are among the more ordinary affections of the skin. Tuberculosis of the lungs, and glandular tuberculosis, or scrofula, are frequent in many localities and are especially common among the reservation Indians in the colder parts of the United States, particularly in North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana, due to their present mode of life. They live in small, insanitary hovels, which in cold weather are ill ventilated and often overheated and crowded, while their dress is heavier than formerly, their daily life less active, their food changed, and, what is most important, there is complete ignorance of the contagious nature of consumption. Some of these conditions, however, are being gradually bettered.

Goiter is widely distributed, though seldom prevalent; it is found particularly among some bands of the Sioux, and it occurs also with some frequency among the Menominee, Oneida, Crows, and White Mountain Apache. Albinism occurs among a number of the tribes; the cases, however, are quite isolated, except among the Hopi and to a lesser degree the Zuni. In 1903 there were 12 cases of albinism in the former and 4 in the latter tribe, all of the complete variety. Vitiligo is much more scattered, but the cases are few. Diseases and functional disturbances peculiar to women, including those of the puerperium, are much less common among Indians than among the white women of this country. Of diseases peculiar to old age, senile arthritis, which affects particularly the spine, and occasional dementia, are found. Senility proceeds slowly in the pure-blood Indian, and the number of individuals above 80 years of age, according to census returns (which, however, should be regarded with caution), is relatively greater than among the whites. Heashkowa. A prehistoric pueblo of the Red Corn (Kukinish-yaka) clan of Acoma, situated at the foot of a mesa about 2 m. s. e. of the present Acoma pueblo, N. Mex. According to tradition it was built by the Red Corn clan when the tribe entered its present valley from the n. and settled at Tapitslama. It is said that when the village was abandoned some of the inhabitants joined the main body of the tribe while the remainder migrated southward. (F. W. H.)

Hebron. A Moravian Eskimo mission, founded in 1830, on the e. Labrador coast, lat. 58°.—Hind., Lab. Penin., ii, 199, 1863.

Hecatari. A former Nevomé pueblo of Sonora, Mexico, with 127 inhabitants in 1730; situated probably at or near the junction of the w. branch of the Rio Yaqui with the main stream, about lat. 28° 30'. Orozco y Berra classes it as a pueblo of the upper Pima.

Hecatari.—Rivera (1678) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 513, 1884. Hecatari.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 347, 1884.

Heda-haidagai (X'ē daxā'-ida-ga-i, 'people living on the low ground'). A subdivision of the Stawas-haidagai, a Haida family of the Eagle clan; named from the character of the ground on which their houses stood in the town of Cumshewa. The town chief belonged to this subdivision.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 273, 1905.

Hediondo (Span.: 'fetid'). A Huichol rancheria about 2½ m. w. of Ratoncita, in Jalisco, Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., ii, 271, 1902.

Rancho Hediondo.—Lumholtz, ibid.

Hegan. According to Pike (N. H. Hist. Soc. Coll., iii, 56, 1832) some English near Kittery, York co., Me., were attacked in 1706 "by their good friends, the Hegans." This may mean some relatives of Hogkins or Hawkins, a chief of the hostile Pennacook, formerly living in that vicinity. It can hardly mean the Mohegan, who were not hostile and who did not live in the neighborhood. (I. M.)

Hehametawe (Hē'ha'mē'tawē, 'descendants of Hametawe'). A subdivision of the Laalaksentao, a Kwakiutl gens.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. for 1895, 332.

Hehkoan ('people of Foam'). A Tlingit division at Wrangell, Alaska, belonging to the Wolf clan. They are named from a place called Foam (X'et), close to Loring, where they lived before joining the Stikine.

Chrsleh-kōn.—Krause, Thinkit Ind., 120, 1885. Qstlkōan.—Boas, 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 25, 1899. Xēlkoan.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Heiltsuk (He'-ilt-sug). A dialect of Kwakiutl embracing the Bellabella (after whose native name it is called), the China Hat, Somehulitk, Nohunitk, and Wikeno. The number of Indians speaking the dialect was about 500 in 1904. (J. R. S.)

Heitotowa. A Choctaw town in the Choctaw Nation, Ind. T., situated at the later Sculleville.

Hei-to-to-wee.—Möhlhausen, Journey, i, 32, 1858.

Hekhalanois (Hēxalā'nois). The ancestor of a Koskimo gens, after whom it was sometimes called.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Hekpa. The Fir clan of the Honau (Bear) phratry of the Hopi.

He'-ka.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 38, 1891.

Helapoonuch. A former Chumashan village situated about 15 m. from Santa Barbara mission, Cal.—Father Timeno (1856) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Helicopile. A village, named after a chief, on lower St Johns r., Fla., in 1564, probably belonging to Saturiwa's confederacy.

Helicopile.—Laudonnière (1567) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 349, 1869. Helicopile.—Gourgue (1568), ibid., 2d s., ii, 280, 1875.

Helikilika. An ancestor of a gens of the Nakomgilisala tribe of Kwakiutl.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Hellett. A Salish tribe on Chimenes r., s. w. Vancouver id., speaking the Covichan dialect; pop. 28 in 1904.

Hel-alt.—Can. Ind. Aff., 306, 1879. Helalt.—Ibid., 79, 1878. Hel-alt.—Ibid., 1883, pt. i, 190. Hellal.—Ibid., 1892, 313. Hel-alt.—Ibid., 1889, 269. Hellett.—Ibid., 1901, pt. ii, 164. Qalā'tiq.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Hello (Hēl-lo'). A former Chumashan village on Mooris id., w. of Santa Barbara, Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Helshen ('sandy beach'; lit., 'soft to the foot'). A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.

Helcen.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 475, 1900.

Heluta. A former Cholovone village in San Joaquin co., Cal., near San Joaquin r.—Pinart, Cholovone MS., B. A. E., 1880.

Hematite. An iron ore much used by the native tribes for implements, ornaments, and small objects of problematical use. It is found in many parts of the country and in great abundance in the Iron Mountain district of Missouri and in the Marquette region of Michigan. It occurs as a massive ore, as nodules, and in other forms, distributed through rocks of various classes, and is usually dark in color, showing various shades of gray, brown, and red. The specular varieties are generally rather gray, and have a metallic luster. The red, earthy varieties, when compact, are known as red chalk, and when much disintegrated and pulverulent, as red ocher. They were, and are, much used as paint by the aborigines, and small quantities, either in lumps or as powder, are commonly found in ancient graves, placed there for personal embellishment in the future existence. The highly siliceous varieties are often very hard, heavy, and tough, and make excellent implements. They were used especially in the manufacture of celts, axes, scrapers, etc., and for the rudely shaped hammers and sledges that served in mining work, as in the iron mines at Leslie, Mo. (Holmes). Many of the celts and celt-like implements are quite small, and in some cases probably served as amulets. Grooved axes of this material are of somewhat rare occurrence, but objects of problematical use, such as cones, hemispheres, and plummets, are common, and on account of their high finish, richness of color, and luster, are much prized by collectors. Hematite objects are found in mounds and on dwelling sites in the middle Mississippi valley region, in the Ohio valley, and extending into e. Kentucky and Tennessee to w. North Carolina, and to a limited extent in the S., in the Pueblo country, and on the Pacific coast. A small, well-shaped figure of this material, representing a bird, and neatly inlaid with turquoise and white shell, is among the collections obtained by Pepper from the Pueblo Bonito ruin, New Mexico. Hematite is not always readily distinguishable from limonite (which is generally yellowish or brownish in tint), and from some other forms of iron ore. See Mines and Quarries.

References to hematite objects are widely distributed throughout the literature of American archeology. Among others the following authors may be consulted: Douglass in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., viii, 1896; Fewkes (1) in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 730, 1898, (2) in 21st Rep. B. A. E., 77, 1903; Fowke in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 1896; Holmes in Smithsonian Rep. 1903, 1904; Moorehead, Prehist. Impls., 1900; Pepper in Am. Anthropol., vii, 195, 1905. (w. H. H.)

Hembem. A former Maidu village on the e. side of North fork of American r., about 6 m. s. e. of Colfax, Placer co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pl. xxxviii, 1905.

Hemispheres, Spheres. Small objects, usually of polished stone, the use of which has not been fully determined; they are therefore classed with problematical objects. The more typical forms, found in the mounds, are often of hematite and, like the cones, rarely exceed a few ounces in weight. Hemispheres are comparatively numerous, but spheres referable to this group are rare. Hammerstones and stones used as club-heads (see Clubs, Hammers) are often spherical, but usually they are not well finished, and occasionally large cannonball-like stones are found which can not be properly classed with the smaller polished objects. The base of the hemispheres is flat, rarely slightly hollowed out, and varies from a circle to a decided ellipse, while the vertical section departs considerably from a true semicircle. Typical objects of this group are most plentiful in the middle Ohio valley. It is surmised that they served in playing some game, as talismans or charms, or for some special shamanistic purpose. According to Grinnell (inf'n, 1906) small balls of stone are still used by some Plains tribes in a game. Little girls roll them on the ice in winter, trying to move a small stick resting on the ice in front of the opposing party, perhaps 20 ft distant. If the stick is touched and moved, the side which rolls the ball may roll it again, and a point is counted. If the stick is not moved, the ball is rolled by one of the opposing party who endeavors to move the stick which rests on the ice in front of her opponent.

A small stone sphere was used by the Pima of Arizona in a kicked ball game, and numerous small spheres, usually of soft stone, are found in prehistoric ruins in Salt river valley of the same territory.

Hemptown (translation of the native name, Gatûn'li'yi). A former Cherokee settlement on a creek of the same name, near the present Morganton, Fannin co., Ga.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 519, 1900.

Henaggi. An Athapaskan tribe or band residing, according to Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 65, 1877), on Smith r., Cal. A treaty was made with them Aug. 17, 1857. It is said they were exceedingly hostile to the neighboring bands to whom they were related, but this hostility was probably only a temporary feud. They are seemingly extinct.

Henakyalaso (Hé'nakyalasö). An ancestor of a gens of the Kwakiutl tribe Tlatlasikoala, after whom it was sometimes called.—Eos in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Hendrick. A Mohawk chief, son of The Wolf, a Mohegan, and a Mohawk woman; often called King Hendrick. With many of his men he participated in the campaign against the French in 1755, and notwithstanding the strong tendency of Braddock's defeat in that year to draw the Indians to the side of the French, Hendrick, at the request of Gen. Johnson, joined the English army, which met 2,000 French under Gen. Dieskau at Lake George, N. Y. At the battle which there took place, Sept. 8, 1755, Hendrick and many of his followers were killed. He was then less than 70 years of age.

Henicohio. Mentioned, in connection with Puaray, apparently as a pueblo of the Tigua in New Mexico in 1598.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. Inéd., xvi, 115, 1871.

Henicane. A former tribe in s. Texas, encountered by Fernando del Bosque in 1675 and said to number 178, including 65 warriors. They were probably related to the Coahuiltecan tribes.

Henicane.—Fernando del Bosque (1675), in Nat. Geog. Mag., xiv, 346, 1908.

Henry, William. See Gelelemend.

Hens. Seemingly derived from a New England Indian cognate of Algonkin, Chippewa, and Cree ens, 'a shell,' especially a small shell, with which may be compared the Natick anna (?anna) and the Abnaki als (l=n). The early English colonists of New England by prefixing h formed hens, which they applied to the quahaug, quahock, or poquahock, 'a little thick shellfish' (Venus mercenaria), from an interior portion of the shell of which the New England Indians manufactured suckauhock, 'black or purple beads,' commonly called purple wampum. See Wampum. (J. N. B. H.)

Henuti. The extinct Cloud clan of the pueblo of Sia, N. Mex.

Hén'-na-ti.—Stevenson in 11th Rep. B. A. E., 19, 1894. Hé'-nauti-háno.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 349, 1896 (háno='people').

Henya. A Tlingit tribe on the w. coast of Prince of Wales id., Alaska, between Tlevak narrows and Sumner strait; pop. 300 in 1869, 500 in 1881, 262 in 1890, and about the same in 1900. Their chief town is Klawak; other towns are Shakan and Tuxican. The social divisions of the tribe are Ganahadi, Hlkoayedí, Kakos hit tan, Kuhinedi, Shunkukedi, Takwanedi, and Tanedi. (J. R. S.)

A. E., 1904.

Hepowwoo. A former Luisefio village in the neighborhood of San Luis Rey mission, s. Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 11, 1860.

Heraldry. Among the tribes of the great plains, and perhaps of other sections, there existed a well-defined system of military and family designation comparable with the heraldic system of Europe. It found its chief expression in the painting and other decoration of the shield and tipi, with the body paint and adornment of the warrior himself, and was guarded by means of religious tabu and other ceremonial regulations. The heraldic tipis, which might number one-tenth of the whole body, usually belonged to prominent families by hereditary descent. The shield belonged to the individual warrior, but several warriors might carry shields of the same origin and pattern at the same time, while so far as known the heraldic tipi had no contemporary duplicate. Both tipi and shield were claimed as the inspiration of a vision, and the design and decoration were held to be in accordance with the instructions imparted to the first maker by the protecting spirit of his dream. The tipi is commonly named from the most notable feature of the painting, as the 'buffalo tipi,' 'star tipi,' etc. The shield was more often known by the name of the originator and maker of the series, but certain more noted series were known as the 'buffalo shield,' 'bird shield,' 'sun shield,' etc., the 'medicine' or protecting power being believed to come from the buffalo, bird, or sun spirits respectively. Shields of the same origin were usually but not necessarily retained in the possession of members of the family of the original maker, and handed down in time to younger members of the family, unless buried with the owner. A certain price must be paid and certain tabus constantly observed by the owner of either shield or tipi. Thus the heir to a certain heraldic tipi in the Kiowa tribe must pay for it a captive taken in war, while those who carried the bird shield were forbidden to approach a dead bird, and were under obligation on killing their first enemy in battle to eat a portion of his heart. Those of the same shield generally used a similar body paint and headdress, pony decorations, and war cry, all having direct reference to the spirit of the original vision, but no such regulation appears to have existed in connection with any tipi. The flag carried on the upper Columbia by the followers of the prophet Smohalla is an instance of the adaptation of Indian symbolism to the white man's usage (Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896).

Among the Haida and some other tribes of the N. W. coast, according to Swanton and other authorities, is found the germ of a similar system. Here, in many cases, the clan totem, or perhaps the personal manito of the individual, has evolved into a crest which persons of the highest rank, i. e. of greatest wealth, are privileged to figure by carving or painting upon their totem poles, houses, or other belongings, tattooing upon their bodies, or painting upon their bodies in the dance, on payment of a sufficient number of "potlatch" gifts to secure recognition as chiefs or leading members of the tribe. The privilege is not hereditary, the successor of the owner, usually his sister's son, being obliged to make the same ceremonial payment to secure the continuance of the privilege. (J. M.)

Hermho (Herm'-ho, 'once'). A Pima village on the N. side of Salt r., 3 m. from Mesa, Maricopa co., s. Ariz.—Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 1902. Ā'mā Ā'kimālt.—Russell, ibid.

Hero Myths. See Mythology, Religion.

Herring Pond. A former settlement on a reserve established for Christian Indians in 1655 at Herring Pond, Plymouth co., Mass. It is probably identical with Comassakumkanit, mentioned by Bourne in 1674, and the Indians there seem to have been considered a distinct tribe. In 1825 there were but 40 left, and these were of mixed blood. (J. M.)

Heshokta ('ancient town of the cliffs'). A ruined pueblo, formerly inhabited by the Zuni, on a mesa about 5 m. N. W. of Zuni pueblo, N. Mex. Cf. Shopakin. Heshoktakwin.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 291, 1885 (Heshoktakwin, or). Heshokta.—Cushing, Zuni Folk Tales, 265, 1901. Hesh-o-ta-thin-al-la.—Fewkes in Jour. Am. Ethnol. and Archeol., 1, 111, 1891.

Heshota Ayahltona ('ancient buildings above'). The ruins of a group of stone houses on the summit of Taalyalana, or Seed mtn., commonly called Thunder mtn., about 4 m. S. E. of Zuni pueblo, N. Mex. This mesa has been a place of refuge for the Zuni at various periods since they have been known to history, Coronado mentioning it as such, although not by name, in 1540. In 1632, after having killed their first missionary, the Zuni fled to the heights, remaining there until 1635. The ruined pueblo now to be seen on the summit was built probably about 1680, on the site of the ancient fortifications alluded to by Coronado, as a refuge against Spanish invasion during the Pueblo revolt of that year, when the villages in the valley below—those that remained of the Seven Cities of Cibola—were abandoned. The tribe doubtless occupied this stronghold uninterrupted for at least 12 years during the Pueblo revolt, being found there by Vargas in 1692. In 1703 the Zuni again fled to their mesa village, after having killed 4 Spanish soldiers. This time they remained until 1705, when they returned to the valley and began to build the present Zúñi pueblo on a part of the site of Halona. The ruins of Heshota Ayahltona have been mistakenly regarded by some writers as the ancient Cibola, hence are often noted on maps as Old Zúñi. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 89, 1891; Bandelier (1) in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 134, 1890; IV, 335, 1892, (2) Doc. Hist. Zúñi, in Jour. Am. Heshota Hluptsina ('Héshota-'hlúp-tsina, 'ancient village of the yellow rocks'). A prehistoric ruined stone pueblo of the Zúñi, situated between the "gateway" and the summer village of Pescado, 7 m. e. of Zúñi pueblo, N. Mex. (F. W. H.) Heshota Hluptsina.—Bandelier in Rev. d'Ethnog., 200, 1896 (misprint). Hesh-o-ta-sop-al-na.—Fewkes in Jour. Am. Ethnol. and Archæol., I, map, 1891. Heshota Hlu-tsina.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 333, 1892. Heshotathlú'ptina.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 291, 1885. Village of the Yellow Rocks.—Cushing, Zúñi Folk Tales, 104, 1901.

Heshota Imkoskwin ('ancient town surrounded by mountains'). A ruined pueblo near Tawyakwin, or Nutria, anciently occupied by the northern clans of the Zúñi.—Cushing, inf'n, 1891.

He-sho-ta Im-'k'oe-kwi-a.—Cushing, inf'n, 1891 (another form). Heshota Im-quosh-kuin.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Heshota Uthla ('Héshota-ú'hla, 'ancient town of the embrasure'). A prehistoric ruined stone pueblo of the elliptical type, supposed to be of Zúñi origin; situated at the base of a mesa on Zúñi r., about 5 m. w. of the Zúñi summer village of Ojo Pescado, or Heshotatsina, N. Mex. So named, according to Cushing, because it was embraced by hills, and by the turn of a northern trail. (F. W. H.)

Heshota Uthla.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 22, 1892 (misprint). Heshota U-thla.—Ibid., 329. Heshotau'uthla.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 291, 1885.

Hesque. The principal village of the Hesquiat (q. v.), on Hesquiat harbor, Vancouver id.—Can. Ind. Aff., 264, 1902.

Hespatigh. A village in 1657, probably belonging to the Unami Delawares, and apparently in N. New Jersey (Deed of 1657 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIV, 393, 1883). A clue to the locality is given by Nelson (Inds. N. J., 124, 1894), who records Espatingh, or Ispatingh, as the name of a hill back of Bergen, or about Union Hill, in 1650.

Hesquiat. A Nootka tribe on Hesquiat harbor and the coast to the westward, Vancouver id.; pop. 162 in 1901, 150 in 1904. Their principal village is Hesheque. Esquates.—Jewitt, Narr., 37, 1849. He'ekwiah.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 81, 1890. Hesh-que-ah.—Can. Ind. Hia ('band of Cree'). A former Arikara band under chief Cherenakuta, or Yellow Wolf.

Hi'-a.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol., 357, 1862.

Hiabu. A tribe met by De Leon, in company with the Hapes, Jumanes (Jumano), and Mescales, near the Rio Grande, not far from the present Laredo, Tex., in 1696. It was probably a Coahuiltecan tribe.

Xiabu.—De Leon (1696) in Texas Hist. Ass. Quar., VIII, 205, 1905.

Hiamonee. A former Seminole village 5 m. from the Georgia boundary, on the n. bank of Oklokee r., probably on the present L. Lamony, Leon co., Fla.

Hiamonee.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Hianagony. Mentioned by Joutel (Margry, Déc., III, 409, 1878) as a tribe living probably in n. Texas in 1687, and hostile to the Kadohadacho.

Hiantatsi. Mentioned by Joutel (Margry, Déc., III, 409, 1878) as a tribe living probably in n. Texas in 1687, and hostile to the Kadohadacho.

Hiaqua. Shell money and ornaments, composed of strings of dentalia, used by Indians of the n. Pacific coast. This word, which has been variously spelled haiqua, hioqua, hiqua, hykwa, iokwa, ioqua, etc., and even Iroquois, is derived from the name for dentalium in the Chinook jargon. (A. F. C.)

Hiatam (Hí'-a-tam, 'sea-sand place,' from Hakatchik). A Pima village n. of Maricopa station on the S. P. R. R., s. Ariz.—Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 18, 1902.

Hiawatha (Haio'-hwa'-tha', 'he makes rivers'). A name and a title of a chieftainship hereditary in the Tortoise clan of the Mohawk tribe; it is the second on the roll of federal chieftainships of the Iroquois confederation. The first known person to bear the name was a noted reformer, statesman, legislator, and magician, justly celebrated as one of the founders of the League of the Iroquois, the Confederation of Five Nations. Tradition makes him a prophet also. He probably flourished about 1570, A. D., and was the disciple and active coadjutor of Dekanawida. These two sought to bring about reforms which had for their object the ending of all strife, murder, and war, and the promotion of universal peace and well-being. Of these one was the regulation to abolish the wasting evils of intratribal blood-feud by fixing a more or less arbitrary price—10 strings of wampum, a cubit in length—as the value of a human life. It was decreed that the murderer or his kin or family must offer to pay the bereaved family not only for the dead person, but also for the life of the murderer who by his sinister act had forfeited his life to them, and that therefore 20 strings of wampum should be the legal tender to the bereaved family for the settlement of the homicide of a co-tribesman. By birth Hiawatha was probably a Mohawk, but he began the work of reform among the Onondaga, where he encountered bitter opposition from one of their most crafty and remorseless tyrants, Wathatatohro (Atotarho). After three fruitless attempts to unfold his scheme of reform in council, being thwarted by the craft of his formidable antagonist (who for revenge destroyed his opponent's daughters), Hiawatha left the Onondaga and, exiling himself, sought the aid of the Mohawk and other tribes. But, meeting with little success among the former, he continued his mission to the Oneida, who willingly assented to his plans on condition that the Mohawk should do the same. The Mohawk, the Cayuga, and the Oneida finally formed a tentative union for the purpose of persuading the Onondaga to adopt the plan of confederation, and the latter accepted it on condition that the Seneca should also be included. A portion of the Seneca finally joined the confederation, whereon the Onondaga, through Wathatatohro, accepted the proposed union. As the Onondaga chieftain was regarded as a great sorcerer, it was inferred that in this matter he had been overcome by superior magic power exercised by Hiawatha and Dekanawida, for they had brought Wathatatohro under the dominion of law and convention for the common welfare. Hence in time the character of Hiawatha became enveloped in mystery, and he was reputed to have done things which properly belong to some of the chief gods of the Iroquois. In this mystified form he became the central figure of a cycle of interrelated legends. Longfellow has made the name of Hiawatha everywhere familiar, but not so the character of the great reformer. Schoolcraft, in his Algonic Researches, embodied a large number of legends relating to Chippewa gods and demigods, and, while compiling his Notes on the Iroquois, Gen. Clark communicated to him this cycle of mythic legends misapplied to Hiawatha. Charmed with the poetic setting of these tales, Schoolcraft confused Hiawatha with Manabozho, a Chippewa deity, and it is to these two collections of mythic and legendary lore that the English language owes the charming poem of Longfellow, in which there is not a single fact or fiction relating to the great Iroquoian reformer and statesman. Hicaranacu. An ancient Timuquanan village in n. Florida.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., II, map, 1591.

Hicocora, Hicocory. See Hickory.

Hichakhshepara ('eagle'). A subgens of the Waninkikikarachada, the Bird gens of the Winnebago.

Hi-taa-gee-pa-rá.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897.

Hichuato. A subdivision or settlement of the Tehueco, probably inhabiting the lower Rio Fuerte or the Fuerte-Mayo divide, in n. w. Sinaloa, Mex.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864.

Hickerau. A small Santee village on a branch of Santee r., S. C., in 1701.

Black house.—Lawson (1714), Hist. Carolina, 46, 1860 (so called by traders). Hickerau.—Ibid.

Hickory. A walnut tree belonging to any one of several species of the genus Hicoria. The word is spelled by early writers in a great variety of ways: po-hickery (Farrar, 1853), peckickery (Shrigley, 1869), peckikery, pokickery, hickorie, hiccora, hiccory, hickory (1882), etc. Capt. John Smith (Hist. Va., II, 26, 1624) describes pawcohiccora, a food of the Algonquian Indians of Virginia, as a preparation of pounded walnut kernels with water. From the cluster words pawcohiccora, etc., transferred by the whites from the food to the tree, has been derived hickory. Derivative words and terms are: Hickory-borer (Cyllene picta), hickory-elm (Ulmus racemosa), hickory-eucalyptus (Eucalyptus punctata), hickory-girdler (Oncideres cingulatus), hickory-head (the ruddy duck), hickory nut (the nut of the hickory, specifically of Hicoria ovata or H. laciniata), hickory-oak (Quercus chrysolepis), hickory-pine (Pinus balfouriana and P. pungens), hickory pole (a Democratic party emblem), hickory poplar (Liriodendron tulipifera), hickory-shad (the gizzard-shad), hickory shirt (a coarse cotton shirt). As an adjective the word hickory took on the sense of firm, unyielding, stubborn, as applied to religious sectarians, members of a political party, etc. Gen. Andrew Jackson was called "Old Hickory." In Waterloo co., Ontario, according to W. J. Wintemberg, the German residents call a Pennsylvania German a Hickory, possibly in reference to their fellows in Pennsylvania having voted the Jackson ticket. (A. F. C.)

Hickory Indians. A small band formerly occupying a village near Lancaster, Pa. (Day, Penn., 397, 1843). Probably a part of the Delawares.

Hickory Log. A former Cherokee settlement on Etowah r., a short distance above Canton, Cherokee co., Ga.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 545, 1900. Wane'-asāi'-dāyi.—Mooney, ibid. ('hickory foot-log place': native name).

Hickorytown. A former Munsee and Delaware village, probably about East Hickory or West Hickory, Forest co., Pa. On account of the hostility of the western tribes the Indians here removed in 1791 to the Seneca and were by them settled near Cattaraugus, N. Y. (J. M.)

Hickory town.—Procter (1791) in Am. State Papers, Ind. AM., I, 164, 1832. Munsee settlement.—Ibid., 153.

Histoba. One of the 5 divisions of the Dakota recorded by Pachot (Margry, Déc., VI, 518, 1886) about 1722. Unidentified.

Seloux de la chasse.—Ibid.

Hidatsa. A Siouan tribe living, since first known to the whites, in the vicinity of the junction of Knife r. with the Missouri, North Dakota, in intimate connection with the Mandan and Arikara. Their language is closely akin to that of the Crows, with whom they claim to have been united until some time before the historic period, when the two separated in consequence of a quarrel over the division of some game, the Crows then drawing off farther to the w.

The name Hidatsa, by which they now call themselves, has been said, with doubtful authority, to mean 'willows,' and is stated by Matthews to have been originally the name only of a principal village of the tribe in their old home on Knife r. (see Elahsa). It probably came to be used as the tribe name, after the smallpox epidemic of 1837, from the consolidation of the survivors of the other two villages with those of Hidatsa. By the Mandan they are known as Minitari, signifying 'they crossed the water,' traditionally said to refer to their having crossed Missouri r. from the e. The Sioux call them Hewaktokto, said to mean 'dwellers on a ridge,' but more probably signifying 'spreading tipis,' or 'tipis in a row,' the name by which they are known to the Cheyenne and Arapaho. The sign gesture in each case would be nearly the same (Mooney). The Crows call them Amashi, 'earth lodges,' and they are now officially known as Gros Ventres (q. v.), a name applied also to the Atsina, a detached tribe of the Arapaho.

According to their own tradition the Hidatsa came from the neighborhood of a lake N. E. of their later home, and identified by some of their traditionists with Mini-wakan or Devils lake, N. Dak. They had here the circular earth-covered log house, in use also by the Mandan, Arikara, and other tribes living close along the upper Missouri, in addition to the skin tipi occupied when on the hunt. Removing from there, perhaps in consequence of attacks by the Sioux, they moved S. W. and allied themselves with the Mandan, who then lived on the W. side of the Missouri, about the mouth of Heart r. The three tribes, Hidatsa, Mandan, and Arikara were all living in this vicinity about 1765. From the Mandan the Hidatsa learned agriculture. Some time before 1796 these two tribes moved up the river to the vicinity of Knife r., where they were found by Lewis and Clark in 1804, the Hidatsa being then in three villages immediately on Knife r., while the Mandan, in two villages, were a few miles lower down, on the Missouri. The largest of the three villages of the tribe was called Hidatsa and was on the N. bank of Knife r. The other two, Amatiha and Am-hami, or Mahaha, were on the S. side. The last named was occupied by the Amahami (Ahnahaway of Lewis and Clark), formerly a distinct but closely related tribe. In consequence of the inroads of the Sioux they had been so far reduced that they had been compelled to unite with the Hidatsa, and have long since been completely absorbed. The three villages together had a population of about 600 warriors, equivalent to about 2,100 souls. Of these the Amahami counted about 50 warriors. There was no change in the location of the villages until after the terrible smallpox epidemic of 1837, which so greatly reduced the Indian population of the upper Missouri, and in consequence of which the survivors of the three villages consolidated into one. In 1845 they, and about the same time the remnant of the Mandan also, moved up the river and established themselves in a new village (see Hidatsanti) close to the trading post of Ft Berthold, on the N. bank of the Missouri and some distance below the entrance of the Little Missouri, in North Dakota. In 1862 the Arikara moved up to the same location, the three tribes now occupying a reservation of 884,780 acres on the N. E. side of the Missouri, including the site of the village. In 1905 the Hidatsa (Gros Ventres) were officially reported to number only 471.

Early writers describe the Hidatsa as somewhat superior intellectually and physically to their neighbors, although according to Matthews this is not so evident in later days. In home life, religious beliefs and customs, house building, agriculture, the use of the skin boat, and general arts, they closely resembled the Mandan with whom they were associated. Their great ceremony was the Sun dance, called by them Da-hpi-ke, which was accompanied with various forms of torture. Their warriors were organized into various military societies, as is the case with the Plains tribes generally.

Morgan (Anc. Soc., 159, 1877) gives a list of 7 Hidatsa "gentes," which were probably really original village names, or possibly society names, viz: Mit-che-ro'-ka ('knife'), Min-ne-pa-ta ('water'), Ba-ho-ha'-ta ('lodge'), Seech-ka-be-ruh-pa'-ka ('prairie chicken'), E-tish-sho'-ka ('hill people'), Ah-nah-ha-nu'-me-te (an unknown animal), E-ku'-pa-be-ka ('bonnet'). The list of "bands" given by Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. 1850, 143, 1851) is really a list of military societies, viz: Fox, Foolish Dog, Old Dog, Bull, and Black-tailed Deers.

Hidlis Hadjo. See Hillis Hadjo.

Highahwixon. One of several tribes displaced by the whites in 1651 from their homes in Charles and St Mary cos., Md., and given a tract at the head of the Wisconsin. They were probably Comco. —Bozman, Maryland, 11, 421, 1837.

High Tower Forks. A former Cherokee settlement mentioned in a document of 1799 (Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887). It was probably one of the places called Etowah (J'tdwa'), q. v.

Higos (Indios de los Higos, Span.: 'Fig Indians'). A tribe of s. Texas, so named by Cabeza de Vaca in 1528 (Smith trans.; 84, 1851) from their custom of subsisting on the prickly pear, or tuna, in its season. Cabeza de Vaca states that they counted the seasons by the ripening of the fruits, the "dying" or (according to Smith) the biting of the fish, and by the appearance of certain constellations. Nothing is known of their ethnic relations. (A. C. F.)

Higtiguk. A former Aleut village on Agattu id., Alaska, one of the Near id. group of the Aleutians, now uninhabited.

Hihages. An unidentified Lower Creek town mentioned in a census list of 1833.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iv, 578, 1854.

Hihakanhanhanwin ('women the skin of whose teeth dangles'). A band of the Brulé Teton Sioux.

Hi-ha kanhanhan win.—Dorsey (after Cleveland) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 219, 1897. Hi-ha ka-ha-ha-wi.—Ibid.

Hihames. A former tribe of Coahuila, N. E. Mexico, which was gathered into the mission of El Santo Nombre de Jesus Peyotes when it was refounded in 1698. This tribe probably belonged to the Coahuiltecan family.

Gijames.—Morfi (1777) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, 1, 611, 1886. Hijames.—Revillagigedo (1793), ibid. Xijames.—Ibid.

Hilakwitiyas (Hil-á-kwi-ti-yús). A former Siuslaw village on or near Siuslaw r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, 111, 230, 1890.

Hilksuk. A former Aleut village on Agattu id., Alaska, one of the Near id. group of the Aleutians, now uninhabited.

Hillabi (pron. hi'-la-pi). A former Upper Creek town near the present Ashland, Clay co., Ala., in the "central district" between Coosa and Tallapoosa rs., on Koufadi cr., a branch of Hillabee cr. Most of the Hillabi people had settled before 1799 in the 4 villages called Hlanudshiapala, Anatichapko, Istudshilaika, and Uktahasaasi. In the vicinity of Hillabi town its inhabitants, with other "Red Sticks," or hostiles, were vanquished by Jackson's army, Nov. 18, 1813, when 316 of them were killed or captured and their town devastated. (A. S. G.)

Hillabee.—Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. iv, 54, 1848. Halle-bae.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776 (on w. bank of Loueshatchee [Tallapoosa] r.). Hallibee.—Drake, Ind. Hillabi. A town of the Creek Nation, s. w. of Eufaula, between North fork and Canadian r., Ind. T.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., 1, 185, 1888.

Hillis Hadjo. (hilis 'medicine', hadsho 'crazy', an official at the busk, q. v.). A noted Seminole leader in the early part of the 19th century, usually known among the whites as Francis the Prophet, and whose name is also recorded as Hidlis Hadjo, Hillishago, Hillishager, etc. He took an active part in the Seminole war, and is accused of having been one of the chief instigators of the second uprising. He seems to have come into public notice as early as 1814, as on Apr. 18 of that year Gen. Jackson wrote from his camp at the junction of Coosa and Tallapoosa rs., Ala., that "Hillishagee, their [the Seminole's] great prophet, has absconded." Led by some abandoned English traders to believe that the treaty of Ghent in 1814 provided for the restoration of the Seminole country, and in the hope of obtaining aid for his tribe against the Americans, he went to England, where he received much attention. An English journal thus mentions his arrival: "The sound of trumpets announced the approach of the patriot Francis, who fought so gloriously in our cause in America during the late war. Being dressed in a most splendid suit of red and gold, and wearing a tomahawk set with gold, gave him a highly imposing appearance." His mission led to no practical result. Near the close of 1817 an American named McKrimmon, who had been captured by a Seminole party, was taken to Mikasuki, where dwelt Hillis Hadjo, who ordered him to be burned to death, but at the last moment his life was saved by the entreaties of Milly (q. v.), the chief's daughter, who, when her father wavered, showed her determination to perish with him. Francis shortly thereafter fell into the hands of the Americans and was hanged. His wife and several daughters afterward surrendered to the Americans at St Marks, Fla., where Milly received much attention from the whites, but refused McKrimmon's offer of marriage until assured that it was not because of his obligation to her for saving his life. (c. r.)

Hilys. An unidentified tribe, said to have lived on Laredo channel, Brit. Col., about lat. 52° 30' (Scott in Ind. Aff. Rep., 316, 1868). This is in the country of the Kittizoo.

Doc. 74 (1823). 19th Cong., 1st sess., 23, 1826 (the last two syllables of this name are joined to the next town name, -chicu-chaty). Hich-a-pue-susse.—Bell, op. cit. Hichpuckasasa.—Taylor, War map, 1838.

Hitchiti (Creek: ahitchita, 'to look upstream'). A Muskogean tribe formerly residing chiefly in a town of the same name on the E. bank of Chattahoochee r., 4 m. below Chiaha, and possessing a narrow strip of good land bordering on the river, in w. Georgia. When Hawkins visited them in 1799 they had spread out into two branch settlements—one, the Hitchitudshi, or Little Hitchiti, on both sides of Flint r. below the junction of Kinchafoonee cr., which passes through a country named after it; the other, Tutalosi, on a branch of Kinchafoonee cr., 20 m. w. of Hitchitudshi. The tribe is not often mentioned in history, and appears for the first time in 1733, when two of its delegates, with the Lower Creek chiefs, met Gov. Oglethorpe at Savannah. The language appears to have extended beyond the limits of the tribe as here defined, as it was spoken not only in the towns on the Chattahoochee, as Chiaha, Chiahudshi, Hitchiti, Oconee, Sawokli, Sawokliudshi, and Apalachicola, and in those on Flint r., but by the Mikasuki, and, as traceable by the local names, over considerable portions of Georgia and Florida. The Seminole are also said to have been a half Creek and half Hitchiti speaking people, although their language is now almost identical with Creek; and it is supposed that the Yamasi likewise spoke the Hitchiti language. This language, like the Creek, has an archaic form called "woman's talk," or female language. The Hitchiti were absorbed into and became an integral part of the Creek Nation, though preserving to a large extent their own language and peculiar customs. (A. S. G.)

Achilia.—Jefferys, French Dom. Am., I, 134, map, 1761 (incorrectly located; false orthography). At-pasha-ahliha.—Gatschet, Koasati MS., B. A. E. (Koasati name: 'mean people'). Echetees.—Carver, Travels, map, 1778. Echetas.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, 7, 1776 (town on Apalachicola r. Leg., I, 137, 1884. Thabloc-ko.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 276, op. cit. Thlobloco-town.—Jesup (1836) in H. R. Doc. 78, 25th Cong., 2d sess., 48, 1838. Thlobthloco.—H. R. Doc. 274, op. cit. Thlob Thloco.—Sen. Ex. Doc. 425, 24th Cong., 1st sess., 257, 1836. Thlobthloco.—Woodward, Reminis., 91, 1859.

Hlaphlako. A town of the Creek Nation, on Alabama cr., n. of the North fork of Canadian r., Okla.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 185, 1888.

Hlahla ('Hla'-u'hla, 'surrounded by arrow-shaft bushes'). The ruins of a small but traditionally important Zuñi pueblo near a small spring about 10 m. N. N. E. of Zuñi, N. Mex. (F. H. C.) Olax-utab-la.—Fewkes in Jour. Am. Ethnol. and Archaeol., I, 100, 1891. 'Hla'-u'hla.—Cushing, inf'n, 1891.

Hlankwima ('Hlaukwí'ma). The native name of the South town of Taos pueblo, N. Mex. (F. W. H.)

Hlanuma ('Hlauu'ma). The native name of the North town of Taos pueblo, N. Mex. (F. W. H.)

Hleetakwe ('Hle'-e-tá-kwe). The northwestern migration of the Bear, Crane, Frog, Deer, Yellow-wood, and other clans of the ancestral pueblo of Zuñi.—Cushing quoted by Powell, 4th Rep. B. A. E., xxxviii, 1886. See Pishla Ateuna.

Hlekatohka ('Le-kátchka, or 'Li-kátchka, from 'le or 'li, 'arrow', kátchka, 'broken': 'broken arrow'). A former Lower Creek town on a trail ford crossing Chattahoochee r., 12 m. below Kasihta, on the w. side of the river, probably in Russell co., Ala. According to Hawkins (Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 858, 1832) the settlement was destroyed in 1814; but it was apparently reestablished, as it was represented in the treaty of Nov. 15, 1827, and a census of 1832 (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, IV, 578, 1854) gives the number of families as 331 in that year. (A. S. G.)

Broken Arrow.—Carey (1792) in Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 323, 1832. Broken Arrow Old Field.—Robertson (1796), ibid., 600. Chalagatso.—Swan (1791) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 262, 1855. Horse-path-town.—Sen. Ex. Doc. 425, 24th Cong., 1st sess., 135, 1836. 'Lákátchka.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 137, 1884. Tribes, IV, 578, 1854. Thlaeotaka.—Woodward, Reminis., 85, 1859. Thla-katch-ka.—Sen. Ex. Doc. 425, 24th Cong., 1st sess., 135, 1836.

Hlekataka ('Le kátaka). The settlement of an offshoot of the Kawita on Arkansas r., almost opposite Wialaka and near Coweta (Kawita), in the Creek Nation, Okla.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., II, 185, 1888.

Hlgadun (Ĥgada'n, 'suffering from overwork'). A town of the Skidai-lanas on Moresby id., opposite and facing Anthony id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It is prominent in Haida mythology.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Hlgædlin (Ĥgå'-lin, probably 'where they wash the frames upon which salal berries are dried'). A Haida town occupied by a branch of the Kona-kegawai called Sus-haidagai; situated on the s. side of Tanoo id., s. E. Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Hlgagilda-kegawai (Ĥgaq'lda q'-gawa-i, 'those born at Hlgagilda,' i. e., Skidegate). A subdivision of the Hlgaiulanas family of the Haida.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 269, 1905.

Hlgahet (Ēgā'xet, 'pebble town'.) A former Haida town near Skidegate, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was purchased from its earlier owners, the Kogangas, by a branch of the Yaku-lanas who were afterward known as the Hlgahetgu-lanas, from the name of their town. (J. R. S.)

Kil-hait-hādd.—Krause, Tlinkit Indianer, 304, 1885 ('people of Hlgahet'). Tig-ā'it.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 24, 1898 (misapplied to to Old Gold Harbor).

Hlgahet-gitinaí (Ēgā'xet gítinā'-i, 'Gitins of Pebble-town'). A division of the Eagle clan of the Haida, for which Gitins was a second name. They moved from Hlgahet, the old town near Skidegate, to Chaahl on the w. coast, along with other families (see Hlgahetgu-lanas). Originally they and the Gitins of Skidegate constituted one family. The Djahui-hlgahet-kegawai, Yaku-gitinaí, Hlgahet-kegawai, and Gweundus were subdivisions. (J. R. S.)

Ēgā'xet gítinā'-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 274, 1905. Tig-ā'it gyit'inaí.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 24, 1898.

Hlgahetgu-lanas (Ēgā'xet-gu-lā'nas, 'people of Pebble-town'). The most important division of the Raven clan of the Haida, on the w. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It received its name from an old town near Skidegate, where the people formerly lived. Before this they were part of the Yaku-lanas and lived at Lawn hill, but trouble arising, they were driven away and purchased the town of Hlgahet from the Kogangas. Later another war forced them to move to the w. coast. (J. R. S.)

Ēgā'xet-gu-lā'nas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905. Lth'ait Lennaa.—Harrison in Proc. and Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 125, 1895. Tig-ā'itgu-lā'nas.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 24, 1898.

Hlgahet-kegawai (Ēgā'xet-qē'gawa-i, 'those born at Pebble-town'). A subdivision of the Hlgahet-gitinaí, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida, or only another name for that family.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 274, 1905.

Hlgai (Ēgā'i). Said to have been the name of a town at the head of Skedans bay, w. coast of the Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Hlgaiha (Ēga'-ira, from lgai 'to dig', ra 'to put in'). A semi-legendary Haida town n. of Dead Tree pt., at the entrance of Skidegate inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. From this place the great Gitins family of Skidegate is said to have sprung.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 99, 1905.

Hlgaiu (Ēgāi-u', probably 'place of stones'). A town and camping place of the Djahui-ekwahladagai of the Haida,

s. of Dead Tree pt., at the entrance to Skidegate inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. One of the names of the town of Skidegate is said to have been derived from this. (J. R. S.)

Kit-hai-u'as hādd.—Krause, Tlinkit Indianer, 304, 1885 (possibly identical). Ēgāi-u'.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Hlgaiu-lanas (Ēgāi-ū' lā'nas, 'Skidegate town people'). A division of the Raven clan of the Haida who originally owned the town of Skidegate, Brit. Col., and hence came to be called by the Haida name of the town. Later they gave the town to the Gitins in payment for an injury inflicted on one of the latter, and moved to Gaodjaos, farther up the inlet. A subdivision was called Hlgagilda-kegawai. (J. R. S.)

Ēgāi-ū' lā'nas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 269, 1905.

Tlāiyā Hāddā.—Harrison in Proc. and Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 125, 1895 (erroneously assigned to Old Gold Harbor). Tig-āio lā'naa.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 24, 1898. Tlāiyā lā'naa.—Boas, 5th Rep. of same, 26, 1889.

Hlgan (Ēgan, 'killer-whale's dorsal fin'). A Haida town s. of Tigun, on the w. coast of Graham id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col., occupied by the Dostlan-lnagai. The Koetas are said to have lived at this place before they moved to Alaska, and the town is said to have been so named on account of a rock which stands up in front of it like the dorsal fin of a killer-whale. (J. R. S.)

Ēgan.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905. Ē'ān.—Swanton, inf'n, 1905 (another form).

Hlgihla-ala (Ēgi'ta āla, probably 'town of the ditches'). A former Haida town n. of Cape Ball, e. shore of Graham id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Naikun-kegawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Hlielung (Ēi'elān). A former Haida town of the Kuna-lanas family on the right bank of a river of the same name (Hi-ellen on Dawson's chart), which flows into Dixon entrance at the foot of Tow hill, n. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. The town was erroneously thought by Dawson (Queen Charlotte Ids., 165a, 1880) to be the Ne-coon of John Work. (J. R. S.)

Hieller.—Deans, Tales from Hideroy, 92, 1899. Lā'gna.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Ēi'elān.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Hlielung-keawai (Ēi'elān qē'awa-i, 'those born at the town of Hlielung'). A subdivision of the Stustas, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida, occupying a town at the mouth of Hiellen (Hlielung) r., Graham id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. (J. R. S.)

Di'ia'ten k'owai.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Ēi'elān qē'awa-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905. Lthyhellun Kiwā.—Harrison in Proc. and Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 125, 1895.

Hlielungkun-lnagai (Ēi'elān kun lnagā'-i, 'Ēi'elān river point town-people'). A town of the Kuna-lanas, belonging to the Raven clan of the Haida, situated on a river of the same name (called Hiellen on Dawson's map). (J. R. S.)

Dl'ia'len kunilnagai'.—Boas, 12th Rep. N.W. Tribes Can., 23, 1898. Hi'elān kun lnagā'-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905.

Hilielung-stustae (Hi'elān stasta'-i, 'Stustas of Hilielung'). A subdivision of the Stustas, an important family of the Eagle clan of the Haida, occupying the town at the mouth of Hilielung or Hiellen r., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. Possibly a synonym of Hilielung-keawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Hlimulnaas-hadai (Himā'i na'as xā'-da-i, 'hlimul-skin-house people'). A subdivision of the Salendas, a Haida family of the Eagle clan. They were so called from one of their houses; hlimul was a name applied to the skins of certain mainland animals.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Hlingwainas-hadai (Hingwā'-i na'as xā'-da-i, 'world-house people'). A subdivision of the Aokeawai, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida; probably named from a house.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Hikaonedis (Tlingit: Eqa'onedis, 'people of Eqao river'). A subdivision of the Koetas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida, living principally in Alaska. They may have received their name from a camping place.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Hikia (Ek/ā', 'chicken-hawk town' or 'saw-bill town'). A former Haida town on the outer side of Lyell id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Kona-kegawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Hikoayedī (Eqo'ayedi). A Tlingit division at Klawak, Alaska, said to be part of the Shunkukedi, q. v. (J. R. S.)

Hlukahadi. A division of the Raven phratry of the Chilkat, formerly living in the town of Yendestake, Alaska. According to the Chilkat themselves the name means 'quick people', but according to informants at Wrangell, 'people of Hlukak' (Łuqā'x), a creek near Wrangell.

Chlukāach-adi.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 116, 1885. Kādawot-kadi.—Ibid. (given as a distinct social group). Łuqā'xadi.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Hlukkuhoan (Łaxq/uxo-ān, 'town where people do not sleep much'). A former Tlingit town in Alaska. (J. R. S.)

Hlula (Łuln). A former Haida town in Naden harbor, Graham id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Hoabonoma. Evidently the Pima or Maricopa name of a tribe of which Father Kino learned while on the lower Rio Gila, Ariz., in 1700. Unidentified, although probably Yuman. They have sometimes been loosely classed as a part of the Cocopa. Heabonomas.—Consag (1746) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Dec. 6, 1861. Hebonumas.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., II, 171, 1759. Hoabonoma.—Kino (1700) quoted by Coues, Garcés Diary, 548, 1900. Hoabonomas.—Mayer, Mexico, II, 38, 1863. Hebonomas.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., I, 301, 1759. Oabonoma.—Kino (1700) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., I, 349, 1866.

Hoaiela. Mentioned by Baudry des Lozières (Voy. Louisiane, 242, 1802) in a list of tribes with no indication of habitat. Possibly intended for Theloei, a name given sometimes to part, at others to all the Natchez.

Hoak.—Wozencraft (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 206, 1853. Hoako.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., XVII, pt. 3, map, 124, 1905. Hoak.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 282, 1877. Hoaka.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 129, 1850. Hoka.—Curtin, MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1886. Hak.—Hale, Ethnol. and Philol., VI, 631, 1846.

Hobatinequasi. A clan of the Acheha phratry of the ancient Timucua of Florida.—Pareja (ca. 1614) quoted by Gatschet in Am. Philos. Soc. Proc., XVII, 492, 1878.

Hobbamock, Hobbamoco. See Hobomok, Hobomoko.

Hobekentopa. A locality, possibly a town, where a treaty with the Choctaw was concluded Aug. 31, 1803. It was on Tombigbee r., in the e. part of Washington co., Ala., perhaps on or near a bluff of the same name upon which St Stephens now stands. (H. W. H.)

Hobekenolepa.—Am. State Papers, Ind. Aff. (1805), I, 749, 1832. Hoe-Buckin-toe-pa.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1803), 103, 1837.

Hobnuts. A folk-etymological corruption of hobbenis, the name of a tuberous root (Orontium aquaticum) in the Delaware dialect of Algonquian. Rev. A. Hesselius (cited by Nelson, Inds. of N. J., 78, 1894), writing in the early years of the 18th century in New Jersey, mentions "the first fruits of roots, which grow in swamps, not unlike nuts, called tachis, or by the English hobnuts." The Delaware hobbenis is a diminutive of hobbin, which was afterward applied by these Indians to the potato. The Swedish colonists called this root hopnia. (A. F. C.)

Hobomok. A chief of the Wampanoag who was the life-long friend of the English, from the time he met them at Plymouth in 1621. He helped to strengthen the friendship of Massasoit for the colonists, but, unlike Massasoit, he became a Christian, and died, before 1642, as a member of the English settlement at Plymouth. He was of great service to the English in warning them of Indian conspiracies. He was present at some of the battles in which Standish performed valorous deeds, but was not an active participant. The name is identical with Abbamoch, Hobbamoco, Habamouk, Hobbamock, Hobomoko, etc. See the following. (A. F. C.)

Hobomoko. Whittier, in the notes to his Poems (464, 1891) cites the saying concerning John Bonython:

Here lies Bonython, the Sagamore of Saco,
He lived a rogue and died a knave, and went to Hobomoko.

Mentioned by early writers as an evil deity of the Massachusetts and closely related Algonquian tribes. (A. F. C.)

Hoccanum. Mentioned as a band formerly in East Hartford township, Hartford co., Conn., where they remained, according to Stiles, until about 1745. They were probably identical with or a part of the Podunk (q. v.). De Forest locates the Podunk here, but does not mention the Hoccanum.

Hoccanuma.—Stiles (1761) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 106, 1809. Hockanocano.—Mason (1659), Ibid., 4th s., vii, 423, 1865 (perhaps the name of the village).

Hochelaga (dialectic form of Hochelayi, 'at the place of the [beaver] dam'). A former Iroquoian town, strongly palisaded, situated in 1535 on Montreal id., Canada, about a mile from the mountain first called "Mont Royal" by Cartier. At that time it contained about 50 typical Iroquoian lodges, each 50 or more paces in length and 12 or 15 in breadth, built of wood and covered with very broad strips of bark, neatly and deftly joined. Estimating 12 fires and 24 firesides, each of three persons, to every lodge, the total population would have been about 3,600. The upper portion of the lodges was used for storing corn, beans, and dried fruits. The inhabitants pounded corn in wooden mortars with pestles and made a paste of the meal, which was molded into cakes that were cooked on large hot rocks and covered with hot pebbles. They also made many soups of corn, beans, and peas, of which they had a sufficiency. In the lodges were large vessels in which smoked fish was stored for winter use. They were not travelers like those of "Canada" and "Saguenay," although, according to Cartier, "the said Canadians are subject to them with 8 or 9 other peoples along the river."

(J. N. B. H.)

Hochelaga.—Cartier (1545), Bref Récit, 9, 1863. Hochelagenses.—De Laet (1633) quoted by Barton, New Views, xiii, 1798 (Latin name of the inhabitants). Ochelaga.—Map (ca. 1543) in Maine Hist. Soc. Coll., 1, 854, 1869; Jes. Rel. 1642, 36, 1858.

Hochelayi ('at the place of the [beaver] dam'). A former Iroquoian town, situated in 1535 in a flat country not far from the junction of Jacques Cartier r. with the St Lawrence, and probably near the present Pt Platon, Quebec. (J. N. B. H.)

Achelad.—Cartier (1535), Bref Récit, 66a, 1863. Achelay.—Ibid. Achelayi.—Ibid. Achelay.—Ibid. Hochelai.—Cartier (1535) quoted by Hakluyt, Voy., ii, 115, 1889. Hochalay.—Ibid., 129. Ochelay.—Cartier, Bref Récit, op. cit.

Hochonchapa ('alligator'). A Chickasaw clan of the Ishpanee phratry.

Ho-shon-shab-ba.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 163, 1877.

Hochon tahápa.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., 1, 96, 1884.

Hockhooken ('place of gourds.'—Hewitt). A former Delaware village on Hocking r., Ohio.

Hackhooken.—La Tour, map, 1779. Hockhooken.—Ibid., 1782. Hockhooken.—Latré, map, 1784. Hockhooken.—Esnauls and Rapilly, map, 1777 (misprint).

Hoes and Spades. Agricultural implements in general are referred to under Agriculture (q. v.), special mention being here made of certain numerous, large, bladelike, chipped implements of flint found in the rich alluvial bottom lands of the middle Mississippi valley, whose polished surfaces in many cases unmistakably indicate long-continued use in digging operations; and this, in connection with their suggestive shape, has caused them to be classified as hoes and spades. Extensive quarries of the flint nodules from which implements of this class were shaped, have been located in Union co., Ill. (see Quarries). Great numbers of the hoes and spades, originating in these or in similar quarries, are distributed over an extensive area in Missouri, Illinois, and the neighboring states. The most common form has an oval, or elliptical outline, with ends either rounded or somewhat pointed; a modified form has the lower end strongly curved, with the sides in straight or slightly concave lines and the same pointed top. Beginning with the extremes of this type, it is possible to arrange a series which will pass by insensible gradations into small scrapers and scraper-like celts. Another type, not unusual, has a semi-elliptical blade with a square or flat top, in the sides of which deep notches are cut for securing the handle. An allied form is without the notches but has projecting points at the top, which answer the same purpose. The larger implements of this class, often reaching a foot in length, are generally denominated spades, and the shorter, or notched, forms hoes; but as both had the handles put on either parallel with the longer axis or at an angle with it, allowing all alike to be used in the same manner, the distinction is without particular significance.

Hokokwito. A former village of the Awani division of the Miwok, opposite Yosemite falls, in Yosemite valley, Mariposa co., Cal. The hotel now occupies its site.

Hocowedoc.—Powers in Overland Mo., x, 333, 1874. Hok-ek'-wi-dok.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 365, 1877. Hokokwito.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905.

Hokomo. A former Maidu village on the e. side of Middle fork of Feather r., almost due n. of Mooretown, Butte co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pl. xxxviii, 1905.

Hokwaits (Ho-kwaits). A band of Paiute formerly living near Ivanpah, s. e. Cal. (Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 51, 1874). Cf. Hakwiche, the Mohave name of the Kawia, q. v.

Holatamico. popularly known as Billy Bowlegs. The last Seminole chief of prominence to leave Florida and remove with his people to the W. He was born about 1808, and after the first Seminole removal became the recognized chief of the remnant in 1842, and was the leader of hostilities in 1855 to 1858. Although but 25 years of age, and not then a chief, he was one of the signers of the treaty of Payne's Landing, May 9, 1832, by which the Seminole agreed to remove to Indian Ter., but it was not until May, 1858, that he and his band, numbering 164 persons, departed. See Bowlegs. (c. r.)

Holeclame. One of several tribes formerly occupying "the country from Buena Vista and Carises lakes, and Kern r. to the Sierra Nevada and Coast range,"

Cal. (Barbour in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 256, 1853). By treaty of June 10, 1851, these tribes reserved a tract between Tejon pass and Kern r. and ceded the remainder of their lands to the United States. Probably Mariposan (Yokuts), though possibly Chumashan. Cf. Holkoma, Holmiuk.

Hole-in-the-day (Bagwünagijik, 'hole, opening, rift in the sky.'—W. J.). A Chippewa chief, a member of the warlike Noka (Bear) clan. He succeeded Curly-head (q. v.) as war chief in 1825. He had already been recognized as a chief by the Government for his bravery and fidelity to the Americans in the war of 1812. His whole subsequent life was spent in fighting the Sioux, and he ended the struggle that had lasted for centuries over the possession of the fisheries and hunting grounds of the L. Superior region by definitively driving the hereditary enemy across the Mississippi. Had not the Government intervened to compel the warring tribes to accept a line of demarkation, he threatened to plant his village on Minnesota r. and pursue the Sioux into the western plains. At Prairie du Chien he acknowledged the ancient possession by the Sioux of the territory from the Mississippi to Green bay and the head of L. Superior, but claimed it for the Chippewa by right of conquest. The Chippewa had the advantage of the earlier possession of firearms, but in the later feuds which Hole-in-the-day carried on the two peoples were equally armed. George Copway, who valued the friendship of Hole-in-the-day and once ran 270 miles in 4 days to apprise him of a Sioux raid, relates how he almost converted the old chief, who promised to embrace Christianity and advise his people to do so "after one more battle with the Sioux." He was succeeded as head chief of the Chippewa on his death in 1846 by his son, who bore his father's name and who carried on in Minnesota the ancient feud with the Dakota tribes. At the time of the Sioux rising in 1862 he was accused of planning a similar revolt. The second Hole-in-the-day was murdered by men of his own tribe at Crow Wing, Minn., June 27, 1868.

(F. H.)

Holholto. A former Maidu village a few miles s. of Mooretown, Butte co., Cal. Malto.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 282, 1877. Holholto.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pl. xxxviii, 1905.

Holkoma. A Mono tribe on Sycamore cr. and Big cr., n. of Kings r., Cal. There is some doubt as to its proper name.

Hol-on-ma.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 782, 1899. Ho-len-mahs.—Johnston (1881) in Sen. Ex. Doc 61, 32d Cong., 1st sess., 22, 1852. Hol-on-nas.—Barbour (1862) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 254, 1853. Hol'-ko-mal.—Merriam in Science, xix, 916, June 15, 1904. Hol-o'-kemmah.—Ibid. To-win-cha'-hik.—Ibid.

Hollow-horn Bear. A Brulé Sioux chief, born in Sheridan co., Nebr., in Mar., 1850. When but 16 years of age he accompanied a band led by his father against the Pawnee, whom they fought on the present site of Genoa, Nebr. In 1868 he joined a band of Brulés in an attack on United States troops in Wyoming, and in another where now is situated the Crow agency, Mont.; and in the following year participated in a raid on the laborers who were constructing the Union Pacific R. R. Subsequently he became captain of police at Rosebud agency, S. Dak., and arrested his predecessor, Crow Dog, for the murder of Spotted Tail. Five years later he resigned and was appointed second lieutenant under Agent Spencer, but was again compelled to resign on account of ill health. When Gen. Crook was sent with a commission to Rosebud, in 1889, to make an agreement with the Indians there, Hollow-horn Bear was chosen by the Sioux as their speaker, being considered an orator of unusual ability. He took part in the parade at the inauguration of President Roosevelt at Washington, Mar. 4, 1905.

Holmiuk. One of the tribes formerly occupying "the country from Buena Vista and Carises lakes, and Kern r. to the Sierra Nevada and Coast range," Cal. By treaty of June 10, 1851, these tribes reserved a tract between Tejon pass and Kern r. and ceded the remainder of their land to the United States. Probably of Mariposan (Yokuts) or Shoshonean stock. Cf. Holeclame, Holkoma.

Hol-mis-uks.—Barbour (1852) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 256, 1853. Holmiuk.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 782, 1899.

Homalko. A Salish tribe on the e. side of Bute inlet, Brit. Col., speaking the Comox dialect; pop. 89 in 1904.

Em-alcum.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1884, 187. Homalco.—Ibid., 1891, map. Homalko.—Ibid., 1901, pt. II, 158. Qos'qomalco.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Homayine (Ho'ma yin'-e, 'young elk'). A subgens of the Khotachi, the Elk gens of the Iowa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 238, 1897.

Homayo. A large ruined pueblo of the Tewa on the w. bank of Rio Ojo Caliente, a small w. tributary of the Rio Grande, in Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, rv, 37, 1892; Hewett in Bull. 32, B. A. E., 39, 1906.

Homhoabit. Given by Rev. J. Caballeria (Hist. San Bernardino Val., 1902) as a former village, probably of the Serranos, at a place now called Homoa, near San Bernardino, s. Cal.

Hominy. From the Algonquian dialects of New England or Virginia, applied to a dish prepared from Indian corn pounded or cracked and boiled, or the kernels merely hulled by steeping first in lye or ashes and afterward boiled, with or without fish or meat to season it. The first mention of the name in print occurs in Capt. John Smith's True Travels, 43, 1630. Some forms of the name given by early writers are tackhummin, 'to grind corn (or grain),' and pokhommin, 'to beat or thresh out.' Josselyn (N. E. Rar., 53, 1672) defined hominy as what was left after the flour had been sifted out of cornmeal. Beverley (Virginia, bk. 3, 1722) says that homony is "Indian corn, broken in a mortar, husked, and then boiled in water over a gentle fire for ten or more hours to the consistency of furmity." The name "hominy grits" is sometimes applied to the cracked variety. Tooker suggests as the radicals ahām, 'he beats or pounds'; min, 'berry or fruit,' 'grain.' The name may be a reduction of some of the words in which it occurs, as rockohominy. Dr Wm. Jones (inf'n, 1906) says: "It is plain that the form of the word hominy is but an abbreviation, for what is left is the designative suffix -min, 'grain,' and part of a preceding modifying stem." For a discussion of the etymology see Gerard in Am. Anthropol., vi, 314, 1904; vii, 228, 1905; Tooker, ibid., vi, 682. See Samp.

Homna (Ho-mna, 'smelling like fish'). A division of the Bulé Teton Sioux.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 218, 1897.

Homnipa. Given as a Karok village on Klamath r., n. w. Cal., inhabited in 1860. Home-nip-pah.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 23, 1860.

Homolobi (Hō-mōl'ōbi, 'place of the breast-like elevation'). A group of ruined pueblos near Winslow, Ariz., which were occupied by the ancestors of various Hopi clans. See Fewkes in 22d Rep. B. A. E., 23, et seq., 1904; Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 29, 1891.

Homolua. A former Timucua village, situated, according to Laudonnière, on the s. side of St Johns r., Fla., at its mouth, in 1564. De Gourgues placed a town of similar name about 60 leagues inland on the same river.

Emola.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s. 306, 1869. Homolua.—Ibid., 331. Homolua.—De Bry, Brev. Homosassa ('abundance of pepper'). A Seminole town in Hernando co., Fla., in 1837. There are now a river and a town of the same name in that locality.

Homoa Sasa.—Drake, Ind. Chron., 215, 1836.

Homuarup. A former Karok village on Klamath r., Cal.

Home-war-roop.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 23, 1860.

Homalehison. A Squawmish village community at Capilano cr., Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.; the former headquarters of the supreme chief of the tribe. Pop. 45 in 1904.

Capilano.—Can. Ind. Aff., 276, 1894. Capitane Creek.—Can. Ind. Aff., 908, 1879. Hōmu'teison.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 475, 1900. Capilano.—Can. Ind. Aff., 367, 1897.

Honabanou. Coxe (Carolana, 14, 1741) says that "fifteen leagues above the Ohio . . . to the w. is the river Honabanou, upon which dwells a nation of the same name, and another called Amicoa." On the map accompanying his work this river is represented as in s. e. Missouri, entering the Mississippi immediately above or nearly opposite the mouth of the Ohio. As there is no stream on the w. side between the mouth of the Ohio and St Genevieve co. that can be called a river, and no Indians of the names mentioned are known to have resided in that section, both must be rejected as unauthentic, and indeed mythical so far as the locality is concerned. This river has evidently been laid down from Hennepin's map of 1697, relating to the "New Discovery," which is admitted to be unauthentic so far as it relates to the region s. of the mouth of Illinois. It is evident, however, that Coxe has attempted to give the name Ouabano (q. v.), which La Salle applied to some Indians who visited Ft St Louis, on Matagorda bay, Texas, from a westerly section. (J. M. C. T.)

Honani. The Badger phratry of the Hopi, comprising the Honani (Badger), Muinyan (Porcupine), Wishoko (Turkey-buzzard), Buli (Butterfly), Buliso (Evening Primrose), and Kachina (Sacred Dancer) clans. According to Fewkes this people settled at Kishyuba, a spring sacred to the Kachinas, before going to Tusayan. The Honani and Kachina phratries are intimately associated. The former settled Walpi when the village was on the old site, and some of them went on to Awatobi, whence they returned after the fall of that pueblo. The arrival of the Honani in Tusayan was probably not earlier than the latter part of the 17th century.

Honani. The Badger clan of the Hopi. Honani.—Bourke, Snake Dance, 117, 1884. Honani wiāwā.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 564, 1900 (wiāwā = 'clan'). Hō-na-ni wū-wū.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., vii, 405, 1894. Hō-nā-wū-wū.—Ibid., 404.

Honanki (Hopi: 'bear house'). A prehistoric cliff-village, attributed to the Hopi, in the valley of Oak cr., in the "red-rock" country s. of Flagstaff, Ariz.—Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 558-569, 1898.

Honau (Ho'-na-u). The Bear phratry of the Hopi, comprising the Honau (Bear), Tokochi (Wild-cat), Chosro (Bird [blue]), Kokyan (Spider), and Hekpa (Fir) clans. According to Fewkes these people are traditionally said to have been the first to arrive in Tusayan. Although reputed to be the oldest people in Walpi they are now almost extinct in that pueblo, and are not represented in Sichomovi. They exist however at Mishongnovi.

Honau.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 564, 1900. Ho'-nau-ah.—Fewkes in Am. Anthrop., vii, 404, 1894. Honia nyumu.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 88, 1891 (nyumu = 'phratry'). Hon-ama.—Voth, Traditions of the Hopi, 86, 1906.

Honmoyashu (Hon-mo-yau'-cu). A former Chumashan village at El Barranco, near San Pedro, Ventura co., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Honiasontkeronon (Iroquois: 'people of the place of crook-necked squashes,' or 'people of the place where they wear crosses'). An unidentified people of whom Gallinée was informed by the Iroquois as living on Ohio r., above the falls at Louisville, Ky. On a map of De l'Isle, dated 1722, a small lake called L. Oniasont, around which are the words 'les Oniasontke,' is placed on the s. side, apparently, of the "Onabache, otherwise called Ohio or Beautiful river," and the outlet of L. Oniasont is made to flow into the Onabache. It may be inferred that the Iroquois statement as to the location of this people was substantially correct; that is, that they lived on a small lake s. of Wabash r. and having an outlet into that stream, although Hofniasontke 'rofino' is an Iroquois euphemism for the land of departed spirits. (J. N. B. H.)

Honwee Vallecito. A Diegueño rancheria represented in the treaty of 1852 at Santa Isabel, s. Cal.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 132, 1857.

Hook. One of the small tribes or bands formerly living in South Carolina on the lower Pedee and its affluents, and possibly of Siouan stock. Lawson (Hist. Car., 45, 1860) refers to them as foes of the Santee and as living in 1701 about the mouth of Winyaw bay, S. C. Consult Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1895. See Backhook.

Hooka (Hó'-o-ka). The Dove clans of the Keresan pueblos of Santa Ana, San Felipe, and Sia, New Mexico. That of the last-mentioned village is extinct. Hókoka-háno.—Hodge in Am. Anthrop., ix, 350, 1896 (Sia form; háno = 'people'). Hókoka-háno.—Ibid. (Santa Ana form). Háuka-háno.—Ibid. (San Felipe form).

Hook-stones. A variety of prehistoric artifacts to which no particular purpose can be assigned. They are heavy, hook-like objects, from 1 to 4 or 5 in. in length and of diversified proportions. The principal variety standing on the heavy rounded base resembles somewhat the letter Z; others are longer and more slender, with the base less developed, but with the hook more pronounced. An example with hook at both ends, probably not properly included in this group, is given by Yates in Morehead's Prehistoric Implements. They are usually made of soapstone and other soft rock, and occur in burials in s. California, on the islands as well as on the mainland, and no doubt had symbolic use (see Problematical objects). A number of these objects, now in the Peabody Museum, are described by Putnam, who prefers to regard them as implements, and mentions signs of use. Two examples were obtained from a grave at the ancient soapstone quarry of Santa Catalina id. in 1902 (Holmes), and a deposit of about 50 specimens was discovered at Redondo beach, Cal., in 1903 (Palmer).

Hopahka Choctaw. The Choctaw formerly residing in Hopahka town in s. Mississippi, w. of Pearl r., who are spoken of as the most intelligent and influential of the tribe. Known also as Cobb Indians, from their leader.—Claiborne (1843) in Sen. Doc. 168, 28th Cong., 1st sess., 39, 65, 1844.

Hopedale. A Moravian Eskimo mission village on the e. coast of Labrador, established in 1782 (Hind, Lab. Penin., II, 199, 1863). Pop. about 155.

Hopehood. A Norridgewock chief, known among his people as Wahowa, or Wohawa, who acquired considerable notoriety in e. New England in the latter part of the 17th century. He was the son of a chief called Robinhood. Hopehood's career is pronounced by Drake (Ind. Biog., 130, 1832) to have been one of long and bloody exploits. He first appears as a participant in King Philip's war, when he made an attack on a house filled with women and children at Newichawanoc, about the site of Berwick, Me.; all escaped, however, except two children and the woman who bravely barred and defended the door. In 1678 he was one of the leaders of the e. New England tribes who held consultation with the English at Taconnet, Me. In 1685 he joined Kankamagus and other sachems in a letter to Gov. Cranfield of New Hampshire, protesting against the endeavor of the English to urge the Mohawk to attack them. On Mar. 18, 1690, he joined the French under Hertel in a massacre at Salmon falls, and in May attacked Fox Point, N. H., burning several houses, killing 14 persons, and carrying away 6 others. Not long afterward he penetrated the Iroquois country, where some Canadian Indians, mistaking him for an Iroquois, slew him and several of his companions. Hopehood was at one time a captive in the hands of the English and served as a slave for a season in Boston. (C. T.)

Hopi (contraction of Hópitu, 'peaceful ones,' or Hópitu-shinumu, 'peaceful all people': their own name). A body of Indians, speaking a Shoshonean dialect, occupying 6 pueblos on a reservation of 2,472,320 acres in n. e. Arizona. The name "Moqui," or "Moki," by which they have been popularly known, means 'dead' in their own language, but as a tribal name it is seemingly of alien origin and of undetermined significance—perhaps from the Keresan language (Móschá in Laguna, Mo-ts in Acoma, Mótel in Sia, Cochiti, and San Felipe), whence Espejo's "Mohace" and "Mohoce" (1583) and Ofiate's "Mohoqui" (1598). Bandelier and Cushing believed the Hopi country, the later province of Tusayan, to be identical with the Totontec of Fray Marcos de Niza.

History.—The Hopi first became known to white men in the summer of 1540, when Coronado, then at Cibola (Zufii), dispatched Pedro de Tobar and Fray Juan de Padilla to visit 7 villages, constituting the province of Tusayan, toward the w. or n. w. The Spaniards were not received with friendliness at first, but the opposition of the natives was soon overcome and the party remained among the Hopi several days, learning from them of the existence of the Grand canyon of the Colorado, which Cardenas was later ordered to visit. The names of the Tusayan towns are not recorded by Coronado's chroniclers, so that with the exception of Oraibi, Shongopovi, Mishongnovi, Walpi, and Awatobi, it is not known with certainty what villages were inhabited when the Hopi first became known to the Spaniards. Omitting Awatobi, which was destroyed in 1700, with the possible exception of Oraibi none of these towns now occupies its 16th century site.

Francisco Sanchez Chamuscado visited Zufii in 1581 and speaks of the Hopi country as Asay or Osay, but he did not visit it on account of the snow. Two years later, however, the province was visited by Antonio de Espejo, who journeyed 28 leagues from Zuffi to the first of the Hopi pueblos in 4 days. The Mohoce, or Mohace, of this explorer consisted of 5 large villages, the population of one of which, Aguato (Ahuato, Zaguato=Awatobi) he estimated at 50,000, a figure perhaps 25 times too great. The names of the other towns are not given. The natives had evidently forgotten the horses of Tobar and Cardenas of 43 years before, as they now became frightened at these strange animals. The Hopi presented Espejo with quantities of cotton "towels," perhaps kilts, for which they were celebrated then as now.

The next Spaniard to visit the "Mohoqui" was Juan de Oñate, governor and colonizer of New Mexico, who took possession of the country and made the Indians swear to obedience and vassalage on Nov. 15, 1598. Their spiritual welfare was assigned to Fray Juan de Claros, although no active missions were established among the Hopi until nearly a generation later. The 5 villages at this time, so far as it is possible to determine them, were Aguato or Aguatuybá (Awatobi), Gaspe (Gualpe=Walpi), Comupaví or Xumupamí (Shongopovi), Majananí (Mishongnovi), and Olalla or Naybí (Oraibi).

The first actual missionary work undertaken among the Hopi was in 1629, on Aug. 20 of which year Francisco de Porras, Andrés Gutierrez, Cristobal de la Concepcion, and Francisco de San Buena Ventura, escorted by 12 soldiers, reached Awatobi, where the mission of San Bernardino was founded in honor of the day, followed by the establishment of missions also at Walpi, Shongopovi, Mishongnovi, and Oraibi. Porras was poisoned by the natives of Awatobi in 1633. All the Hopi missions seem to have led a precarious existence until 1680, when in the general Pueblo revolt of that year four resident missionaries were killed and the churches destroyed. Henceforward no attempt was made to reestablish any of the missions save that of Awatobi in 1700, which so incensed the other Hopi that they fell upon it in the night, killing many of its people and compelling its permanent abandonment. Before the rebellion Mishongnovi and Walpi had become reduced to visitas of the missions of Shongopovi and Oraibi respectively. At the time of the outbreak the population of Awatobi was given as 800, Shongopovi 500, and Walpi 1,200. Oraibi, it is said, had 14,000 gentiles before their conversion, but that they were consumed by pestilence. This number is doubtless greatly exaggerated.

The pueblos of Walpi, Mishongnovi, and Shongopovi, situated in the foothills, were probably abandoned about the time of the Pueblo rebellion, and new villages built on the adjacent mesas for the purpose of defense against the Spaniards, whose vengeance was needlessly feared. The reconquest of the New Mexican pueblos led many of their inhabitants to seek protection among the Hopi toward the close of the 17th century. Some of these built the pueblo of Payupki, on the Middle mesa, but were taken back and settled in Sandia about the middle of the 18th century. About the year 1700 Hano

was established on the East mesa, near Walpi, by Tewa from near Abiquiu, N. Mex., who came on the invitation of the Walpians. Here they have lived uninterruptedly, and although they have intermarried extensively with the Hopi, they retain their native speech and many of their distinctive tribal rites and customs. Two other pueblos, Sichomovi on the First mesa, built by Asa clans (q. v.)

from the Rio Grande, and Shipaulovi, founded by a colony from Shongopovi on the Second or Middle mesa, are both of comparatively modern origin, having been established about the middle of the 18th century, or about the time the Payupki people returned to their old home. Thus the pueblos of the ancient province of Tusayan now consist of the following: Walpi, Sichomovi, and Hano, on the First or East mesa; pop. (1900) 205, 119, and 160, respectively, exclusive of about 20 who have established homes in the plain; total 504. Mishongnovi, Shongopovi, and Shupaulovi, on the Second or Middle mesa; estimated pop. 244, 225, and 126; total 595. Oraibi, on the Third or West mesa; pop. (1890) 905. Total Hopi population (1904) officially given as 1,878.

Social organization.—The Hopi people are divided into several phratries, consisting of numerous clans, each of which preserves its distinct legends, ceremonies, and ceremonial paraphernalia. Out of these clan organizations have sprung religious fraternities, the head-men of which are still members of the dominant clan in each phratry. The relative importance of the clans varies in different pueblos; many that are extinct in some villages are powerful in others. The 12 phratries and their dependent clans as represented in the East Mesa villages are as follows:

1. Ala-Lengya (Horn-flute) phratry: Ala (Horn), Pangwa (Mountain sheep), Sowinwa (Deer), Chubio (Antelope), Chaizra (Elk), Lehu (Seed grass), Shiwanu (Ant), Anu (Red-ant), Tokoanu (Black-ant), Wukoanu (Great-ant), Leliotu (Tiny-ant), Shakwalengya (Blue flute), Masilengya (Drab or All-colors flute).

2. Patki (Water-house or Cloud) phratry: Patki (Water-house), Kau (Corn), Omauwu (Rain-cloud), Tanaka (Rain-bow), Talawipiki (Lightning), Kwan (Agave), Siwapi ('Rabbit-brush'), Pawikya (aquatic animal [Duck]), Pakwa (Frog), Pavatiya (Tadpole), Murzibusi (Bean), Kawaibatunya (Watermelon), Yoki (Rain).

3. Chua (Snake) phratry: Chua (Snake), Tohouh (Puma), Huwi (Dove), Ushu (Columnar cactus), Puna (Cactus fruit), Yungyu (Opuntia), Nabowu (Opuntia frutescens), Piuwani (Marmot), Pihcha (Skunk), Kalashiavu (Raccoon), Tubish (Sorrow), Patung (Squash), Atoko (Crane), Kele (Pigeon-hawk), Chinunga (Thistle). The last 5 are extinct.

4. Pakab (Reed) phratry: Pakab (Reed), Kwahu (Eagle), Kwayo (Hawk), Koyonya (Turkey), Tawa (Sun), Paluna (Twin-brother of Puhukonghoya), Shohu (Star), Massikwayo (Chicken-hawk), Kahabi (Willow), Tebi (Greasewood).

5. Kokop (Wood) phratry: Kokop (Wood), Ishauu (Coyote), Kwewu (Wolf), Sikyataiyo (Yellow-fox), Letaiyo (Gray-fox), Zrohona (small mammal), Masi (Masauu, dead, skeleton, Ruler of the Dead), Tuvou (Pifion), Hoko (Juniper), Awata (Bow), Sikyachi (small yellow bird), Tuvuchi (small red bird).

6. Tabo (Cottontail rabbit) phratry: Tabo (Cottontail rabbit), Sowu (Jackrabbit).

7. Tuwa (Sand or Earth) phratry: Kuch, Bachipkwasi, Nananawi, Momobi (varieties of lizard), Pisa (White sand), Tuwa (Red sand), Chukai (Mud), Sihu (Flower), Nanawu (small striped squirrel).

8. Honau (Bear) phratry: Honau (Bear), Tokochi (Wild-cat), Chosro (Blue-bird), Kokyan (Spider), Hekpa (Fir).

9. Kachina (Sacred dancer) phratry: Kachina (Sacred dancer), Gyazru (Paroquet), Angwusi (Raven), Sikyachi (Yellow bird), Tawamana (Blackbird), Salabi (Spruce), Suhubi (Cottonwood).

10. Aa (Tansy mustard) phratry: Aa (Tansy mustard), Chakwaina (Black-earth Kachina), Kwingyap (Oak), Hosboa (Chapparral cock), Posiwo (Magpie), Chisro (Snow-bunting), Puchkohu (Boomerang rabbit-stick), Pisha (Field-mouse).

11. Piba (Tobacco) phratry: Piba (Tobacco), Chongyo (Pipe).

12. Honani (Badger) phratry: Honani (Badger), Muinyawu (Porcupine), Wishoko (Turkey-buzzard), Buli (Butterfly), Buliso (Evening Primrose), Kachina (Sacred dancer).

Most of the above clans occur in the other Hopi pueblos, but not in Hano. There are a few clans in the Middle Mesa villages and in Oraibi that are not now represented at Walpi. For the Hano clans see Hano.

The Honau (Bear) clan is represented on each mesa and is supposed to be the oldest in Tusayan. It is said to have come originally from the Rio Grande valley, but on the East mesa the clan is now so reduced as to be threatened with extinction at Walpi within a generation.

The Chua (Snake) people were among the earliest to settle in Tusayan, joining the Bears and living with them when Walpi was in the foot-hills. The legends of this people declare that they came from pueblos in the N., near Navaho mt., on the Rio Colorado. In their northern home they were united with the Ala (Horn) people, who separated from them in their southerly migration and united with the Flute people at the now-ruined pueblo of Lengyanobi, n. of the East mesa. The combined Snake and Ala people control the Antelope and Snake fraternities, and possess the fetishes and other paraphernalia of the famous Snake dance. The palladium of this people is kept at Walpi, thus leading to the belief that this was the first Hopi home of the Snake and kindred people.

The Lengya (Flute) people, once very strong, are now almost extinct at the East mesa, but are numerous in some of the other pueblos. They are said to have lived formerly at Lengyanobi and to have come to Tusayan from the S., or from pueblos along Little Colorado r. The chief of the Flute priesthood controls the Flute ceremony, which occurs biennially, alternating with the Snake dance. There are two divisions in the Flute fraternity, one known as the Drab Flute and the other as the Blue Flute, the former being extinct at Walpi. Sichomevi and Hano have no representatives of this phratry, but it is represented in all the other Hopi villages.

There are Ala, or Horn, people in most of the Hopi pueblos, and clans belonging to this phratry are named generally after horned animals. Their ancestors came to Walpi with the Flute people and were well received, because they had formerly lived with the Snake people in the N. They now join the Snake priest in the Antelope rites of the Snake dance.

The Patki (Water-house, or Cloud) phratry includes a number of clans that came to the Hopi country from the S., and the now ruined villages along the Little Colorado are claimed by this people to have been their former homes. They were comparatively late arrivals, and brought a high form of sun and serpent worship that is still prominent in the Winter Solstice ceremony. The Sun priests, who are well represented in most of the Hopi pueblos and are especially strong at Walpi, accompanied this people. Others, as the Piba or Tobacco clan, came to Walpi from Awatobi on the destruction of the latter pueblo in 1700.

The Pakab (Reed) people also came from Awatobi, settling first at the base of the Middle mesa, whence they went to Walpi. They control the Warrior society called Kalektaka.

The Kokop (Wood) phratry came from Sikyatki and have a few representatives in Walpi and in the other villages. The traditional home of the Kokop and allied clans was Jemez (q. v.), in New Mexico.

The Honani or Badger phratry originally lived at Awatobi, and after the destruction of that pueblo went to Oraibi and Walpi. It is now largely represented in Sichomevi, which village it joined the Asa in founding. The Bull, or Butterfly, clan is closely related to the Honani people, and both are probably of Keresan or of Tewa origin.

HOPI MAN AND WIFE

The Kachina phratry is also of New Mexican origin, and in some of the pueblos shares with the Honani the control of the masked dance organization called Kachinas; but it is not strong in Walpi.

The Asa people were Tewa in kin, coming originally from the Rio Grande valley and settling successively at Zuffi and in the Canyon de Chelly. This people, with the Honani, founded Sichomevi, and is now one of the strongest clans on the East mesa. Only one or two members now live at Walpi; a few live in the Middle Mesa villages, but none at Oraibi.

Archeology.—The erection and final abandonment of their villages by the various Hopi clans during their migrations and successive shiftings have left many ruins, now consisting largely of mounds, both within their present territory and remote from it. Ruins of villages which the traditions of the Hopi ascribe to their ancestors are found as far n. as the Rio Colo. rado, w. to Flagstaff, Ariz., s. to the Verde valley, Tonto basin, and the Rio Gila, and e. to the Rio Grande in New Mexico. Therefore, although Shoshonean in language, the present Hopi population and culture are composite, made up of accretions from widely divergent sources and from people of different linguistic stocks. Some of the Hopi ruins have been explored by the Bureau of American Ethnology, the National Museum, and the Field Museum of Natural History. One of the most celebrated of these is Awatobi (q. v.) on Jeditoh or Antelope mesa, the walls of whose mission church, built probably in 1629, are still partly standing.

Sikyatki (q. v.), another large and now well-known ruin, in the foot-hills of the East mesa, was occupied in prehistoric times by Kokop clans of Keresan people from the Rio Grande country. They had attained a highly artistic development as exhibited by their pottery, which is probably the finest ware ever manufactured by Indians n. of Mexico.

The original clans of Walpi are said to have occupied three sites after their arrival in the Hopi country, settling first on the terrace w. of the East mesa, then higher up and toward the s., where the foundation walls of a Spanish mission church can still be traced. From this point they moved to the present Walpi on the summit of the mesa, apparently soon after the Pueblo revolt of 1680. See Kisakobi, Kuchapturela.

Payupki, a picturesque ruin on the Middle mesa, was settled by Tanoan people (apparently Tigua) about the year 1700 and abandoned about 1742, when the inhabitants were taken back to the Rio Grande and settled at Sandia.

Chukubi, a prehistoric pueblo midway between Payupki and Shupaulovi, also on the Middle mesa, was built probably by southern clans whose descendants form most of the present population of the Middle mesa villages.

Old Shongopovi lay in the foot-hills at the base of the Middle mesa, below the present pueblo of that name. This town was inhabited at the time of the Spanish advent, and near it was built a church the walls of which, up to a few years ago, served as a sheep corral. Its original inhabitants came from the Little Colorado valley.

The ruins of Old Mishongnovi are on the terrace below the present pueblo. Its walls are barely traceable. From its cemetery beautiful pottery, resembling that of Sikyatki, has been exhumed.

Some of the most important ruins of the Hopi country are situated on the rim of Antelope mesa, not far from Awatobi, and are remains of Keresan pueblos. Among these are Kawaika and Chakpahu. In the same neighborhood are the ruins of Kokopki, once occupied by the Wood clan, originally from Jemez. North of the present Hopi mesas are ruins at Kishuba, where the Kachina clan once lived, and at Lengyanobi, the home of the Flute people. The ruins along the lower Little Colorado, near Black falls, known as Wukoki, and those called Homolobi, near Winslow, are likewise claimed by the Hopi as the homes of ancestral clans. Wukoki may have been inhabited by the Snake people, while the inhabitants of Homolobi were related to southern clans that went to Walpi and Zuni.

Characteristics and customs.—The Hopi are rather small of stature, but muscular and agile. Both sexes have reddish-brown skin, high cheek-bones, straight broad nose, slanting eyes, and large mouths with gentle expression. As a rule the occiput exhibits cradle-board flattening (see Artificial head deformation). The proportion of albinos is large. The hair is usually straight and black, but in some individuals it is brownish and in others it is wavy. The hair of the men is commonly "banged" in front or cut in "terraces"; the long hair behind is gathered in a sort of short queue and tied at the neck. The matrons wear their hair in two coils which hang in front. On reaching puberty the girls dress their hair in whorls at the sides of the head, in imitation of the squash blossom, the symbol of fertility (see illustration). The women tend to corpulency and age rapidly; they are prolific, but the infant mortality is very great (see Health and Disease). Boys and girls usually have fine features, and the latter mature early, often being married at the age of 15 or 16 years. Bachelors and spinsters are rare. A few men dress as women and perform women's work.

In mental traits the Hopi are the equal of any Indian tribe. They possess a highly artistic sense, exhibited by their pottery, basketry, and weaving. They are industrious, imitative, keen in bargaining, have some inventive genius, and are quick of perception. Among themselves they are often merry, greatly appreciating jests and practical jokes. They rarely forget a kindness or an injury, and often act from impulse and in a childlike way. They are tractable, docile, hospitable, and frugal, and have always sought to be peaceable, as their tribal name indicates. They believe in witchcraft, and recognize many omens of good and bad.

The Hopi are monogamists, and as a rule are faithful in their marital relations. Murder is unknown, theft is rare, and lying is universally condemned. Children are respectful and obedient to their elders and are never flogged except when ceremonially initiated as kachinas. From their earliest years they are taught industry and the necessity of leading up-right lives.

The clothing of the Hopi men consists of a calico shirt and short pantaloons, and breechcloth, moccasins, and hair bands. Bracelets, necklaces of shell, turquoise, or silver, and earrings, are commonly worn.

The women wear a dark-blue woolen blanket of native weave, tied with an embroidered belt, and a calico manta or shawl over one shoulder; their moccasins, which are worn only occasionally, are made of ox-hide and buckskin, like those of the men, to which are attached leggings of the same material, but now often replaced by sheepskin. The ear-pendants of the women and girls consist of small wooden disks, ornamented with turquoise mosaic on one side. Small children generally run about naked, and old men while working in the fields or taking part in ceremonies divest themselves of all clothing except the breechcloth.

The governing body of the Hopi is a council of hereditary clan elders and chiefs of religious fraternities. Among these officials there is recognized a speaker chief and a war chief, but there has never been a supreme chief of all the Hopi. Following ancient custom, various activities inhere in certain clans; for instance, one clan controls the warrior society, while another observes the sun and determines the calendar. Each pueblo has an hereditary village chief, who directs certain necessary communal work, such as the cleaning of springs, etc. There seems to be no punishment for crime except sorcery, to which, under Hopi law, all transgressions may be reduced. No punishment of a witch or wizard is known to have been inflicted at Walpi in recent years, but there are traditions of imprisonment and of the significant and mysterious disappearance of those accused of witchcraft in former times.

The Hopi possess a rich mythology and folklore, inherited from a remote past. They recognize a large number of supernatural beings, the identification of which is sometimes most difficult. Their mythology is poetic and highly imaginative, and their philosophy replete with inconsistency. Their songs and prayers, some of which are in foreign languages, as the Keresan and Tewa, are sometimes very beautiful. They have peculiar marriage customs, and elaborate rites in which children are dedicated to the sun. The bodies of the dead are sewed in blankets and deposited with food offerings among the rocks of the mesas. The Hopi believe in a future life in an underworld, but have no idea of future punishment. They smoke straight pipes in ceremonies, but on secular occasions prefer cigarettes of tobacco wrapped in corn-husks. They never invented an intoxicating drink, and until within recent years none of them had any desire for such. Although they have seasons of ceremonial gaming, they do not gamble; and they have no oaths, but many, especially among the elders, are garrulous and fond of gossip.

Maize being the basis of their subsistence, agriculture is the principal industry of the Hopi. On the average 2,500 acres are yearly planted in this cereal, the yield in 1904 being estimated at 25,000 bushels. Perhaps one-third of the annual crop is preserved in event of future failure through drought or other causes. There are also about 1,000 acres in peach orchards and 1,500 acres in beans, melons, squashes, pumpkins, onions, chile, sunflowers, etc. Cotton, wheat, and tobacco are also raised in small quantities, but in early times native cotton was extensively grown. In years of stress desert plants, which have always been utilized to some extent for food, form an important part of the diet.

The Hopi have of late become more or less pastoral. Flocks (officially estimated in 1904 at 56,000 sheep and 15,000 goats), acquired originally from the Spaniards, supply wool and skins. They own also about 1,500 head of cattle, and 4,350 horses, burros, and mules. Dogs, chickens, hogs, and turkeys are their only other domesticated animals. All small desert animals are eaten; formerly antelope, elk, and deer were captured by being driven into pitfalls or corrals. Communal rabbit hunts are common, the animals being killed with wooden clubs shaped like boomerangs (see Rabbit sticks). Prairie dogs are drowned out of their burrows, coyotes are caught in pitfalls made of stones, and small birds are captured in snares.

The Hopi are skilled in weaving, dyeing, and embroidering blankets, belts, and kilts. Their textile work is durable, and shows a great variety of weaves. The dark-blue blanket of the Hopi woman is an important article of commerce among the Pueblos, and their embroidered ceremonial blankets, sashes, and kilts made of cotton have a ready sale among neighboring tribes. Although the Hopi ceramic art has somewhat deteriorated in modern times, fair pottery is still made among the people of Hano, where one family has revived the superior art of the earlier villagers. They weave basketry in a great variety of ways at the Middle Mesa pueblos and in Oraibi; but, with the exception of the familiar sacred-meal plaques, which are well made and brightly colored, the workmanship is crude. The Hopi are clever in making masks and other religious paraphernalia from hides, and excel in carving and painting dolls, representing kachinas, which are adorned with bright feathers and cloth. They likewise manufacture mechanical toys, which are exhibited in some of their dramatic entertainments. Nowhere among the aborigines of North America are the Hopi excelled in dramaturgic exhibitions, in some of which their imitations of birds and other animals are marvelously realistic.

The Hopi language is classified as Shoshonean; but, according to Gatschet, it "seems to contain many archaic words and forms not encountered in the other dialects, and many vocables of its own." The published vocabularies are very limited, and comparatively little is known of the grammatical structure of the language; but it is evident that it contains many words of Keresan, Tewa, Pima, Zuni, Ute, Navaho, and Apache derivation. As among other Southwestern tribes a number of words are modified Spanish, as those for horse, sheep, melon, and the names for other intrusive articles and objects. Slight dialectic differences are noticeable in the speech of Oraibi and Walpi, but the language of the other pueblos is practically uniform. The Hopi language is melodious and the enunciation clear. The speech of the people of Awatobi is said to have had a nasal intonation, while the Oraibi speak drawlingly. Although they accompany their speech with gestures, few of the Hopi understand the sign language. The Keresan people have furnished many songs, with their words, and Zuni and Pima songs have also been introduced. Some of the prayers also have archaic Tanoan or Keresan words.

The Hopi are preëminently a religious people, much of their time, especially in winter, being devoted to ceremonies for rain and the growth of crops. Their mythology is a polytheism largely tinged with ancestor worship and permeated with fetishism. They originally had no conception of a great spirit corresponding to God, nor were they ever monotheists; and, although they have accepted the teachings of Christian missionaries, these have not had the effect of altering their primitive beliefs. Their greatest gods are deified nature powers, as the Mother Earth and the Sky god—the former mother, and the latter father, of the races of men and of marvelous animals, which are conceived of as closely allied.

The earth is spoken of as having always existed. In Hopi mythology the human race was not created, but generated from the earth, from which man emerged through an opening called the sipapu, now typified by the Grand canyon of the Colorado. The dead are supposed to return to the underworld. The Sky Father and the Earth Mother have many names and are personated in many ways; the latter is represented by a spider; the former by a bird—a hawk or an eagle. Such names as Fire god, Germ god, and others are attributive designations of the great male powers of nature, or its male generative principle. All supernatural beings are supposed to influence the rain and consequently the growth of crops. Every clan religion exhibits strong ancestral worship, in which a male and a female ancestral tutelary of the clan, called by a distinctive clan name, is preëminent. The Great Horned or Plumed Serpent, a form of sky god, derived from the S., and introduced by the Patki and other southern clans, is prominent in sun ceremonies. The number of subordinate supernatural personages is almost unlimited. These are known as "kachinas," a term referring to the magic power inherent in every natural object for good or for bad. Many of these kachinas are personations of clan ancestors, others are simply beings of unknown relationship but endowed with magic powers. Each kachina possesses individual characteristics, and is represented in at least six different symbolic colors. The world-quarters, or six cardinal points, play an important rôle in Hopi mythology and ritual. Fetiches, amulets, charms, and mascots are commonly used to insure luck in daily occupations, and for health and success in hunting, racing, gaming, and secular performances. The Hopi ceremonial calendar consists of a number of monthly festivals, ordinarily of 9 days' duration, of which the first 8 are devoted to secret rites in kivas (q. v.) or in rooms set apart for that purpose, the final day being generally devoted to a spectacular public ceremony or "dance." Every great festival is held under the auspices of a special religious fraternity or fraternities, and is accompanied with minor events indicating a former duration of 20 days. Among the most important religious fraternities are the Snake, Antelope, Flute, Sun, Lala-kontu, Owakultu, Mamzrautu, Kachina, Tataukyamu, Wuwuchimtu, Aaltu, Kwakwantu, and Kalektaka. There are also other organized priesthoods, as the Yaya and the Poshwypkia, whose functions are mainly those of doctors or healers. Several ancient priesthoods, known by the names Koyimsi, Paiakyamu, and Chukuwypkia, function as clowns or fun-makers during the sacred dances of the Kachinas. The ceremonial year is divided into two parts, every great ceremony having a major and a minor performance occurring about 6 months apart; and every 4 years, when initiations occur, most ceremonies are celebrated in extenso. The so-called Snake and Flute dances are performed biennially at all the pueblos except Sichomovi and Hano, and alternate with each other. Ceremonies are also divided into those with masked and those with unmasked participants, the former, designated kachinas, extending from January to July, the latter occurring in the remaining months of the year. The chief of each fraternity has a badge of his office and conducts both the secret and the open features of the ceremony. The fetiches and idols used in the sacred rites are owned by the priesthood and are arranged by its chief in temporary altars (q. v.), in front of which dry-paintings (q. v.) are made. The Hopi ritual is extraordinarily complex and time-consuming, and the paraphernalia required is extensive. Although the Hopi cultus has become highly modified by a semi-arid environment, it consisted originally of ancestor worship, embracing worship of the great powers of nature—sky, sun, moon, fire, rain, and earth. A confusion of effect and cause and an elaboration of the doctrine of signatures pervade all their rites, which in the main may be regarded as sympathetic magic.

Hopnomkoyo. A former Maidu village on Lights cr., in the s. part of Plumas co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., XVII, pl. xxxviii, 1905.

Hopocan ('[tobacco] pipe'). A Delaware chief, known to the whites as Captain Pipe, and after 1763 among his people as Konieschguanokee ('Maker of Daylight'). An hereditary sachem of the Wolf division of the Delawares, he was war chief of the tribe. He was also prominent in council, having a reputation for wisdom and a remarkable gift of oratory. In the French war he fought against the English with courage and skill. He was present at the conference with Geo. Croghan at Ft Pitt in 1759, and in 1763 or 1764 tried to take the fort by stratagem, but failed, and was captured. After peace was concluded he settled with his clan on upper Muskingum r., Ohio, and in 1771 sent a "speech" to Gov. Penn. He attended the councils of the tribe at the Turtle village and at Ft Pitt until the Revolutionary war broke out, when he accepted British pay and fought the Americans and the friendly Indians, but told the British commander at Detroit that he would not act savagely toward the whites, having no interest in the quarrel, save to procure subsistence for his people, and expecting that when the English made peace with the colonists the Indians would be punished for any excesses that they committed. Col. William Crawford, however, in retaliation for the massacre of Moravian Indians by a party of white men, was put to torture when he fell into Captain Pipe's hands after the ignominious rout of his regiment of volunteers near the upper Sandusky in May, 1782. Pipe signed the treaty of Ft Pitt, Pa., Sept. 17, 1778, the first treaty between the United States and the Indians; he was also a signer of the treaties of Ft McIntosh, Ohio, Jan. 21, 1785, and Ft Harmar, Ohio, Jan. 9, 1787. In 1780 he removed from his home on Walhonding cr., at or near White Woman's town, to old Upper Sandusky, or Cranestown, Ohio, thence to Captain Pipe's village, about 10 m. s. e. of Upper Sandusky, on land that was ceded to the United States in 1829. He died in 1794. See Drake, Hist. Ind., 534, 1880; Darlington, Jour. of Col. May, 94, 1873; Pa. Archives, iv, 441, 1833.

Horicon. Marked on a map of 1671 as a people living on the headwaters of Hudson r., N. Y., w. of L. Champlain, and placed by others in the same general region. Rutenber says they were a part of the Mahican who occupied the L. George district, but Shea considers the word a mere misprint for Hircocoi, Hierocoyes, or Iroquois, which is doubtful.

Hormiguero (Span.: 'ant hill'). A village, probably of the Pima, on the Pima and Maricopa res., Gila r., Ariz.; pop. 510 in 1860, 514 in 1869. Cf. Ormejea. Herriguen.—Browne, Apache Country, 290, 1869. Hormiguero.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 19, 1863.

Hornotlimed. A Seminole chief who came into notice chiefly through a single incident of the Seminole war of 1817-18. He resided at the Fowl Town, in n. w. Florida, at the beginning of hostilities, but was forced to flee to Mikasuki. On Nov. 30, 1817, three vessels arrived at the mouth of Apalachicola r. with supplies for the garrison farther up the stream, but on account of contrary winds were unable to ascend. Lieut. Scott was sent to their assistance with a boat and 40 men, who, on their return from the vessels, were ambushed by Hornotlimed and a band of warriors, all being killed except 6 soldiers, who jumped overboard and swam to the opposite shore. Twenty soldiers who had been left to aid the vessels, and an equal number of women and sick who were with them, fell into the hands of Hornotlimed and his warriors and were slain and scalped. The scalps were carried to Mikasuki and displayed on red sticks as tokens of the victory. Mikasuki was soon afterward visited by American troops and, although most of the Indians escaped, Hornotlimed was captured and immediately hanged. Gen. Jackson called him "Homattlemico, the old Red-stick," the latter name being applied because he was a chief of the Mikasuki band, known also as Red sticks, because they erected red-painted poles in their village. (c. r.)

Horoceoe. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Horses. The first horses seen by the mainland Indians were those of the Spanish invaders of Mexico. A few years later De Soto brought the horse into Florida and westward to the Mississippi, while Coronado, on his march to Quivira in 1541, introduced it to the Indians of the great plains. When the Aztec saw the mounted men of Cortés they supposed horse and man to be one and were greatly alarmed at the strange animal. The classical Centaur owed its origin to a like misconception. A tradition existed among the Pawnee that their ancestors mistook a mule ridden by a man for a single animal and shot at it from concealment, capturing the mule when the man fell.

The horse was a marvel to the Indians and came to be regarded as sacred. For a long time it was worshiped by the Aztec, and by most of the tribes was considered to have a mysterious or sacred character. Its origin was explained by a number of myths representing horses to have come out of the earth through lakes and springs or from the sun. When Antonio de Espejo visited the Hopi of Arizona in 1583, the Indians spread cotton scarfs or kilts on the ground for the horses to walk on, believing the latter to be sacred. This sacred character is sometimes shown in the names given to the horse, as the Dakota sínka wákan, 'mysterious dog.' Its use in transportation accounts for the term 'dog' often applied to it, as the Siksika ponokámíta, 'elk dog'; Cree místatim, 'big dog'; Shawnee misháwá, 'elk.' (See Chamberlain in Am Ur-Quell, 1894.)

The southern plains proved very favorable, and horses greatly multiplied. Stray and escaped horses formed wild herds, and, as they had few carnivorous enemies, their increase and spread were astonishingly rapid. The movement of the horse was from s. to n., at about an equal rate on both sides of the mountains. It moved northward in three ways: (1) The increase of the wild horses and their dispersal into new regions was rapid. (2) For 150 years before the first exploration of the W. by residents of the United States, Spaniards from the Mexican provinces had been making long journeys northward and eastward to trade with the Indians, even, it is said, as far N. as the camps of the Kiowa, when these were living on Tongue r. (3) As soon as the Indians nearest to the Spanish settlements appreciated the uses of the horse, they began to make raiding expeditions to capture horses, and as knowledge of the animal extended, the tribes still farther to the N. began to procure horses from those next S. of them. So it was that tribes in the S. had the first horses and always had the greatest number, while the tribes farthest N. obtained them last and always had fewer of them. Some tribes declare that they possessed horses for some time before they learned the uses to which they could be put.

On the N. Atlantic coast horses were imported early in the 17th century, and the Iroquois possessed them toward the end of that century and were regularly breeding them prior to 1736. For the northern plains they seem to have been first obtained from the region w. of the Rocky mts., the Siksika having obtained their first horses from the Kutenai, Shoshoni, and other tribes across the mountains, about the year 1800. W. T. Hamilton, who met the Nez Percés, Cayuse, and other tribes of the Columbia region between 1840 and 1850, tells of the tradition among them of the time when they had no horses; but having learned of their existence in the S., of the purposes for which they were used, and of their abundance, they made up a strong war party, went S., and captured horses. It is impossible to fix the dates at which any tribes procured their horses, and, since many of the Plains tribes wandered in small bodies which seldom met, it is likely that some bands acquired the horse a long time before other sections of the same tribe. The Cheyenne relate variously that they procured their first horses from the Arapaho, from the Kiowa, and from the Shoshoni, and all these statements may be true for different bodies. A very definite statement is made that they received their first horses from the Kiowa at the time when the Kiowa lived on Tongue r. The Cheyenne did not cross the Missouri until toward the end of the 17th century. For some time they resided on that stream, and their progress in working westward and south-westward to the Black-hills, Powder r., and Tongue r. was slow. They probably did not encounter the Kiowa on Tongue r. long before the middle of the 18th century, and it is possible that the Kiowa did not then possess horses. Black Moccasin, reputed trustworthy in his knowledge and his dates, declared that the Cheyenne obtained horses about 1780. The Pawnee are known to have had horses and to have used them in hunting early in the 18th century. Carver makes no mention of seeing horses among the Sioux that he met in 1787 in w. Minnesota; but in 1776 the elder Alexander Henry saw them among the Assiniboin, while Umfreville a few years later spoke of horses as common, some being branded, showing that they had been taken from Spanish settlements.

The possession of the horse had an important influence on the culture of the Indians and speedily changed the mode of life of many tribes. The dog had previously been the Indian's only domestic animal, his companion in the hunt, and to some extent his assistant as a burden bearer, yet not to a very great degree, since the power of the dog to carry or to haul loads was not great. Before they had horses the Indians were footmen, making short journeys and transporting their possessions mostly on their backs. The hunting Indians possessed an insignificant amount of property, since the quantity that they could carry was small. Now all this was changed. An animal had been found which could carry burdens and drag loads. The Indians soon realized that the possession of such an animal would increase their freedom of movement and enable them to increase their property, since one horse could carry the load of several men. Besides this, it insured a food supply and made the moving of camp easy and swift and long journeys possible. In addition to the use of the horse as a burden bearer and as a means of moving rapidly from place to place, it was used as a medium of exchange.

The introduction of the horse led to new intertribal relations; systematic war parties were sent forth, the purpose of which was the capture of horses. This at once became a recognized industry, followed by the bravest and most energetic young men. Many of the tribes, before they secured horses, obtained guns, which gave them new boldness, and horse and gun soon transformed those who, a generation before, had been timid foot wanderers, to daring and ferocious raiders.

On the plains and in the S. W. horses were frequently used as food, but not ordinarily when other flesh could be obtained, although it is said that the Chiricahua Apache preferred mule meat to any other. It frequently happened that war parties on horse-stealing expeditions killed and ate horses. When this was done the leader of the party was always careful to warn his men to wash themselves thoroughly with sand or mud and water before they went near the enemy's camp. Horses greatly dread the smell of horse flesh or horse fat and will not suffer the approach of any one smelling of it.

The horse had no uniform value, for obviously no two horses were alike. A war pony or a buffalo horse had a high, an old pack pony a low, value. A rich old man might send fifteen or twenty horses to the tipi of the girl he wished to marry, while a poor young man might send but one. A doctor might charge a fee of one horse or five, according to the patient's means. People paid as they could. Among the Sioux and the Cheyenne the plumage of two eagles used to be regarded as worth a good horse. Forty horses have been given for a medicine pipe.

Indian saddles varied greatly. The old saddle of Moorish type, having the high peaked pommel and cantle made of wood or horn covered with raw buffalo hide, was common, and was the kind almost always used by women; but there was another type, low in front and behind, often having a horn, the prong of a deer's antler, for a rope. The Indians rode with a short stirrup—the bareback seat. To-day the young Indians ride the cowboy saddle, with the cowboy seat—the long leg. Cow-skin pads stuffed with the hair of deer, elk, antelope, buffalo, or mountain sheep were commonly used instead of saddles by some of the tribes in running buffalo or in war, but among a number of tribes the horse was stripped for chasing buffalo and for battle. Some tribes on their horse-stealing expeditions carried with them small empty pads, to be stuffed with grass and used as saddles after the horses had been secured. The Indians of other tribes scorned such luxury and rode the horse naked, reaching home chafed and scarred.

Horse racing, like foot racing, is a favorite amusement, and much property is wagered on these races. The Indians were great jockeys and trained and handled their horses with skill. When visiting another tribe they sometimes took race horses with them and won or lost large sums. The Plains tribes were extremely good horsemen, in war hiding themselves behind the bodies of their mounts so that only a foot and an arm showed, and on occasion giving exhibitions of wonderful daring and skill. During the campaign of 1865 on Powder r., after Gen. Conner's drawn battle with a large force of Arapaho and Cheyenne, an Arapaho rode up and down in front of the command within a few hundred yards, and while his horse was galloping was seen to swing himself down under his horse's neck, come up on the other side, and resume his seat, repeating the feat many times.

The horse was usually killed at the grave of its owner, just as his arms were buried with him, in order that he might be equipped for the journey that he was about to take. A number of Plains tribes practised a horse dance. There were songs about horses, and prayers were made in their behalf. On the whole, however, the horse's place in ceremony was only incidental. On the occasion of great gatherings horses were led into the circle of the dancers and there given away, the donor counting a coup as he passed over the gift to the recipient. In modern times the marriage gift sent by a suitor to a girl's family consisted in part of horses. Among some tribes a father gave away a horse when his son killed his first big game or on other important family occasions. In the dances of the soldier-band societies of most tribes 2, 4, or 6 chosen men ride horses during the dance. Their horses are painted, the tails are tied up as for war, hawk or owl feathers are tied to the forelock or tail, and frequently a scalp, or something representing it, hangs from the lower jaw. The painting represents wounds received by the rider's horse, or often there is painted the print of a hand on either side of the neck to show that an enemy on foot has been ridden down. In preparing to go into a formal battle the horse as well as his rider received protective treatment. It was ceremonially painted and adorned, as described above, and certain herbs and medicines were rubbed or blown over it to give it endurance and strength.

Among some of the Plains tribes there was a guild of horse doctors who devoted themselves especially to protecting and healing horses. They doctored horses before going into battle or to the buffalo hunt, so that they should not fall, and doctored those wounded in battle or on the hunt, as well as the men hurt in the hunt. In intertribal horse races they "doctored" in behalf of the horses of their own tribe and against those of their rivals. See Commerce, Domestication, Travel and Transportation. (G. B. G.)

Hospitality. Hospitality, distinguished from charity, was a cardinal principle in every Indian tribe. The narratives of many pioneer explorers and settlers, from De Soto and Coronado, Amidas and Barlow, John Smith and the Pilgrims, down to the most recent period, are full of instances of wholesale hospitality toward the white strangers, sometimes at considerable cost to the hosts. Gift dances were a feature in every tribe, and it was no uncommon occurrence on the plains during the summer season for large dancing parties to make the round of the tribes, returning in the course of a month or two with hundreds of ponies given in return for their entertainment. Every ceremonial gathering was made the occasion of the most lavish hospitality, both in feasting and the giving of presents. In some languages there was but one word for both generosity and bravery, and either one was a sure avenue to distinction. A notable exemplification of this was the institution of the pollatch (q. v.) among the tribes of the N. W. coast, by which a man saved for half a lifetime in order to give away his accumulated wealth in one grand distribution, which would entitle him and his descendants to rank thereafter among the chiefs. In tribes where the clan system prevailed the duty of hospitality and mutual assistance within the clan was inculcated and sacredly observed, anyone feeling at liberty to call on a fellow-clansman for help in an emergency without thought of refusal. The same obligation existed in the case of formal comradeship between two men. Among the Aleut, according to Veniaminoff, the stranger received no invitation on arriving, but decided for himself at which house he chose to be a guest, and was sure to receive there every attention as long as he might stay, with food for the journey on his departure.

On the other hand it can not be said that the Indian was strictly charitable, in the sense of extending help to those unable to reciprocate either for themselves or for their tribes. The life of the savage was precarious at best, and those who had outlived their usefulness were very apt to be neglected, even by their own nearest relatives. Hospitality as between equals was a tribal rule; charity to the helpless depended on the disposition and ability of the individual. See Ethics and Morals, Feasts. (J. M.)

Hotagastlas-hadai (Xō'tagastlas xā'da-i, 'people who run about in crowds'). A subdivision of the Chaahl-lanas, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida, settled in Alaska. They are said to have been thus named because they were so numerous that when visitors came great crowds ran to meet them.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Hotalihyana (Creek: hótali, hótali, 'wind,' 'gust,' 'hurricane'; huyána, 'passing'; hence 'Hurricane town'). A former Lower Creek or Seminole town in Dougherty co., Ga., established by Indians of Chiaha on the e. bank of Flint r., 6 m. below the junction of Kitchofooni cr. Settlers from the adjacent Ootchi had mingled with the 20 families of the village in Hawkins' time (1799). It had 27 families in 1832. (A. S. G.)

E., 1026, 1896 (= 'heavy eyebrows': another name).

Hotao (Xō'tao). A legendary Haida town that is said to have stood on the s. w. coast of Maude id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. From this place, according to one account, came the ancestress of the Hlgaiu-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Hotdijhoas (Xō'tdijhoas, 'hair seals at low tide'). A former Haida town on Lyell id., near the n. end of Darwin sl., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Hagi-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Hothepoya. See Meneva.

Hotnas-hadai (ʔot nas xadā-i, 'box-house people'). Given by Boas (Fifth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 27, 1889) as the name of a subdivision of the Yaku-lanas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida in Alaska. It is in reality only a house name belonging to that family. (J. R. S.)

Hot Springs. A summer camp of the Sitka Indians on Baranoff id., Alaska. There were 26 people there in 1880.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Hottrochtas. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Houanelha. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned to Joutel (Margry, Déc., III, 409, 1878) in 1687, while he was staying with the Kačohadacho on Red r. of Louisiana, by the chief of that tribe as being among his enemies.

Houattoehronon (Huron: Kwathogé-rónon, 'people of the sunsetting or of the west'). One of a number of tribes, mentioned in the Jesuit Relation for 1640, which were reputed to be sedentary, populous, and agricultural. Later the form Quatoghe, or Quadoge, is found as the name of the s. end of L. Michigan, being so employed on Mitchell's map of the British Colonies in N. A., of 1755, and on Jefferys' and D'Anville's maps, the one of 1777 and the other of 1775. Meaning simply 'people of the west', it was evidently the name of some people living in the w., at the s. end of L. Michigan. For some unknown reason the name Quatoghees or Quatoghies was applied to the Tionontati by Colden, and by Gallatin, Schoolcraft, and others who followed him; but this is an apparent error, as the Tionontati, or Hurons du Petun, never lived at the s. end of L. Michigan. In the famous deed of the hunting grounds of the Five Nations to the King of England, in 1701, Quadoge is given as the western boundary, at a point w. of the Miami. Father Potier, who resided at Detroit in 1751, says that Satoeronnon (Ouatoieronon and Quatokeoronon being cognate forms) was the Huron name for the Sauk. (J. N. B. H.)

Houattoehronon.—Jes. Rel., index, 1858. Hvattoehronon.—Jes. Rel. 1640, 35, 1858. Satoeronnon.—Potier, Rac. Hur. et Gram., MS., 1751.

Honjets. An unidentified tribe containing 40 men described as of fine stature, living on a branch of Red r. of Louisiana, 6 leagues from the main stream, at the beginning of the 19th century.—Baudry des Lozières, Voy. a la Louisiane, 242, 249, 1802.

Houtgna. A former Gabrieleño rancharia in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a locality later called Rancho de Lugo.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Howakeas. Mentioned with the Choc-taw as forming a small party which was defeated by the Creeks (Oglethorpe, 1743, in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist. vi, 242, 1855). Possibly a bad misprint for Timucua.

Howiri. A ruined pueblo, formerly occupied by the Tewa, at the Rito Colorado, about 10 m. w. of the Hot Springs, near Abiquiu, Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. See Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 61, 1890; iv, 22, 1892; Hewett in Bull. 32, B. A. E., 40, 1906.

Ho-ut-ri.—Bandelier, op. cit.

Howkan (*a'ok'ian, a Tlingit word probably referring to a stone which stood up in front of the town, although some derive it from gōwak'an, 'deer,' deer being numerous there). A Haida town on Long id., facing Dall id., Alaska, below which a great canoe fight took place, resulting in the occupancy of part of Prince of Wales id. by the Kaigani Haida. It was the seat of several families, but the Chaahl-lanas owned it. According to John Work's estimate (1836-41) there were 27 houses and 458 inhabitants. Petroff gave the population as 287 in 1880-81; in 1890 there were 90; in 1900, 145, including whites. (J. R. S.)

Hau kan hade.—Krause, Tlinkit Indianer, 304, 1885. Hou-a-guan.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes v, 489, 1855 (after Work, 1836-41). Houkan Hada.—Harrison in Proc. and Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., sec. II, 125, 1895. Hou-a-guan.—Dawson, Q. Charlotte Ids., 1738, 1880 (after Work). Howkan.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 32, 1884. Howkan.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 31, 1890. Hou-a-gan.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859 (misprint from Work).

Howungkut. A Hupa village of the southern division, nearly dues. of Meddiling, from which it is separated by Trinity r., Cal. At this village the first day's dancing of the white deer-skin dance of the Hupa takes place. (P. E. G.)

Wang-kat.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 73, 1877. Xōwākāt.—Goddard, Life and Culture of the Hupa, 12, 1903.

Hoya. The name of a chief and also of a former settlement on or near the s. coast of South Carolina, visited by Jean Ribault in 1562. Apparently the Ahoya mentioned by Vandera in 1567. The people were friendly with and were possibly related to the Edisto, q. v.

Ahoya.—Vandera (1567) in Smith, Collec. Doc. Fla., 16, 1857. Hoya.—Ribault (1562) in Hakluyt, Voy., 1600, 379, 1800.

Hoya (Xō'ya, 'raven' in the Skidegate dialect). One of the two great phratries or clans into which the Haida are divided. (J. R. S.)

K'ō'a-la.—Boas, Fifth and Twelfth Repts. N. W. Tribes Canada, passim (improperly applied; K'ō'a-la or K'ō'a-las means simply 'people of another clan'). Yāhl.—Swanton, inf'n, 1900 (name in Masset dialect).

Hoyagundla (Xō'ya g'a'nla, 'raven creek'). A Haida town on a stream of the same name which flows into Hecate str. a short distance s. of C. Fife, Queen Charlotte Ids., Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Djahui-gitinaí.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Hoyalas ('the troubled ones'). A Kwakiutl tribe formerly occupying the upper shores of Quatsino sd.; they were exterminated by the Koskimo.

Ho-ya.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1897, sec. II, 70. Xó'yalas.—Boas in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., v, pt. 2, 401, 1902. Xoyá'las.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. for 1895, 332.

Hoyima. A former Yokuts (Mariposan) tribe on San Joaquin r., Cal.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1906.

Huachi. A former Costanoan village near Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Huachinera (so called on account of the tascal wood found there in abundance.—Rudo Ensayo). An Opata pueblo and seat of a Spanish mission, founded about 1645, which afterward became a visita of Baseraca; situated on Tesorobabi cr., a branch of Rio Bavispe, e. Sonora, Mexico, near the Chihuahua border. Population 538 in 1678; 285 in 1730, but as it became the place of refuge of the inhabitants of Baquigopa and Batesopa on the abandonment of those villages later in the 18th century, the population was augmented. Total pop. 337 in 1900. (F. W. H.)

Guatinera.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1768), Guleras trans., 217, 1894. Huachinera.—Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, pt. 1, 59, 1890. San Juan Guachirita.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 343, 1864 (mentioned as if distinct from Huachinera). S. Juan de Guachinela.—Rivera, Diario, leg. 1444, 1736. S. Juan Guachinera.—Zapata (1678) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 246, 1884.

Huadjinaas-hadai. (Xú'adjí na'as xá'-da-i, 'people of grizzly-bear house'). A subdivision of the Koetas family of the Kaigani Haida of British Columbia.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 272, 1905.

Huados (Xuadó's, 'standing-water people,' in allusion to the swampy nature of the land around their towns). A division of the Raven clan of the Haida, formerly occupying the e. shore of Graham id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. Originally they were settled at Naikun, but on account of wars they moved to C. Ball, thence to Skidegate. The Naikun-kegawai seem to have been a sort of aristocratic branch of this family. (J. R. S.)

Qua'dás.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Canada, 24, 1898. Xuadó's.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905.

Hualga. Given by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, II, 180, 1889) as the Moon clan of the Mohave; but according to Kroeber, so far as known the Mohave do not name their clans, and their name for moon is halya.

Hualimesa. A former Cochimi rancheria under San Ignacio mission, Lower California, about lat. 28° 40'.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Jan. 17, 1862.

Hualquilme. A former Costanoan village near Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Huanes. A former tribe of s. Texas, mentioned with the Pampas, Mesquites, Pastias, Camamas, Cacanas, and Canas, as a tribe for which mission San José at San Antonio had been founded.

Huanes.—Solís, Diario, 1767-68, cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906.

Huague. Mentioned by Oviedo (Hist. Gen. Indies, III, 628, 1853) as one of the provinces or villages visited by Ayllon in 1520. Probably on the South Carolina coast.

Huaseari. A tribe or band, probably Paiute, living in 1775 in lat. 38° 3', doubtless in s. Utah.—Dominguez and Escalante in Doc. Hist. Mex., 2d s., I, 537, 1854.

Huashpatzena (huashpa = 'dance-kilt'). A pueblo occupied after 1605 by the ancestors of the inhabitants of Santo Domingo pueblo, near the present site of the latter, on the e. bank of the Rio Grande, n. central New Mexico. The pueblo was erected after the destruction, by a freshet, of the second Gipuy (q. v.) to the eastward. A part of Huashpatzena was also carried away by flood, compelling the villagers to move farther east, where they built the pueblo of Kiua—the present Santo Domingo, q. v.

Huash-pa Tze-na.—Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 187, 1892. Uash-pa Tze-na.—Ibid., III, 34, 1890.

Hui-au-ulto.—Eells, letter, B. A. E., May 21, 1886. Jamestown.—Ibid.

Huichol. A tribe of the Piman stock, numbering 3,000 to 4,000, living in the rugged Sierra Madre of n. w. Jalisco, Mexico. Their neighbors on the e. are the Tepecano, on the w. the Cora; in the n. their territory was formerly bounded by that of the Tepehuane, and in the s. by the Jalisco tribes proper, but these have largely given way to a Mexican and mixed population. In many respects the Huichol are closely related to the Cora; they are alike physically, speak cognate dialects, and exhibit many similarities in culture, thus leading some early writers to confuse the two tribes.

Their country, drained chiefly by the Rio Chapalagana, is divided into three principal districts, with the villages of

HUICHOL MAN. (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

Santa Catarina, San Sebastian, and San Andrés Coamiata as their respective central seats of government. There is little political unity in the tribe. Each of the three districts controls the land within definite boundaries and annually elects officers of its own, consisting of a governor, an alcalde, a captain, a majordomo, and some minor officials—an acquisition from the Spaniards. These officials reside in the central village, which is also a religious center. The farming season is spent in isolated rancherias, and here indeed some of the natives live during the entire year.

The Huichol are of medium stature, three-fourths of the men ranging between 160 and 170 cm.; they are predominantly brachycephalic (the cephalic index of 70 percent of the men exceeding 80), with rather short face and slightly platyrrhine nose. The body is generally well developed, deformity being extremely rare. They are healthy and prolific, and gain their livelihood by farming, hunting, fishing, and by gathering wild fruits. The wealthier Indians own good cattle. They maintain their independence with great jealousy, but they are generally peaceable and mild tempered, and show marked fondness for music, dancing, flowers, and personal finery. The women are adept in weaving and embroidery.

Their houses are quadrangular, and are built of loose stones, or of stone and mud, with thatched roofs. The dress of the men, now slightly modified, consisted of a poncho made of brown, blue, or white woolen fabric, tightened at the waist with one to three handsomely embroidered girdles, and short breeches of poorly dressed deerskin without hair, at the lower edges of which were strung a number of leathern thongs. To-day these are supplanted by trousers of white cotton. The males wear straw hats handsomely decorated in many ways. Pouches woven of wool or cotton in great variety of design form a part of their costume. Several such bags generally hang from a woven string around the waist; on ceremonial occasions as many as a dozen may be thus worn. The women wear short skirts and ponchos of cotton cloth, sometimes nicely embroidered. Both the men and the women wear over their shoulders, on gala occasions, a small cotton shawl, richly embroidered with red or red and blue thread. Sandals are worn by men. The men tie the hair in a sort of queue with a colored hair ribbon, or confine it at the neck behind. The women usually wear the hair loose.

HUICHOL WOMAN. (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

The Huichol are polygamists. They preserve their aboriginal religious beliefs, which however show some Christian admixture owing to the teachings of the friars which began after the Spanish conquest of 1722. They have numerous small temples, shrines, and sacrificial caves. Each year a party of men makes a pilgrimage to San Luis Potosí to gather peyote and to procure holy water, and their return is followed by an elaborate ceremony. Justice is administered almost entirely by the Indians themselves. Thieves are punished by enforced restitution; other criminals by whipping and confinement without food; sorcerers are sometimes killed. The dead are buried in graves or deposited in caves.

The Huichol villages and rancherías, past or present, include Bastita, Chonacate, Guadalupe y Ocotán, Guayabas, Hediondo, Kiatate, Nogal, Ocota, Pedernales, Pochotita, Popotita, San Andrés Coamiata, San José, San Sebastián, Santa Catarina, Santa Gertrudis, Soledad, Techalotita, and Texompa. Huite (Cahita: 'archer'). A small tribe or subdivision of the Cahita group, formerly living, according to Orozco y Berra, in the mountains of n. Sinaloa, Mexico, 7 leagues from the "Sinaloas." They are described as having been anthropophagous, at open war with all their neighbors, and as barbarous and naked, but through the efforts of the missionaries they were gradually reformed and were gathered into a pueblo where they afterward became confounded with the "Sinaloas." Whether they spoke a dialect different from that of the other subdivisions of the Cahita is uncertain, although from statements by Father Perez de Ribas, in 1645, it may be inferred that they did. They became extinct as a tribe at an early date, probably through absorption by the Sinaloa.

Huma ('red'). A Choctaw tribe living during the earlier period of the French colonization of Louisiana, 7 leagues above Red r. on the n. bank of the Mississippi, their settlement in 1699 containing 140 cabins and 350 families. A red pole (see Baton Rouge) marked the boundary between them and the Bayougoula on the s. In 1706 the Tonika fled to them from the Chickasaw, but later rose against them and killed more than half, after which the remainder established themselves near the site of New Orleans. Later they lived along Bayou La Fourche and in the neighborhood of the present Houma, La., which bears their name. They are now supposed to be extinct. See Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 113, 1884.

Humalijs. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863.

Humarisa (from hūmashi, 'to run'). A rancheria of 288 Tarahumare, not far from Norogachic, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumboltz, inf'n, 1894.

Humawhi. A Shastan tribe or subtribe formerly living on the s. fork of Pit r., Modoc co., Cal. According to Curtin they were a portion of the Ilmawi, living a short distance n. of Hot Spring, Modoc co.

Hama'wi.—Curtin, Ilmawi vocab., B. A. E., 1889.
Hu-ma'-whi.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 267, 1877.

Humbo. A New Hampshire word for maple syrup. Horatio Hale sought to bring it into relation with ombigamiege in Chippewa and closely related Algonquian dialects, a term signifying 'he makes the maple syrup boil,' or 'boiled sugar drink,' the chief element being the radical omb, 'to boil.' (A. F. C.)

Humboldt Indians. The Paviotso living around Humboldt lake, Nev.—Simpson, Rep. of Explor. Across Utah, 38, 1876.

Hume. A former tribe of s. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, the chief of which was encountered in 1675 by Fernando del Bosque 7 leagues beyond the Rio Grande. Jume.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., XIV, 344, 1903. Jumeca. Revillagigedo, MS. (1793) quoted by Orozco y Berra, Geog., 306, 1864.

Humelsom (Humelsom).—A Squawmish village community on Burrard inlet, Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 475, 1900.

Humkak (Hum-kak). An important Chumashan village formerly near Pt Conception, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Humor. It has been so commonly the fashion to describe the American Indian as "the stoic of the woods without a tear," that he has generally been denied as well the possession of a sense of humor. That he does not lack such, however, will readily be admitted by any one who has come to know the Indian as he is, has shared his meals and his camp fire, and had the opportunity of enjoying the real wit and humor abounding in common speech and in ancient legend. The pun, the jest of all kinds, the practical joke, the double-entendre, of which he is sometimes past-master, are all known to him. Particularly does the awkward action or the inept movement of the white man incite him to laughter. Like the white man, he has a fund of wit at the expense of the weaker sex and its peculiarities. The Eskimo and the Pueblos especially are merry, laughing people, who jest and trifle through all the grades from quiet sarcasm to the loudest joke. This appears in their songs and legends, in which humor and satire are constantly cropping out. That the Micmac and closely related Indian tribes of the Algonquian stock in N. E. North America have a keen sense of the humorous and ridiculous any one may convince himself by reading some of the tales in Leland and Prince's Kuloskop (1902), especially the episode of the master and the babe, and the story of the wizard and the Christian priest. The mythic trickster is, in fact, found in every tribe, sometimes as a misshapen personage, sometimes as a supernatural coyote, rabbit, or other animal, and the relation of his adventures provokes the greatest mirth. Around their camp fires, and "when the spirit moves them," the Chippewa and related tribes can jest and trifle in real fashion. The episodes in many of their tales and legends also prove their possession of wit and humor. The Cherokee sense of humor is proved by their myths and legends (Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 1900), and that of the Zuni by the folklore of that tribe (Cushing, Zuni Folk Tales, 1901). The Kutenai of British Columbia and Idaho are not without the virtues of humor and sarcasm (Chamberlain, Rep. on N. W. Tribes of Can., 70, 1892). Puns and mistakes in pronunciation easily set them into fits of laughter. The Pueblos, Iroquois, Apache, some of the Plains tribes, and those of the N. W. Pacific coast had regular clowns or fun-makers at some of their dances and other ceremonies. Some Plains tribes had the custom of marking the spot where any amusing accident occurred while on the march in order that later travelers might inquire and learn the joke. See Amusements. (A. F. C.)

Humptulips (said to mean 'chilly region'). A body of Chehalis on a river of the same name emptying into Chehalis r., Wash. They are under the supervision of the Puyallup school superintendent and numbered 21 in 1904.

Hamtolops.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 574, 1878. Humptulip.—Ind. Aff. Rep., pt. I, 702, 1901. Hump-tu-lups.—Ross in Ind. Aff. Rep., 18, 1870. Um-too-leaux.—Ford, ibid., 250, 1888.

Huna. A Tlingit tribe on Cross sd., Alaska, camping in summer northward to and beyond Lituya bay. Pop. 1,300 in 1870, 908 in 1880, and 592 in 1890. For 1900 the entire population of Gaudekan, the chief Huna village, was given as 447. Other towns in their country are Akvet-skoe, Hukanuwu, Klughuggue, Kukanuwu, and Tlushashakian. Their social divisions are Chukanedi, Koskedi, Tak-dentan, and Wushketan.

Ohūna-kōn.—Krause, Thinkit Ind., 118, 1885. Gross Sound Indians.—Kane, Wand N. A., app. 1849 (traders' name). Gross Sound Indians.—Colyer in Ind. Aff. Hunawurp (Hu-na-wurp). One of the Chumashan villages formerly near Santa Inez mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Henshaw, Santa Inez MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Huneta. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Hungopavi (Navaho: 'crooked nose'). An important pueblo ruin 2 m. above Pueblo Bonito, on the n. side of Chaco canyon, at the base of the canyon wall, in n. w. New Mexico. It is built around 3 sides of a court, the extremities of the wings being connected by a semicircular double wall and the space between these walls divided into rooms. The length of the main building is 309 ft; of the 2 wings, 136 ft each. The building was 4 stories high. There is a circular kiva in the court and another inclosed within the walls of the main building. The one inclosed is 23 ft in diameter. The masonry of Hungopavi is exceptionally good; the material is fine-grained, grayish-yellow sandstone, compactly laid in thin mud mortar. The exterior walls of the first story are 3 ft thick. Walls still stand to a height of 30 ft, and deterioration has proceeded very slowly since the ruin was first described. See Hardacre in Scribner's Mag., Dec. 1878; Jackson in 10th Rep. Hayden Surv., 438, 1879, and the writers mentioned below. (E. L. H.)

Hungo Parie.—Domenech, Deserts, 1, 200, 1860 (misprint). Hungo Pavia.—Morgan in Rep. Peabody Mus., xii, 549, 1880. Hungo Pavia.—Simpson, Exped. Navaho Country, 79, 1850. Hunyo Pavia.—Cope in Rep. Wheeler Surv., app. LL, 173, 1875.

Huning ruin. A large, rectangular, prehistoric ruin on the ranch of Henry Huning at Showlow, Navajo co., Ariz., on a rock table above Showlow cr. The pottery found on the site is of red and gray ware, not of very fine quality. The masonry of the walls is good, but the remains of the pueblo do not indicate very long occupancy.—Hough in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 301, 1903.

Hunkkhwitk (Hūn-kwi'-tik). A former Yaquina village on the n. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 229, 1890.

Hunkpapa (variously interpreted 'at the entrance,' 'at the head end of the circle,' 'those who camp by themselves,' and 'wanderers'). A division of the Teton Sioux. From the meager data relating to the history of this band it seems probable that it is one of comparatively modern formation. When Hennepin, in 1680, found what are believed to have been the Teton as far e. as the banks of the upper Mississippi, no mention of the Hunkpapa at that early date or for 100 years thereafter can be found unless it be under some name yet unidentified. Their name is not mentioned by Lewis and Clark, though it is possible that the tribe is included in the Teton Saone of those explorers. The name first appears as Hunkpapa, and it is properly written Hunkpapa in the treaty of 1825. It is evident that the tribe was then well known, although its history previous to this date is undetermined. The Teton Saone were located by Lewis and Clark, in 1804, on both sides of the Missouri below Beaver cr., N. Dak., and were estimated at 300 men or 900 souls in 120 tipis. Ramsey (1849) gave their location as near Cannonball r. Culbertson (1850) gave their range as on the Cheyenne, Moreau, Grand, and Cannonball rs., and estimated them at 320 tipis. Gen. Warren (1855) said that they lived on the Missouri near the mouth of the Moreau and roamed from the Big Cheyenne up to the Yellowstone, and w. to the Black-hills. He states that they formerly intermarried extensively with the Cheyenne. His estimate of population is 365 tipis, 2,920 souls. He adds that many of the depredations along the Platte "are committed by the Unkpapas and Sihapapas." It is indicative of their character that they were among the last of the Dakota to be brought upon reservations. The Indian agent, writing in 1854, says: "All the bands of Sioux have already received their presents with great appearance of friendship, excepting the Minnecowzues (Miniconjou), Blackfeet (Sihapapa), and Honepapas (Hunkpapa). The former band are daily expected at the fort, and will gladly receive their annuities; but the Blackfeet and Honepapas still persist in refusing any annuities, and are constantly violating all the stipulations of the treaty. They are continually warring and committing depredations on whites and neighboring tribes, killing men and stealing horses. They even defy the Great Father, the President, and declare their intention to murder indiscriminately all that come within their reach. They, of all Indians, are now the most dreaded on the Missouri." And when the agent finally succeeded in reaching them and holding a council with their chiefs at Ft Clark, they refused to receive the presents sent by the Government, stating that they did not want them, but preferred the liberty to take scalps and commit whatever depredations they pleased. They took part in most of the subsequent conflicts with the whites, as that at Ft Phil. Kearney and that with Custer on the Little Bighorn. The number of the band in 1891 was 571;

these were gathered on Standing Rock res., N. and S. Dak. The population is no longer given separately. The noted Sitting Bull was chief of this tribe, though in making treaties he signed also for the Ogala.

Their subdivisions as given by J. O. Dorsey are: (1) Chankaokhan, (2) Cheokhba, (3) Tinazipeshicha, (4) Talonapin, (5) Kiglashka, (6) Chegnakeokisela, (7) Shikshichela, (8) Wakan, and (9) Hunkachantozhuha. Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. 1850, 141, 1851) mentions the following bands: Devil's medicine-man band (Wakan), Half breechclout people (Chegnakeokisela), Fresh neck people (Cheokhba), Sore backs (Chankaokhan), Bad bows (Tinazipeshicha), and Those that carry. Fire-Heart's band (Chantapeta's band) is supposed to be a part of the Hunkpapa.

Hunkpatina ('campers at the end of the circle'). One of the two primary divisions of the Yanktonai Sioux, commonly known as Lower Yanktonai, from their former range on lower James r. of s. South Dakota. The Hunkpatina are seemingly referred to for the first time, in whole or in part, by Lewis and Clark, in 1804, under the name Honetaparten, as a division of the Yankton of the N. They were on intimate terms with the Upper Yanktonai, who ranged about the upper waters of the James. They are now chiefly on Crow Creek res., S. Dak., where they numbered 1,009 in 1905. In 1866 they were estimated at 2,100. Some others appear to be attached to Standing Rock agency, N. Dak. Their bands, as given by J. O. Dorsey (15th Rep. B. A. E., 218, 1897), are: Putetemini (Sweat-lips), Shungikcheka (Common dogs), Takhuhayuta (Eat-the-scrappings-of-hides), Sangona (Shot-at-some-white-object), Ihasha (Red-lips), Iteghu

Hunting. The pursuit of game may be divided into two sets of activities, which correspond to military strategy and tactics, the one including the whole series of traps, the other hunting weapons and processes. Beginning with the latter, the following 9 classes embrace all the hunting activities of the American Indians:

(1) Taking animals with the hand without the aid of apparatus. Examples of this are picking up marine animals on the beach to eat on the spot, robbing birds' nests, and seizing birds on their roosts on dark nights. Such unskilled taking developed the utmost cunning, agility, and strength for pursuing, seizing, climbing, diving, stealing upon, and deceiving, and the same qualities were useful also in the pursuit with weapons. The climax of this first class was the communal game drive, in which a whole band or tribe would surround a herd of animals and coax or force them into a gorge, a corral, or natural cul-de-sac.

(2) Gathering with devices. To this class of activities belong substitutes for the fingers or palms, such as rakes for drawing or piling up sea food; a sharp stick for getting worms by forcing them out of the ground; nets and scoops for taking animals from the water (see Fishing, Nets); also dulle, reatas, and bolas for reaching out and grasping. This class reached its climax in the partnership or communal net, used by the Eskimo and other tribes for taking seal and also small fish.

(3) The employment of apparatus for striking, bruising, or breaking bones, including stones held in the hands, clubs with grips, and hard objects at the end of a line or handle, like a slung shot. The N. Pacific tribes took great pains with their clubs, carving on them their symbolism.

(4) Slashing or stabbing with edged weapons. The Indians had little to do with metals and were given almost altogether to the use of stone, bone, reeds, and wood for stabbing and slashing. Both chipped and ground weapons were used, either without a handle, with a grip, or at the end of a shaft. Every Eskimo had a quiver of daggers for use at close quarters, and so had the Indian his side arms. Edged weapons, however, were not so common as the weapons of the next class.

(5) Hunting with piercing weapons, the most common of all Indian methods of taking animals. The implements include the pointed stick or stone, the lance, the spear, the harpoon, and the arrow (q. v.). Weapons of this class were held in the hand, hurled from the hand, shot from a bow or a blowgun, or slung from the throwing stick. Each of the varieties went through a multitude of transformations, depending on game, materials at hand, the skill of the maker, etc.

(6) The use of traps, pits, and snares (see Traps). The Tenankutchin of Alaska capture deer, moose, and caribou by means of a brush fence, extended many miles, in which at intervals snares are set; and the same custom was practised by many other tribes in hunting the larger game. The Plains tribes and the ancient Pueblos captured deer, antelope, and wolves by means of pitfalls.

(7) Capturing game by means of dogs or other hunting animals. Indian tribes, with few exceptions, had no hunting dogs regularly trained to pursue game, but the common dog was very efficient. Fowls of the air, marine animals, and especially carnivorous animals, such as the coyote, by their noises and movements gave the cue which aided the cunning and observant hunter to identify, locate, and follow his game. (See Domestication.)

(8) Hunting by means of fire and smoke. In America, as throughout the world, as soon as men came into possession of fire the conquest of the animal kingdom was practically assured. The Indians used smoke to drive animals out of hiding, torches to dazzle the eyes of deer and to attract fish and birds to their canoes, and firebrands and prairie fires for game drives.

(9) Taking animals by means of drugs. The bark of walnut root served to asphyxiate fish in fresh-water pools in the Southern states; in other sections soap root and buckeyes were used.

In connection with hunting processes there were accessory activities in which the Indian had to be versed. There were foods to eat and foods tabued, clothing and masks to wear, shelters and hiding places to provide, and not only must the hunter be familiar with calls, imitations, decoys, whistles, and the like, but acquainted with the appropriate hunting songs, ceremonies, and fetishes, and with formulas for every act in the process, the time for the chase of the various animals, the laws for the division of game, and the clan names connected with hunting. Besides, there were numberless employments and conveniences associated therewith. In order to use the harpoon it was necessary to have a canoe, and with every method of hunting were connected other employments which taxed the ingenuity of the savage mind. There were also certain activities which were the result of hunting. Questions presented themselves regarding transportation, receptacles, the discrimination of useful species, and the construction of fences. A slight knowledge of anatomy was necessary in order to know where to strike and how to cut up game. All these gave excellent training in perception, skill, and cooperative effort. See Buffalo, Fishing, Food, Fur trade, Horse, etc., and the various subjects above referred to.

Hupa. An Athapascan tribe formerly occupying the valley of Trinity r., Cal., from South fork to its junction with the Klamath, including Hupa valley. They were first mentioned by Gibbs in 1852; a military post was established in their territory in 1855 and maintained until 1892; and a reservation 12 m. square, including nearly all the Hupa habitat, was set apart in Aug., 1864. The population in 1888 was given as 650; in 1900, 430; in 1905, 412. They are at present self-supporting, depending on agriculture and stock raising. When they first came in contact with the whites, in 1850, the Hupa were all under the control of a chief called Ahrookoos by the Yurok (McKee in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 161, 1853), whose authority is said to have extended to other peoples southward along Trinity r. The position of chief depended on the possession of wealth, which usually remained in the family, causing the chieftainship to descend from father to son. In feasts and dances a division of the Hupa into two parts is manifest, but this division seems to have no validity outside of religious matters. The tribe occupied the following permanent villages: Cheindekhotding, Djish-tangading, Haslinding, Honsading, How-ungkut, Kinchuwahikut, Medilding, Miskut, Takimilding, Tlilding, Toltsasding, and Tsewenalding. Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 73, 1877) gave Chail-kutkaituh, Wissomanchuh, and Misketoi-itok, which have not been identified with any of the foregoing; Gibbs (MS. on Klamath river, B. A. E., 1852), on information furnished by the Yurok, gave Wangullewutlekauih, Wangullewattl, Sehachpeya, and (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853) Tashuanta, Sokeakeit (Sok-chit), and Meyemma.

The houses of the Hupa were built of cedar slabs set on end, the walls being 4 ft high on the sides and rising to more than 6 ft at the ends to accommodate the slope of the roof, inclosing a place about 20 ft square, the central part of which was excavated to form the principal chamber, which was about 12 ft square and 5 ft deep. The entrance was a hole 18 or 20 in. in diameter and about a foot above the ground. This was the storehouse for the family goods and the sleeping place of the women. The men occupied sweat houses at night. The Hupa depended for food on the deer and elk of the mountains, the salmon and lamprey of the river, and the acorns and other vegetal foods growing plentifully about them. They are noted for the beautiful twined baskets produced by the women and the fine pipes and implements executed by the men. The yew bows they used to make, only about 3 ft long, strengthened with sinew fastened to the back with sturgeon glue, were effective up to 75 yds. and could inflict a serious wound at 100 yds. Their arrows, made of syringa shoots wound with sinew, into which foreshafts of juneberry wood were inserted, feathered with three split hawk feathers and pointed with sharp heads of obsidian, flint, bone, or iron, sometimes passed entirely through a deer. The hunter, disguised in the skin of the deer or elk, the odor of his body removed by ablution and smoking with green fir boughs, simulated so perfectly the movements of the animal in order to get within bowshot that a panther sometimes pounced upon his back, but withdrew when he felt the sharp pins that, for the very purpose of warding off such an attack, were thrust through the man's hair gathered in a bunch at the back of the neck. The Hupa took deer also with snares of a strong rope made from the fiber of the iris, or chased them into the water with dogs and pursued them in canoes. Meat was roasted before the fire or on the coals or incased in the stomach and buried in the ashes until cooked, or was boiled in water-tight baskets by dropping in hot stones. Meat and fish were preserved by smoking. Salmon were caught in latticed weirs stretched across the river or in seines or poundnets, or were speared with barbs that detached but were made fast to the pole by lines. Dried acorns were ground into flour, leached in a pit to extract the bitter taste, and boiled into a mush.

The men wore ordinarily a breechclout of deerskin or of skins of small animals joined together, and leggings of painted deerskin with the seam in front hidden by a fringe that hung from the top, which was turned down at the knee. Moccasins of deerskin with soles of elk hide were sometimes worn. The dance robes of the men were made of two deerskins sewn together along one side, the necks meeting over the left shoulder and the tails nearly touching the ground. Panther skins were sometimes used. The hair wasted into two clubs, one hanging down on each side of the head, or into one which hung behind. Bands of deer-skin, sometimes ornamented with woodpeckers' crests, were worn about the head in dances, and occasionally feathers or feathered darts were stuck in the hair. The nose was not pierced, but in the ears were often worn dentalium shells with tassels of woodpeckers' feathers. A quiver of handsome skin filled with arrows was a part of gala dress, and one of plain buckskin or a skin pouch or sack of netting was carried as a pocket for small articles. Women wore a skirt of deerskin reaching to the knees, with a long, thick fringe hanging below and a short fringe at the waist. When soiled it was washed with the soap plant. At the opening of the skirt in front an apron was worn underneath. The skirts worn in dances were ornamented with strings of shell beads, pieces of abalone shell, and flakes of obsidian fastened to the upper and of shells of pine nuts inserted at intervals in the lower fringe. The apron for common wear was made of long strands of pine-nut shells and braided leaves attached to a belt. The dance aprons had strands of shells and pendants cut from abalone shells. Small dentalium and olivella shells, pine-nut shells, and small black fruits were strung for necklaces. A robe of deerskin or of wildcat fur was worn with the hair next to the body as a protection against the cold and in rainy weather with the hair side out. The head covering was a cap of fine basket work, which protected the forehead from the carrying strap whereby burlens and baby baskets were borne. Women, except widows, wore their hair long and tied in queues that hung down in front of the ears, and were ornamented with strips of mink skin, sometimes covered with woodpeckers' crests, and shell pendants, and sometimes perfumed with stems of yerba buena. From their ears hung pendants of abalone shell attached to twine. All adult women were tattooed with vertical black marks on the chin and sometimes curved marks were added at the corners of the mouth.

The imagination of the Hupa has peopled the regions E., W., S., and above with mortals known as Kihunai. The underworld is the abode of the dead. Their creator or culture hero, Yimantuwingyai, dwells with Kihunai across the ocean toward the N. A salmon feast is held by the southern division in the spring and an acorn feast by the northern division in the fall. They formerly celebrated three dances each year: the spring dance, the white-deerskin dance, and the jumping dance. They have a large and varied folklore and many very interesting medicine formulas. Huron (lexically from French huré, 'bristly,' 'bristled,' from hure, 'rough hair' (of the head), head of man or beast, wild boar's head; old French, 'muzzle of the wolf, lion,' etc., 'the scalp,' 'a wig'; Norman French, huré, 'rugged'; Roumanian, hurée, 'rough earth,' and the suffix -on, expressive of depreciation and employed to form nouns referring to persons). The name Huron, frequently with an added epithet, like vilain, 'base,' was in use in France as early as 1358 (La Curne de Sainte-Palaye in Dict. Hist. de l'Ancien Langage Francoise, 1880) as a name expressive of contumely, contempt, and insult, signifying approximately an unkempt person, knave, ruffian, lout, wretch. The peasants who rebelled against the nobility during the captivity of King John in England in 1358 were called both Hurons and Jacques or Jacques bons hommes, the latter signifying approximately 'simpleton Jacks,' and so the term Jacquerie was applied to this revolt of the peasants. But Father Lalement (Jes. Rel. for 1639, 51, 1858), in attempting to give the origin of the name Huron, says that about 40 years previous to his time, i. e., about 1600, when these people first reached the French trading posts on the St Lawrence, a French soldier or sailor, seeing some of these barbarians wearing their hair cropped and roached, gave them the name Hurons, their heads suggesting those of wild boars. Lalement declares that while what he had advanced concerning the origin of the name was the most authentic, "others attribute it to some other though similar origin." But it certainly does not appear that the rebellious French peasants in 1358, mentioned above, were called Hurons because they had a similar or an identical manner of wearing the hair; for, as has been stated, the name had, long previous to the arrival of the French in America, a well-known derogatory signification in France. So it is quite probable that the name was applied to the Indians in the sense of 'an unkempt person,' 'a bristly savage,' 'a wretch or lout,' 'a ruffian.'

A confederation of 4 highly organized Iroquoian tribes with several small dependent communities, which, when first known in 1615, occupied a limited territory, sometimes called Huron, around L. Simcoe and s. and e. of Georgian bay, Ontario. According to the Jesuit Relation for 1639 the names of these tribes, which were independent in local affairs only, were the Attigneaouantan (Bear people), the Attigneonongnahac (Cord people), the Arendahronon (Rock people), and the Tohontaenrat (Atahonta'enrat or Tohonta'enrat, White-eared or Deer people). Two of the dependent peoples were the Bowl people and the Ataronchronon. Later, to escape destruction by the Iroquois, the Wenrochronon, an Iroquoian tribe, in 1639, and the Atontataronnon, an Algonquian people, in 1644, sought asylum with the Huron confederation. In the Huron tongue the common and general name of this confederation of tribes and dependent peoples was Wendat (Sensat), a designation of doubtful analysis and signification, the most obvious meaning being 'the islanders' or 'dwellers on a peninsula.' According to a definite tradition recorded in the Jesuit Relation for 1639, the era of the formation of this confederation was at that period comparatively recent, at least in so far as the date of membership of the last two tribes mentioned therein is concerned. According to the same authority the Rock people were adopted about 50 years and the Deer people about 30 years (traditional time) previous to 1639, thus carrying back to about 1590 the date of the immigration of the Rock people into the Huron country. The first two principal tribes in 1639, regarding themselves as the original inhabitants of the land, claimed that they knew with certainty the dwelling places and village sites of their ancestors in the country for a period exceeding 200 years. Having received and adopted the other two into their country and state, they were the more important. Officially and in their councils they addressed each other by the formal political terms 'brother' and 'sister'; they were also the more populous, having incorporated many persons, families, clans, and peoples, who, preserving the name and memory of their own founders, lived among the tribes which adopted them as small dependent communities, maintaining the general name and having the community of certain local rights, and enjoyed the powerful protection and shared with it the community of certain other rights, interests, and obligations of the great Wendat commonwealth.

The provenience and the course of migration of the Rock and Deer tribes to the Huron country appear to furnish a reason for the prevalent but erroneous belief that all the Iroquoian tribes came into this continent from the valley of the lower St Lawrence. There is presumptive evidence that the Rock and the Deer tribes came into Huronia from the middle and upper St Lawrence valley, and they appear to have been expelled therefrom by the Iroquois, hence the expulsion of the Rock and the Deer people from lower St Lawrence valley has been mistaken for the migration of the entire stock from that region.

In his voyages to the St Lawrence in 1534-43, Jacques Cartier found on the present sites of Quebec and Montreal, and along both banks of this river above the Saguenay on the N. and above Gaspé peninsula on the S. bank, tribes speaking Iroquoian tongues, for there were at least two dialects, a fact well established by the vocabularies which Cartier recorded. Lexical comparison with known Iroquoian dialects indicates that those spoken on the St Lawrence at that early date were Huron or Wendat. Cartier further learned that these St Lawrence tribes were in fierce combat with peoples dwelling southward from them, and his hosts complained bitterly of the cruel attacks made on them by their southern foes, whom they called Toudamani (Trudamans or Trudamani) and Agouionda (Onkhiion'thā is an Onondaga form), the latter signifying 'those who attack us.' Although he may have recorded the native names as nearly phonetically as he was able, yet the former is not a distant approach to the well-known Tsonnon-towanen of the early French writers, a name which Champlain printed Chouon-touarouion (probably written Chonon-touarouion), the name of the Seneca, which was sometimes extended to include the Cayuga and Onondaga as a geographical group. Lescarbot, failing to find in Canada in his time the tongues recorded by Cartier, concluded that "the change of language in Canada" was due "to a destruction of people," and in 1603 he declared (Nova Francia, 170, 1609): "For it is some 8 years since the Iroquois did assemble themselves to the number of 8,000 men, and discomfited all their enemies, whom they surprised in their enclosures;" and (p. 290) "by such surprises the Iroquois, being in number 8,000 men, have heretofore exterminated the Algonquians, them of Hochelaga, and others bordering upon the great river." So it is probable that the southern foes of the tribes along the St Lawrence in Cartier's time were the Iroquois tribes anterior to the formation of their historical league, for he was also informed that these Agouionda "doe continually warre one against another"—a condition of affairs which ceased with the formation of the league. Between the time of the last voyage of Cartier to the St Lawrence, in 1543, and the arrival of Champlain on this river in 1603, nothing definite is known of these tribes and their wars. Champlain found the dwelling places of the tribes discovered by Cartier on the St Lawrence deserted and the region traversed only rarely by war parties from extralimital Algonquian tribes which dwelt on the borders of the former territory of the expelled Iroquoian tribes. Against the aforesaid Iroquoian tribes the Iroquois were still waging relentless warfare, which Champlain learned in 1622 had then lasted more than 50 years.

Such was the origin of the confederation of tribes strictly called Hurons by the French and Wendat (S Wendat) in their own tongue. But the name Hurons was applied in a general way to the Tionontati, or Tobacco tribe, under the form "Huron du Pétun," and also, although rarely, to the Attiwendaronk in the form "Huron de la Nation Neutre." After the destruction of the Huron or Wendat confederation and the more or less thorough dispersal of the several tribes composing it, the people who, as political units, were originally called Huron and Wendat, ceased to exist. The Tionontati, or Tobacco tribe, with the few Huron fugitives, received the name "Huron du Pétun" from the French, but they became known to the English as Wendat, corrupted to Yendat, Guyandotte, and finally to Wyandot. The Jesuit Relation for 1667 says: "The Tionnontateheronnons of to-day are the same people who heretofore were called the Hurons de la nation du pétun." These were the so-called Tobacco nation, and not the Wendat tribes of the Huron confederation. So the name Huron was employed only after these Laurentian tribes became settled in the region around L. Simcoe and Georgian bay. Champlain and his French contemporaries, after becoming acquainted with the Iroquois tribes of New York, called the Hurons les bons Iroquois, 'the good Iroquois,' to distinguish them from the hostile Iroquois tribes. The Algonquian allies of the French called the Hurons and the Iroquois tribes Nadouek, 'adders,' and Iri-khowek, 'real serpents,' hence, 'bitter enemies.' The singular Iri'kowi, with the French suffix -ois, has become the familiar "Iroquois." The term Nadoue in various forms (e. g., Nottaway) was applied by the Algonquian tribes generally to all alien and hostile peoples. Champlain also called the Hurons Ochateguin and Charioquois, from the names of prominent chiefs. The Delawares called them Talamatan, while the peoples of the "Neutral Nation" and of the Huron tribes applied to each other the term Attiwendaronk, literally, 'their speech is awry,' but freely, 'they are stammerers,' referring facetiously to the dialectic difference between the tongues of the two peoples.

In 1615 Champlain found all the tribes which he later called Hurons, with the exception of the Wenrobronon and the Atontrataronon, dwelling in Huronia and waging war against the Iroquois tribes in New York. When Cartier explored the St Lawrence valley, in 1534-43, Iroquoian tribes occupied the N. bank of the river indefinitely northward and from Saguenay r. eastward to Georgian bay, with no intrusive alien bands (despite the subsequent but doubtful claim of the Onontchataronon to a former possession of the island of Montreal), and also the S. watershed from the Bay of Gaspé W. to the contiguous territory of the Iroquois confederation on the line of the E. watershed of L. Champlain.

The known names of towns of these Laurentian Iroquois are Araste, Hagonchenda, Hochelaga, Hochelay, Satadip, Stadacona, Starnatan, Tailla, Teguenon-dahi, and Tutonaguy. But Cartier, in speaking of the people of Hochelaga, remarks: "Notwithstanding, the said Canadians are subject to them with eight or nine other peoples who are on the said river." All these towns and villages were abandoned previous to the arrival of Champlain on the St Lawrence in 1603. Of the towns of the Hurons, Sagard says: "There are about 20 or 25 towns and villages, of which some are not at all shut, nor closed [palisaded], and others are fortified with long pieces of timber in triple ranks, interlaced one with another to the height of a long pike [16 ft], and reinforced on the inside with broad, coarse strips of bark, 8 or 9 ft in height; below there are large trees, with their branches lopped off, laid lengthwise on very short trunks of trees, forked at one end, to keep them in place; then above these stakes and bulwarks there are galleries or platforms, called ondaqua ('box'), which are furnished with stones to be hurled against an enemy in time of war, and with water to extinguish any fire which might be kindled against them. Persons ascend to these by means of ladders quite poorly made and difficult, which are made of long pieces of timber wrought by many hatchet strokes to hold the foot firm in ascending." Champlain says that these palisades were 35 ft in height. In accord with the latter authority, Sagard says that these towns were in a measure permanent, and were removed to new sites only when they became too distant from fuel and when their fields, for lack of manuring, became worn out, which occurred every 10, 20, 30, or 40 years, more or less, according to the situation of the country, the richness of the soil, and the distance of the forest, in the middle of which they always built their towns and villages. Champlain says the Hurons planted large quantities of several kinds of corn, which grew finely, squashes, tobacco, many varieties of beans, and sunflowers, and that from the seeds of the last they extracted an oil with which they anointed their heads and employed for various other purposes.

The government of these tribes was vested by law in a definite number of executive officers, called "chiefs" (q. v.) in English, who were chosen by the suffrage of the child-bearing women and organized by law or council decree into councils for legislative and judicial purposes. There were five units in the social and political organization of these tribes, namely, the family, clan, phratry, tribe, and confederation, which severally expressed their will through councils co-ordinate with their several jurisdictions and which made necessary various grades of chiefs in civil affairs. In these communities the civil affairs of government were entirely differentiated from the military, the former being exercised by civil officers, the latter by military officers. It sometimes happened that the same person performed the one or the other kind of function, but to do so he must temporarily resign his civil authority should it be incumbent on him to engage in military affairs, and when this emergency was past he would resume his civil function or authority.

In almost every family one or more chiefship titles, known by particular names, were hereditary, and there might even be two or three different grades of chiefs therein. But the candidate for the incumbency of any one of these dignities was chosen only by the suffrage of the mothers among the women of his family. The selection of the candidate thus made was then submitted for confirmation to the clan council, then to the tribal council, and lastly to the great federal council composed of the accredited delegates from the various allied tribes.

The tribes composing the Hurons recognized and enforced, among others, the rights of ownership and inheritance of property and dignities, of liberty and security of person, in names, of marriage, in personal adornment, of hunting and fishing in specified territory, of precedence in migration and encampment and in the council room, and rights of religion and of the blood feud. They regarded theft, adultery, maiming, sorcery with evil intent, treason, and the murder of a kinsman or a co-tribesman as crimes which consisted solely in the violation of the rights of a kinsman by blood or adoption, for the alien had no rights which Indian justice and equity recognized, unless by treaty or solemn compact. If an assassination were committed or a solemnly sworn peace with another people violated by the caprice of an individual, it was not the rule to punish directly the guilty person, for this would have been to assume over him a jurisdiction which no one would think of claiming; on the contrary, presents designed to "cover the death" or to restore peace were offered to the aggrieved party by the offender and his kindred. The greatest punishment that could be inflicted on a guilty person by his kindred was to refuse to defend him, thus placing him outside the rights of the blood feud and allowing those whom he had offended the liberty to take vengeance on him, but at their own risk and peril.

The religion of these tribes consisted in the worship of all material objects, the elements and bodies of nature, and many creatures of a teeming fancy, which in their view directly or remotely affected or controlled their well-being. These objects of their faith and worship were regarded as man-beings or anthropic persons possessed of life, volition, and orenda (q. v.) or magic power of different kind and degree peculiar to each. In this religion ethics or morals as such received only a secondary, if any, consideration. The status and interrelations of the persons of their pantheon one to another were fixed and governed by rules and customs assumed to be similar to those of the social and the political organization of the people, and so there was, therefore, at least among the principal gods, a kinship system patterned after that of the people themselves. They expressed their public religious worship in elaborate ceremonies performed at stated annual festivals, lasting from a day to fifteen days, and governed by the change of seasons. Besides the stated gatherings there were many minor meetings, in all of which there were dancing and thanksgiving for the blessings of life. They believed in a life hereafter, which was but a reflex of the present life, but their ideas regarding it were not very definite. The bodies of the dead were wrapped in furs, neatly covered with flexible bark, and then placed on a platform resting on four pillars, which was then entirely covered with bark; or the body, after being prepared for burial, was placed in a grave and over it were laid small pieces of timber, covered with strong pieces of bark and then with earth. Over the grave a cabin was usually erected. At the great feast of the dead, which occurred at intervals of 8 or 10 years, the bodies of those who had died in the interim, from all the villages participating in the feast, were brought together and buried in a common grave with elaborate and solemn public ceremonies.

In 1615, when the Hurons were first visited by the French under Champlain, he estimated from the statements of the Indians themselves that they numbered 30,000, distributed in 18 towns and villages, of which 8 were palisaded; but in a subsequent edition of his work Champlain reduces this estimate to 20,000. A little later Sagard estimated their population at 30,000, while Brebeuf gave their number as 35,000. But these figures are evidently only guesses and perhaps much above rather than below the actual population, which, in 1648, was probably not far from 20,000.

When the French established trading posts on the St Lawrence at Three Rivers and elsewhere, the Hurons and neighboring tribes made annual trips down Ottawa r. or down the Trent to these posts for the purpose of trading both with the Europeans and with the Montagnais of the lower St Lawrence who came up to meet them. The chief place of trade at this time was, according to Sagard (Histoire, I, 170, 1866), in the harbor of Cape Victory, in L. St Peter of St Lawrence r., about 50 miles below Montreal, just above the outlet of the lake, where, on Sagard's arrival, there were "already lodged a great number of savages of various nations for the trade of beavers with the French. The Indians who were not sectarians in religion invited the missionaries into their country. In 1615 the Récollect fathers accepted the invitation, and Father Le Caron spent the year 1615-16 in Huronia, and was again there in 1623-24. Father Poulain was among the Hurons in 1622, Father Viel from 1623 to 1625, and Father De la Roche Daillon in 1626-28. The labors of the Jesuits began with the advent of Father Brebeuf in Huronia in 1626, but their missions ended in 1650 with the destruction of the Huron commonwealth by the Iroquois. In all, 4 Récollect and 25 Jesuit fathers had labored in the Huron mission during its existence, which at its prime was the most important in the French dominions in North America. As the first historian of the mission, Fr. Sagard, though not a priest, deserves honorable mention.

From the Jesuit Relation for 1640 it is learned that the Hurons had had cruel wars with the Tionontati, but that at the date given they had recently made peace, renewed their former friendship, and entered into an alliance against their common enemies. Sagard is authority for the statement that the Hurons were in the habit of sending large war parties to ravage the country of the Iroquois. The well-known hostility and intermittent warfare between the Iroquois and the Huron tribes date from prehistoric times, so that the invasion and destruction of the Huron country and confederation in 1648-50 by the Iroquois were not a sudden, unprovoked attack, but the final blow in a struggle which was already in progress when the French under Cartier in 1535 first explored the St Lawrence. The acquirement of firearms by the Iroquois from the Dutch was an important factor in their subsequent successes. By 1643 they had obtained about 400 guns, while, on the other hand, as late as the final invasion of their country the Hurons had but very few guns, a lack that was the direct cause of their feeble resistance and the final conquest by the Iroquois confederation of half of the country E. of the Mississippi and N. of the Ohio. In July, 1648, having perfected their plans for the final struggle for supremacy with the Hurons, the Iroquois began open hostility by sacking two or three frontier towns and Teanaustayé (St Joseph), the major portion of the invading warriors wintering in the Huron country unknown to the Hurons; and in March, 1649, these Iroquois warriors destroyed Taenhatentaron (St Ignace) and St Louis, and carried into captivity hundreds of Hurons. These disasters completely demoralized and disorganized the Huron tribes, for the greater portion of their people were killed or led into captivity among the several Iroquoian tribes, or perished from hunger and exposure in their precipitate flight in all directions, while of the remainder some escaped to the Neutral Nation, or "Hurons de la Nation Neutre," some to the Tobacco or Tionontati tribe, some to the Erie, and others to the French settlements near Quebec on the island of Orleans. The Tohontaenrat, forming the populous town of Scanonaenrat, and a portion of the Arendahronon of the town of St-Jean-Baptiste surrendered to the Seneca and were adopted by them with the privilege of occupying a village by themselves, which was named Gandougarée (St Michel). As soon as the Iroquois learned of the Huron colony on Orleans id., they at once sought to persuade these Hurons to migrate to their country. Of these the Bear people, together with the Bowl band and the Rock people, having in an evil day promised to remove thither, were finally, in 1656, compelled to choose between fighting and migrating to the Iroquois country. They chose the latter course, the Bear people going to the Mohawk and the Rock people to the Onondaga. The Cord people alone had the courage to remain with the French.

The adopted inhabitants of the new town of St Michel (Gandougarée) were mostly Christian Hurons who preserved their faith under adverse conditions, as did a large number of other Huron captives who were adopted into other Iroquois tribes. In 1653 Father Le Moine found more than 1,000 Christian Hurons among the Onondaga. The number of Hurons then among the Mohawk, Oneida, and Cayuga is not known.

Among the most unfortunate of the Huron fugitives were those who sought asylum among the Erie, where their presence excited the jealousy and perhaps the fear of their neighbors, the Iroquois, with whom the Erie did not fraternize. It is also claimed that the Huron fugitives strove to foment war between their protectors and the Iroquois, with the result that notwithstanding the reputed 4,000 warriors of the Erie and their skill in the use of the bow and arrow (permitting them dextrously to shoot 8 or 9 arrows while the enemy could fire an arquebus but once), the Erie and the unfortunate Huron fugitives were entirely defeated in 1653-56 and dispersed or carried away into captivity. But most pathetic and cruel was the fate of those unfortunate Hurons who, trusting in the long-standing neutrality of the Neutral Nation which the Iroquois had not theretofore violated, fled to that tribe, only to be held, with the other portion of the Huron people still remaining in their country, into harsh captivity (Jes. Rel. 1659-60).

A portion of the defeated Hurons escaped to the Tionontati or "Huron du Pétun," then dwelling directly westward from them. But in 1649, when the Iroquois had sacked one of the Tionontati palisaded towns, the remainder of the tribe, in company with the refugee Hurons, sought an asylum on the Island of St Joseph, the present Charity or Christian id., in Georgian bay. It is this group of refugees who became the Wyandots of later history. Finding that this place did not secure them from the Iroquois, the majority fled to Michilimakinac, Mich., near which place they found fertile lands, good hunting, and abundant fishing. But even here the Iroquois would not permit them to rest, so they retreated farther westward to Manitoulin id., called Ekaentoton by the Hurons. Thence they were driven to Ile Huronne (Potawatomi id., because formerly occupied by that tribe), at the entrance to Green bay, Wis., where the Ottawa and their allies from Saginaw bay and Thunder bay, Manitoulin, and Michilimakinac, sought shelter with them. From this point the fugitive Hurons, with some of the Ottawa and their allies, moved farther westward 7 or 8 leagues to the Potawatomi, while most of the Ottawa went into what is now Wisconsin and N. W. Michigan among the Winnebago and the Menominee. Here, in 1657, in the Potawatomi country, the Hurons, numbering about 500 persons, erected a stout palisade. The Potawatomi received the fugitives the more readily since they themselves spoke a language cognate with that of the Ottawa and also were animated by a bitter hatred of the Iroquois who had in former times driven them from their native country, the N. peninsula of Michigan. This first flight of the Potawatomi must have taken place anterior to the visit by Nicollet in 1634.

Having murdered a party of Iroquois scouts through a plot devised by their chief Anahotaha, and fearing the vengeance of the Iroquois, the Hurons remained here only a few months longer. Some migrated to their compatriots on Orleans id., near Quebec, and the others, in 1659-60, fled farther w. to the Illinois country, on the Mississippi, where they were well received. Anahotaha was killed in 1659 in a fight at the Long Sault of Ottawa r., above Montreal, in which a party of 17 French militia under Sieur Dolard, 6 Algonkin under Mitameg, and 40 Huron warriors under Anahotaha (the last being the flower of the Huron colony then remaining on Orleans id.) were surrounded by 700 Iroquois and all killed with the exception of 5 Frenchmen and 4 Hurons, who were captured. It was not long before the Hurons found new enemies in the Illinois country. The Sioux brooked no rivals, much less meddlesome, weak neighbors; and as the Hurons numbered fewer than 500, whose native spirit and energy had been shaken by their many misfortunes, they could not maintain their position against these new foes, and therefore withdrew to the source of Black r., Wis., where they were found in 1660. At last they decided to join the Ottawa, their companions in their first removals, who were then settled at Chequamigon bay, on the s. shore of L. Superior, and chose a site opposite the Ottawa village. In 1665 Father Allouez, the founder of the principal western missions, met them here and established the mission of La Pointe du Saint Esprit between the Huron and the Ottawa villages. He labored among them 3 years, but his success was not marked, for these Tionontati Hurons, never fully converted, had relapsed into paganism. The Ottawa and the Hurons fraternized the more readily here since the two peoples dwelt in contiguous areas s. of Georgian bay before the Iroquois invasion in 1648-49. Father Marquette succeeded Father Allouez in 1669 and founded the missions of the Sault Ste Marie and St François-Xavier de la Baïe des Puants. The Sioux, however, sought every possible pretext to assail the settlements of the Hurons and the Ottawa, and their numbers and known cruelty caused them to be so feared that the latter tribes during Marquette's régime withdrew to the French settlements, since the treaty of peace between the French and the Iroquois in 1666 had delivered them from their chief enemies. The Ottawa, however, returned to Manitoulin id., where the mission of St Simon was founded, while the Hurons, who had not forgotten the advantageous situation which Michilimakinac had previously afforded them, removed about 1670 to a point opposite the island, where they built a palisaded village and where Marquette established the mission of St Ignace. Later, some of the Hurons here settled moved to Sandusky, Ohio, others to Detroit, and still others to Sandwich, Ontario. The last probably became what was latterly known as the Anderson band of Wyandots, but which is now entirely dissipated, with the possible exception of a very few persons.

In 1745 a considerable party of Hurons under the leadership of the war chief Orontony, or Nicholas, removed from Detroit r. to the marsh lands of Sandusky bay. Orontony was a wily savage whose enmity was greatly to be feared, and he commanded men who formed an alert, unscrupulous, and powerful body. The French having provoked the bitter hatred of Nicholas, which was fomented by English agents, he conspired to destroy the French, not only at Detroit but at the upper posts, and by Aug., 1747, the "Iroquois of the West," the Hurons, Ottawa, Abnaki, Potawatomi, "Ouabash," Sauteurs, Missisauga, Foxes, Sioux, Sauk, "Sarastan," Loups, Shawnee, and Miami, indeed all the tribes of the middle W., with the exception of those of the Illinois country, had entered into the conspiracy; but through the treachery of a Huron woman the plot was revealed to a Jesuit priest, who communicated the information to Longueuil, the French commandant at Detroit, who in turn notified all the other French posts, and although a desultory warfare broke out, resulting in a number of murders, there was no concerted action. Orontony, finding that he had been deserted by his allies, and seeing the activity and determination of the French not to suffer English encroachments on what they called French territory, finally, in Apr., 1748, destroyed his villages and palisade at Sandusky, and removed, with 119 warriors and their families, to White r., Ind. Not long after he withdrew to the Illinois country on Ohio r., near the Indiana line, where he died in the autumn of 1748. The inflexible and determined conduct of Longueuil toward most of the conspiring tribes brought the coalition to an end by May, 1748.

After this trouble the Hurons seem to have returned to Detroit and Sandusky, where they became known as Wyandots and gradually acquired a paramount influence in the Ohio valley and the lake region. They laid claim to the greater part of Ohio, and the settlement of the Shawnee and Delawares within that area was with their consent; they exercised the right to light the council fire at all intertribal councils, and although few in number they joined all the Indian movements in the Ohio valley and the lake region and supported the British against the Americans. After the peace of 1815 a large tract in Ohio and Michigan was confirmed to them, but they sold a large part of it in 1819, under treaty provisions, reserving a small portion near Upper Sandusky, Ohio, and a smaller area on Huron r., near Detroit, until 1842, when these tracts also were sold and the tribe removed to Wyandotte co., Kans. By the terms of the treaty of 1855 they were declared to be citizens, but by the treaty of 1867 their tribal organization was restored and they were placed on a small tract, still occupied by them, in the N. E. corner of Oklahoma.

That portion of the Hurons who withdrew in 1650 and later to the French colony, were accompanied by their missionaries. The mission of La Conception, which was founded by them, although often changed in name and situation, has survived to the present time. The Hurons who wintered in Quebec in 1649 did not return to their country after learning of its desolation by the Iroquois, but were placed on land belonging to the Jesuits at Beauport, and when the Huron fugitives came down to Quebec to seek protection, the others followed these in May, 1651, to Orleans id., settling on the lands of Mademoiselle de Grand Maison that had been bought for them. Here a mission house was erected near their stockaded bark lodges. In 1654 they numbered between 600 and 600 persons. But again the Iroquois followed them, seeking through every misrepresentation to draw the Hurons into their own country to take the place of those who had fallen in their various wars. By this means a large number of the Hurons, remnants of the Bear, Rock, and Bowl tribes, were persuaded in 1656 to migrate to the Iroquois country, a movement that met with such success that the Iroquois even ventured to show themselves under the guns of Quebec. In the same year they mortally wounded Father Garreau, near Montreal, and captured and put to death 71 Hurons on Orleans id. These misfortunes caused the Hurons to draw nearer to Quebec, wherein they were given asylum until peace was concluded between the French and the Iroquois in 1666. The Hurons then withdrew from the town about 5 m., where in the following year the mission of Notre Dame de Foye was founded. In 1693 the Hurons moved 5 m. farther away on account of the lack of wood and the need of richer lands; here the missionaries arranged the lodges around a square and built in the middle of it a church, to which Father Chaumonot added a chapel, patterned after the Casa Sancta of Lorette in Italy, and now known as Old Lorette. Some years later the mission was transferred a short distance away, where a new village, Younger Lorette, or La Jeune Lorette, was built. About the remains of this mission still dwell the so-called Hurons of Lorette.

The old estimates of Huron population have been previously given. After the dispersal of the Huron tribes in 1649-50, the Hurons who fled w. never seem to have exceeded 500 persons in one body. Later estimates are 1,000, with 300 more at Lorette (1736), 500 (1748), 850 (1748), 1,250 (1765), 1,500 (1794-95), 1,000 (1812), 1,250 (1812). Only the first of these estimates is inclusive of the "Hurons of Lorette," Quebec, who were estimated at 300 in 1736, but at 455, officially, in 1904. In 1885 those in Indian Ter. (Oklahoma) numbered 251, and in 1905, 378, making a total of 832 in Canada and the United States.

Nothing definite was known of the clans of the Hurons until the appearance of Morgan's Ancient Society in 1877, Powell's Wyandot Government (1st Rep. B. A. E., 1881), and Connolley's The Wyandots (Archæol. Rep. Ontario, 92, 1899). From the last writer, who corrects the work of the former authorities, the following list of Huron clans is taken: Great Turtle, Little Water Turtle, Mud Turtle, Wolf, Bear, Beaver, Deer, Porcupine, Striped Turtle, Highland Turtle, Snake, and Hawk. These, according to Powell, were organized into four phratries or clan brotherhoods, but Connolley denies that four phratries ever existed. The evidence appears to indicate, however, that the four-phratry organization was merged into one of three, of which the Wolf clan constituted one and acted as executive and presiding officer.

The Huron villages were Andiatia, Angoutenc, Anonata, Arendaonata, Arente, Arontaen, Brownstown, Cahiaque, Carhagouha, Carmaron, Cranetown (2 villages), Ekhiondatsaan, Endarahy, Iahhouthon, Ihonatiria (St Joseph II), Jeune Lorette, Junquisindundeh(?), Junundat, Khioetosa, Karenhassa, Khinonascaran (3 small villages so called), Lorette, Ouenrio, Ouentisati, Ossossané, Sandusky, Ste Agnes, Ste Anne, Ste Antoine, Ste Barbe, Ste Catherine, Ste Cécile, Ste Charles (2 villages), St Denys, St Etienne, St François Xavier, St Geneviève, St Joachim, St Louis, St Martin, Ste Marie (2 villages), Ste Térèse, Sranonaennat, Taenhatentaron (St Ignace I, II), Tean-austayaé (St Joseph I), Teandewiata, Tonaguainchain (Ste Madeleine), and Tondakhra.

Hushkoni ('ekunk'). A Chickasaw clan of the Ishpanee phratry.

Hushkoni.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 163, 1877. Hushkoni.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Lex., I, 96, 1884.

Hushkovi. A traditional village about 2 m. N. W. of Oraibi, N. E. Ariz. According to Hopi story Hushkovi and Pivanhonkapi were destroyed by a fire that had been kindled in the San Francisco mts., 90 m. away, at the instance of the chief of Pivanhonkapi and with the aid of the Yayaponchatu people who are said to have been in league with supernatural forces, because the inhabitants of Pivanhonkapi had become degenerates through gambling. Most of the inhabitants were also destroyed; the survivors moved away, occupying several temporary villages during their wanderings, the ruins of which are still to be seen. See Voth, Traditions of the Hopi, 241, 1905.

Hu'ekovi.—Voth, op. cit.

Husistaic. A former Chumashan village near Purísima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1881.

Huskanaw. An Algonquian word applied to certain initiation ceremonies of the Virginia Indians, performed on boys at puberty, which were accompanied by fasting and the use of narcotics. The whites applied the term to huskanaw (Beverley, Hist. Va., III, 32, 39, 1705) in a figurative sense. Thus Jefferson (Corresp., II, 342) wrote: "He has the air of being huskanawed, i. e., out of his element." The term is derived from the language of the Powhatan. Gerard (Am. Anthropol., VII, 242, 1905) etymologizes the word as follows: "Powhatan ustinaweu, 'he has a new body', from usti 'new', naw 'body'; eu 'has he', said of a youth who had reached the age of puberty". But the word is rather from the Powhatan equivalent of the Massachusetts wuskenaw, 'he is young', and does not necessarily contain the root iaw (not naw) 'body'. It has no connection with the English word "husky," as some have supposed. For an account of the "solemnity of huskanawing" see Beverley, op. cit., and cf. Heckewelder (1817), Indian Nations, 245, 1876. See Child life, Ordeal. (A. F. C.)

Husky. According to Julian Ralph (Sun, N. Y., July 14, 1895), "the common and only name of the wolf-like dogs of both the white and red men of our northern frontier and of western Canada." Husky was originally one of the names by which the English settlers in Labrador have long known the Eskimo (q. v.). The word, which seems to be a corruption of one of the names of this people, identical with our 'Eskimo' in the northern Algonquian dialects, has been transferred from man to the dog. (A. F. C.)

Husoron. A former division or pueblo of the Varohio, probably in the Chinipas valley, in w. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864.

Huspah. A Yamasi band living in South Carolina under a chief of the same name about the year 1700. (A. S. G.)

Ibin. A former Aleut village on Agattu id., Alaska, one of the Near id. group of the Aleutians, now uninhabited.

Ibitoupa. A small tribe of unknown affinity, but the theory that they were connected with the Chickasaw has more arguments in its favor than any other. In 1699 they formed one of the villages mentioned by Iberville (Margry, Déc., iv, 180, 1880) as situated on Yazoo r., Ibitoupa being near the upper end of the group between the Chacquesauma (Chak-chiuma) and the Thysia (Tioux), according to the order named, which appears to be substantially correct, although Coxé (Carolana, 10, 1741) who omits Thysia, makes the Ibitoupa settlement expressly the uppermost of the series. The Ibitoupa and Chakchiuma, together with the Tapoucha (Taposa), were united in one village on the upper Yazoo by 1798. What eventually became of them is not known, but it is probable that they were absorbed by the Chickasaw. See Itomapa.

(A. S. G.)

Bitoupas.—Pénicaut (1700) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., i, 61, 1869. Epitoupa.—Coxé, Carolana, 10, map, 1741. Ouitoupas.—Pénicaut (1700) in Margry, Déc., v, 401, 1883. Outapa.—Iberville (1699), ibid., iv, 180, 1880. Outaypas.—Martin, Hist. La., i, 249, 1827. Witoupa.—Alcedo, Dic. Geog., v, 343, 1789 (misprint). Witowpa.—Esnaux et Rapilly, map, 1777. Witowpa.—Philippeaux, map of English Col., 1781. Ybitoupa.—Romans, Fla., i, 101, 1775. Ybitoupas.—Baudry des Lozières, Voy. à la Louisiane, 245, 1802.

Ieska digpa.—Cleveland, letter to Dorsey, 1884. Ieska-toi-tea.—Dorsey (after Cleveland) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 221, 1897.

Ietan. A term which, with "Tetan" and other forms of the name, was applied by writers of the early part of the 19th century to several western tribes. Mooney (17th Rep. B. A. E., 167, 1898) explains its application as follows: "The Ute of the mountain region at the headwaters of the Platte and the Arkansas, being a powerful and aggressive tribe, were well known to all the Indians of the plains, who usually called them by some form of their proper name, Yütawáts, or, in its root form, Yuta, whence we get Eutaw, Utah, and Ute. Among the Kiowa the name becomes Itáá-go, while the Siouan tribes seem to have nasalized it so that the early French traders wrote it as Ayutan, Iatan, or Ietan. By prefixing the French article it became L'etan, and afterward Aliatan, while by misreading of the manuscript word we get Jatan, Jetan, and finally Tetau. Moreover, as the early traders and explorers knew but little of the mountain tribes, they frequently confounded those of the same generic stock, so that almost any of these forms may mean Shoshoni, Ute, or Comanche, according to the general context of the description." By reason of the varied applications of Ietan and its equivalents, the name is here treated separately.

Allatá.—Lewis and Clark, Discov., 60, 1806 (so called by the French). Aliatan.—Drake, Bk. Inds., vi, 1848. Aliatans, of La Playa.—Lewis, Travels, 181, 1809. Aliatans, of the West.—Lewis and Clark, Discov., 63, 1806. Aliatons.—Lewis and Clark, Jour., 139, 1840. Aliatons of the West.—Brown, West. Ikogmiut. A tribe of Alaskan Eskimo inhabiting both banks of the Yukon as far as Makak. They have hairy bodies and strong beards and exhibit a marked variation in physique, customs, and dialect from the Eskimo N. and E. of Norton sd., being more nearly allied to the other fishing tribes s. of them. Dall estimated their number at 1,000 in 1870, including the Chnagmiut. In 1890 there were 172

Ikogmiut proper. Holmberg divided the natives of the delta into the Kwikpagmiut and the Kwikluagmiut, living respectively on the Kwikpak and Kwikluak passes. The villages are Asko, Bazhi, Ignok, Ikatlek, Ikogmiut, Ingahame, Ingrakak, Katagkak, Kenunimik, Kikhkat, Koko, Koserefski, Kuyikanuik-pul, Kvikak, Makak, Nukluak, Nunaikak, Nunaktak, Paimute, Pogoreshapka, and Uglovaia.

Illinois (Iliniuek, from ilini 'man', iw 'is', ek plural termination, changed by the French to ois). A confederacy of Algonquian tribes, formerly occupying s. Wisconsin, N. Illinois, and sections of Iowa and Missouri, comprising the Cahokia, Kaskaskia, Michigamea, Moingwena, Peoria, and Tamaroa.

The Jesuit Relation for 1660 represents them as livings w. of Green bay, Wis., in 60 villages, and gives an extravagant estimate of the population, 20,000 men, or 70,000 souls. The statement in the Jesuit Relations that they came from the border of a great sea in the far W. arose, no doubt (as Tailhan suggests), from a misunderstanding of the term "great water," given by the Indians, which in fact referred to the Mississippi. Their exact location when first heard of by the whites can not be determined with certainty, as the tribes and bands were more or less scattered over s. Wisconsin, n. Illinois, and along the w. bank of the Mississippi as far s. as Des Moines r., Iowa. The whites first came in actual contact with them (unless it be true that Nicollet visited them) at La Pointe (Shaugawaumikong), where Allouez met a party in 1667, which was visiting that point for purposes of trade. In 1670 the same priest found a number of them at the Mascoutin village on upper Fox r., some 9 m. from where Portage City now stands, but this band then contemplated joining their brethren on the Mississippi. The conflicting statements regarding the number of their villages at this period and the indefiniteness as to localities render it difficult to reach a satisfactory conclusion on these points. It appears that some villages were situated on the w. side of the Mississippi, in what is now Iowa, yet the major portion of the tribes belonging to the confederacy resided at points in n. Illinois, chiefly on Illinois r. When Marquette journeyed down the Mississippi in 1673 he found the Peoria and Moingwena on the w. side, about the mouth of Des Moines r. On his return, 2 months later, he found them on Illinois r., near the present city of Peoria. Thence he passed n. to the village of Kaskaskia, then on upper Illinois r., within the present LaSalle co. At this time the village consisted of 74 cabins and was occupied by one tribe only. Hennepin estimated them, about 1680, at 400 houses and 1,800 warriors, or about 6,500 souls. A few years later (1690-94) missionaries reported it to consist of 350 cabins, occupied by 8 tribes or bands. Father Sébastien Rasles, who visited the village in 1692, placed the number of cabins at 300, each of 4 "fires," with 2 families to a fire, indicating a population of about 9,000—perhaps an excessive estimate. The evidence, however, indicates that a large part of the confederacy was gathered at this point for awhile. The Kaskaskia at this time were in somewhat intimate relation with the Peoria, since Gravier, who returned to their village in 1700, says he found them preparing to start s., and believed that if he could have arrived sooner "the Kaskaskians would not thus have separated from the Peouroua [Peoria] and other Illinois." By his persuasion they were induced to stop in s. Illinois at the point to which their name was given. The Cahokia and Tamaroa were at this time living at their historic seats on the Mississippi in s. Illinois. The Illinois were almost constantly harassed by the Sioux, Foxes, and other northern tribes; it was probably on this account that they concentrated, about the time of LaSalle's visit, on Illinois r. About the same time the Iroquois waged war against them, which lasted several years, and greatly reduced their numbers, while liquor obtained from the French tended still further to weaken them. About the year 1750 they were still estimated at from 1,500 to 2,000 souls. The murder of the celebrated chief Pontiac, by a Kaskaskia Indian, about 1769, provoked the vengeance of the Lake tribes on the Illinois, and a war of extermination was begun which, in a few years, reduced them to a mere handful, who took refuge with the French settlers at Kaskaskia, while the Sauk, Foxes, Kickapoo, and Potawatomi took possession of their country. In 1778 the Kaskaskia still numbered 210, living in a village 3 m. n. of Kaskaskia, while the Peoria and Michigamea together numbered 170 on the Mississippi, a few miles farther up. Both bands had become demoralized and generally worthless through the use of liquor. In 1800 there were only about 150 left. In 1833 the survivors, represented by the Kaskaskia and Peoria, sold their lands in Illinois and removed w. of the Mississippi, and are now in the n. e. corner of Oklahoma, consolidated with the Wea and Piankashaw. In 1885 the consolidated Peoria, Kaskaskia, Wea, and Piankashaw numbered but 149, and even these are much mixed with white blood. In 1905 their number was 195.

Nothing definite is known of their tribal divisions or clans. In 1736, according to Chauvignerie (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 1056-1855), the totem of the Kaskaskia was a feather of an arrow, notched, or two arrows fixed like a St Andrew's cross; while the Illinois as a whole had the crane, bear, white hind, fork, and tortoise totems.

In addition to the principal tribes or divisions above mentioned, the following are given by early writers as seemingly belonging to the Illinois: Albivi, Amonekoa, Chepoussa, Chinko, Coiracoentanon, Espeminkia, and Tapouara. In general their villages bore the names of the tribes occupying them, and were constantly varying in number and shifting in location.

The Illinois are described by early writers as tall and robust, with pleasant visages. The descriptions of their character given by the early missionaries differ widely, but altogether they appear to have been timid, easily driven from their homes by their enemies, fickle, and treacherous. They were counted excellent archers, and, besides the bow, used in war a kind of lance and a wooden club. Polygamy was common among them, a man sometimes taking several sisters as wives. Unfaithfulness of a wife was punished, as among the Miami, the Sioux, the Apache, and other tribes, by cutting off the nose of the offending woman, and as the men were very jealous, this punishment was often inflicted on mere suspicion.

It was not the custom of the Illinois, at the time the whites first became acquainted with them, to bury their dead. The body was wrapped in skins and attached by the feet and head to trees. There is reason, however, to believe, from discoveries that have been made in mounds and ancient graves, which appear to be attributable to some of the Illinois tribes, that the skeletons, after the flesh had rotted away, were buried, often in rude stone sepulchers. Prisoners of war were usually sold to other tribes.

According to Hennepin, the cabins of the more northerly tribes were made like long arbors and covered with double mats of flat flags or rushes, so well sewed that they were never penetrated by wind, snow, or rain. To each cabin were 4 or 5 fires, and to each fire 2 families, indicating that each dwelling housed some 8 or 10 families. Their towns were not inclosed.

The villages of the confederacy noted in history are Cahokia (mission), Immaculate Conception (mission), Kaskaskia, Matchinkoa, Moingwena, Peoria, and Pimitoui. (J. M. C. T.)

Illumination. The employment of artificial light among the Indians was limited by their simple habits and needs to the camp-fire and the torch, in which respect they are found in the same culture grade as the Malay, the Negro, and the majority of uncivilized peoples. The camp-fire, built for the purpose of cooking food or furnishing heat, supplied most of the needed light. On special occasions large bonfires were made when ceremonies were held and nocturnal illumination was required. As a makeshift for the torch, a brand was taken from the camp-fire. When a continuous light was desired the fire was fed with slivers of wood set up in a circle and fed from one end where a gap was left in the circle, as among the Cherokee; or when a temporary light was wanted among the Indians of British Columbia a little oil was thrown on the coals. The torches were of pine knots, rolls of bark, cane, or other inflammable material, but bundles of resinous wood, or masses of resin were almost never made, the form of the Indian torch being of the most primitive character. They were used by night for hunting and fishing; for instance, deer were "weequashed," or "jacked," by means of torches, and fish were speared and birds captured by light from pine knots, especially among the eastern Indians. Lamps, however, have been possessed from time immemorial by the Eskimo, and they are the only aborigines of the hemisphere who had such utensils. In s. Alaska the lamp has a narrow wick-edge and is in the shape of a flat-iron; along the tundra n. of St Michael it is a saucer of clay or stone; northward to Point Barrow it is gibbous, with wide wick-edge and made of soapstone. The length of the wick-edge of the Eskimo lamp has been observed to vary with the latitude, that is, the higher the latitude the longer the night, hence the greater need for light, which is met by lengthening the margin of the lamp on which the moss wick is placed, so that while in s.

Alaska the wick edge is 2 or 3 in. long, in Smith ed. it is 36 in. in length, and between these geographical extremes there is an increase in the size of the lamp from lower to higher latitudes. In at least two localities in the United States the bodies of fish were burned for light—the candle-fish of the N. W. coast and a fresh-water fish of Penobscot r. in Maine.

Torches and fires were used for signaling at night; the Apache set fire to the resinous spines of the saguaro, or giant cactus, for this purpose. The picturesque and remarkable Fire-dance of the Navaho described by Matthews is a good example of the use of illumination in ceremonies. Among many tribes fire forms an essential part of a ceremony; in some cases, where Indians have been induced to rehearse a night ceremony by day, they do not omit the fire, though artificial light is not required. A law of the Iroquois League required that a messenger approaching a camp-fire or village at night should carry a torch in order to show the absence of hostile intent. See Fire-making.

Imaha. A Quapaw village mentioned by La Metairie in 1682 and by Iberville in 1699, and visited by La Harpe in 1719. It was situated on a s. w. branch of Arkansas r. In the wars and contentions of the 18th and 19th centuries some of the Quapaw tribe fled from their more northerly villages and took refuge among the Caddo, finally becoming a recognized division of the confederacy. These were called Imaha, but whether the people composing this division were from the village Imaha, mentioned by the early French travelers, is not absolutely known. The people of the Imaha division of the Caddo confederacy for some time retained their own language, which was Siouan. See Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1092, 1896. (A. C. F.)

Posa. in Am., i, 73, 1847. Isalugmiut.—Woolfe in 11th Census, Alaska, 130, 1893 (given to inhabitants of both islands; see Inalik). Yikrga'alit.—Bogoras, Chukchee, 21, 1904 (Chukchi name for inhabitants of Diomedé id.).

Imarsivik. An Eskimo village of 21 people on the E. coast of Greenland.—Nansen, Eskimo Life, 124, 1894.

Imekpung (Imé'kpûñ). An Utkiavimut Eskimo camp near Pt Barrow, Alaska.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 274, 1892.

Imiak. A Togiagmiut village at the outlet of Aleknagik lake, Alaska.—Tebenkof (1849) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902.

Imiche. A Californian tribe cited several times and mentioned once as on Kaweah r., Cal., which location, if correct, would make it part of the Mariposan stock. The Wimalchi of Kings r. may have been meant.

Imitohoa.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 363, 1874. Y-Mitohoa.—Henley in Ind. Aff. Rep., 611, 1854 (at Four rivers, near Tulare r.). Ymitohoa.—Bancroft, op. cit., i, 456 (misquoted from Henley).

Imigen ('fresh water'). One of the two winter villages of the Kingumiut, a branch of the Okomiut Eskimo, on an island at the head of Cumberland sd.; pop. 17 in 1883.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Imik. A former Aleut village on Agattu id., Alaska, one of the Near id. group of the Aleutians, now uninhabited.

Immaculate Conception. A mission established by Marquette in 1674 among the Kaskaskia, near Rockford, Ill.

Immaculate Conception.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 406, 1855. Immaculée Conception de Notre Dame aux Illinois.—Gravier(?) (1694) quoted by Shea, ibid., 419.

Immahal. A former Chumashan village in Ventura co., Cal., "not far from José Carrillo's rancho" in 1856.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Imnangana. The southernmost winter settlement of the Ita Eskimo, situated at C. York, N. Greenland.

Ekadit'shuin.—Stein in Petermanns Mitt., no. 9, map, 1902 (= 'salmon fishery'). Ignazine.—Heilprin, Peary Relief Exped., 102, 1893. Imaagen.—Markham in Trans. Ethnol. Soc. Imnarkuan ('where we make maple sugar'). A Passamaquoddy village formerly on the site of Pembroke, Washington co., Me.—Vetromile, Abnakis, 56, 1866.

Imoktegokahuk. A Kaviagmiut Eskimo village at C. Nome, Alaska; pop. 30 in 1880.

Imokhtegokahuk.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 11, 1884. Imokhtegokahuk.—Ibid., map. Imoktegokahuk.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902.

Imongalasha (Imoklasha, 'their people are there'). A former Choctaw settlement, sometimes called West Imongalasha to distinguish it from Imongalasha Skatane, and also popularly known as Mokalusha. It was situated on the headwaters of Tala-sha cr., Neshoba co., Miss., and was the most important Choctaw town in that region, the name appearing often in early government records. Tecumseh visited it in 1811 and held a council there. In 1824 it was almost abandoned owing to the ravages of smallpox. The houses of the settlement, with the small fields intervening, covered an area of 3 m. N. and S., and 1½ m. E. and W. It consisted of a number of hamlets, the names of which, from S. to N., were Yaneka Chukkilissa, Onaheli, Nanihaba, and Bihikonlo.—Halbert in Miss. Hist. Soc. Publ., vi, 431, 1902. Imoklasha.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 138, 1884.

Imongalasha Skatane (Imoklasha Iskitini, 'Little Imongalasha'). A former Choctaw town on the E. prong of Yazoo cr., now known as Flat cr., a N. affluent of Petickfa cr., Kemper co., Miss.—Halbert in Miss. Hist. Soc. Publ., vi, 423, 1902. East Moka-Lassa.—Romans, Florida, 310, 1775. Imongalasha Skatani.—West Fla. map, ca. 1775.

Implements, Tools, Utensils. While a tool is that with which something is made, an implement that with which work is done, and a utensil that in or on which something is prepared or used up, they can not always be distinguished among primitive peoples, who utilize one thing for many purposes. Many forms are discussed under Arts and Industries and in articles devoted to special activities. It must be borne in mind that all such devices were helpers of the skillful hand and a vast deal of excellent work was done with it alone.

The Indians of North America were in the stone age and therefore every device with which the arts of life were carried on, whether implement, tool, or utensil, was in harmony with this grade of culture. The archeologist finds of such objects in ancient remains and sites either their substantial portions, or the perishable parts that have been accidentally preserved, or impressions of them left on pottery. By comparing these relics with implements, tools, and utensils found in actual use among the Indians one is able to partially reconstruct ancient industry and read far backward into history. The moment that the savages saw implements, tools, and utensils of metal in the hands of Europeans, they recognized the superiority of these and adopted them. It is interesting to note the modifications that were made in hafting and using, in order to adapt the new devices to old habits and customs. As of old, manual parts were still carved, painted, and hung with symbols, without which they were thought to be ineffectual.

The instruments of handicraft were of two classes—general, for common purposes, and special, for particular industries. The general implements, tools, and utensils may be described in detail (Holmes in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 501, 1903):

Hammers.—These were made of stone or other hard substance, with or without handles. There were sledges, mauls, and pile-drivers for two or more men.

Knives.—These were made commonly of chipped or ground stone. Teeth, bone, shell, and wood were also used for the purpose (McGuire in Am. Anthropol., iv, 1891).

Saws.—These were of serrated stones, shells, or other materials, and were worked by rubbing with the edge, often with the aid of sand with or without water.

Borers.—Many natural objects were used for making holes in hard and soft objects, either by pressure, striking, vibrating, or revolving. They were held directly in the hand or were hafted; were grasped by one hand or by both hands; held between the palms or were worked by means of strap, bow, or pump (McGuire in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1894, t23, 1896). (See Drills and Drilling.)

Axes.—The stone ax, rudely flaked or highly polished, plain or grooved, ranging in weight from a few ounces to many pounds in the ceremonial ax, was universal. It was held in the hand or attached in various ways to a handle by means of rawhide, but was never furnished with an eye for a helve. Other substances were occasionally used, as shell, iron ore, and copper, but the stone ax was the main reliance. The blade could be easily turned at right angles, and then the implement became an adz. (See Adzes, Axes, Celts.)

Scrapers.—The scraper was also a tool of wide dispersion. In shape it resembled a chisel blade with a beveled edge. The rudest were sharp spalls of siliceous stone, held in the hand with or without padding; others were of smooth materials set into handles or grips that snugly fitted the workwoman's hand. One variety was made for scraping hides, another for scraping wood.

Nippers.—These include all devices for holding tightly an object or holding parts together while being worked. Hinged varieties were not known, but the Eskimo, especially, had several inventions to do the work of clamps, pincers, tweezers, or the vise with the aid of wedges.

The simple mechanical powers, the wedge, the lever, and the inclined plane, were universally understood. The screw was employed but sparingly, if at all. The N. W. coast tribes used rollers, skids, and parbuckles to move great house beams into place, and the Alaskan Eskimo, according to Elliott, landed the walrus by means of a sliding tackle looped over pegs driven into cracks in the rocks and run through slits in the hide. The wheel and axle were entirely unknown, save in their most primitive form, the spindle. Power for doing work with the devices just described was derived from the muscle of the worker. The wind was utilized here and there, blowing upon a fixed mat erected for a sail, but nothing was known of shifting sails. The Indians made good use of fire in clearing ground for planting, in felling trees, excavating canoes, and making pitch and glue. Bellows were not used, but the blowtube existed. Water wheels were unknown, and in the matter of using nature's forces for work northern America was in a primitive state of culture. The special implements, tools, and utensils employed in the various aboriginal industries are enumerated below. They are also treated more fully in separate articles.

Agriculture.—Digging sticks, hardened in fire and sharpened, and often weighted; dibbles, hoes, scarecrows, harvesting devices, husking pegs, granaries, and caches were common. For harvesting both wild and cultivated produce various tribes had tongs for picking the cactus fruit, stone implements for opening hulls or shells, baskets for gathering, carrying, and storing, poles for reaching fruit, harvesting apparatus for grass seed, wild rice, camas, woka, coonti, maize, etc. (See Agriculture, Food.)

Bark work.—Peelers, shredders, twist-ers, sewing tools, pitching tools.

Boat building.—Axes, adzes, saws, borers, hammers, knives, pitch and paint brushes, and fire.

Carrying.—Packing baskets, hide cases, walking sticks, special costumes, and a provision of compact food, as pemmican, dried fish, and crisp bread. The making up of burdens into neat loads for handling and for the back was understood and further completed by means of headbands, breast straps, and shoulder straps. The dog was here and there a pack beast and harness was devised.

Cooking.—Besides open roasting, grilling frames of wood, and pits for baking and steaming, there were stone slabs for parching seeds and for baking bread; pottery and baskets for boiling (the latter by the help of heated stones), and soapstone utensils for preparing meat and other food. (See Food.)

Curing food.—Drying frames, smoking devices.

Fishing.—Besides fishing implements proper, the fisher's outfit included canoes, paddles, weirs, dams, anchor stones, etc.

Plastic art.—In the technic of this industry belong all tools and implements used in quarrying clays and preparing them for the potter, all devices employed in building up, smoothing, polishing, and decorating ware, and the apparatus for burning. (See Pottery.)

Quarrying, mining, and stone working.—Digging sticks, mauls, hammers, edge tools for making lamps, and dishes and other receptacles of soapstone, chipping and other shaping tools and implements, carrying apparatus, flakers, chippers, polishers.

Textile industries.—All implements and tools needed in gathering roots, stems, and leaves as materials, and those used in preparing these for matting, bagging, basketry, blankets, robes, lacework, net-work, thread, string, and rope; finally all inventions employed in manufacturing these products. (See Basketry, Blankets, Weaving.)

Whaling.—Suit of water-tight clothing; kaiak and paddle; harpoon, with line; skin floats; lance.

Woodcraft.—Ax, knife, saw, adz, chisel, borers, rasps, polishers, paint brushes, rollers, moving and setting up devices. (See Woodwork.)

For serving and consuming food, knives were necessary; spoons were fashioned of natural objects, especially of wood, horn, and gourd, but there were no forks or individual dishes or tables. Much food was consumed on the spot where it was found. The Indians had manifold apparatus for making, preserving, and using fire; for cooking, lighting, and heating. Shovels were used for baking bread. The outfit for harvesting and preparing acorns included gathering basket, for which the woman's hat was often used, carrying hamper, granary, hulling mill, mortar, hopper basket, meal mat, leaching pit, cooking basket, mush basket, and eating bowls. Milling implements in general included natural bowlders and pebbles; mortars of wood, stone, bone, or hide; pestles of the same materials; metates of varying degrees of texture, with manos to correspond; baskets to serve as hoppers and to catch meal, and brooms. Hunters' implements included a vast number of accessory apparatus for making weapons effectual.

Devices for binding or permanently holding two parts together, pegs, lashings, and cement were used (see Cement). In the absence of metal and rattan, rawhide, sinew, roots of evergreen trees, splits of tough wood, pitch, and animal glue performed the necessary function. In the aboriginal economy no great stones were moved, but large logs were sometimes transported many miles.

Metric devices of the North Americans were very crude compared with modern standards, but were exactly adapted to their needs. A man fitted his boat and all its appurtenances to his body, just as he did his clothing. The hunter, basket maker, potter, tentmaker, weighed and measured by means of the same standard. For securing uniform thickness the N. W. coast tribes bored holes through hulls of dugouts, and ran slender plugs into them which were used as gauges. Usually the parts of the body were the only gauges. (See Measurements.)

Straighteners were made of wood, stone, horn, or ivory for bending wood and other substances to shape. Digging sticks, dibbles, and the whole class of implements for making holes in the ground were used also for working in quarries, for getting worms and the like from the beach or the earth, and for digging roots for food or for textile and other industrial purposes. Tonges were employed in moving hot stones, in gathering cactus fruit, and in capturing snakes.

Dwellings were of such varying types and forms that their construction in different areas required the services of different kinds of work—that of the tentmaker, the joiner, the mason, or the snow worker, with their different implements, including shovels, axes, trowels, adzes, levers, parbuckles, etc. (see Architecture, Habitations). The joiner's outfit included many devices, from those for hafting to those for house building, tent framing, boat fitting, and the use of roots and thongs. Puncheons were hewn out, but there was no mortising. Hafting, the joining of the working part of a tool to the manual part, was accomplished variously by driving in, groove, splice, socket, tongue-and-groove, or mortising, and the fastening was done with pegs or lashing.

For the shaping arts, the working of stone, wood, and other hard substances, the apparatus varied with the material, and consisted of knives, hammers, wedges, saws, files, polishers, borers, adzes, and chisels, made out of materials best suited always to their uses. (See Art, Sculpture, Stonework, Woodwork.)

The propelling of all sorts of water craft was done by paddling, by poling, by dragging over mud, and by towing. No oars or rudders were used. Vessels were made water-tight with pitch or by the swelling of the wood. The rope or rawhide line for dragging a canoe along shore is known as a cordelle, the French-Canadian term. Portage, the moving of a bark canoe from one body of water to another, was accomplished by carrying load and canoe separately, sliding the empty canoe over mud, or shooting rapids in it. (See Boats, Commerce, Travel and Transportation.)

The making of snowshoes was an important occupation in the N., requiring great skill and manifold tools and devices. Ice and snow implements and utensils used in the higher latitudes include picks with ivory or stone blades, shovels with wooden blade and ivory edge, creepers for the boots, boat hooks for warding off and drawing canoes, sleds, and the indispensable snowshoes. The Eskimo were ingenious in devising such implements. They had shovels with edges of walrus ivory, walking sticks for going over the snow, snow goggles, snowshoes, and snow trowels and knives for housebuilding; also ice picks and crowbars and hooks and scoops for cutting and moving ice.

See Arts and Industries, and the subjects cited thereunder; also the articles describing special types of implements, tools, and utensils, and the materials from which they are made. (O. T. M.)

Imtuk. A Yuit Eskimo village near Indian pt., N. E. Siberia; pop. 43 in 9 houses about 1895, 65 in 12 houses in 1901. Most of its people are of the Aiwan division, but 4 families are from Cherinak.

Imtuk.—Bogoras, Chukchee, 29, 1904. Imtuk.—Ibid. (Chukchi name).

Imukfa (Hitchiti: 'shell,' also referring to a metallic ornament of concave shape; applied possibly in allusion to the bend in the river). A subordinate settlement of the Upper Creek town Oakfuski, on a creek of the same name, a short distance W. of Tallapoosa r., Ala. A battle was fought there Jan. 24, 1814, in the Creek war, and the celebrated battle of the Horseshoe Bend, on Mar. 25 of the same year, took place in the immediate vicinity. (A. S. G.)

Imuris. Given by early authorities as a Pima rancharia near the E. bank of Rio San Ignacio (or Magdalena), lat. 30° 50', long. 110° 50', in the present Sonora, Mexico. Orozco y Berra mentions the Himeris (who are evidently the inhabitants of this settlement), with the Opata. If they belonged to the latter, Imures was doubtless the last Opata settlement toward the N., and the earlier writers did not, in this case, distinguish the Opata from the Pima. Imuris was visited by Father Kino as early as 1699, and the bell in its church bears the date 1680. It was afterward a visita of San Ignacio mission (Rudo Ensayo, ca. 1762, 153, 1863), with 80 inhabitants in 1730. It is now a civilized pueblo. Of its 637 inhabitants in 1900, 74 were Mayo and 32 Yaqui. (F. W. H.)

Imarara.—Kino, map, in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott. 74, 1726. Himeria.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 344, 1864. Imuri.—Rudo Ensayo (ca. 1762), 153, 1863. Imeria.—Box, Adventures, 277, 1869. Imures.—Kino (1696) in Doc. Inajalahu. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara, Cal.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, 1, 459, 1874.

Inalik. An Inguklimiut village on Little Diomed id., Alaska. The name of the people was extended by Woolfe (11th Census, Alaska, 130, 1893) to include the inhabitants of both islands.—Nelson, 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899.

Inam. The best known village of the upper division of the Karok, speaking the Karakuka dialect. Situated on Klamath r., at or near the mouth of Clear cr., N. W. Cal. It was the scene of the Deer-skin dance and of an annual "world-making" ceremony. (A. L. K.)

Inam.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 23, 1860.

Inaqtek (In'á'khtek, 'raven'). A sub-phrase or gens of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 1, 42, 1896.

Inaspetsum. One of the tribes included by the early fur traders under the term Nez Percé (Ross, Fur Hunters, 1, 185, 1855). They lived on Columbia r., above the mouth of the Snake, in Washington. Perhaps they were the Winatshipum or the Kalispel. (L. F.)

Incense. Incense, from the Latin incendere, 'to burn,' is defined as anything burned to produce a pleasant sweet smell during religious rites. It may be regarded as direct sacrifice, as symbolic of ascending prayer, or as an aid to spiritual exaltation. Incense has been in almost universal use from the earliest historic period, particularly in the more highly organized ancient religions. In Mexico and adjacent parts various resinous gums known collectively under the Aztec name of copalli, or copal, were used. North of the Rio Grande the plant substances most commonly employed for the same purpose were tobacco, in various native varieties; the dried tops of Thuja, and other cedars; spruce and pine needles, particularly those of Abies and Pinus ponderosa; sweetgrass (Savastana odorata), Artemisia, and the root of the balsam-root (Balsamorhiza). Tobacco was used in one way or another in important ceremonials over almost the whole area of the United States and along the N. W. coast, and in the Canadian interior. Pine needles were most commonly used among the Pueblos and other tribes of the S. W. In the noted Hopi snake dance the smoke of burning juniper tops was blown through tubes known as "cloud-blowers" until the kiva was filled with the pleasing fragrance. Cedar tops, sweet grass, and wild sage were more common in ceremonies of the Plains Indians, especially the Peyote rite, and parcels of the dried substance were sometimes attached to sacrifice poles or deposited with the corpse in the grave or on the scaffold. With some tribes the twigs and leaves of the plant were differentiated as male and female. The balsam root was burned in small quantities in every great sweat-house rite among the Plains tribes and was held so precious that sometimes a horse was given for a single root. Among the Siksika, according to Wissler, every tipi contains an altar—a small excavation in the earth—where sweet gum is burned daily.

There were also a number of vegetal perfumes used for personal gratification, either by rubbing the juice of the crushed plant over the skin or by wearing the leaves or dried tops in little bags attached to the clothing. The Southern Ute mother placed sweet-smelling herbs under the pillow of her baby. One of the ingredients of the secret medicine employed by the Buffalo doctors among the Plains tribes in treating wounds is believed to have been the strong smelling musk of the beaver. (J. M.)

Incha. An unidentified tribe said to have lived where there were Spanish settlements and to have been at war with the Mantons (Mento) of Arkansas r. in 1700. Ioca.—Iberville (1702) in Margry, Déc., iv, 561, 1890. Incha.—Ibid., 599.

Inchl (In'tei, 'stone lodge'). A village occupied by the Kansa in their migration up Kansas r.—J. O. Dorsey, inf'n, 1882.

Incomesanetook (Income-can-took). Given by Ross (Advent., 290, 1847) as an Okinagan tribe.

Indak. A former Maidu village on the site of Placerville, Eldorado co., Cal.—Dixon in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, pl. xxxviii, 1905.

Indelchidnti ('pine'). An Apache clan or band at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881 (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 111, 1890); identical with Indilche-dentiene, 'Live in country with large pine trees' (White, Apache Names of Indian Tribes, MS., B. A. E.), a band formerly under chief Narchubeulecolte.

Indian. The common designation of the aborigines of America. The name first occurs in a letter of Columbus dated Feb., 1493, wherein the discoverer speaks of the Indios he had with him (F. F. Hilder in Am. Anthropol., n. s., 1, 545, 1899). It was the general belief of the day, shared by Columbus, that in his voyage across the Atlantic he had reached India. This term, in spite of its misleading connotation, has passed into the languages of the civilized world: Indio in Spanish, Portuguese, and Italian; Indien in French; Indianer in German, etc. The term American Indian, for which it has been proposed to substitute Amerind (q. v.), is however in common use; less so the objectionable term redskins, to which correspond the French Peaux-rouges, the German Rothhäute. Brinton titled his book on the aborigines of the New World, "The American Race," but this return to an early use of the word American can hardly be successful. In geographical nomenclature the Indian is well remembered. There are Indian Territory, Indiana, Indianapolis, Indianola, Indio. Besides these, the maps and gazetteers record Indian arm, bay, bayou, beach, bottom, branch, brook, camp, castle, cove, creek, crossing, diggings, draft, fall, field, fields, ford, gap, grove, gulch, harbor, head, hill, hills, island, lake, mills, mound, mountain, neck, orchard, pass, point, pond, ridge, river, rock, run, spring, springs, swamp, town, trace, trail, valley, village, and wells, in various parts of the United States and Canada. The term Red Indian, applied to the Beothuk, has given Newfoundland a number of place names.

Many wild plants have been called "Indian" in order to mark them off from familiar sorts. Use by Indians has been the origin of another class of such terms.

The following plants have been called after the Indian:

Indian apple.—The May apple, or wild mandrake (Podophyllum peltatum).

Indian arrow.—The burning bush, or wahoo (Euonymus atropurpureus).

Indian arrow-wood.—The flowering dogwood, or cornelian tree (Cornus florida).

Indian balm.—The erect trillium, or ill-scented wake-robin (Trillium erectum).

Indian bark.—The laurel magnolia, or sweet bay (Magnolia virginiana).

Indian bean.—(1) The catalpa, or bean-tree (Catalpa catalpa). (2) A New Jersey name of the groundnut (Apios apios).

Indian beard-grass.—The bushy beard-grass (Andropogon glomeratus).

Indian bitters.—A North Carolina name of the Fraser umbrella or cucumber tree (Magnolia fraseri).

Indian black drink.—The cassena, yaupon, black drink (q. v.), or Carolina tea (Ilex cassine).

Indian boys and girls.—A western name of the Dutchman's breeches (Bikukulla cucullaria).

Indian bread.—The tuckahoe (Scelerotium giganteum).

Indian bread-root.—The prairie turnip, or pomme blanche (Pseoralea esculenta).

Indian cedar.—The hop-hornbeam, or ironwood (Ostrya virginiana).

Indian cherry.—(1) The service-berry, or june-berry (Amelanchier canadensis). (2) The Carolina buckthorn (Rhamnus caroliniana).

Indian chickweed.—The carpet-weed (Mollugo verticillata).

Indian chief.—A western name of the American cowslip or shooting-star (Dodecatheon meadia).

Indian cigar tree.—The common catalpa (Catalpa catalpa), a name in use in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the District of Columbia. See Indian bean, above.

Indian corn.—Maize (Zea mays), for which an early name was Indian wheat.

Indian cucumber.—Medeola virginiana, also known as Indian cucumber-root.

Indian cup.—(1) The common pitcher-plant (Sarracenia purpurea). (2) The cupplant (Silphium perfoliatum).

Indian currant.—The coral-berry (Symphoricarpos vulgaris).

Indian dye.—The yellow puccoon or orange-root (Hydrastis canadensis); also known as yellow-root.

Indian elm.—The slippery-elm (Ulmus fulva).

Indian fig.—(1) The eastern prickly pear (Opuntia opuntia). (2) Cereus giganteus, or saguaro, the giant cereus of Arizona, California, Mexico, and New Mexico.

Indian fog.—The crooked yellow stonecrop or dwarf houseleek (Sedum reflexum).

Indian gravel-root.—The tall boneset or joe-pye-weed (Eupatorium purpureum).

Indian hemp.—(1) The army-root (Apocynum cannabinum), called also black Indian hemp. (2) The swamp milkweed (Asclepias incarnata) and the hairy milkweed (A. pulchra), called also white Indian hemp. (3) A West Virginia name for the yellow toad-flax (Linaria linaria). (4) The velvet-leaf (Abutilon abutilon), called also Indian mallow.

Indian hippo.—The bowman's-root (Porteranthus trifolius), called also Indian physic.

Indian lemonade.—A California name, according to Bergen, for the fragrant sumac (Rhus trilobata).

Indian lettuce.—The round-leaved wintergreen (Pyrola rotundifolia).

Indian mallow.—(1) The velvet-leaf (Abutilon abutilon), also known as Indian hemp. (2) The prickly sida (Sida spinosa).

Indian melon.—A Colorado name of a species of Echinocactus.

Indian millet.—The silky oryzopsis (Oryzopsis cuspidata).

Indian moccasin.—The stemless lady's-slipper or moccasin-flower (Cypripedium acule).

Indian mozemize, or moose misse.—The American mountain-ash or dogberry (Sorbus americana).

Indian paint.—(1) The strawberry-blite (Blitum capitatum). (2) The hoary puccoon (Lithospermum canescens). (3) A Wisconsin name, according to Bergen, for a species of Tradescantia. Indian liquor.—A Western term for whisky or rum adulterated for sale to the Indians.

Indian meal.—Maize or corn meal. A mixture of wheat and maize flour was called in earlier days "wheat and indian"; one of maize and rye flour, "rye and indian."

Indian orchard.—According to Bartlett, a term used in New York and Massachusetts to designate an old orchard of ungrafted apple trees, the time of planting being unknown.

Indian pipestone.—A name for catlinite (q. v.), the stone of which tribes in the region of the upper Mississippi made their tobacco pipes.

Indian pudding.—A pudding made of cornmeal, molasses, etc.

Indian reservation or reserve.—A tract of land reserved by Government for the Indians.

Indian sign.—A Western colloquialism of the earlier settlement days for a trace of the recent presence of Indians.

Indian sugar.—One of the earlier names for maple sugar.

Indian summer.—The short season of pleasant weather usually occurring about the middle of November, corresponding to the European St. Marthas summer, or summer of All Saints (Albert Matthews in Monthly Weather Rev., Jan., 1902).

The name Indian appears sometimes in children's games (Chamberlain in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, xv, 107-116, 1902).

In Canadian French the usual term applied to the Indian was "sauvage" (savage); and hence are met such terms as "botte sauvage," "traine sauvage," "tabagane," "thé sauvage." The "Siwash" of the Pacific coast and in the Chinook jargon is only a corruption of the "sauvage" of French-Canadian trappers and adventurers. (A. F. C.)

Indian Industries League. A philanthropic organization, originally the Indian industries department of the National Indian Association, but incorporated as an independent body at Boston, Mass., in 1901. Its object is "to open individual opportunities of work, or of education to be used for self-support, to individual Indians, and to build up self-supporting industries in Indian communities." As a department of the national organization the Indian industries gained its first important impetus in 1892, when it held at the Mechanics' Fair, in Boston, an exhibition of Indian beadwork and of class-room work in iron, tin, wood, leather, and lace. It has been instrumental in the education of two Indian girls, who were graduated with credit from the Boston High School, and has helped individual educated Indians toward self-support, having in view the fact that the progress of the Indians toward civilization is in proportion to the number of their young people who have seen and practised the white man's life at its best. It has also helped to foster a beadwork industry, aided in developing the native moccasin to suit the white man; bought baskets of native manufacture, paying therefor a fair price to the Pima and Mission Indians, the basket making tribes of Washington, and others, and has obtained for these products places for exhibit and sale. The league also erected an industrial room for the Navaho on San Juan r., N. Mex., which was disposed of when the plant became a mission station. In 1905 the president of the league officially visited the Mission Indians of California and others, his report on the former resulting in the amelioration of their extreme poverty by bringing to them governmental and private aid. The league strives to aid the Indians in any way that offers even temporary self-support, like that derived from their aboriginal industries. It believes in the assimilation of the Indians into the national life, in the abolishment of reservations, and in the freedom of the Indians to live and work where they please. (F. C. S.)

Indian Point. A village on the site of Lisbon, N. Y., occupied after the Revolution by Catholic Iroquois removed thither by the English Government until they were dispersed in 1806, when they retired to Onondaga and St Regis.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 342, 1855.

Indian Rights Association. A nonpolitical, nonsectarian body organized in Philadelphia, Dec. 15, 1882, by gentlemen who met in response to an invitation of Mr John Welsh to consider the best method of producing such public feeling and Congressional action as should secure civil rights and education to the Indians, and in time bring about their civilization and admission to citizenship. When the association began its work much of the country over which the Indians roamed was sparsely settled; outbreaks had been frequent; comparatively little attention was paid to the Indians' rights and wrongs, and ignorance concerning Indian affairs was widespread. When the tide of emigration swept westward, and settlers, good and bad, began crowding the Indians more and more, it was evident that measures should be adopted whereby the Indian could be adapted to his new artificial environment. The work confronting the association was one of magnitude. It was necessary to procure accurate knowledge of actual conditions, which could be done only by frequent visits to the Indian country. The information thus obtained had to be brought to the attention of the public in order that sufficient pressure might be exerted on Congress and the Executive. This was done by dissemination of information in pamphlets and leaflets, by public addresses, and by announcements through the public press. The association gradually won the respect and confidence of the public. The accuracy of its statements is rarely questioned now, and an appeal to the press on any matter requiring attention from Congress or the public usually meets with ready response. In the beginning the association was regarded by a few as maintaining visionary theories, and was viewed by some Government officials as a meddlesome and irresponsible body; but the Office of Indian Affairs came to regard it as a friendly critic and welcomed its aid. The association has a representative in Washington to cooperate with the Office of Indian Affairs, to bring to the attention of the Commissioner matters requiring adjustment, to scrutinize legislation relating to Indian affairs, and to inform members of Congress regarding the merits or demerits of pending bills. Vicious legislation, when it can not be defeated in committee, is vigorously fought in Congress through personal presentation and by letters and pamphlets, with frequent appeals to the Executive.

Many of the laws enacted by Congress with a view of improving the condition of the Indian have been prompted by the association. Among those of a general nature is the statute of Feb. 8, 1887, known as the "general severalty act," which authorizes allotments. Under this law the title to Indian lands is held by the Government in most cases for 25 years, but in the meantime the allottee is subject to the laws in common with other citizens. More recent is the enactment of a statute, drafted by the association, designed to defeat the monopoly that has so largely controlled Indian trade, the law now providing that any person of good moral character shall be granted a license on application.

The courts have frequently been appealed to by the association in the endeavor to secure justice. The Warner Ranch (Mission Indian) case, appealed from the local courts of California to the Supreme Court of the United States, was in its inception espoused by the association and prosecuted by it to the final decree of the highest tribunal, the necessary funds for the prosecution of the case being advanced by the association. The celebrated "Lone Wolf" case was appealed by the association to the United States Supreme Court in the hope that the policy of recognizing the validity and sacredness of the Government's treaty obligations with the Indian tribes, followed since the adoption of the Constitution, would be upheld. The adverse decision in this case marked the beginning of a new era in the management of the Indians. The appeal made to the association by friends of Spotted Hawk and Little Whirlwind, of the Northern Cheyenne in Montana, under sentence of death and life imprisonment, respectively, for the alleged murder of a sheep herder, was responded to by the association, which employed counsel to present the case on appeal to the supreme court of Montana. The effort resulted in securing the liberty of both young men, and a subsequent confession by the person guilty of the crime charged to them fully exonerated them and showed the need of watchfulness to prevent great wrongs against Indians by reason of local prejudice. The exposure by the association of the anomalous conditions in Indian Territory resulted in directing the attention of the people and of Congress to the need of better safeguarding the rights of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Considerable attention has been given by the association to exposing the wrongdoing of Government officials where such unfortunately existed, usually by the class of employees who obtained their positions through political influence. The association has also strenuously urged that the appointment of Indian agents be made solely on the ground of efficiency, and it was through its efforts that the civil-service rules were extended to the Indian service.

At the time of the organization of the Indian Rights Association, Congress, owing largely to misunderstanding of the Indians' needs, failed to make adequate appropriations for schools, but by informing the public of the nature and possibilities of this work, a vigorous sentiment was created in its favor (see Education). The fact that an organization exists solely to guard the rights of the Indians acts as a powerful deterrent to persons seeking the exploitation of the Indians' estate.

The association has printed and distributed about 600,000 copies of various publications. Among those that have attracted much attention are: The Indian Before the Law, by Henry S. Pancoast; The Indian Question Past and Present, by Herbert Welsh; Indian Wardship, by Charles E. Pancoast; Civilization Among the Sioux, by Herbert Welsh; The Mission Indians, by C. C. Painter; Latest Studies on Indian Reservations, by J. B. Harrison; and A New Indian Policy, by S. M. Brosius. (M. K. S. S. M. B.)

Inscribed tablets. Objects, generally of soft stone, usually shale or sandstone, containing various lines and formal characters incised or in relief. Some of them are undoubtedly prehistoric and susceptible of interpretation in the light of aboriginal ornamentation and symbolism; others are forgeries. While it would perhaps be too much to say that there exists N. of Mexico no tablet or other ancient article that contains other than a pictorial or pictographic record, it is safe to assert that no authentic specimen has yet been brought to public notice. Any object claimed to be of pre-Columbian age and showing hieroglyphic or other characters that denote a degree of culture higher than that of the known tribes, is to be viewed with suspicion and all the circumstances connected with its discovery subjected to rigid scrutiny. The same remarks apply to engraved copper plates. In the latter material, the uneven surface produced by natural corrosion is often mistaken for attempts at inscriptions. Invention. In the language of the Patent Office "an invention is something new and useful." The word applies to the apparatus of human activities and to the processes involved. The life of culture from the lowest savagery to the highest civilization is an increase in the artificialities of life. There were no tribes in America without culture, and the lowest of them had inventions. For instance, the Fuegians had learned to convert the fish-spear into a barbed harpoon by fastening the detachable head, which was set loosely in the socket, to the end of a shaft by means of a short piece of rawhide. They had also invented a canoe of bark made in three pieces. When they wished to move to a new bay or inlet between which and the last there was a dangerous headland, they could take the canoe apart, carry it over the intervening mountain, and unite the parts by lashing, covering the joints with pitch. The most ingenious savages on the continent, however, were the Eskimo, all of whose apparatus used in their various activities show innumerable additions and changes, which are inventions. They lived surrounded by the largest animals in the world, which they were able to capture by their ingenuity. Their snow domes, waterproof clothing, skin canoes, sinew-backed bows, snowshoes, traps and snares in myriad varieties, some of which they shared with neighboring Indian tribes, amaze those who study them. Among other ingenious devices which would pass under the name of inventions are: the use of skids by the N. W. coast natives for rolling logs into place in building their immense communal dwellings; the employment of the parbuckle to assist in the work of moving logs; the use of a separate fly of rawhide at the top of the tipi, which could be moved by means of a pole with one end resting on the ground, so that the wind would not drive the smoke back into the tipi; driving a peg of known length into the side of a canoe as a gauge for the adzman in chipping out the inside; the boiling of food in baskets or utensils of wood, gourd, or rawhide, by means of hot stones; the attachment of inflated sealskins to the end of a harpoon line to impede the progress of game through the water after it was struck; the sinew-backed bow, which enabled the Eskimo hunter to employ brittle wood for the rigid portion and sinew string for propulsion; the continuous motion spindle; the reciprocating drill; the sand saw for hard stone, and all sorts of signaling and sign language. Iowa ('sleepy ones'). One of the southwestern Siouan tribes included by J. O. Dorsey with the Oto and Missouri in his Chiwere group. Traditional and linguistic evidence proves that the Iowa sprang from the Winnebago stem, which appears to have been the mother stock of some other of the southwestern Siouan tribes; but the closest affinity of the Iowa is with the Oto and Missouri, the difference in language being merely dialectic. Iowa chiefs informed Dorsey in 1883 that their people and the Oto, Missouri, Omaha, and Ponca "once formed part of the Winnebago nation." According to the traditions of these tribes, at an early period they came with the Winnebago from their priscan home n. of the great lakes, but that the Winnebago stopped on the shore of a great lake (L. Michigan), attracted by the abundant fish, while the others continued southwestward to the Mississippi. Here another band, the Iowa, separated from the main group, "and received the name of Pahoja, or Gray Snow, which they still retain, but are known to the white people by the name of Ioways, or Aiaouez. The first stopping place of the Iowa, after parting from the Winnebago, as noted in the tradition, appears to have been on Rock r., Ill., near its junction with the Mississippi. Another tradition places them farther n. In 1848 a map was drawn by a member of the tribe showing their movements from the mouth of Rock r. to the place where they were then living. According to this their first move was to the banks of Des Moines r., some distance above its mouth; the second was to the vicinity of the pipestone quarry in s. w. Minnesota, although on the map it was placed erroneously high up on the Missouri; thence they descended to the mouth of Platte r., and later moved successively to the headwaters of Little Platte r., Mo.; to the w. bank of the Mississippi, slightly above the mouth of Des Moines r., a short distance farther up on the same side of the Mississippi; again southwestwardly, stopping on Salt r., thence going to its extreme headwaters; to the upper part of Chariton r.; to Grand r.; thence to Missouri r., opposite Ft Leavenworth, where they lived at the time the map was drawn. These successive movements, which are of comparatively recent date, are generally accepted as substantially correct. The Sioux have a tradition (Williamson in Minn. Hist. Coll., I, 296) that when their ancestors first came to the falls of St Anthony, the Iowa occupied the country about the mouth of Minnesota r., while the Cheyenne dwelt higher up on the same stream. The Iowa appear to have been in the vicinity of the mouth of Blue Earth r., Minn., just before the arrival there of Le Sueur in 1701 for the purpose of erecting his fort. His messengers, sent to invite them to settle in the vicinity of the fort because they were good farmers, found that they had recently removed toward Missouri r., near the Maha (Omaha), who dwelt in that region. The Sioux informed Le Sueur that Blue Earth r. belonged to the Scioux of the West (Dakota), the Aya-vois (Iowas), and Otocatas (Oto), who lived a little farther off. Father Maréchal (La Harpe, Jour., 39, 1851) says that the Iowa were about this date associated with the Sioux in their war against the Sauk. This does not accord with the general tradition that the Dakota were always enemies of the Iowa, nevertheless the name Nadoessi Mascouteins seems to have been applied to the Iowa by the early missionaries because of their relations for a time with the Sioux. Père Andre thus designated them in 1676, when they were living 200 leagues w. of Green Bay, Wis. Perrot (Mém., 63, 1864) apparently located them in the vicinity of the Pawnee, on the plains, in 1685. Father Zenobius (1680) placed the Anthoutantas (Oto) and Nadouessious Maskoutens (Iowa) about 130 leagues from the Illinois, in 3 great villages built near a river which empties into the river Colbert (Mississippi) on the w. side, above the Illinois, almost opposite the mouth of the Wisconsin. He appears to locate a part of the Ainoves (perhaps intended for Aioües), on the w. side of Milwaukee r., in Wisconsin. On Marquette's map (1674-79) the Pahoutet (Iowa), the Otontanta (Oto), and Maha (Omaha) are placed on Missouri r., evidently by mere guess. La Salle knew of the Oto and the Iowa, and in his letter in regard to Hennepin, Aug. 22, 1682, mentions them under the names Otontanta and Aiounouea, but his statement that Accault, one of his company, knew the languages of these tribes is doubtful. It is probable that in 1700, when Le Sueur furnished them with their first firearms, the Iowa resided on the extreme headwaters of Des Moines r., but it appears from this explorer's journal that they and the Oto removed and "established themselves toward the Missouri river, near the Maha." Jefferys (Fr. Dom. in Am., 1761) placed them on the e. side of the Missouri, w. of the sources of Des Moines r., above the Oto, who were on the w. side of the Missouri and below the Omaha; but in the text of his work they are located on the Mississippi in lat. 43° 30'. In 1804, according to Lewis and Clark (Orig. Jour., vi, 91-92, 1905), they occupied a single village of 200 warriors or 800 souls, 18 leagues up Platte r., on the s. e. side, although they formerly lived on the Missouri above the Platte. They conducted traffic with traders from St Louis at their posts on Platte and Grand Nemaha r., as well as at the Iowa village, the chief trade being skins of beaver, otter, raccoon, deer, and bear. They also cultivated corn, beans, etc. In 1829 (Rep. Sec. War) they were on Platte r., Iowa., 15 m. from the Missouri state line. Schoolcraft (1853) placed them on Nemaha r., Nebr., a mile above its mouth. By 1880 they were brought under the agencies.

The visiting and marriage customs of the Iowa did not differ from those of cognate tribes, nor was their management of children unlike that of the Dakota, the Omaha, and others. They appear to have been cultivators of the soil at an early date, as Le Sueur tried to persuade them to fix their village near Ft L'Huillier because they were "industrious and accustomed to cultivate the earth." Pike says that they cultivated corn, but proportionately not so much as the Sauk and Foxes. He also affirms that the Iowa were less civilized than the latter. Father André (Jes. Rel., 1676, Thwaites ed., LX, 203, 1900) says that although their village was very large, they were poor, their greatest wealth consisting of "ox-hides and red calumets," indicating that the Iowa early manufactured and traded catlinite pipes. Some small mounds in Minnesota and Iowa have been ascribed to them by two distinct traditions.

IOWA. (DAVID TOHEE)

In 1824 they ceded all their lands in Missouri, and in 1836 were assigned a reservation in N. E. Kansas, from which a part of the tribe moved later to another tract in central Oklahoma, which by agreement in 1890 was allotted to them in severalty, the surplus acreage being opened to settlement by whites.

Various estimates of the population of the Iowa at different dates are as follows: In 1760, 1,100 souls; by Lewis and Clark in 1804, 800, smallpox having carried off 100 men besides women and children in 1803; the Secretary of War gives the number in 1829 as 1,000; Catlin in 1832 at about 1,400, but in 1836 at 992; the Indian Affairs Report of 1843 gives their number as 470; the number at the Potawatomi and Great Nemaha agency in Iron. The use of iron by the American aborigines and especially by the tribes n. of Mexico was very limited as compared with their use of copper. The compact ores were sometimes used, and were flaked, pecked, or ground into shape, as were the harder varieties of stone. Implements, ornaments, and symbolic objects of hematite ore are found in great numbers in mounds and in burial places and on dwelling sites over a large part of the country. Since smelting was unknown to the natives, the only form of metallic iron available to them and sufficiently malleable to be shaped by hammering is of meteoric origin, and numerous examples of implements shaped from it have been recovered from the mounds. A series of celts of ordinary form, along with partly shaped pieces and natural masses of the metal, were found by Moorehead in a mound of the Hopewell group near Chillicothe, Ohio, and these are now in the Field Museum of Natural History, Chicago. The Turner mounds, in Hamilton co., Ohio, have perhaps yielded the most interesting relics of this class. Putnam describes these, in enumerating the various objects found on one of the earthen altars, as follows: "But by far the most important things found on this altar were the several masses of meteoric iron and the ornaments made from this metal. One of them is half of a spool-shaped ear ornament, like those made of copper with which it was associated. Another ear ornament of copper is covered with a thin plating of iron, in the same manner as others were covered with silver. Three of the masses of iron have been more or less hammered into bars, as if for the purpose of making some ornament or implement, and another is apparently in the natural shape in which it was found" (16th Rep. Peabody Museum, iii, 171, 1884; see also Putnam in Proc. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 349, 1883). Ross records the fact that the Eskimo of Smith ad. used meteoric iron. Small bits of this metal beaten out and set in a row in an ivory handle made effective knives. See Hematite, Metal work.

Iroquoian Family. A linguistic stock consisting of the following tribes and tribal groups: the Hurons composed of the Attigneaouantan (Bear people), the Attigneenongnahac (Cord people), the Arendahronon (Rock people), the Tohontaenrat (Atahontaenrat or Tohontaenrat, White-eared or Deer people), the Wenrohonon, the Ataronchronon, and the Atonthrataronon (Otter people, an Algonquian tribe); the Tionontati or Tobacco people or nation; the confederation of the Attiwendaronk or Neutrals, composed of the Neutrals proper, the Aondironon, the Ongniarahronon, and the Atrigenratka (Atriguenrek); the Conkhandeenrhonon; the Iroquois confederation composed of the Mohawk, the Oneida, the Onondaga, the Cayuga, and the Seneca, with the Tuscarora after 1726; and in later times the incorporated remnants of a number of alien tribes, such as the Tutelo, the Saponi, the Nanticoke, the Conoy, and the Muskewi or Foxes; the Conestoga or Susquehanna of at least three tribes, of which one was the Akhrakouaehronon or Atrakouaehronon; the Erie or Cat nation of at least two allied peoples; the Tuscarora confederation, composed of several leagued tribes, the names of which are now unknown; the Nottaway; the Meherrin; and the Cherokee composed of at least three divisions, the Elati, the Middle Cherokee, and the Atali; and the Onnontoga consisting of the Iroquois-Catholic seceders on the St Lawrence.

Each tribe was an independent political unit, except those which formed leagues in which the constituent tribes, while enjoying local self-government, acted jointly in common affairs. For this reason there was no general name for themselves common to all the tribes.

Jacques Cartier, in 1534, met on the shore of Gaspé basin people of the Iroquoian stock, whom in the following year he again encountered in their home on the site of the city of Québec, Canada. He found both banks of the St Lawrence above Québec, as far as the site of Montreal, occupied by people of this family. He visited the villages Hagonchenda, Hochelaga, Hochelayi, Stadacona, and Tutonaguy. This was the first known habitat of an Iroquoian people. Champlain found these territories entirely deserted 70 years later, and Lescarbot found people roving over this area speaking an entirely different language from that recorded by Cartier. He believed that this change of languages was due to "a destruction of people," because, he writes, "some years ago the Iroquois assembled themselves to the number of 8,000 men and destroyed all their enemies, whom they surprised in their enclosures." The new language which he recorded was Algonquian, spoken by bands that passed over this region on warlike forays.

The early occupants of the St Lawrence were probably the Arendahronon and Tionontati, tribes of the Hurons. Their lands bordered on those of the Iroquois, whose territory extended westward to that of the Neutrals, neighbors of the Tionontati and western Huron tribes to the n. and the Erie to the s. and w. The Conestoga occupied the middle and lower basin of the Susquehanna, s. of the Iroquois. The n. Iroquoian area, which Algonquian tribes surrounded on nearly every side, therefore embraced nearly the entire valley of the St Lawrence, the basins of L. Ontario and L. Erie, the s. e. shores of L. Huron and Georgian bay, all of the present New York state except the lower Hudson valley, all of central Pennsylvania, and the shores of Chesapeake bay in Maryland as far as Choptank and Patuxent rs. In the s. the Cherokee area, surrounded by Algonquian tribes on the n., Siouan on the e., and Muskogean and Uchean tribes on the s. and w., embraced the valleys of the Tennessee and upper Savannah rs. and the mountainous parts of Virginia, the Carolinas, and Alabama. Separated from the Cherokee by the territory of the eastern Siouan tribes was the area occupied by the Tuscarora in n. North Carolina and by the Meherrin and Nottoway n. of them in s. e. Virginia.

The northern Iroquoian tribes, especially the Five Nations so called, were second to no other Indian people n. of Mexico in political organization, statecraft, and military prowess. Their leaders were astute diplomats, as the wily French and English statesmen with whom they treated soon discovered. In war they practised ferocious cruelty toward their prisoners, burning even their unadopted women and infant prisoners; but, far from being a race of rude and savage warriors, they were a kindly and affectionate people, full of keen sympathy for kin and friends in distress, kind and deferential to their women, exceedingly fond of their children, anxiously striving for peace and good will among men, and profoundly imbued with a just reverence for the constitution of their commonwealth and for its founders. Their wars were waged primarily to secure and perpetuate their political life and independence. The fundamental principles of their confederation, persistently maintained for centuries by force of arms and by compacts with other peoples, were based primarily on blood relationship, and they shaped and directed their foreign and internal polity in consonance with these principles. The underlying motive for the institution of the Iroquois league was to secure universal peace and welfare (ne' skén'no') among men by the recognition and enforcement of the forms of civil government (ne' gā'i'hutio) through the direction and regulation of personal and public conduct and thought in accordance with beneficent customs and council decrees; by the stopping of bloodshed in the bloodfeud through the tender of the prescribed price for the killing of a tribesman; by abstaining from eating human flesh; and, lastly, through the maintenance and necessary exercise of power (ne' gā'shōdon'ā'), not only military but also magic power believed to be embodied in the forms of their ceremonial activities. The tender by the homicide and his family for the murder or killing by accident of a tribesman was twenty strings of wampum—ten for the dead person, and ten for the forfeited life of the homicide.

The religious activities of these tribes expressed themselves in the worship of all envioning elements and bodies and many creatures of a teeming fancy, which, directly or remotely affecting their welfare, were regarded as man-beings or anthropic personages endowed with life, volition, and peculiar individual orenda, or magic power. In the practice of this religion, ethics or morals, as such, far from having a primary had only a secondary, if any, consideration. The status and personal relations of the personages of their pantheon were fixed and regulated by rules and customs similar to those in vogue in the social and political organization of the people, and there was, therefore, among at least the principal gods, a kinship system patterned on that of the people themselves.

The mental superiority of the Hurons (q. v.) over their Algonquian neighbors is frequently mentioned by the early French missionaries. A remainder of the Tionontati, with a few refugee Hurons among them, having fled to the region of the upper lakes, along with certain Ottawa tribes, to escape the Iroquois invasion in 1649, maintained among their fellow refugees a predominating influence. This was largely because, like other Iroquoian tribes, they had been highly organized socially and politically, and were therefore trained in definite parliamentary customs and procedure. The fact that, although but a small tribe, the Hurons claimed and exercised the right of lighting the council fire at all general gatherings, shows the esteem in which they were held by their neighbors. The Cherokee were the first tribe to adopt a constitutional form of government, embodied in a code of laws written in their own language in an alphabet based on the Roman characters adapted by one of them (see Sequoyia), though in weighing these facts their large infusion of white blood must be considered.

The social organization of the Iroquoian tribes was in some respects similar to that of some other Indians, but it was much more complex and cohesive, and there was a notable difference in regard to the important position accorded the women. Among the Cherokee, the Iroquois, the Hurons, and probably among the other tribes, the women performed important and essential functions in their government. Every chief was chosen and retained his position, and every important measure was enacted by the consent and cooperation of the child-bearing women, and the candidate for a chieftship was nominated by the suffrages of the matrons of this group. His selection by them from among their sons had to be confirmed by the tribal and the federal councils respectively, and finally he was installed into office by federal officers. Lands and houses belonged solely to the women.

All the Iroquoian tribes were sedentary and agricultural, depending on the chase for only a small part of their subsistence. The northern tribes were especially noted for their skill in fortification and house-building. Their so-called castles were solid log structures, with platforms running around the top on the inside, from which stones and other missiles could be hurled down upon besiegers.

For the population of the tribes composing the Iroquoian family see Iroquois, and the descriptions of the various Iroquoian tribes.

Iroquois (Algonkin: Iriwakhioiw, ‘real adders’, with the French suffix -ois). The confederation of Iroquoian tribes known in history, among other names, by that of the Five Nations, comprising the Cayuga, Mohawk, Oneida, Onondaga, and Seneca. Their name for themselves as a political body was Ongwanonsioñni, ‘we are of the extended lodge.’ Among the Iroquoian tribes kinship is traced through the blood of the woman only; kinship means membership in a family, and this in turn constitutes citizenship in the tribe, conferring certain social, political, and religious privileges, duties, and rights which are denied to persons of alien blood; but, by a legal fiction embodied in the right of adoption, the blood of the alien may be figuratively changed into one of the strains of the Iroquoian blood, and thus citizenship may be conferred on a person of alien lineage. In an Iroquoian tribe the legislative, judicial, and executive functions are usually exercised by one and the same class of persons, commonly called chiefs in English, who are organized into councils. There are three grades of chiefs. The chieftship is hereditary in certain of the simplest political units in the government of the tribe; a chief is nominated by the suffrages of the matrons of this unit, and the nomination is confirmed by the tribal and the federal councils. The functions of the three grades of chiefs are defined in the rules of procedure. When the five Iroquoian tribes were organized into a confederation, its government was only a development of that of the separate tribes, just as the government of each of the constituent tribes was a development of that of the several clans of which it was composed. The government of the clan was a development of that of the several brood families of which it was composed, and the brood family, strictly speaking, was composed of the progeny of a woman and her female descendants, counting through the female line only; hence the clan may be described as a permanent body of kindred, socially and politically organized, who trace actual and theoretical descent through the female line only. The simpler units surrendered part of their autonomy to the next higher units in such wise that the whole was closely interdependent and cohesive. The establishment of the higher unit created new rights, privileges, and duties. This was the principle of organization of the confederation of the five Iroquoian tribes. The date of the formation of this confederation (probably not the first, but the last of a series of attempts to unite the several tribes in a federal union) was not earlier than about the year 1570, which is some 30 years anterior to that of the Huron tribes.

The Delawares gave them the name Mingwe. The northern and western Algonquians called them Nadowa, 'adders'. The Powhatan called them Masasawomekes. The English knew them as the Confederation of the Five Nations, and after the admission of the Tuscarora in 1722, as the Six Nations. Moreover, the names Maqua, Mohawk, Seneca, and Tsonnontowan, by which their leading tribes were called, were also applied to them collectively. The League of the Iroquois, when first known to Europeans, was composed of the five tribes, and occupied the territory extending from the e. watershed of L. Champlain to the w. watershed of Genesee r., and from the Adirondacks southward to the territory of the Conestoga. The date of the formation of the league is not certain, but there is evidence that it took place about 1570, occasioned by wars with Algonquian and Huron tribes. The confederated Iroquois immediately began to make their united power felt. After the coming of the Dutch, from whom they procured firearms, they were able to extend their conquests over all the neighboring tribes until their dominion was acknowledged from Ottawa r. to the Tennessee and from the Kennebec to Illinois r. and L. Michigan. Their westward advance was checked by the Chippewa; the Cherokee and the Catawba proved an effectual barrier in the S., while in the N. they were hampered by the operations of the French in Canada. Champlain on one of his early expeditions joined a party of Canadian Indians against the Iroquois. This made them bitter enemies of the French, whom they afterward opposed at every step to the close of the French régime in Canada in 1763; while they were firm allies of the English. The French made several attempts through their missionaries to win over the Iroquois, and were so far successful that a considerable number of individuals from the different tribes, most of them Mohawk and Onondaga, withdrew from the several tribes and formed Catholic settlements at Caughnawaga, St Regis, and Oka, on the St Lawrence. The tribes of the league repeatedly tried, but without success, to induce them to return, and finally, in 1684, declared them to be traitors. In later wars the Catholic Iroquois took part with the French against their former brethren. On the breaking out of the American Revolution the League of the Iroquois decided not to take part in the conflict, but to allow each tribe to decide for itself what action to take. All the tribes, with the exception of the Oneida and about half of the Tuscarora, joined the English. After the revolution the Mohawk and Cayuga, with other Iroquoian tribes that were in the English interest, after several temporary assignments, were finally settled by the Canadian government on a reservation on Grand r., Ontario, where they still reside, although a few individuals emigrated to Gibson, Bay of Quinte, Caughnawaga, and St Thomas, Ontario. All the Iroquois in the United States are on reservations in New York with the exception of the Oneida, who are settled near Green Bay, Wis. The so-called Seneca of Oklahoma are composed of the remnants of many tribes, among which may be mentioned the Conestoga and Hurons, and of emigrants from all the tribes of the Iroquoian confederation. It is very probable that the nucleus of these Seneca was the remnant of the ancient Erie. The Catholic Iroquois of Caughnawaga, St Regis, and Oka, although having no connection with the confederation, supplied many recruits to the fur trade, and a large number of them have become permanently resident among the northwestern tribes of the United States and Canada.

The number of the Iroquois villa, varied greatly at different periods, from decade to decade. In 1657 there were about 24, but after the conquest of the Erie the entire country from the Genesee to the w. watershed of L. Erie came into possession of the Iroquoian tribes, which afterward settled colonies on the upper waters of the Allegheny and Susquehanna and on the n. shore of L. Ontario, so that by 1750 their villages may have numbered about 50. The population of the Iroquois also varied much at different periods. Their constant wars greatly weakened them. In 1689 it was estimated that they had 2,250 warriors, who were reduced by war, disease, and defections to Canada, to 1,230 in 1698. Their losses were largely made up by their system of wholesale adoption, which was carried on to such an extent that at one time their adopted aliens were reported to equal or exceed the number of native Iroquois. Disregarding the extraordinary estimates of some early writers, it is evident that the modern Iroquois, instead of decreasing in population, have increased, and number more at present than at any former period. On account of the defection of the Catholic Iroquois and the omission of the Tuscarora from the estimates it was impossible to get a statement of the full strength of the Iroquois until within recent times. About the middle of the 17th century the Five Nations were supposed to have reached their highest point, and in 1677 and 1685 they were estimated at about 16,000. In 1689 they were estimated at about 12,850, but in the next 9 years they lost more than half by war and by desertions to Canada. The most accurate estimates for the 18th century gave to the Six Nations and their colonies about 10,000 or 12,000 souls. In 1774 they were estimated at 10,000 to 12,500. In 1904 they numbered about 16,100, including more than 3,000 mixed-bloods, as follows:

In Ontario: Iroquois and Algonkin at Watha (Gibson), 139 (about one-half Iroquois); Mohawk of the Bay of Quinté, 1,271; Oneida of the Thames, 770; Six Nations on Grand r., 4,195 (including about 150 Delawares). In Quebec: Iroquois of Caughnawaga, 2,074; of St Regis, 1,426; of Lake of Two Mountains, 993. Total in Canada, about 10,418.

The Iroquois of New York in 1904 were distributed as follows: Onondaga and Seneca on Allegany res., 1,041; Cayuga, Onondaga, and Seneca on Cattaraugus res., 1,456; Oneida on Oneida res., 150; Oneida and Onondaga on Onondaga res., 513; St Regis res., 1,208; Cayuga and Seneca on Tonawanda res., 512; Onondaga and Tuscarora on Tuscarora res., Total, 5,290.

1905 there were also 366 Indians held as Seneca under the Seneca School, Okla.

The Algonquian and other Indians included with the Iroquois are probably outnumbered by the Caughnawaga and others in the Canadian N. W. who are not separately enumerated.

The following villages were Iroquois, but the particular tribes to which they belonged are either unknown or are collective: Adjouquay, Allaquipa, Anpauqun, Aquatsagana, Aratumquat, Awegen, Blackleg's Village, Buckaloon, Cahun-ghage, Canowdowse, Caughnawaga, Charlierstown, Chemegaide, Chenango, Chinklacamoose, Chugnut, Churamuk, Codocoraren, Cokanuck, Conaquanoeshan, Conejoholo, Conemaugh, Conihunta, Connosomothian, Conoytown (mixed Conoy and Iroquois), Coreorgonel (mixed), Cowawago, Cussewago, Ganadoga, Ganagarahhare, Ganassarage, Ganeraske, Ganecious, Gannentaha, Glasswanoge, Goshgoshunk (mixed), Grand River Indians, Hickorytown (mixed), Janundat, Jedakne, Johnstown, Jonondes, Juniata, Juraken (2), Kahendohon, Kanaghasaws, Kannawallohalla, Kanesadageh, Karaken, Karhationni, Karhawnradon, Kayehkwarageh, Kaygen, Kenté, Kickenapawling, Kiskiminetas, Kittaning, Kuskuski (mixed), Lawunkhanek, Logstown, Loyalhannon (?), Mahusquechikoken, Mahican, Mahoning, Manckatawangun, Matchasaung, Middletown, Mingo Town, Mohanet, Nescopock, Newtown (4 settlements), Newtychaning, Octageron, Ohrekionni, Onaweron, Onkwe Iyede, Opolopong, Oquaga, Osewingo, Oskawaserenhon, Ostowwackin, Oswegatchie, Otiahnanague, Otsiningo, Otskwirakeron, Ousagwentera, Owego, Paille Coupée, Pluggy's Town, Punxatawney, Runonvea, Saint Regis, Sawcunk, Schoharie, Schohorage, Sconassi, Scoutash's Town, Seneca Town, Sevegé, Sewickly's Old Town, Shamokin, Shanopin, Shenango, Sheshequin, Sheoquage, Sittawung, Skannayutenate, Skehandowa, Solocka, Swahadowri, Taiaiaigon, Tewanondadon, Tioga, Tohoguses Cabins, Tonihata, Tullihase, Tuscarora, Tuskokogie, Tutelo, Unadilla, Venango, Wakatomica, Wakerhon, Wauteghe, Yoghroonwago, Youcham. Catholic missions among the Iroquois were: Caughnawaga, Indian Point, La Montagne, La Prairie, Oka, Oswegatchie, St Regis, and Sault au Recollet. For the other Iroquois settlements, see under the several tribal names.

Iroquois Supérieurs (French: 'upper Iroquois'). A geographical group of Iroquois, embracing the Oneida, Onondaga, Cayuga, and Seneca, occupying, in the 17th century, an inland country farther from St Lawrence r. than the Mohawk, who were called Iroquois Inférieurs.—Jes. Rel. for 1656, 7, 1858.

Irrigation. It was once assumed that irrigation was not practised by the Indians of the arid region, except to a very limited extent, until after they came under the influence of Spanish missionaries; but recent systematic study of the archeologic remains in the S. W. has removed all doubt that agriculture was conducted in prehistoric times with the aid of extensive irrigation canals, reservoirs, and dams. The most important of these works are in the valleys of the Gila and its tributaries, in s. Arizona, where scores of miles of ditches are still traceable, in instances extending more than 10 m. from the stream from which the water was diverted; according to some observers there are individual canals that traverse a total distance of 25 m. In the Salt River valley alone it is estimated that from 200,000 to 250,000 acres were made available for cultivation by means of irrigation before the arrival of white men. Some of the ancient canals were about 7 ft deep and 4 ft wide at the bottom, but the sides sloped gradually, rising in steps, giving the acequia a width of about 30 ft at the surface. Both the bed and the sides were carefully tamped and plastered with clay to prevent waste through seepage. Remains of what are believed to have been wooden head gates have been exposed by excavation. Where canal depressions have disappeared, owing to cultivation or to sand drift, the canals are still traceable by the innumerable boulders and water-worn concretions that line the banks; these, according to Cushing, having been placed there by the natives as "water-tamers" to direct the streams to the thirsty fields. The irrigation works in the valleys mentioned probably indicate greater engineering skill than any aboriginal remains that have been discovered N. of Mexico. Several of the old canal beds have been utilized for miles by modern ditch builders; in one instance a saving of $20,000 to $25,000 was effected at the Mormon settlement of Mesa, Maricopa co., Ariz., by employing an ancient acequia that traversed a volcanic knoll for 3 m. and which at one point was excavated to a depth of 20 to 25 ft in the rock for several hundred feet. The remains of ditches the building of which necessitated overcoming similar though less serious obstacles exist in the valley of the Rio Verde; and on the Hasayampa, N. W. of Phoenix, a canal from that stream traverses a lava mesa for several miles and falls abruptly into a valley 40 or 50 ft. below, the water in its descent having cut away the rocky mesa walls for several feet.

Even where the water supply of a pueblo settlement situated several miles from a stream was obtained by means of canals, each house cluster was provided with a reservoir; and in many instances through the S. W., reservoirs, sometimes covering an area measuring 1 m. by $\frac{1}{2}$ m., designed for the storage of rain water, were the sole means of water supply both for domestic purposes and for irrigation. In the valleys of the Rio Grande and its tributaries, in New Mexico, small reservoirs were the chief means of supplying water to the ancient villages; and even to-day only the rudest methods of irrigation are employed by the Pueblo tribes. The ancient occupants of Peñasco Blanco, one of the Chaco canyon group of ancient ruins in the Navaho desert in N. W. New Mexico, diverted water from the Chaco by means of a ditch which supplied a reservoir built in sand, and partially prevented seepage by lining its bed with slabs of stones and clay.

The neighboring pueblos of Una Vida, Pueblo Bonito, Kinklazhin, Kinbineola, and Kinyaah, also were artificially provided with water for irrigation. Kinbineola, however, exhibits the best example of irrigation works of any of the Chaco group of villages, water having been diverted from the sandy wash to a large natural depression and thence conducted to the fields, 2 m. away, by a ditch dug around a mesa and along a series of sand hills on a fairly uniform grade. This ditch was mainly earthwork, but where necessary the lower border was reinforced with retaining walls of stone. Kinyaah is said to have been provided with two large reservoirs and a canal 25 to 30 ft wide and in places 3 to 4 ft deep.

Hand irrigation is still practised by the Pueblo Indians. The Zuni women, in order to raise their small crops of onions, chile, etc., are obliged to carry water in jars on their heads, sometimes for several hundred yards; it is then poured on the individual plants with a gourd ladle. At the Middle Mesa villages of the Hopi, garden patches are watered in much the same way, except that here the gardens are within easier reach of the springs and are irrigated by means of a gourd vessel fastened to the end of a long pole. Both the Hopi of to-day and the ancient inhabitants of the vicinity of the present Solomonville, on the Gila, constructed reservoirs on the mesa sides from which terraced gardens below were regularly irrigated, the reservoirs being supplied by impounding storm water. Throughout the S. W. where pueblos occupied the summits of mesas, reservoirs were provided, and according to tradition some of these were filled in winter by rolling into them immense snowballs. For hundred of years the pueblo of Acoma (q. v.) has derived its entire water supply for domestic purposes from a natural depression in the rock which receives the rainfall from the mesa summit.

Isle aux Tourtes (French: 'turtle-dove island'). A French Sulpitian mission station, probably on Ottawa r., Quebec, begun for the Algonkin and Nipissing about 1720, but shortly afterward removed to Oka, q. v.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 333, 1856.

Isle of St John's. A village or resort of a band of Micmac, probably in Nova Scotia, in 1760.—Frye (1760) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., X, 115, 1809.

Isleta (Span: 'islet', so named from the location of the old village on a delta or island between the bed of a mountain torrent and the Rio Grande. The native name of the pueblo is Shiinchibak, 'knife laid on the ground to play whib, 'whib being a native foot race. The name was perhaps suggested by the knife-like shape of the lava ridge on which the pueblo is built.—Lummis). A Tigua pueblo on the w. bank of the Rio Grande, about 12 m. s. of Albuquerque, N. Mex. According to Lummis it stands on the site it occupied at the time of the Spanish discovery in 1540, when it formed one of the villages of the province of Tiguex of Coronado's chroniclers. It was the seat of the Franciscan mission of San Antonio de Isleta from prior to 1629, and about 1675 received accessions from the Tigua pueblos of Quarai, Tajique, and others, e. of the Rio Grande, when those pueblos were abandoned in consequence of Apache depredations. In 1680 the population of Isleta was about 2,000. As the Spanish settlers along the lower Rio Grande took refuge in this pueblo when the uprising occurred in the year named, and thus in-year following (1681) Otermin surprised and captured the pueblo, and on his return from the n. took with him 519 captives, of whom 115 afterward escaped. The remainder were settled on the n. n. bank of the Rio Grande, a few miles below El Paso, Tex., the name Isleta del Sur ('Isleta of the South') being applied to their pueblo. The date of the refoounding of the northern Isleta is somewhat in doubt. According to Bancroft the present pueblo was built in 1709 by some scattered families of Tigua gathered by missionary Juan de la Peña, while Bandelier asserts that the pueblo "remained vacant and in ruins until 1718, when it was re peopled with Tiguas who had returned from the Moquis [Hopi], to whom the majority of the tribe had fled during interrupted communication between its inhabitants and the seat of war at the northern villages, they did not participate in the massacre of the colonists and missionaries in the vicinity. When Gov. Otermin retreated from Santa Fé, however, he found Isleta abandoned, the inhabitants having joined the rebels. The the 12 years of Pueblo 'independence,' " 1680-92. The name of the mission (San Antonio de la Isleta) seems also to have been transferred to the new pueblo in the s., and on the reestablishment of the northern Isleta the latter became the mission of San Agustin. The Genizaros pueblos of Belen and Tomé were visitas of this mission in 1788. It has been learned by Lummis that a generation ago about 150 Queres from Acoma and Laguna were forced to leave their homes on account of drought and to settle at Isleta, where they still form a permanent part of that village and are recognized by representation in its civil and religious government. Pop. 1,110. (Consult Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 233, et seq., 1892.)

According to Lummis (inf'n, 1896) the Isleta people have the following clans: Kim (Mountain lion), Pashir (Water pebble), Num (Earth), T'hur (Sun), Shiu (Eagle), Tam (Antelope), Pim (Deer), Churehu (Mole), Shumuyu (Turquoise), Kurni (Goose), Tuim (Wolf), Iebathu (White corn), Iefeu (Red corn), Ieshur (Blue corn), Iechur (Yellow corn), and Parrot. According to Gatschet the tribe is divided into the Churan and Shifunin fraternities or parties—the 'Red Eyes' and the 'Black Eyes'—but these may be merely phratral designations. See Pueblos, Tigua. (F. W. H.)

Isleta del Sur (Span.: 'Isleta of the south'). A Tigua pueblo on the n. e. bank of the Rio Grande, a few miles below El Paso, Tex. It was established in 1681 by some 400 Indian captives from Isleta, N. Mex., taken thence by Gov. Otermin on his return from the attempted reconquest of the Pueblos after their revolt in Aug., 1680. It was the seat of a Franciscan mission from 1682, containing a church dedicated to San Antonio de Padua. The mission name San Antonio applied to Isleta del Sur belonged to the northern Isleta until its abandonment in consequence of the revolt, and when the latter was resettled in 1709 or 1718, the mission was named San Agustín de la Isleta. The few inhabitants of Isleta del Sur are now almost completely Mexicanized. See authors cited below; also Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., iv, no. 1, 1902. (F. W. H.)

Ita. A tribe of Eskimo between lat. 76° and 78° 18', w. Greenland. Their principal village (Etah), from which they take their name, is at Foulke fjord; their chief hunting grounds are Whale and Wolstenholme sds. When first visited by Ross in 1818 they possessed neither canoes nor arrows. The art of building kaiaks, long forgotten, was introduced after 1873 by immigrants from Baffin land, who came by way of Ellesmere land. They hunt seal, their principal food, on the floes of the bays and walrus at the floe edges, and in summer they kill caribou in the mountains. They live in almost complete isolation, without salt, with scarcely any substance of vegetal origin, in the northernmost climate inhabited by human beings, having no food besides meat, blood, and blubber; no clothing except the skins of birds and animals. Pop. in 1854, according to Kane, 140; in 1884, according to Nourse, 80; Peary enumerated 253 in 1895, reduced by disease to 234 in 1897. Their villages and camping places at various times are: Akpan, Anootok, Etah, Igludahoming, Igluduaquin, Ikalu, Imnangana, Iterlesoa, Iübling, Kana, Kangerdluksoa, Kangidli, Karmenak, Karsuit, Kiatang, Kingatok, Koinson, Kukan, Navialik, Netlek, Nutun, Pikirlu, Pituarvik, Sarfalik, Udlubsen, Umana, and Uwarosuk. I-to-ches.—McKee et al. (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 75, 1853. It-i'-cha.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 370, 1877. I-to-ches.—Barbour (1852) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 252, 1852. Ituhas.—Lewis in Ind. Aff. Rep., 399, 1858 (a band of the Wattokes high up on Kings r.).

Itijarelling. A summer settlement of Padlimiut Eskimo on Exeter sd., Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Itivimiut ('people of the farther side,' so called by the Eskimo of Labrador proper). A tribe of Labrador Eskimo inhabiting the e. coast of Hudson bay, from lat. 53° to 58°; pop. estimated at 500. These people hunt in the interior half-way across the peninsula, continually scouring the coast for seal and the plains and hills for caribou to obtain necessary food and clothing.

Itivimiut.—Turner in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., II, 99, 1888. Thiviment.—Boas in Am. Antiq., 40, 1888 (misprint).

Itivliarsuk. An Eskimo village in w. Greenland, lat. 73° 30'.—Science, XI, map, 259, 1888.

Itiwa Ateuna ('those of the midmost all'). A Zuzi phratry embracing the Pichi or Mula (Parrot or Macaw), Taa (Seed or Corn), and Yatokya (Sun) clans.—Cushing, inf'n, 1891.

Itilik. A Squawmish village community on the left bank of Squawmish r., Brit. Col.

Itiv'q.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 474, 1900.

Yit'q.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Itokakhtina ('dwellers at the south'). A band of the Sisseton Sioux; an offshoot of the Basdechesni.

Itokak-tina.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 217, 1897. Itokaq-tina.—Ibid.

Itomapa. Mentioned by Martin (Hist. La., I, 252, 1820) as a tribe, on the w. side of the lower Mississippi, which sent a deputation to the village of the Acolapissa in 1717 to meet Bienville. Cf. Ibitoupa.

Itrahani. The Cottonwood clan of Cochiti pueblo, N. Mex.

Hiita Hanyi.—Bandelier, Delight Makers, 256, 1890 (same?). I'trahani hánuch.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., IX, 350, 1896 (hanuch = 'people').

Itsatiga (It-sa'-a-ti-a-ga). A Paviotso band formerly living about Unionville, w. Nev.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Itsehebine. A division of the Assiniboin, numbering 850, including 250 warriors, in 100 tipis, when seen by Lewis and Clark in 1804, at which time they roved on the headwaters of Mouse (Souris), Qu'Appelle, and Assiniboine rs., in the United States and Canada. In 1808, according to Henry Coues, New Light, II, 522, 1897), they were at enmity with the Dakota, Shoshoni, and with some of the Arikara and other tribes, but were friendly with the Cree. They lived by hunting, conducting trade with the Hudson's Bay, Northwest, and X. Y. fur companies, whose posts were 150 m. n. of

Ft. Mandan. They are said to have paid little attention to their engagements and were great drunkards. In 1853 they numbered 10 lodges under chief Les Yeux Gris.

(F. W. H.)
Gens de Feuilles.—Lewis and Clark, Exped., I, 217, 1893. Gens de la Feuille.—Badin (1830) in Ann. de la Prop. de la Fol., IV, 536, 1843 (same). Gens des fees or Girls.—Orig. Jour. Ivory. See Bonework.

Ivy Log. A Cherokee settlement, about the period of the removal of the tribe to Indian Ter. in 1839, on Ivy Log cr., Union co., N. Ga. (J. M.)

Iwai. A former Yaquina village on the N. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.

I-wai'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Iwayusota ('uses up by begging for'; 'uses up with the mouth'). A band of the Oglala Sioux.—Dorsey (after Cleveland) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897.

Iwi. The Eagle gens of the Kadohadacho.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1093, 1896.

Ixtacan. A pueblo of the Cora and the seat of a mission; situated on the S. bank of the Rio San Pedro, about lat. 22°, Tepic, Mexico.

Dialkatan.—Hrdlicka, Inf'n, 1906. S. Pedro de Ixtacan.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 290, 1864.

Iyaayo (I-ya-aye, 'sunflower'). An Apache clan or band at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache in 1881.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 111, 1890. See Yachin.

Iyakosa ('wart on a horse's leg'). A band of the Brulé Teton Sioux.

A-4-ko-za.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Vol., 376, 1862. Big Ankle band.—Ibid. Big-legged horses.—Culbertson in Smithson. Rep., 1850, 141, 1851. Iyakosa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 218, 1897. Iyak'osa.—Ibid.

Iyama Ateuna ('those of the uppermost'). A phratry embracing the Kyakyali (Eagle) and Ana (Tobacco) clans of the Zuni.—Cushing, Inf'n, 1891.

Iyis. A Karok village on Klamath r., Cal., inhabited in 1860.

I-yis.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Mar. 23, 1860.

Iza. A settlement of which Coronado was informed by the Indian known as The Turk, while on the Rio Grande in New Mexico in 1540-41, as a place, 6 or 7 days' journey distant, at which the army could obtain provisions on its way to "Copala" and Quivira. It was possibly imaginary; if not, it may have been a settlement of the Eyish, a Caddoan tribe of Texas. See Mota-Padilla (1742), Nueva Galicia, 164, 1870. (F. W. H.)

Iztacana. A name adopted by Rafinesque (introd. to Marshall, Ky., I, 26, 1824) for an imaginary prehistoric race of the United States.

Jack. See Kintpuash.

Jackash. A name of the American mink (Putorius vison) in use in the fur country (Coues, N. Am. Must., 172, 1877). From achdkas, the name of this animal in the Cree dialect of Algonquian. This word Lacombe (Dict., 316, 1874) explains as a diminutive of wittaküy, signifying 'genitals,' in reference to the glands of the creature. (A. F. C.)

Jack Indians. An unidentified tribe mentioned by Dobbs (Hudson Bay, 13, 1744), who states that in 1731 they came to trade at the mouth of Albany r., N. W. Ter., Canada. Named as distinct from Moose River Indians (Monsoni), Sturgeon Indians (Nameuilini), and French Indians.

Jackquyome (Jack-guy-ome). A body of Salish of Kamloops agency, Brit. Col.; pop. 257 in 1884, when their name appears for the last time.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1884, 188.

Jacobs Cabins. A settlement on Youghiogheny r. in 1753 (Gist in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., v. 102, 1836). It may have been near Jacobs cr., Fayette co., Pa., and was perhaps named from Captain Jacobs. (J. M.)

Jacobs, Captain. A Delaware chief who participated in the ambush of Gen. Braddock's army, and a leader in conjunction with Shingis in the raids and massacres on the frontiers of the settlements of Pennsylvania that followed the British disaster. A price was set on both their heads. They had a rendezvous at Kittanning, Pa., whither they took their spoils and captives. Col. John Armstrong marched against this place and assailed it at daybreak on Sept. 8, 1756. The Pennsylvanians surrounded the village and the Indians defended themselves bravely but hopelessly from their burning wigwams. Jacobs was killed with all his family.—Drake, Bk. Inds., 534, 1880.

Jacona (Span. form of Tewa Sikona). A former small Tewa pueblo situated with Cuyamunke a short distance W. of Nambe, on the S. side of Pojoaque r., Santa Fé co., N. Mex. At the time of the Pueblo rebellion of 1680 it was a visita of Nambe mission. It was abandoned in 1696, its inhabitants settling among the other Tewa pueblos, and in 1702 the grant of land that had been made to it by Spain became the property of Ignacio de Roybal. See Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 85, 1892. (F. W. H.)

Jacona.—Buschmann, Neu-Mex., 230, 1858. Jacona.—Davis, El Gringo, 88, 1857. Jacona.—Vetancurt (1698) Teatro Mex., III, 317, 1871. Jacona.—Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, IV, 85, 1892 (Jacona, or). Ja'kona.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1885 (Tewa pronunciation). S. Domingo de Xacono.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1778. S. Domingo de Xacona.—Walch, Charte America, 1805. S. Domingo de Xacona.—D'Anville, map Am. Sept., 1746. Xacona.—De l'Isle, carte Mexiq. et Floride, 1703. Xacono.—De l'Isle, Atlas Nouveau, map 60, 1733.

Jacuenecacahel. A former rancheria under the mission of San Francisco Xavier de Biaundo, in Lower California.—Writer of 1728 in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., v, 187, 1857.

Jade. See Nephrite.

Jagavana. The name of a small tribe formerly on the Texas coast; mentioned by Harris (Coll. Voy., i, 802, 1705) as one of those visited about 1530 by Cabeza de Vaca, as not far from the Chorrucos, and as neighbors of the Mariames. Possibly the Yguases of Cabeza de Vaca's Relation (Smith trans., 92, 1871).

Jagaya. A former village in a well-watered country 50 leagues from Santa Helena and 20 leagues from the sea, in n. w. South Carolina; visited by Juan Pardo in 1565.—Vandera (1567) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., i, 16, 1857.

Jakobahavn. A Danish missionary station and trading post on Disko bay, w. Greenland, established in 1741. Pop. 300 in 1867.

Jacobs-haven.—Crantz, Hist. of Greenland, i, 15, 1767.

Jamac. A former rancheria, probably of the Sobaipuri of s. Arizona, and a visita of the mission of Guevavi in 1732.—Alegre quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 524, 1884.

Jamaica. A former pueblo of the Opatá in n. e. Sonora, Mexico, under the jurisdiction of the municipality of Cumpus, in the district of Moctezuma (Orozco y Berra, Geog., 343, 1864). It contained 9 civilized inhabitants in 1900.

Jameco. The supposed name of "a small tribe or family of Indians subject to some other," thought to have dwelt formerly on Long Island, N. Y., near Jamaica, which derives its name from the band.

Jameco.—Thompson, Long Id., 382, 1839. Jemaco.—Flint, Early Long Id., 198, 1896.

Janemo. See Ninigret.

Janos. An extinct tribe which, with the Jocomes, inhabited the region of Chihuahua, Mexico, between Casas Grandes, Chihuahua, and Fronteras. Bandelier (Nation, July 2, 1885) classes them as the most southerly band of the Apache, called after presidio Janos in n. w. Chihuahua. He believes that the tribe slowly arose after 1684 and was composed of Lipan, Mescalero, and other Apache stragglers, together with renegade Suma, Toboso, Tarahumare, and Opatá Indians, and Spanish captives. Missions were established among them at an early date at Janos and Carretas, but were abandoned on account of the incursions of the Apache proper, with whom the Janos were subsequently merged. Frequent mention is made of the Janos by Jesuit missionaries during the first half of the 18th century, but of their language and customs almost nothing is known.

Janes.—Linschoten, Descr. de l'Am., map 1, 1638. Janos.—Benavides, Memorial, 7, 1630. Jamos.—

Duro, Peñalosa, 63, 1882. Jansera.—Bandelier in N. Y. Nation, July 2, 1885. Janes.—Kino (1690) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., i, 230, 1856. Yanes.—Mühlenpfordt, Mejico, ii, 521, 1844.

Jantamais. Mentioned by Domenech (Deserts of N. Am., i, 441, 1860) in a list of tribes without further notice. Possibly the Yanktonai; otherwise unknown.

Japasawa. A Powhatan Indian, chief of Potomac and a friend of the English. In 1611 he inveigled Pocahontas on board an English ship to be detained as a hostage for the good behavior of Powhatan, her father.—Drake, Bk. Inds., 357, 1880.

Jappayon. A former village connected with San Carlos mission, Cal., and said to have been Esselen.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Japul. Given by the Yavapai to Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776 (Diary, 405, 1900) as the name, seemingly, of a Yuman tribe; locality not recorded, but possibly in the vicinity of the Rio Colorado.

Japiel.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 349, 1864 (misprinting Garcés). Japul.—Garcés, op. cit., 444. Tapiel.—Cortez (1799) in Whipple, Pac. R. R. Rep., iii, pt. 3, 126, 1856 (misprint).

Jars. See Dishes, Pottery, Receptacles.

Jauniga. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with San Juan Bautista mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 25, 1860.

Jasper. An impure, opaque form of chalcedony displaying various shades of color, the yellow, red, and brown hues predominating. When grayish or greenish and mottled with red the name bloodstone is sometimes applied. It was much used by the native tribes for flaked implements of several varieties, and more rarely for hammers, celts, axes, and ornaments. It occurs in irregular masses, or pockets, in connection with other formations in many sections of the United States, and was often obtained by the Indians in the form of fugitive pebbles and bowlders; but in Pennsylvania, and perhaps in other states, it was quarried from the original beds. The best known quarries are in Bucks, Lehigh, and Berks cos., Pa. Jasper was extensively worked by the ancient inhabitants of Converse and neighboring counties of Wyoming, who found this material as well as the translucent varieties of chalcedony in connection with the quartzite of the region. See Chalcedony.

Jeboltsae.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Nov. 23, 1860. Jeboltsae.—Engelhardt, Franciscans in Cal., 398, 1897.

Jedakne. A village, Iroquois or Delaware, that existed in the 18th century on the w. branch of Susquehanna r., probably on the site of Dewart, Northumberland co., Pa. (J. N. B. H.)

Jedakne.—Laitré, map, 1784. Jedakne.—Homann Heirs' map, 1766.

Jedandago. A former Seneca hamlet, e. of Irondequoit bay, L. Ontario, N. Y.—Doc. of 1687 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., III, 434, 1853.

Jemez (from Hä'-mish, or Hae'-mish, the Keresan name of the pueblo.—Bandelier). A village on the n. bank of Jemez r., about 20 m. n. w. of Bernalillo, N. Mex. According to tradition the Jemez had their origin in the n., at a lagoon called Uabunatota (apparently identical with the Shipapulima and Cibobe of other Pueblo tribes), whence they slowly drifted into the valleys of the upper tributaries of the Rio Jemez—the Guadalupe and San Diego—where they resided in a number of villages, and finally into the sandy valley of the Jemez proper, which they now occupy, their habitat being bounded on the s. by the range of the w. division of the Rio Grande Keresan tribes—the Sia and Santa Ana. Castañeda, the chronicler of Coronado's expedition of 1541, speaks of 7 pueblos of the Jemez tribe in addition to 3 others in the province of Aguas Calientes, identified by Simpson with the Jemez Hot Springs region. Espejo in 1583 also mentions that 7 villages were occupied by the Jemez, while in 1598 Ofiate heard of 11 but saw only 8. In the opinion of Bandelier it is probable that 10 pueblos were inhabited by the tribe in the early part of the 16th century.

Following is a list of the pueblos formerly occupied by the Jemez people so far as known. The names include those given by Ofiate, which may be identical with some of the others: Amushungkwa, Anyukwinu, Astialakwa, Bulitzequa, Catroo, Ceca, Guatitriti, Guayoguia, Gyusiwa, Hanakwa, Kiashita, Kiatsukwa, Mecastria, Nokyuntseleta, Nonyishagi, Ostyalakwa, Patoqua, Pebulikwa, Pek-wiligii, Potre, Seshiuqua, Setoqua, To-wakwa, Trea, Tyajuindena, Tyasoliwa, Uahatzaa, Wabakwa, Yjar, Zolatungzezhii.

Doubtless the reason for the division of the tribe into so many lesser village communities instead of aggregating in a single pueblo for defense against the persistent aggressiveness of the Navaho, according to Bandelier, was the fact that cultivable areas in the sandy valley of the Jemez and its lower tributaries are small and at somewhat considerable distances from one another; but another and perhaps even more significant reason was that the Navaho were apparently not troublesome to the Pueblos at the time of the Spanish conquest. On the establishment of Spanish missions in this section and the introduction of improved methods of utilizing the water for irrigation, however, the Jemez were induced to abandon their pueblos one by one, until about the year 1622 they became consolidated into the two settlements of Gyusiwa and probably Astialakwa, mainly through the efforts of Fray Martin de Arvide. These pueblos are supposed to have been the seats of the missions of San Diego and San Joseph, respectively, and both contained chapels probably from 1618. Astialakwa was permanently abandoned prior to the Pueblo revolt of 1680, but in the meantime another pueblo (probably Patoqua) seems to have been established, which became the mission of San Juan de los Jemez. About the middle of the 17th century the Jemez conspired with the Navaho against the Spaniards, but the outbreak plotted was repressed by the hanging of 29 of the Jemez. A few years later the Jemez were again confederated with the Navaho and some Tigua against the Spaniards, but the contemplated rebellion was again quelled, the Navaho soon resuming their hostility toward the village dwellers. In the revolt of the Pueblos in Aug., 1680, the Jemez took a prominent part. They murdered the missionary at Gyusiwa (San Diego de Jemez), but the missionary at San Juan de los Jemez, with the alcalde mayor and three soldiers, succeeded in escaping. In 1681, when Gov. Otermin attempted to regain possession of New Mexico, the Jemez retreated to the mesas, but returned to their village on the evacuation of the region by the Spaniards. Here they probably remained until 1688, when Cruzate appeared, causing them to flee again to the heights. When Vargas came in 1692 the Jemez were found on the mesa in a large pueblo, but they were induced to descend and to promise the Spaniards their support. The Jemez, however, failed to keep their word, but waged war during 1693 and 1694 against their Keresan neighbors on account of their fidelity to the Spaniards. Vargas returned to the Jemez in 1693, when they reiterated their false promises. In July, 1694, he again went to Jemez with 120 Spaniards and some allies from Santa Ana and Sia. The mesa was stormed, and after a desperate engagement, in which 84 natives were killed, the pueblo was captured. In the month following, Vargas (after destroying this village, another on a mesa some distance below, and one built by their Santo Domingo allies 3 leagues N.) returned to Santa Fé with 361 prisoners and a large quantity of stores. From this time the only then existing pueblo of the Jemez reoccupied was San Diego, or Gyusiwa, which was inhabited until 1696, when the second revolt occurred, the Indians killing their missionary and again fleeing to the mesas, where they constructed temporary shelters. Here they were joined by some Navaho, Zuni, and Acoma allies, and made hostile demonstrations toward the Sia, Santa Ana, and San Felipe people, but in June of the year mentioned they were repulsed by a small detachment of Spaniards from Bernalillo and Sia with a loss of 30 men, 8 of whom were Acoma. The defeated Jemez this time fled to the Navaho country, where they remained several years, finally returning to their former home and constructing the present village, called by them Walatoo, "Village of the Bear." In 1728, 108 of the inhabitants died of pestilence. In 1782 Jemez was made a visita of the mission of Sia.

The Jemez clans are: Waha (Cloud), Seh (Eagle), Son (Badger), Daahl (Earth), Kyiahl (Crow), Pe (Sun), Kyunu (Corn), Sungki (Turquoise), Weha (Calabash), Yang (Coyote), Kio (Pine).

The population of the tribe in 1890 was 428; in 1904, 498, including a score of descendants of the remnant of the Pecos (q. v.), who left their old home on the upper Rio Pecos in 1838 to join their kindred.

Jennesedaga.—A former Seneca village on the right bank of Allegheny r., 17 m. above Warren, Pa., which in 1816 was the residence of the celebrated Cornplanter; it then consisted of 12 houses.—Day, Hist. Coll. Pa., 656, 1853.

Jenzenaque. A former Natchez village. Dumont (Mémoire, ii, 97, 1753) mentions it in addition to Great, Flour, Apple, and Gray villages, in the early part of the 18th century. The fifth village, mentioned by most authors of his period, is Terre Blanche, and Jenzenaque may be its Natchez name.

Jerome Big Eagle. See Wamdetanka.

Jeromestown. A former Delaware village near the present Jeromesville, Ashland co., Ohio, on a section of land set aside for the use of the Delawares by act of Mar. 3, 1807, but ceded to the United States by treaty of Sept. 29, 1817. It received its name from Jean Baptiste Jerome, an early French trader. See Brown, West. Gaz., 314, 1817; Howe, Hist. Coll. Ohio, i, 255, 1898; Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Ohio map, 1899.

Jesus María. A pueblo of the Cora on the e. bank of Rio San Pedro, here known as the Rio Jesus María, in the n. part of the Territory of Tepic, about lat. 22° 40', Mexico. It was the seat of a mission, of which San Francisco was a visita. See Orozco y Berra, Geog., 380, 1864; Humboldt, Unknown Mexico, i, 487; ii, 16, map, 1902.

Jesus María y José. A Franciscan mission founded by Fathers Casasias and Bordoyn, in 1690, in the vicinity of and as an adjunct to the mission of San Francisco de los Tejas (q. v.) in Texas, and abandoned in 1693. Its history is the same as that of the parent mission. See Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 417-418, 666, 1886; Garrison, Texas, 1903.

Santa María.—Bancroft, op. cit. Santísimo Nombre de María.—Ibid.

Jet, Lignite, Anthracite, Cannel coal. Carbonaceous materials used to some extent by Indians. Jet of excellent quality occurs in Colorado, and the Indians of the arid region employ it for jewelry and various carvings. Good examples of lignite ornaments were obtained by Fewkes from the ancient ruins of Arizona, and of jet by Pepper from the ruins of Chaco canyon, N. Mex. Among the latter is a well-sculptured frog decorated with inlaid designs in turquoise and shell. Cannel-coal objects are found in the Ohio valley mounds, but few specimens carved from anthracite are known. A small, well-carved human head of jet-like stone was obtained by Smith from a shell heap on lower Frazer r., Brit. Col., and Niblack says that the N. W. coast tribes pulverize lignite and mix it with oil for paint.

Jetti. A former Cochimi rancheria 3 leagues n. of Loreto mission, Lower California.—Picolo (1702) in Lettres Edifiantes, ii, 63, 1841.

Jews and Indians. See Lost Ten Tribes, Popular fallacies.

Jiaspi. A former rancheria of the So-baipuri, visited by Father Kino about 1697 and by him named Rosario. It was situated on the w. bank of Rio San Pedro, probably in the vicinity of the present village of Prospect, s. Arizona. (F. W. H.)

Jiaspi.—Kino (1697) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., i, 279, 1866. Rosario.—Bernal (1697) quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 356, 1887, (Jiaspi, or).

Jicamorachic. A former Tarahumare settlement in Chihuahua, Mexico.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 323, 1864.

Jicara. (Mex. Span.: 'small gourd vessel or basket'). A former Tepehuane pueblo in Durango, Mexico, and the seat of a Spanish mission.

S. Pedro Jicara.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 319, 1864.

Jicarilla (Mex. Span.: 'little basket'). An Athapaskan tribe, first so called by Spaniards because of their expertness in making vessels of basketry. They apparently formed a part of the Vaqueros of early Spanish chronicles, although, according to their creation legend, they have occupied from the earliest period the mountainous region of s. e. Colorado and n. New Mexico, their range at various periods extending eastward to w. Kansas and Oklahoma, and into n. w. Texas. The Arkansas, Rio Grande, and Canadian rs. figure in their genesis myth (Mooney in Am. Anthropol., xi, 200, 1898), but their traditions seem to center about Taos and the heads of Arkansas r. They regard the kindred Mescaleros and also the Navahos as enemies, and, according to Mooney, their alliances and blood mixture have been with the Ute and Taos. In language they are more closely related to the Mescaleros than to the Navaho or the Arizona Apache. The Jicarillas were first mentioned by this name early in the 18th century. Later, their different bands were designated Carlanes, Calchufines, Quar-telejos, etc., after their habitat or chiefs. The Spaniards established a mission among them within a few leagues of Taos, N. Mex., in 1733, which prospered for only a short time. They were regarded as a worthless people by both the Spanish settlers of New Mexico and their American successors, in raids for plunder the worst of the Apache tribes, more treacherous and cruel and less brave and energetic warriors than the Ute, but equally fond of intoxicants. While they sometimes planted on a small scale, they regarded theft as a natural means of support. The governor of New Mexico in 1853 induced 250 of the tribe to settle on Rio Puerco, but failure to ratify the treaty caused them to go on the warpath, maintaining hostility until their defeat by United States troops in 1854. Henceforward they were nominally at peace, although committing many petty thefts. In 1870 they resided on the Maxwell grant in N. E. New Mexico, the sale of which necessitated their removal. In 1872 and again in 1878 an attempt was made to move them s. to Ft Stanton, but most of them were permitted to go to the Tierra Amarilla, on the N. confines of the territory, on a reservation of 900 sq. m. set aside in 1874. Their annuities being suspended in 1878 on account of their refusal to move southward in accordance with an act of Congress of that year, they resorted to thieving. In 1880 the act of 1878 was repealed, and a new reservation was set aside on the Rio Navajo, to which they were removed. Here they remained until 1883, when they were transferred to Ft Stanton, but in 1887 were again returned to the reservation set aside for them in the Tierra Amarilla region by Executive order of Feb. 11 of that year, where they have since resided. Of this reservation 129,313.35 acres have been allotted to the Indians, and 280.44 acres reserved for mission, school, and agency purposes; the remainder, comprising 286,400 acres, is unallotted. Their population in 1905 was 795. The present divisions of the Jicarilla, as recorded by Mooney (MS., B. A. E., 1897), are: Apatiltizihbi, Dachizhoshin, Golkahin, Ketailind, and Saitinde. (F. W. H.)

John Hicks' Town. A former Seminole settlement w. of Payne's savanna, in N. Florida, occupied by Mikasuki Indians.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 507, 1822.

Johnnys. A Hankutchin village situated on Yukon r., Alaska, where the mining camp of Eagle now is. It was the village of the Katshikotin, whose chief was known as John.—Schwatka, Recon. in Alaska, 87, 1885.

Johnson, John. See Enmegahbowh.

Johnstown. A former Cherokee settlement on the upper waters of Chattahoochee r., probably in the N. part of Hall co., Georgia.

John's Town.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1847.

Johnstown. A new settlement "where the Iroquois were thereafter to speak," instead of at Orange or New Albany, N. Y.—Doc. of 18th cent. in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., x, 98, 1858.

Joles. A former Seminole town in Florida, on the w. bank of Apalachicola r., 60 m. above its mouth, apparently at or near the present Iola in Calhoun co.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 27, 1826.

Jolly, John. A Cherokee chief, noted as the adopted father of Gen. Samuel Houston, and later chief of the Arkansas band of Cherokee. His native name was Ahúludégl. 'He throws away the drum.' His early life was spent in Tennessee, near the mouth of the Hiwassee, where an island still preserves his name, and it was here that Houston came to live with him, remaining 3 years and acquiring a lifelong friendship for his adopted people. In 1818 Jolly removed to the other side of the Mississippi and joined the Arkansas band, whose chief he became a few years later on the death of Tollunteskee.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 507, 1900.

Jonatas. A former Chumashan village, tributary to Santa Inez mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Gatschet in Chief Engrs. Rep., pt. III, 553, 1876.

Jonesdih (Jó-ne-a-dih, 'beyond the point.'—Hewitt). A former Seneca village on Allegheny r., nearly opposite Salamanca, N. Y.—Morgan, League Iroq., 466, 1851.

Jones, Peter (Kahkewaquonaby, Kahkewagwonnaby). A mixed-blood Mississauga chief, missionary, and author; born Jan. 1, 1802, died June 29, 1856. His father was a white man of Welsh descent named Augustus Jones, who maintained the closest friendship with Brant during the latter's life. Peter's mother was Tuhbenahneeguay, daughter of Wahbanossay, a chief of the Mississauga on Credit r., at the extreme w. end of L. Ontario, where, on a tract of land known as Burlington heights, Peter and his brother John were born. He remained with his tribe, following their customs and accompanying them on their excursions, until his 16th year, when his father, who was then a government surveyor, had him baptized by Rev. Ralph Leeming, an English Episcopal minister, at the Mohawk church on Grand r., near Brantford, Ont. Having professed religion at a campmeeting held near Ancaster, Ont., and taken an active part in the religious exercises of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, Peter was sent on a missionary tour, in 1827, to L. Simcoe, St. Clair, Muncey, and other points in w. Ontario, although not yet ordained. He had by this time entered upon his literary work, as in this year was published a hymn book translated by him into Chippewa. He was constituted a deacon of the Wesleyan Methodist conference in 1830, and as minister by Rev. George Marsden at the Toronto conference in 1833. The remainder of his life was devoted chiefly to missionary work among the Mississauga and Chippewa, and to some extent among the Iroquois. His position as a Christian pastor and ruling chief of his tribe gave him great influence, not only among his own people, but among all the Chippewa tribes. He visited England and New York, and made repeated journeys to Toronto in the prosecution of his work and in behalf of his people. It was largely through his efforts that the titles of the Credit Indians to their lands were perfected. Although injured to out-door life and of a somewhat robust frame, his constitution began to yield to excessive exposures, resulting in his death, near Brantford, in 1856. A monument was erected to his memory, in 1857, with the inscription: "Erected by the Ojibway and other Indian tribes to their revered and beloved chief, Kahkewaquonaby (the Rev. Peter Jones).” A memorial tablet was placed by his family in the Indian church at the New Credit settlement.

Ryerson (Ojibway Indians, 18, 1861) describes Jones as “a man of athletic frame, as well as of masculine intellect; a man of clear perception, good judgment, great decision of character; a sound preacher, fervent and powerful in his appeals; very well informed on general subjects, extensively acquainted with men and things.” His wife was an English woman, who with 4 sons survived him. His seventh son, Peter E. Jones, who bore his father's name (Kah-ke-wa-quo-na-by), was editor of a periodical, The Indian, published at Hagersville, Ont., in 1885-86.

In addition to the volume of hymns, first printed in 1829, republished in 1836, and in various enlarged editions in later years, Jones translated also into Chipewewa a volume of Additional Hymns (1861), an Ojibway Spelling Book (1828), Part of the New Testament (1829), The First Book of Moses (1835), and Part of the Discipline of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada (1835). He also wrote the Life and Journals of Kah-ke-wa-quo-na-by (Rev. Peter Jones), 1860, and a History of the Ojibway Indians, with Especial Reference to their Conversion to Christianity, 1861. Jonondes (Diionon'dese, ‘at the high mountain’). A former Iroquois village belonging to the Bear clan; location unknown. (J. N. B. H.)

Jonondese.—Hale, Iroquois Book of Rites, 120, 1833. Jonondeseh.—Ibid., 121.

Joquisara. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Cf. Josquigard.

Jore (probably from Ayd'li'yi, ‘little place,’ i. e., ‘little town’; abbreviated Ayd'li). A former Cherokee settlement on Iola cr., an upper branch of Little Tennessee r., N. C. (J. M.)

Iola.—Present map form. Jore.—Bartram, Travels, 371, 372, 1792. Joree.—Doc. of 1755 cited by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 142, 1887.

Joseph. The leader of the Nez Percés in the hostilities of 1877. His mother was a Nez Percé, his father a Cayuse, who received the name Joseph from his teacher, the missionary Spalding, who was with Dr Whitman and who went to the Idaho country in the late thirties of the 19th century. Chief Joseph's native name was Hinmaton-yalatkit (hinmaton, ‘thunder’; yalatkit, ‘coming from the water up over the land.’—Miss McBeth), but both he and his brother Ollicot were often called

Joseph, as if it were a family name. Joseph was a man of fine presence and impressive features, and was one of the most remarkable Indians within the borders of the Union. The treaty of 1863, by which the whites obtained a right to the Wallowa valley, the ancient home of Joseph's band in N. E. Oregon, was not recognized by Joseph and the Indians sympathizing with him, who continued to dwell there in spite of collisions between the Indians and the whites, which became more and more frequent. The matter of removing these Indians to the Lapwai res. in Idaho, after the failure of a commission the previous year, was proceeding to a peaceful settlement when outrageous acts on the part of the white settlers caused the Nez Percés to break loose and attack the settlements. War was declared. After several engagements, in which the whites lost severely, Joseph displayed remarkable generalship in a retreat worthy to be remembered with that of Xenophon's ten thousand (Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 714, 1896). In spite of the fact that in front of him was Col. Miles, behind Gen. Howard, on his flank Col. Sturgis and his Indian scouts, Joseph brought his little band, incommoded with women and children, to within 50 miles of the Canadian border, their objective point, when they were cut off by fresh troops in front and forced to surrender conditionally on Oct. 5, 1877. Not only the conduct of the Nez Percés during this retreat of more than 1,000 miles, but also the military and tactical skill displayed by their leader, won unstinted praise from their conquerors. The promises made to Joseph and his people were ignored, and the Indians, numbering 431, were removed to Ft Leavenworth, Kans., and afterward to Indian Ter., where they remained for several years, always yearning for the mountains and valleys of Idaho. In 1883 a party of 33 women and children were allowed to go back to their old home, and were followed the next year by 118 others. Joseph and the remaining members of his band, however, numbering 150, were not permitted to return to Idaho, but were sent to the Colville res., Wash. He lived to visit President Roosevelt and Gen. Miles at Washington in Mar., 1903, but died at Nespelini, on the Colville res., Wash., Sept. 21, 1904. According to the Indian agent he had become reconciled to civilization in his last years, lending his aid in the education of the children of his tribe, and discouraging gambling and drunkenness.

Josquigard. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Cf. Juquizarra.

Jotars. An unidentified tribe of Texas, mentioned in the Mezières MS. of 1779, together with the Kichai and Nasoni, from whom an epidemic had spread to the Tawakoni, Caddo, and other tribes. The Jotars lived in a locality remote from Nacogdoches, probably toward the N. W.

(H. E. B.)

Jova. A former Opata division inhabiting principally the valley of the stream on which Sahuaripa (lat. 29°, lon. 109°) is situated, in Sonora, Mexico, and extending E. into Chihuahua, to and including the village of Dolores on a s. tributary of Rio Aros. Its members are now completely Mexicanized. The language spoken differed dialectically from the Opata proper and the Eudeve. The Jova settlements were Arivechi, Chamada, Natora, Ponila, Sahuaripa (in part), San Mateo, Malzura, Santa María de los Dolores, Santo Tomas, Satechi (?), Servas, Setasura, and Teopari. (F. W. H.)

Jaba.—Dávila. Sonora Hist., 316, 1894. Joba.—Ibid., 317. Jobal.—Orozco y Berra. Geog., 315, 1864. Jobales.—Ibid. Jova.—Ibid. Ovsa.—Ibid. Sahuaripas.—Ibid.

Joytadachi. Apparently a former village of the Opata in the Sierra de Baserac, one of the N. W. spurs of the Sierra Madre, in N. E. Sonora, Mexico.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 58, 1890.

Joyvan. Mentioned by La Harpe (Marry, Déc., VI, 277, 1886), together with the Quidehais, Naouydiehes, Huanchanés, and others, as a wandering tribe, apparently W. of southern Arkansas in 1719. Unidentified.

Juajona. A former rancharia, probably

Patago, near San Xavier del Bac in S. Arizona; visited by Kino and Mange in 1699.—Mange quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 358, 1889.

Juan Bautista. A Kawia village of the Cabezón division, in San Bernardino co., Cal.—Burton in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 117, 1857.

Juaneños. A Shoshonean division on the California coast, named from San Juan Capistrano mission (q. v.), at which they were principally gathered, extending N. to Alisos cr. and S. to a point between San Onofre and Las Flores crs. Their language forms one group with those of the Luiseños, Kawia, and Aguas Calientes (q. v.). According to Ames (Rep. Mission Inds., 5, 1873) there were only 40 individuals in the neighborhood in 1873; of these most are now dead and the remainder scattered.

Gaitchim.—Gatchet in Rep. Chief of Engrs., pt. 3, 555, 1876. Juaneños.—Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (so called by the Indians and Spaniards). Netala.—Hale, Ethnog. and Philol., 222, 1846 (sig. 'my language').

Judao. The largest of three large Pima rancharias on Gila r., S. Ariz., in the 18th century, now probably known by some other name.—Villa-Sefior, Teatro Am., pt. 2, 404, 1748.

Judosa. A village or community E. of the mouth of Trinity r., Tex., in a region generally controlled by tribes of the Atacapan family in the 17th century.

Juadosa.—Uhde, Länder, 159, 1861. Judosa.—De l'Isle, map (1700) in Winsor, Hist. Am., II, 294, 1886.

Jugelnute. A Kaiyukhotana division on Shageluk and Innoko rs., Alaska; pop. 150 in 1880. It included the villages of Anilukhtakpak, Inselnostlindte, Intenleiden, Khuligichakat, Kuingshtetaktan, Kvigimpainagmute, and Vagitchitchate. Shageluk settlements.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 12, 1884. Inkalit-Ingelaut.—Schott in Erman, Archiv, VII, 480, 1849 (misprint). Jugelnuten.—Holmberg, Ethnog. N. A. Ethnol., I, 26, 1877 (Athapaskan name). Yugelnut.—Zagoskin (1842) quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884.

Juichun. A Costanoan division or village in California, speaking a dialect very similar to that of the Mutsun.—Arroyo de la Cuesta. Idiomas Californias, MS. trans., B. A. E.

Jukiusmo. The Moquelumnan Indians on whose land the San Rafael mission, Cal., was built. Their language was identical with the Chokuyem, and their name may be a distorted form of the same word.

Jouklouamé.—Duflet de Mofras, Expl., II, 391, 1844. Jouklouamé.—Shea, Catholic Miss., 109, 1855. San Rafael Indians.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 195, 1877. Jouklouamé.—Latham in Trans. Philol. Soc. Lond., 82, 1856 (misquoted).

Julianehaab. A Danish colony and Eskimo settlement on a small island, lat. 60° 43', S. Greenland.

Julimeños. A former tribe in N. E. Mexico, probably of the Coahuiltecan linguistic family, which was gathered into the mission of San Francisco Vizarron de los Pausanes, in Coahuila, in 1737.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 303, 1864.

Jumano. A tribe of unknown affinity, first seen, although not mentioned by name, about the beginning of 1536 by Cabeza de Vaca and his companions in the vicinity of the junction of the Conchos with the Rio Grande, or northward to about the s. boundary of New Mexico. They were next visited in 1582 by Antonio de Espejo, who called them Jumanos and Patarabueyes, stating that they numbered 10,000 in five villages along the Rio Grande from the Conchos junction northward for 12 days' journey. Most of their houses were built of sod or earth and grass, with flat roofs; they cultivated maize, beans, calabashes, etc. When visited in 1598 by Juan de Oñate, who called them Rayados on account of their striated faces, a part at least of the Jumano resided in several villages near the Salinas, E. of the Rio Grande, in New Mexico, the four principal ones being called Atripuy, Genobey, Quelotetrey, and Pataotrey. From about 1622 these were administered to by the Franciscan Fray Juan de Salas, missionary at the Tigua pueblo of Isleta, N. Mex. In response to the request of 50 Jumano, who visited Isleta in July, 1629, an independent mission, under the name San Isidore, was established among them in the Salinas, but the main body of the tribe at this time seems to have resided 300 m. E. of Santa Fé, probably on the Arkansas, within the present Kansas, where they were said to be also in 1632. Forty years later there were Jumano 15 leagues E. of the Piro and Tigua villages of the Salinas, not far from Pecos r., who were administered by the priest at Quarai. About this time the Salinas pueblos were abandoned on account of Apache depredations. The Jumano did not participate in the Pueblo rebellion of 1680-92, but before it was quelled, i. e., in Oct., 1683, 200 of the tribe visited the Spaniards at El Paso, to request missionaries, but owing to the unsettled condition of affairs by reason of the revolt in the N., the request was not granted. In the following year friars visited the Jumano in s. Texas, and within this decade they became known to the French under the name Choumans. Various references to them are made during the 18th century, including the perhaps significant statement by Cabello (Informe, 1784, M. cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906) that "the Taguyayazs (Wichita) are known in New Mexico by the name of Jumanes also." As late as the middle of the 19th century they are mentioned in connection with the Kiowa, and again as living near Lampazas, Nuevo Leon, Mexico. The tribal name was once applied to the Wichita mts. in Oklahoma, and it is still preserved in the "Mesa Jumanes" of New Mexico. See Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 268, 1892; Benavides, Memorial (1630), in Land of Sunshine, xiv, 46, 51, 1901; Vetancurt (1693), Teatro Americano, iii, 304, repr. 1871. (F. W. H.)

Aumanes.—Uhde, Länder, 121, 1861 (near Lampazas, N. Leon). Berradas.—Doc. of 1796 quoted by Orozco y Berra, Geog., 882, 1864 'striped', same? Choumanes.—Charlevoix, New France, Shea ed., iv, 78, 1870. Choumanes.—Barcia, Ensayo, 264, 1722. Choumans.—Doc. of 1699 in Margry, Déc., iv, 316, 1880. Choumanes.—Barcia, op. cit., 271. Chouman.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., iii, 299, 1878. Choumanes.—Barcia, op. cit., 283. Choumans.—Douay (ca. 1687) quoted by Shea, Discov., 205, 1862. Choumay.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., iii, 410, 1878. Choumanes.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Junaluska (corruption of Tsunúldhánaki, 'he tries repeatedly, but fails'). A former noted chief of the East Cherokee in North Carolina. In the Creek war of 1813-14 he led a detachment of warriors to the support of Gen. Jackson, and did good service at the bloody battle of the Horseshoe Bend. Having boasted on setting out that he would exterminate the Creeks, he was obliged to confess on his return that some of that tribe were still alive, whence the name jokingly bestowed upon him by his friends. He went west with his people in the removal of 1838, but returned to North Carolina, and as a special recognition of his past services was given citizenship rights and a tract of land at Cheowa, near the present Robinsville, Graham co., N. C., where he died in 1858. See Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 97, 164-5, 1900.

Junatea. A former tribe or village, presumably Costanoan, from which Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal., drew some of its neophytes.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Junetro. A ruined pueblo of the Tewa in Rio Arriba co., N. Mex.—Bandelier in Ritch, N. Mex., 201, 1885. See Tajique.

Juniamua. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Juniata (from Tyu'nanyate, 'projecting rock,' in the Seneca and other Iroquois dialects, a name said to refer to a standing stone to which the Indians paid reverence.—Hewitt). An unidentified tribe that lived at and about the mouth of Juniata r., Pa. Their village, known by the same name, was situated on Duncan id., in the Susquehanna. About 1648 they were the forced auxiliaries of the Conestoga. (J. M.)

Iam-a-Dees.—Writer (ca. 1648) quoted by Froud, Penn., i, 114, 1797. Iotesea.—Map (ca. 1614) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., i, 1856. Johna-dees.—Sanford, U. S., cxlviii, 1819. Junesata.—Brainerd (1745) quoted by Day, Penn., 275, 1843 (the village).

Junotaca. A former rancharia, probably Papago, visited by Kino and Mange in 1699; situated near San Xavier del Bac, in the present s. Arizona.—Mange quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 358, 1889.

Junqueindundeh ('it has a rock.'—Hewitt). A village, probably of the Hurons, situated in 1766 on Sandusky r., Ohio, 24 m. above its mouth.—Smith, Bouquet Exped., 67, 1766.

Junundat ('one hill.'—Hewitt). A Huron village in 1756 on a small creek that empties into a little lake below the mouth of Sandusky r., Seneca co., Ohio.

Ayamantoua.—L. Jonquière (1751) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., x, 240, 1856. Aykontent.—Ibid., vi, 783, 1856. Oauandagoh.—Guy Park conf. Wild., 201, 1841. Wyandot Tewa.—Hutchins, map in Smith, Bouquet Exped., 1766.

Juraken. Two former villages under Iroquois rule, one situated on the right bank of Susquehanna r., just below the fork, at the site of Sunbury, Pa., the other on the left bank of the e. branch of the Susquehanna.—Popple, Nouv. Carte Particulière de l'Amérique [n. d.].

(J. N. B. H.)

Juris. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Jurlanoca. A former village on the Indian trail of n. Florida, 8 m. e. of Alachua. Jefferys (Topog. N. Am., chart, 67, 1762) has here a river joining the St Johns from the s. w.

Jurumpa. Given by Rev. J. Caballeria (Hist. San Bernardino Val., 1902) as a former village, probably Serrano, at Riverside, s. California. The Spanish Rancho Jurupa shows the same name.

Jutan. A Calusa village on the s. w. coast of Florida, about 1570.

Futua.—Fontaneda as quoted by Shipp, De Soto and Fla., 586, 1881 (misprint). Jutua.—Fontaneda Memoir (ca. 1575), Smith trans., 19, 1854.

Juyubit. A former rancharia connected with San Gabriel mission, Los Angeles co., Cal. The locative ending, bit, shows the name to be Serrano rather than Gabrieleño.

Jajubit.—Latham in Proc. Philol. Soc. Lond., vi, 76, 1854. Juyubit.—Dufoit de Molras, Explor., i, 394, 1844.

Kaadnaas-hadai (Q'ā'ad na'as Xadā'-i, 'dogfish house people'). A subdivision of the Yaku-lanas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida, living in s. w. Alaska. The name is probably derived from that of a particular house. (J. R. S.)

K'at naas iha'dā'i.—Boas, 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Canada, 26, 1898. Q'ā'ad na'as Xadā'-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 271, 1906.

Kaake (Qā'āqē). A Salish tribe which formerly occupied the s. e. coast of Valdez id. Brit. Col., and spoke the Comox dialect. It is now extinct.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Kaana. The Corncob clan of the pueblo of Taos, N. Mex.

Kāina-tāina.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1899 (tāina = 'people').

Kaayahunik. A Squawmish village on the w. bank of Squawmish r., Brit. Col.—Brit. Adm. chart, no. 1917.

Kaayu (Ka-ā-yu). A pueblo built, occupied, and abandoned by the Nambe tribe prior to the Spanish advent in the 16th century. Situated with Agawano in the vicinity of the "Santuario," in the mountains about 7 m. e. of the Rio Grande, on Rio Santa Cruz, Santa Fé co., N. Mex.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 84, 1892.

Kabashes ('sturgeon'). A gens of the Abnaki.

Kā-bāh'-seh.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 174, 1877. Kabasa.—J. Dyneley Prince, inf'n, 1906 (modern St Francis Abnaki form).

Kabayo. A tribe or village formerly in the country lying between Matagorda bay and Maligne (Colorado) r., Tex. Joutel in 1687 obtained the name from the Ebahamo Indians, who were probably closely affiliated to Karankawan tribes living in this region. They are probably identical with the Cabia of Manzanet. See Joutel in French, Hist. Coll. La., i,

137, 152, 1846, and in Margry, Déc., III, 288, 1878; Gatschet, Karankawa Indians, 23, 25, 1891. Cf. Kiabaha. (A. C. F.)

Oabaia.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723. Oabia.—Massenet (1690), MS., cited by Bolton, inf'n, 1906. Kabayas.—Joutel, Jour. Voy., 90, 1719.

Kachegaret. A Kaviagmiut village at Port Clarence, Alaska.—11th Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Kachgiya ('the raven'). A Knaiakhotana division residing on Cook inlet, Alaska.—Richardson, Arctic Exped., I, 406, 1851.

Kachina. A term applied by the Hopi to "supernatural beings impersonated by men wearing masks or by statuettes in imitation of the same"; also to the dances in which these masks figure. See Masks. Consult Fewkes (1) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 25, 1897; (2) 21st Rep. B. A. E., 3, 1903; Voth in various pubs. Field Columbian Museum.

Kachina. The Sacred Dancer phratry of the Hopi, comprising the Kachina, Gyazru (Paroquet) Angwusi (Raven), Sikyachi (Yellow bird), Tawamana (Black bird), Salabi (Spruce), and Suhubi (Cottonwood) clans. They claim to have come from the Rio Grande, but lived for some time near the now ruined pueblo of Sikyatki.

Ka-tai'-na.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891 (tc = ch). Ka-tai'-na nyi-má.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., VII, 404, 1894 (nyi-má = 'phratry').

Kachina. The name of two distinct Sacred Dancer clans of the Hopi, one belonging to the Kachina, the other to the Honani (Badger) phratry. The Tewa pueblo of Hano has a similar clan.

Kachina-towa.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., IX, 351, 1896 (Tewa name: towa = 'people'). Ka-tai'-na.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891. Katoina wiiwá.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 544, 1900 (wiiwá = 'clan'). Ka-tai'-na wiiw-wii.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., VII, 404, 1894.

Kachinba ('sacred-dancer spring'). A small ruin at a spring 6 m. from Sikyatki and about E. of Walpi pueblo, N. E. Arizona. It was one of the stopping places of the Kachina clan of the Hopi, whence the name.—Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 589, 1898.

Kachisupal. A former Chumashan village connected with Purisima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Kachnawaacharege. A former fishing station of the Onondaga, situated W. of Oneida lake. At this place Col. Schuyler held a conference with the Onondaga chiefs, Apr. 25, 1700. (J. N. B. H.)

Kachnawaacharege.—Doc. of 1700 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IV, 657, 1854. Kachnawarage.—Ibid., 799. Kagnawarage.—Ibid., 805.

Kachyayakuch (Katc-ya-yá'-kuc). A former Chumashan village at Alazumita, near San Buenaventura, Ventura co., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Kadadjans (Q'adadjá'ns, said to be applied to a person who gets angry with another and talks of him behind his back; a backbiter). A town of the Hagilanas of the Haida, on the N. W. end of Anthony id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., on which also stood the town of Nin-stints.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Kadakaman. A Laimon tribe or band that lived between the old missions of San Fernando and Santa Rosalia Mulege, Lower California.—Taylor in Browne, Res. Pac. Slope, app., 54, 1869. See San Ignacio de Kadakaman.

Kadishan's Village. A summer settlement of a Stikine chief named Katishan, on Stikiner., Alaska; 27 people were there in 1880.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Kadohadacho (Ká'dohadá'cho, 'real Caddo,' 'Caddo proper'). A tribe of the Caddo confederacy, sometimes confused with the confederacy itself. Their dialect is closely allied to that of the Hainai and Anadarko, and is one of the two dialects dominant to-day among the remnant of the confederacy.

The Kadohadacho seem to have developed, as a tribe, on Red r. of Louisiana and in its immediate vicinity, and not to have migrated with their kindred to any distance either N. or S. Their first knowledge of the white race was in 1541, when De Soto and his followers stayed with some of the subtribes on Washita r. and near the Mississippi. The Spaniards never penetrated during the 16th and 17th centuries to their villages in the lake region of N. W. Louisiana, but the people came in contact with Spanish soldiers and settlers from the W. by joining the war parties of other tribes. Various articles of European manufacture were brought home as trophies of war. The tribe was not unfamiliar with horses, but had not come into possession of firearms when the survivors of La Salle's party visited them on their way N. in 1687. For nearly two years La Salle had previous direct relations with tribes of the Caddo confederacy who were living in what is now Texas, so that when the approach of the French was reported the visitors were regarded as friends rather than as strangers. The chief of the Kadohadacho, with his warriors, taking the calumet, went a league to meet the travelers, and escorted them with marks of honor to the village on Red r. On arrival, "the women," says Douay, "as is their wont, washed our heads and feet in warm water and then placed us on a platform covered with very neat white mats. Then followed banquets, the calumet dance, and other rejoicing day and night." The friendly relations then begun with the French were never abandoned. A trading post was established and a flour mill built at their village by the French early in the 18th century, but both were given up in a few years owing to the unsettled state of affairs between the Spaniards and the French. These disturbances, added to the enmity of tribes who were being pushed from their homes by the increasing number of white settlers, together with the introduction of new diseases, particularly smallpox and measles, brought about much distress and a great reduction in the population. During the last quarter of the 18th century the Kadohadacho abandoned their villages in the vicinity of the lakes in n.w. Louisiana, descended the river, and settled not far from their kindred, the Nachitoches. By the beginning of the 19th century their importance as a distinct tribe was at an end; the people became merged with the other tribes of the confederacy and shared their misfortune. In customs and ceremonies they resembled the other Caddo tribes.

The tribes of the Caddo confederacy, including the Kadohadacho, have 10 clans, according to Mooney, viz.: Suko (Sun), Kagahanin (Thunder), Iwi (Eagle), Kishi (Panther), Oat (Raccoon), Tao (Beaver), Kagraih (Crow), Nawotsi (Bear), Tasha (Wolf), Tanaha (Buffalo). The Buffalo clan was sometimes called Koho (Alligator), "because both animals bellow in the same way." The members of a group did not kill the animal from which the group took its name, except the eagle, whose feathers were necessary for regalia and in sacred ceremonies; but the bird was killed only by certain men initiated to perform this ceremonial act. The rituals and songs attending the rite of preparation for the killing of eagles have passed away with their last keeper, and the people have now to depend on other tribes for the needed feathers (see Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1093, 1896).

Kadusgo (Q'á'dasgo). A Haida town or camp on Louise id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col., at the mouth of a creek bearing the same name, which flows into Cumshewa inlet from the s. The family which occupied it came to be called Kadusgo-kegawai ('those born at Kadusgo').—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Kadusgo-kegawai (Q'á'dasgo qé'gawa-i, 'those born at Kadusgo creek'). A family belonging to the Raven clan of the Haida, residing in the town of Kloo, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. The name was derived from that of an old camping place on the n. side of Louise id., and the people claimed descent from the Hlgahetgu-lanas of Old Gold Harbor; but until recent years they occupied a low position socially. At present they form one of the most numerous of the surviving family groups of the tribe. (J. R. S.) K'-adas ke'-owai.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Canada, 25, 1898. Q'á'dasgo qé'gawa-i.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 269, 1905.

Kae (Qá'-i, 'sea-lion town'). A former Haida town on Skotagai bay, above Skidegate, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Kaiahl-lanas, who took their name from the place before they moved to Kaisun. (J. R. S.)

Kaekibi. A traditionary pueblo of the Asa people of the Hopi, who were of Tewa origin; situated on the Rio Chama, N. Mex., near the present Abiquiu. —Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 30, 1891.

Kaersok. An Eskimo village and trading post in w. Greenland, lat. 72° 39'. —Meddelelser om Grönland, VIII, map, 1889.

Kaffetalaya (Kaf-talaia, 'sa:safra thicket'). A former Choctaw town on Owl cr., Neshoba co., Miss. The name was extended to cover a large district in that territory. —Halbert in Miss. Hist. Soc. Pub., VI, 427, 1902.

Kafetalaya. —Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 108, 1884. Koffadeliah. —West Florida map, ca. 1776.

Kafitalaya. —Romans, Florida, map, 1776.

Kagahanin (Ka'gāhānīn). The Thunder clan of the Caddo. —Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1093, 1896.

Kagaih (Ka'gāih). The Crow clan of the Caddo. —Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1093, 1896.

Kagakwisuwug (Kāgā'kwisuwug), 'they go by the name of pigeon-hawk'. A Thunder gens of the Sauk and Foxes.

Kāgā'kwisuwug. —Wm. Jones, Infn., 1908. Kā-kā-kwis'-se-uk. —Morgan, Anc. Soc., 170, 1877.

Kaganhittan ('sun-house people'). Given by Boas as a social group of the Tlingit at Wrangell, Alaska, but it is actually only the name of the people of a house belonging to the Kiksadi, q. v. Gāgī'nhittā. —Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Kagan hit tan. —Boas, 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes of Can., 25, 1889.

Kagials-kegawai (Qā'gials qē'gawa-i, 'those born at Kagials'). An important family of the Raven clan of the Haida, which derives its name from a reef near Lawn hill, at the mouth of Skidegate inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., where some of the people formerly lived. A second name was hē'qē'not-lā'naa, 'people of [the town of] Cumshewa', whence one portion of the Kagials-kegawai is said to have moved. Their own town was Skedans, and their chief was one of the most influential on the islands. Subdivisions of the family were the Kils-haidagai and Kogaahl-lanas, the latter being of low social rank. The Kagials-kegawai claim to have sprung from a woman who floated ashore at Hot Springs id. in a cockleshell. They were closely connected with the Tadjī-lanas, who appear to have originated in the same locality. (J. R. S.)

Kāgīyalā'owai. —Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 24, 1898. Qē'not-lā'naa. —Swanton, Cont. Haida, 269, 1905. Qā'gials qē'gawa-i. —Ibid. Tli-t-noti-lā'naa. —Boas, op. cit.

A division of the Paiute, numbering 171 in 1873, when they were in the vicinity of Kanab, s. w. l'tah. Powell gave their name to the Kaibab plateau, n. w. Ariz. In 1903 their number was given as 140, of which 30 were at Cedar City, Utah, and 110 under a special agent. In 1905 there were 109 reported, not under an agent.

Kai-bab-bit.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 251, 1877. Kaibabita.—Ingalls in H. R. Ex. Doc. 66, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 2, 1873. Kaivavwit.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874. Kai-vvav-nai Nu-inta.—Sen. Ex. Doc. 42, 43d Cong., 1st sess., 15, 1874.

Kaidatoiabie (Kai-da-toi-ab-ie). A Paviotso tribe of 6 bands formerly living in N. E. Nevada; pop. 425 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 52, 1874.

Kaidju. A Haida town in Hewlett bay, on the E. coast of Moresby id., Queen Charlotte ids. Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Kas-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Kaidjudal (Qai'djudal). A former Haida town on Moresby id., opposite Hot Spring id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Huldanggats.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Kaidju-kegawai (Qai'dju qe'gawa-i, 'those born at Songs-of-victory town'). A subdivision of the Tadjilanas, a family belonging to the Gunghet-haidagai (Nintists people) of the Haida of British Columbia.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 269, 1905.

Kaigani (K'aigā'ni). A division of the Haida, living in Alaska. Their name is derived from that of a camping place or summer settlement where they were accustomed to assemble to meet incoming vessels and to trade with the whites. The Kaigani emigrated from the N. W. end of Queen Charlotte ids. between 150 and 200 years ago, drove the Tlingit (Koluschan) from the S. end of Prince of Wales id., and took possession of their towns. The most important of these settlements were Sukwan, Klinkwan, Howkan, and Kasaan, which bear their old Tlingit names. The last three are still inhabited. Like many Tlingit tribes, but unlike other Haida, the Kaigani subdivisions often took their names from the name given to some individual house. About 1840 the population was estimated at 1,735. According to Petroff's report (10th Census, Alaska) they numbered 788 in 1880; in 1890 the population was given as 391. Their present number probably does not exceed 300. (J. R. S.)

Kaiganies.—Halleck (1869) in Morris, Resources of Alaska, 67, 1879. Kaigan.—Terry in Rep. Sec. War, i, 40, 1868-69. Kaigani.—Dawson, Queen Charlotte Ids., 104B, 1880. Kegani.—Dunn, Hist. Oregon, 281, 1844. Kiganis.—Dufort de Mofras, Oregon, i, 335, 336, 1844. Kiganes.—Ludewig, Aborig. Lang. America, 157, 1860. Kiganes.—Am. Pioneer, ii, 189, 1843. Kygan.—Dall in Proc. A. A. S., 269, 1869. Kyganies.—Scouler in Jour. Geog. Soc.

Lond., i, 219, 1841. Kygan.—Gibbs after Anderson in Hist. Mag., 74, 1863. Kygaroy.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 489, 1856 (after Work, 1836-41). Kygarney.—Kane, Wand. N. A., app., 1859 (after Work, 1836-41).

Kaigani. An important Haida summer town or camping place at the S. E. end of Dall id., S. W. Alaska. Most of the families which moved from the Queen Charlotte ids. formerly gathered here to meet trading vessels, for which reason they came to be known to the whites as Kaigani. The dominant family in this town is said to have been the Yakulanas. (J. R. S.)

Kaigwa (Kiowa proper). The oldest tribal division of the Kiowa, from which the tribe derives its name. To it belongs the keeping of the medicine tipi, in which is the grand medicine of the tribe.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1079, 1896.

Kaihatin ('willow'). A clan or band of the Coyotero and also of the Pinaleno Apache at San Carlos and Ft Apache agencies, Ariz.; coordinate with the Kai clan of the Navaho.

Kaijatin.—Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 112, 1890. Kay-tan-lia.—Ibid.

Kaihl-lanas (Qai-tl lā'nas). A subdivision of the Doetlan-lagai, a family group of the Haida, named from a camping place on the W. coast of Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. (J. R. S.)

Kailaidshi. A former Upper Creek town in the central district, on a creek of the same name, which joins Oakjoy cr., a W. tributary of Tallapoosa r., probably in the N. W. part of the present Elmore co., Ala. Atchinahatchi and Hatchichapa were dependent villages of this town, the name of which probably has reference to a warrior's head-dress. (A. S. G.)

Kailcedjee.—Robin, Voy., ii, map, 1807. Kailcees.—Woodward, Reminiscences, 83, 1850. Ka-ikidahi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 133, 1884. Kailees.—U. S. Ind. Treat. S., 1784 (probably identical). Pialages.—Weatherford (1793) in Am. State Pap., Ind. Aff., i, 336, 1832.

Kailaidshi. A town of the Creek Nation on Canadian r., E. of Hilabi, Okla. Ka-ila'idahi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., ii, 185, 1888.

Kaime (Kai-me'). A Pomo tribe occupying Russian r. valley, Cal., from Cloverdale to Geyserville.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 183, 1877.

Kainah (Ah-kai-nah, 'many chiefs', from a-kai-im 'many', ni'-nah 'chiefs'). A division of the Siksiika (q. v.), or Blackfeet, now living on a reservation under the Blood agency in Alberta, Canada, between Belly and St Mary rs. The subtribes or bands are Ahkaiksumika, Ahkaipokaka, Ahkotashika, Ahkwonists, Anepo, Apikaiyika, Aputosikainah, Inuhksivistamika, Isisokasimika, Istai-kainah, Mameoya, Nitiksikika, Saksinah-mahyika, Siksahpunika, and Siksinnokaka. According to the Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1858, there were then 300 tipis and 2,400 persons. In 1904 there were 1,198 persons on the reservation, of whom 958 were classed as pagans.

Bloods.—Hind, Red R. Exped., 157, 1860 (so called by half-breeds). Blood Indians.—Writer of 1786 in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., III, 24, 1794. Blood People.—Morgan, Conang. and Affin., 289, 1871. Blut Indianer.—Walch, map, 1805 (German form). Ede-but-say.—Anon. Crow MS. vocab., B. A. E. (Crow name). Gens du Sang.—Duffot de Mofras, Expl., II, 342, 1844. Indians du Sang.—Ibid., 339. Kainas.—Maximilian, Travels, 245, 1843. Kahna.—Ibid. Kai'-e-na.—Hayden, Ethnol. and Philol. Polar Sea, I, 170, 1824 (own name). Kam'-ne.—Hayden, op. cit., 402 (Crow name). Ke'-na.—Hale, Ethnol. and Philol., 219, 1846 (sing.). Keneku'n.—Ki-na.—Morgan, Conang. and Affin., 289, 1871 (trans.: 'high minded people'). Kine-ne-ai-keea.—Henry, MS. vocab., 1808. Ki'-no.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 171, 1877. Meethes-thinyowwe.—Franklin, Journ. Polar Sea, I, 170, 1824. We'-wi-sa-sa.—Cook, Yankton MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882 (Yankton name).

Kaisun (Qai'sun). A former Haida town on the n. w. coast of Moresby id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It belonged to the Kaihl-lanas, who settled there after moving from Skidegate inlet, but before that time the Kas-lanas are said to have occupied it. By the whites Kaisun was sometimes called Gold Harbor, or, to distinguish it from the town afterward built on Maude id. by the west-coast people, Old Gold Harbor; but this term is properly applicable to Skaito, a campon Gold Harbor, itself occupied by Haida from all parts of the Queen Charlotte ids. during the time of the gold excitement. Kaisun is the Kish-awin of John Work's list, which was accredited by him with 18 houses and 329 people in 1836-41. Since the old people can still remember 17 houses, Work's figures would appear to be trustworthy. The few survivors of Kaisun now live at Skidegate. (J. R. S.)

Kaiwanungavidukw (Kai-va-nung-av'-i-duk-w.) A band of the Pavlotsko, popularly called Paiute, formerly living in Surprise valley, n. e. Cal.—Powell, Pavlotsko MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Kaiyan ('head'). A name applied by all the Pomo about Clear lake to those living about the n. end of the lake, in Upper Lake and Bachelor valleys, Lake co., Cal. (S. A. B.)

Kaiyuhkhotana. The westernmost Athapaskan tribe of Alaska, living on the banks of Yukon r. between Anvik and Koyukuk rs. They have been supplanted in the w. part of their old habitat by Eskimo. Since hostilities between them and the Eskimo have ceased they have become assimilated with the latter, adopting a fish diet and differing from all their congeners in acquiring a liking for oil. The tribe is distinguished from its neighbors also by its language, they being unable to converse with the Kutchin. The southernmost settlements subsist principally by fishing and trading. They dry fish and are very expert in making wooden ware and strong birch canoes. Those of upper Yukon, Shageluk, and Kusko-kwim rs. combine hunting with these pursuits. The Kaiyuhkhotana build permanent villages which they sometimes leave during the summer. The pointed hunting shirts formerly worn have been largely replaced by the clothing of the whites. They do not appear to have adopted a totemic system, and follow the Eskimo custom of giving elaborate feasts. Zagoskin in 1844 estimated their population at 923. Petroff (10th Census, Alaska, 1884) gave their number as 805 on the Yukon and 148 on the Kuskokwim. Allen (Report on Alaska, 1887) gave the population as about 1,300. The 11th Census (1880, 1893) gives the population of the Yukon district as 753 and of the Kuskokwim as 386; total, 1,139. The following are Kaiyuhkhotana villages, exclusive of those of the Jugelnute division: Anvik, Chagvagchat, Chiniik, Iktigalik, Innoka, Ivan, Kagokakat, Kaiakak, Kaltag, Khaigamute, Khogolinde, Khulikakat, Khunanilinde, Klamaskwaltin, Koserefski, Kunkhogliak, Kutul, Lofka, Nulato, Nunakhtagmut, Palchikakno, Taguta, Tanakot, Terentief, Tigshelde, Tutago, Ulukakhotana, and Wolasatux. The local divisions were Ingalik, Inkaliich, Jugelnute, Kaiyuhkhotana, Nulato, Takaiak, Tlegonkhotana, Taiyanyanokhotana, and Ulukakhotana. Dan.—Pettit, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 361, 1891. Ingalik.—Dall in Proc. Am. A. S., xviii, 270, 1870. Kayah-Khatana.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 133, 1874. Kaiyuhkhotana.—Ibid., 148, 1882. Kaiyuhkhotana.—Dall, Alaska, 431, 1870. Kaiyuhkhotana.—Allen, Rep., 143, 1887. Kpauyou-Kout-tana.—Pettit, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 361, 1891 ('people of the willows'). Lowlanders.—Dall in Proc. Am. A. S., xviii, 270, 1870.

Kaiyuhkhotana. A division of the Kaiyuhkhotana, living on Kaiyuh r. Their village was Kutul.

Kainkhotana.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 161, 1894 (misprint). Kaiyuk'-a-kho-tan'-a.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 26, 1877.

Kaiyawuntsunithai ('rocky land'). A former Kuitsh village on lower Umpqua r., Oreg.

Kai'-ya-wun-tu'-u'-ait'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 231, 1890.

Kajechadi. (Kā-jēch-adī). Given by Krause (Tlinkit-Ind., 116, 1885) as a Tlingit division living in the town of Chilkoot, Alaska. Unidentified.

Kajienatroene ('eagle people'.—Hewitt). One of the 6 "castles" of the Ottawa near Michilimackinac, Mich., in 1723.—Albany conf. (1723) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 693, 1855.

Kaka ('crows'). A band or society of the Arikara.

Culbertson in Smithsonian Rep. 1850, 143, 1861. Ka-ka'.—Hayden, Ethnol. and Philol., 357, 1862.

Kakaghe (Kā-kāg'-she, 'crow'). A gens of the Potawatomi.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 167, 1877.

Kakake (Kakāke, 'crow'). A subphratry or gens of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., pt. i, 42, 1896.

Kakake. Given as the Pigeon-hawk gens of the Chippewa, but really the Raven (Kagigi) gens of that tribe.

Kagagi.—Win. Jones, inf'n, 1906. Ka-kalk.—Tanner, Narr., 314, 1880 ('hen hawk'). Ka-kake'.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 166, 1877 ('pigeon hawk').

Kakanatzia. A former village of the Sia (q. v.), opposite the present Sia pueblo, on Jemez r., n. central N. Mex. According to Sia tradition, war broke out between the inhabitants of this village and those of Kohasaya, the former being driven southward by an attempt of the latter to burn their pueblo, the Kohasaya afterward moving to the site of Sia. It is not improbable that one of the two pueblos mentioned was occupied at the time of Espejo's visit in 1583, and thus formed one of the villages of his province of Puname.

Ka-kan A-tsa Tia.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 196, 1892.

Kakapoya ('inside fat'.—Morgan). Given as a division of the Piegan tribe of the Siksika. Perhaps the same as Inuk-sikahkopwaiks, q. v.

Inside Fat.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 171, 1877. Ka-ka'-po-ya.—Ibid.

Kakawatilikya (Qā'qawatilik'a). A gens of the Tsawatenok, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 331, 1897.

Kake. A Tlingit tribe on Kupreanof id., Alaska. The designation is often extended to include the people of Kuia and Sumdum (q. v.). Their winter village is Kake, near Hamilton harbor. Pop., including probably the Kuia people, 234 in 1890. Their social divisions are

Kahlchanedi (extinct), Katchadi, Nesadi, Sakutenedi, Shunkukedi, Tsaguedi, Tenedi, and Was-binedi. (J. R. S.)

Kakes.—Seward, Speeches on Alaska, 5, 1869. Kakes.—Crosbie in H. R. Ex. Doc. 77, 36th Cong., 1st sess., 8, 1860. Kake.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1869. Kakas.—Hallock in Rep. Sec. War, pt. 1, 38, 1868. Kates.—Colyer (Louthan) in Ind. Aff. Rep., 573, 1870. Kaykovakie.—Elliot, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 227, 1875 (transliterated from Veniaminoff). Kakh.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 32, 1894. Kahona.—Scott in Ind. Aff. Rep., 313, 1868 (name on Russian charts). Kak.—Tikhmenieff, Russ. Am. Co., ii, 341, 1863. Kākeh-kā.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 120, 1885. Kekuvakie.—Veniaminoff, Zapiski, ii, pt. 3, 30, 1840. Kāgi.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904. Kākhku.—Holmberg, Ethnol. Skizz., map, 1855. Kyaaka.—Scott in Ind. Aff. Rep., 314, 1868. Kat tribe.—Mahony (1869) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 68, 41st Cong., 2d sess., 20, 1870.

Kake. The modern name of the village of the Kake Indians on the n. w. coast of Kupreanof id., Alaska; pop. 234 in 1890. Kāgi.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904. Kākhwan.—Petroff in Tenth Census, Alaska, 32, 1894. S'ikakaxā'ni.—Swanton, op. cit. (said to be proper name of the town, perhaps meaning 'from a black bear town').

Kakega.—Dorsey (after Cleveland) in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 219, 1897. Kakega.—Ibid.

Kakekt (Kā'ekt). An extinct Salish tribe which formerly lived at C. Lazo, n. coast of Vancouver id., and spoke the Comox dialect.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Kakhan. The Wolf clan of the Keresan pueblo of Laguna, N. Mex. It claims to have come originally from Sandia.

Ka-kna.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 298, 1890 (given as name of the wolf fetish). Kākhah-bahā'.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 352, 1896 (hanoch = 'people').

Kakhmiontowan ('village at the bend'). A division of the Sisseton Sioux.

Kahmi-atonwan.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 217, 1897. Kahmi-atonwa'.—Ibid.

Kakhtshanwaish. A former Alsea village on the n. side of Alsea r., Oreg.

Kāq-toa'-waish'.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 280, 1890.

Kakiek. According to Coxe a tribe formerly on an island of the same name in Tennessee r., above the Chickasaw; possibly Creek. See Ochali.

Kakiek.—Coxe, Carolina, map, 1741. Kakigua.—Ibid., 14.

Kakinonba. A tribe mentioned by several early French writers about the close of the 18th century as living apparently on Tennessee or Cumberland r., although the exact locality and the relationship of the tribe can not be determined. Marquette's map places them n. of the Mississippi, about the region of Kentucky, in 1674. The Senex map of 1710 locates them along the middle of Tennessee r. St Cosme speaks of them as in s. Illinois in 1690. Tennessee r. was called Casquin-ambeaux, Casquinampo, and Kaskinenpo by early French explorers.

Kakinonpas.—Sauvole (1701) in French, Hist. Coll. Ia., iii, 238, 1851. Caskinampo.—Senex, map of N. Am., 1710. Kakinonba.—Marquette's map (ca. 1674) in Shea, Discov. Miss., 1862. Kakinonpala.—

St Cosme (1699) in Shea, Early Voy., 60, 1861. Kasquinaipe.—Tonté (ca. 1690) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 82, 1846.

Kakuak. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on Kuskokwim r., Alaska; pop. 8 in 1880.

Kakhiyagamiute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 17, 1884.

Kalanunyi (Ká'lanúñ'yi, 'raven place'). One of the five districts or 'towns' which Col. William H. Thomas, in his capacity of agent for the Eastern Cherokee, laid off on the E. Cherokee res., in Swain and Jackson cos., N. C., after the removal of the rest of the tribe to Indian Ter. in 1838. The name is still retained. (J. M.)

Rig Cove.—Mooney in 19th Rep., B. A. E., 161, 524, 1900. Ká'lanúñ'yi.—Ibid. (Cherokee name: 'Raven place'). Raventown.—Ibid.

Kalapooian Family. A group of tribes formerly occupying the valley of Willamette r., N. w. Oreg., and speaking a distinct stock language (see Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 81, 1891). Little is known of their history, but they seem to have confined themselves to the territory mentioned, except in the case of one tribe, the Yonkalla, which pushed southward to the valley of the Umpqua. The earliest accounts describe a numerous population in Willamette valley, which is one of the most fertile in the N. W.; but the Kalapooian tribes appear to have suffered severe losses by epidemic disease about 1824, and since that time they have been numerically weak. They are also described as being indolent and sluggish in character, yet they seem to have been able to hold their territory against the attempts of surrounding tribes to dispossess them. They were at constant war with the coast peoples and also suffered much at the hands of the white pioneers. Game, in which the country abounded, and roots of various kinds constituted their chief food supply. Unlike most of the Indians of that region they did not depend on salmon, which are unable to ascend the Willamette above the falls, and at which point the Kalapooian territory ended. Of the general customs of the group there is little information. Slavery existed in a modified form, marriage was by purchase and was accompanied by certain curious ceremonies (Gatschet in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, XII, 212, 1899), and flattening of the head by fronto-occipital pressure was practised. The language is sonorous, the verb excessively complex, few prefixes being used, and the words are distinguished by consonantal endings.

By treaty of Calapooia cr., Oreg., Nov. 29, 1854, the Umpqua and Kalapooian tribes of Umpqua valley ceded their lands to the United States, the tract, however, to constitute a reserve for these and other tribes, unless the President should decide to locate them elsewhere. This removal was effected, and the entire tract was regarded as ceded. By treaty at Dayton, Oreg., Jan. 22, 1855, the Calapooia and confederated bands of Willamette valley ceded the entire drainage area of Willamette r., the Grande Ronde res. being set aside for them and other bands by Executive order of June 30, 1857. By agreement June 27, 1901, confirmed Apr. 21, 1904, the Indians of Grande Ronde res. ceded all the unallotted lands of said reservation. The Kalapooian bands at Grande Ronde numbered 351 in 1880, 164 in 1890, 130 in 1905. There are also a few representatives of the stock under the Siletz agency.

It is probable that in early times the tribes and divisions of this family were more numerous, but the following are the chief ones of which there is definite information: Ahantchuyuk or Pudding River, Atfalati or Tualati, Calapooya, Chelamela, Chepenafa, Lakmiut, Santiam, Yamel, and Yonkalla.

The following are presumed to be Kalapooian tribes or bands, but have not been fully identified: Chemapho, Chemeketas, Chillychandize, Laptambif, Leeshtelosh, Peeyon, Shehees, Shookany, and Winnefelly. Kalindarak (kalin 'ocean', ta 'at', ruk 'houses',—Kroeber). A village near the mouth of Salinas r., Cal. The name has been used, whether or not with justification, to designate the group of Indians inhabiting the villages on lower Pajaro r., and between it and the Salinas, near the coast. Indians from this area were taken both to San Carlos and to San Juan Bautista missions. Among the villages attributed to this region are Alcoz, Animpayamo, Kapanai, Kulul, Lukaiasta, Mustak, Nutnur, Paisin, Poitokwis, Tiubta, and Ymunakam.

Kalispel (popularly known as Pend d'Oreilles, 'ear drops'). A Salish tribe around the lake and along the river of the same name in the extreme n. part of Idaho and n. e. Washington. Gibbs divided them into the Kalispelms or Pend d'Oreilles of the Lower Lake and the Sika-tkml-schi or Pend d'Oreilles of the Upper Lake, and according to Dr Dart the former numbered 620 in 1851, the latter 480 (Pac. R. R. Rep. I, 415, 1855). McVickar (Hist. Exped. Lewis and Clark, II, 386, note, 1842) made three divisions: Upper Pend d'Oreilles, Lower Pend d'Oreilles, and Micksucksealton. Lewis and Clark estimated their number at 1,600 in 30 lodges in 1805. In 1905 there were 640 Upper Pend d'Oreilles and 197 Kalispel under the Flathead agency, Mont., and 98 Kalispel under the Colville agency, Wash.

The subdivisions, being seldom referred to, are disregarded in the synonymy.

Kalopaling (pl. Kalopalit). A merman of Eskimo mythology; also called Mitiiling ('with eider ducks'). He wears a jacket of eider-duck skins spotted with their black heads, and into the enormous hood he puts drowned hunters when kaiaks capsize. His feet are as big as sealskin floats. The Central Eskimo believe that once there were many Kalopalit, while now only few are left, but they imagine that they still see one occasionally swimming far out at sea and splashing the water with his legs and arms, or basking on a rock, or sitting in winter on the edge of a floe. They are supposed to delight in overturning kaiaks, and hunters tell stories of stealing up to Kalopalit while they lie asleep on the water and killing them with walrus harpoons, but one must shut his eyes as he makes the cast, else the Kalopaling will overset the kaiak and drown all on board. The flesh of the Kalopalit is said to be poisonous, but it can be fed to dogs.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 620, 1888.

Koltog.—Whymper, Alaska, 190, 1869. Kahltag.—Raymond in Sen. Ex. Doc. 12, 42d Cong., 1st sess., 25, 1871. Kaltag.—Dall, Alaska, 41, 1870. K-kaltat.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 87, 1884. Kkhalat.—Tikhmenief (1861) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902.

Kaltat. A Koyukukhotana village on an island in Yukon r., not far from its junction with Koyukuk r., Alaska; pop. 9 in 1842.

Khaltat's village.—Allen, Rep. on Alaska, 110, 1887. K-khaltat.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 87, 1884.

Kaluplo (Ka'-lu-plo.) A former Nishinam village in the valley of Bear r., Cal.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 316, 1877.

Kamaiaikan (Kama'ākan). The principal chief of the Yakima and confederate tribes of w. Washington under the treaty of 1855, and leader in the war which began a few months later and continued for 3 years. He appears to have been himself a Yakima. In consequence of the heavy immigration to Oregon and the discovery of gold in the Colville and Cœur d'Alène country of n. w. Washington and adjacent Idaho, in the spring of 1855, Gov. Stevens, of Washington, was instructed to negotiate treaties for cession of territory with the various tribes of the region, with the purpose of limiting them to reservations. Led by Kamaiaikan the Indians offered strong opposition to any arrangement which would deprive them of any portion of the lands or allow right of way to the whites. After considerable difficulty treaties were made with a number of the tribes, largely through the assistance of a majority of the Nez Percés, but it soon became evident that practically the entire body of the Cayuse, Yakima, Wallawalla, Palcos, Spokane, and others were bitterly opposed to removal from their homes or confinement to reservations. In the meantime, although the treaties were not yet ratified and no time had been designated for the removal, settlers and miners began to overrun the Indian lands and collisions became frequent. In Sept., 1855, the war began with the killing of special agent Schon while on his way to arrange a conference with Kamaiaikan, who now publicly declared his intention to keep all whites out of the upper country by force and to make war also on any tribe refusing to join him. The first regular engagement occurred, Oct. 4 and 5, on the southern edge of Simcoe valley, between a detachment of 84 regulars under Maj. Haller and a large force of Indians led by Kamaiaikan himself. The troops were finally obliged to retire, although the Indian loss was thought to be the greater.

By this time it was believed that 1,500 hostiles were in the field, and the rising now spread to the tribes in w. Washington as well as among those of s. Oregon, and even including some of the coast Indians of s. Alaska. The principal leader in w. Washington was Leechi (q. v.). In Sept., 1856, another conference was held near Wallawalla with some of the chiefs, but to no purpose, Kamaiaikan refusing to attend and those present refusing all terms except the evacuation of the territory by the whites. The war went on, with numerous raids, murders, and small engagements by regulars and volunteers. In the next year, 1857, the rising was brought under control w. of the Cascade mts., several of the leaders being hanged. An incident of the war in this quarter was a determined attack on Seattle, Jan. 25, 1856, which was repulsed by a naval force stationed in the harbor at the time.

On May 17, 1858, a strong force of dragoons under Col. Steptoe was defeated a few miles from the present site of Colfax, n. w. Washington, by a combined force of Palcos, Spokane, and Skitawish (Cœur d'Alènes), but a few months later the war was brought to a close by two decisive defeats inflicted by Col. George Wright, with more than 700 cavalry, infantry, and artillery, on the main body of the hostiles led by Kamaiaikan himself. The engagements took place Sept. 1 and 5 near Four Lakes, on a s. tributary of Spokane r. Besides the killed and wounded, the Indians lost 800 horses, having already lost large quantities of winter supplies, and burned their own village to save it from capture. Kamaiaikan was among the wounded. On the 17th Wright dictated terms to the hostiles at a conference near Cœur d'Alène mission. The defeated Indians, being no longer capable of resistance, were treated with great severity, 24 of the leading chiefs of the various tribes being either hanged or shot. Kamaiaikan refused to sue for peace, but crossed the border into British Columbia, where he finally ended his days. Consult Bancroft, Hist. Wash., Idaho, and Montana, 1890, and authorities cited; Stevens, Life of I. I. Stevens, 1900. (J. M.)

Kanagaro (Kandakaro?, 'a pole in the water'). A Mohawk town situated in 1677 on the n. side of Mohawk r., in Montgomery or Herkimer co., N. Y. In the year named it had a single stockade, with four ports, and contained 16 houses. Megapolensis mentions it as early as 1644, but no reference is made to it after 1693. (J. N. B. H.)

Kanagaro. A former Seneca town on Bountion hill, directly s. of Victor, N. Y. For a long period it was the capital of the Seneca tribe. Greenhalgh states that in 1677 it contained 150 houses, 50 to 60 ft in length, with 13 or 14 fires to the house. Here Greenhalgh saw 9 prisoners (4 men, 4 women, and a boy) burned, the torture lasting about seven hours. This shows that the Iroquois as well as the Neuters burned their unadopted women prisoners, but the Jesuit Relation for 1641 says the Huron do not burn their women captives. On the approach of Denonville, in 1687, this town was burned by its inhabitants, who, like those of the neighboring Kanagaro, the foreign colony, removed about 20 m. s. e. to Kanadasaga, where the foreign element became known by the name Seneca. In the early part of the 19th century the Seneca formed a village approximately on the site of the burned Kanagaro, which they called Gaonageon ('basswood bark lying around'), referring, it is said, to gutters of this material employed to convey water from a neighboring spring. Another settlement existed in 1740 in the vicinity of the old site, which was called Chinoshahgeh.

Kanagaro. A former town belonging to the Seneca, situated at different times at different sites from 1½ to 4 m. s. of Kanagaro, the Seneca capital, and s. e. from Victor, on the e. side of Mud cr., N. Y. According to Greenhalgh it contained about 30 houses in 1677. The inhabitants of this town, according to the Jesuit Relation for 1670, were chiefly incorporated captives and their descendants of three tribes, the Onnontioaga, the Neuters, and the Hurons. Its situation thus placed its inhabitants directly under the eyes of the federal chiefs dwelling in the capital town of Kanagaro. Here in 1656 the Jesuits established the mission of the Tohontatenrat at Scanonenrat, which surrendered in a body to the Seneca in 1649. On account of these associations the missionaries gave it their special attention, with such success that it became known as the Christian town of the Seneca. Like all the principal Seneca towns it was destroyed by Denonville in 1687. The inhabitants of the western towns, Totiakaton and Gandachiragon, removed s. and then w. to Genesee r., where their settlements were destroyed by Sullivan in 1779; those of the eastern towns, Gandagaro (Kanagaro) and Gandougaras, removed to the E., where their settlements at Canandaigua and near Geneva, N. Y., were also destroyed by Sullivan's army.

Kanakuk. A Kickapoo prophet. When the Kickapoo in 1819 ceded their lands, was still occupied by the hostile Ojage. Half the tribe emigrated instead to Spanish territory in Texas, and the rest were ready to follow when the Government agents intervened, endeavoring to induce them to remove to Missouri. Kanakuk, inspired with the ideas that had moved Tenskawatawa, exhorted them to remain where they were, promising that if they lived worthily, abandoning their native superstitions, avoiding quarrels among themselves and infractions of the white man's law, and resisting the seduction of alcohol, they would at last inherit a land of plenty clear of enemies. He was accepted as the chief of the remnant who remained in Illinois, and many of the Potawatomi of Michigan became his disciples. He displayed a chart of the path, leading through fire and water, which the virtuous must pursue to reach the "happy hunting grounds," and furnished his followers with prayer-sticks graven with religious symbols. When in the end the Kickapoo were removed to Kansas he accompanied them and remained their chief, still keeping drink away from them, until he died of smallpox in 1852. See Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 692-700, 1896.

Kanani (Ka'nani, 'living arrows'). A Navaho clan.—Matthews in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 104, 1890.

Kanapima ('one who is talked of'). An Ottawa chief, born about 40 m. S. of Mackinaw, Mich., July 12, 1813, and christened as Augustin Hammelin, jr. He was sent with his younger brother, Macoda Binnasee (The Blackbird), in 1829 to be educated in the Catholic seminary at Cincinnati, where the two boys remained for 3 years without making marked progress in their studies. In 1832 both were sent to Rome to continue their education in the college of the Propaganda Fide, with the view of entering the priesthood. This object in Kanapima's case was defeated from the usual causes. After his brother died at the end of two years he ceased his studies, returned to America, became chief of his branch of the tribe, and resumed the costume and habits of his people, except when he went among white people, as in 1835, to make a treaty for the Ottawa with the Government at Washington, but he does not appear to have been a signer of any Ottawa treaty. On such occasions he exhibited the ease and polish of a man of the world.

Kanastunyi (Kanastūn'yi). A traditional Cherokee settlement on the headwaters of French Broad r., near the present Brevard, in Transylvania co., N. C. A settlement called Cannostee or Cannastion is mentioned as existing on Hiawasee r. in 1776.

Kanchati ('red ground', 'red earth'). A name applied to several places, one of the best known being the principal village of the Alibamu, formerly on the E. bank of Alabama r., below Koasati and a little w. of Montgomery, Ala. Hawkins described it in 1799 as a small village on the left bank of Alabama r., with its fields on the right side in a cane swamp, and its people poor and indolent. A census of 1832 (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, IV, 578, 1854) gave the number of families as 55. The name has been applied also to a township in the Creek Nation, Okla., and to a village a few miles n. w. of Talladega, Ala. (A. S. G.)

Kanohatino ('red river'). The Caddo name for the Red r. of Louisiana, and, according to Gatschet, for the Colorado r. of Texas. It was supposed by the companions of La Salle to be the name of a tribe encountered by them in the neighborhood of the Colorado or the Brazos. From the alternative name given, "Ayano," or "Ayona," it has been erroneously assumed that this tribe was the Hainai. "Ayano," however, is evidently the general Caddo word for "man." Although a Caddo tribe may have been living or camping in the region indicated when La Salle passed, the fact that they were not mentioned when León advanced to the Caddo country a few years later would seem to discredit the theory. The only alternative supposition is that the Wichita or one of their branches, the Tawakoni or the Waco, were camping considerably to the s. of their customary habitat at that time. This would explain the warfare that was found to exist between the Caddo and the Kanohatino in which some of La Salle's former companions took part.

Kansa. A southwestern Siouan tribe; one of the five, according to Dorsey's arrangement, of the Dhegiha group. Their linguistic relations are closest with the Osage, and are close with the Quapaw. In the traditional migration of the group, after the Quapaw had first separated therefrom, the main body divided at the mouth of Osage r., the Osage moving up that stream and the Omaha and Ponca crossing Missouri r. and proceeding northward, while the Kansa ascended the Missouri on the s. side to the mouth of Kansas r. Here a brief halt was made, after which they ascended the Missouri on the s. side until they reached the present n. boundary of Kansas, where they were attacked by the Cheyenne and compelled to retrace their steps. They settled again at the mouth of Kansas r., where the Big Knives, as they called the whites, came with gifts and induced them to go farther w. The native narrators of this tradition give an account of about 20 villages occupied successively along Kansas r. before the settlement at Council

KANSA. (KAKEBASHA)

Grove, Kans., whence they were finally removed to their reservation in Indian Ter. Marquette's autograph map, drawn probably as early as 1674, places the Kansa a considerable distance directly w. of the Osage and some distance s. of the Omaha, indicating that they were then on Kansas r. The earliest recorded notice of the Kansa is by Juan de Onate, who went from San Gabriel, N. Mex., in 1601, till he met the "Escansaques," who lived 100 leagues to the n. e., near the "Panana," or Pawnee. It is known that the Kansa moved up Kansas r. in historic times as far as Big Blue r., and thence went to Council Grove in 1847. The move to the Big Blue must have taken place after 1723, for at that date Bourgmont speaks of the large village of the Quans (Kansa) as on a small river flowing from the n. 30 leagues above Kansas r. and near the Missouri. The village of the Missouri tribe was then 30 leagues below Kansas r. and 60 leagues from the Quans village. Iberville estimated them at 1,500 families in 1702. A treaty of peace and friendship was made with them by the United States, Oct. 28, 1815. They were then on Kansas r. at the mouth of Saline r., having been forced back from the Missouri by the Dakota. They occupied 180 earth lodges, and their number was estimated at 1,500. According to Lewis and Clark, they resided in 1804 on Kansas r., in two villages, one about 20 and the other 40 leagues from its mouth, with a population of 300 men. These explorers say that they formerly lived on the s. bank of Missouri r. about 24 leagues above the mouth of the Kansas, and were more numerous, but were reduced by the attacks of the Sauk and the Iowa. O'Fallon estimated their number in 1822 at 1,850. By the treaty of St Louis, June 3, 1825, they ceded to the United States their lands in n. Kansas and s. e. Nebraska, and relinquished all claims they might have to lands in Missouri, but reserving for their use a tract on Kansas r. Here they were subject to attacks by the Pawnee, and on their hunts by other tribes, whereby their number was considerably reduced. Porter estimated their number in 1829 at 1,200; according to the Report of the Indian Office for 1843 the population was 1,588. By treaty at Methodist Mission, Kans., Jan. 14, 1846, they ceded to the United States 2,000,000 acres of the e. portion of their reservation, and a new reservation was assigned them at Council Grove, on Neosho r., Morris co., Kans., where they remained until 1873. As this tract was overrun by settlers, it was sold, and with the funds another reservation was bought for them in Indian Ter. next to the Osage; with the exception of 160 acres, reserved for school purposes, all their lands have now been allotted in severalty. The population diminished from about 1,700 in 1850 to 209 in 1905, of whom only about 90 were full-bloods. Much of this decrease has been due to epidemics. In the winter of 1852-53 smallpox alone carried off more than 400 of the tribe at Council Grove.

The Kansa figured but slightly in the history of the country until after the beginning of the 19th century, and they never played an important part in frontier affairs. During the 26 years which the Kansa spent at Council Grove, efforts were made to civilize them, but with little success. Mission schools were conducted by the Methodists in 1850-54, and by the Quakers in 1869-73, but the conservatism of the tribesmen prevented the attendance of the children, believing it to be degrading and ruinous to Indian character to adopt the white man's ways. According to T. S. Huffaker, who lived among them, chiefly as teacher, from 1850 to 1873, only one Indian of the tribe was converted to Christianity during that period, while the influence of frontier settlers and traders, with the introduction of liquor, stood in the way of the good that the schools might otherwise have accomplished. While at Council Grove they subsisted largely by hunting the buffalo, until the extinction of the herds, when they took up desultory farming under the instruction of Government teachers, because driven to it by necessity; but the houses erected by the Government for their use they refused to occupy, regarding their own lodges as more healthful and comfortable (G. P. Morehouse, inf'n, 1906).

Say's account, perhaps the most accurate of the earlier notices (Long, Exped. Rocky Mts., 1823), describes the ordinary dress of the men as consisting of a breech-clout of blue or red cloth secured in its place by a girdle, leggings and moccasins without ornamentation, and a blanket thrown over the shoulders. The hair of the chiefs and warriors, except a small lock at the back, was scrupulously removed. The dress of the females consisted of a piece of cloth secured at the waist by a girdle, the sides meeting on the outside of the right thigh, the whole extending downward to the knee. In cold weather or for full dress a similar piece of cloth was thrown over the left shoulder, and leggings of cloth, with a broad protecting border on the outside, and moccasins were worn. They were cultivators of the soil. Tattooing was formerly practised to a limited extent. The chastity of the females was guarded to a greater extent than was usual among the western tribes. The mode of constructing their principal permanent dwellings is described by Say as follows: "The roof is supported by two series of pillars, or rough vertical posts, forked at top for the reception of the transverse connecting pieces of each series; 12 of these posts form the outer series, placed in a circle; and 8 longer ones, the inner series, also describing a circle; the outer wall, of rude frame-work, placed a proper distance from the exterior series of pillars, is 5 or 6 ft high. Poles as thick as the leg at base rest with their butts upon the wall, extending on the cross-pieces, which are upheld by the pillars of the two series, and are of sufficient length to reach nearly to the summit. These poles are very numerous, and, agreeably to the position which we have indicated, they are placed all round in a radiating manner, and support the roof like rafters. Across these are laid long and slender sticks or twigs, attached parallel to each other by means of bark cord; these are covered by mats made of long grass, or reeds, or with the bark of trees; the whole is then covered completely over with earth, which, near the ground, is banked up to the eaves. A hole is permitted to remain in the middle of the roof to give exit to the smoke [see Earth lodge]. Around the walls of the interior a continuous series of mats are suspended; these are of neat workmanship, composed of a soft reed united by bark cord in straight or undulated lines, between which lines of black paint sometimes occur. The bedsteads are elevated to the height of a common seat from the ground, and are about 6 ft wide; they extend in an uninterrupted line around three-fourths of the circumference of the apartment, and are formed in the simplest manner of numerous sticks or slender pieces of wood, resting at their ends on cross-pieces, which are supported by short notched or forked posts driven into the ground; bison skins supply them with a comfortable bedding. Restriction of marriage according to gentes has always been strictly observed by the Kansa. When the eldest daughter of a family married, she controlled the lodge, her mother, and all her sisters, the latter being always the wives of the same man. On the death of the husband the widow became the wife of his eldest brother without ceremony; if there was no brother the widow was left free to select her next husband.

The Kansa gentes as given by Dorsey (15th Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1897) are: 1, Manyinka (earth lodge); 2, Ta (deer); 3, Panka (Ponca); 4, Kanze (Kansa); 5, Wasabe (black bear); 6, Wanaghe (ghost); 7, Kekin (carries a turtle on his back); 8, Minkin (carries the sun on his back); 9, Upan (elk); 10, Khuya (white eagle); 11, Han (night); 12, Ibache (holds the firebrand to sacred pipes); 13, Hangan-tanga (large Hanga); 14, Chedunga (buffalo bull); 15, Chizhuwashtage (Chizhu peacemaker); 16, Lunikashinga (thunder-being people). These gentes constitute 7 phratries.

The following were some of the Kansa villages, their names having been gained chiefly through the investigations of Rev. J. O. Dorsey, but in only a few cases are their locations known: Bahekhuba, Cheshulin (2), Djestyedje, Gakhulin, Gakhulinulinbe, Igamaneabe, Inchi, Ishtakhechiduba, Manhazitanman, Manhazulin, Manhazulinanman, Manyinkatuhudje, Neblazhetama, Niudje, Padjegadin, Pausulin, Tanmangile, Waheheyngetsyabe, Wazhazhepa, Yuzhemakanchebubkpaye, Zandjezhinga, Zandjulin, and Zhanichi.

Karakuka. The name given by the main body of the Karok (q. v.) to the divergent dialect spoken on Clear cr. and at Happy Camp, Cal.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905.

Karankawa. A term that seems to have been given originally to a small tribe near Matagorda bay, Texas, but its application has been extended to include a number of related tribes between Galveston bay and Padre id. The signification of the name has not been ascertained. Although the linguistic material obtained is not sufficient to show positive relation to any other language, there are very strong indications of affinity with the dialects of the Pakawa group—Pakawa, Comecrudo, and Cotonam—still recognized as a part of the Coahuiltecan family. On the other side they were probably connected with the Tonkawa. If any of the coast tribes mentioned by Cabeza de Vaca was identical with the Karankawa, which is not unlikely, it is impossible to determine the fact. The first positive notice of them is found in the accounts of La Salle's ill-fated visit to that section. It was on Matagorda bay, in the country of the tribe at that time, that this French explorer built his Ft St Louis. Joutel (1687) mentions them under the name Koienkahé (Margry, Déc., iii, 288, 1878), probably a misprint for Korenkake, which is also given. They are represented as living at that time chiefly between St Louis bay (a part of Matagorda bay) and Maligne (Colorado) r., but are the Indians, though mentioned under the name Clamcöets, who massacred all except 5 of the people left by La Salle at his fort in 1687. If the Ebahamo, Hebobiamos, Bahamas, or Bracamos were identical with the Karankawa or with a portion of the tribe, which is probable, they were living on St Louis or St Bernard bay in 1707 (De l'Isle's map in Winsor, Hist. Am., ii, 294, 1886), and are noticed as living at the same place in 1719-21. Their abode is spoken of as an island or peninsula in St Bernard bay (French, Hist. Coll., ii, 11, note, 1875). It appears from documents in the Texas archives that in 1793 a part of the Karankawa had become christianized and were then living at the mission of Nuestra Señora del Refugio (q. v.), established in 1791 at the mouth of Mission r. emptying into Aransas bay. The pagan portion of the tribe lived at that time contiguous to the Lipan. Later a number of the tribe were living at the mission of Espíritu Santo de Zúñiga. According to Orozco y Berra (Geog., 382, 1864) the territory of the Lipan near the lower Rio Grande bordered that occupied by the Karankawa in 1796. An incident in the history of the tribe was a fierce battle with Lafitte's band of pirates in consequence of the abduction of one of their women by one of the former; the Indians, however, were forced to retreat before the heavy fire of the buccaneers. With the settlement made by Stephen Austin on the Brazos in 1823 began the decline of the tribe. Conflicts between the settlers and the Indians were frequent, and finally a battle was fought in which about half the tribe were slain, the other portion fleeing for refuge to La Bahia presidio on San Antonio r. They took sides with the Americans in the Texan war of independence, in which their chief, José Maria, was killed, as were most of his warriors, amounting, however, to only about 20. Mention is made of 10 or 12 families living between 1839 and 1851 on Aransas bay and Nueces r. According to Bonnell (Topog. Descrip. Texas, 137, 1840) the Karankawa in 1840 had become reduced to 100, living on Lavaca bay. In 1844, having murdered one of the whites on Guadalupe r., they fled toward the mouth of the Rio Grande, one part stopping on Padre id. and the other passing into Mexico. But few references are made to them after this date, and these are conflicting. A report quoted by Gatschet says the history of these Indians terminates with an attack made on them in 1858 by Juan Nepomuceno Cortina with other rancheros, when they were surprised at their hiding place in Texas and exterminated.

The men are described as very tall and well formed, the women as shorter and fleshier. Their hair was unusually coarse, and worn so long by many of the men that it reached to the waist. Agriculture was not practised by these Indians, their food supply being obtained from the waters, the chase, and wild plants, and, to a limited extent, human flesh; for, like most of the tribes of the Texas coast, they were cannibals. Travel among them was almost wholly by the canoe, or dugout, for they seldom left the coast. Head-flattening and tattooing were practised to a considerable extent. Little is known in regard to their tribal government, further than that they had civil and war chiefs, the former being hereditary in the male line. (See Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., 1891.)

The following tribes or villages were probably Karankawan: Coaque, Ebahamo, Emet, Kouyam, Meracouman, Quara, Quinet, and Toyal. The following were in the country of the Karankawa, but whether linguistically connected with them is not certain: Ahehouen, Ahouerhopiheim, Arhau, Chorruc, Doguenes, Kabaye, Kiabaha, Kopano, Las Mulas, Mariandis, Mendica, Mora, Ointemarhen, Omenaoesse, Pataquilla, Quevenes, San Francisco, and Spichebat.

Karankawan Family. A family established by Powell (7th Rep. B. A. E., 82, 1831) on the language of the Karankawa tribe as determined by Gatschet. Although this and the related tribes are extinct, investigation has led to the conclusion that the Coaque, Ebahamo, and other tribes or settlements of the Texas coast mentioned under Karankawa (q. v.) should be included in the family.

Karezi. An unidentified tribe mentioned as living w. of L. Superior and distinct from the Cree.—Jes. Rel. 1667, 23, 1858.

Karhadage ('in the forest.'—Hewitt). An unidentified tribe, band, or village, probably in Canada, with which the Iroquois affirmed they had made peace in 1701. Mentioned with the Chippewa, Mississauga, Nipissing, and others (Livingston in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., iv, 899, 1854). Cf. Karhagaghrooney, Karigouistes, Karrihad. (J. M.)

Karhagaghrooney (Karhagaronon, 'people of the woods'). According to Sir Wm. Johnson a name applied by the Iroquois to wandering Indians n. of Quebec; but as he suggests Carillon on Ottawa r. as the best point for a post of trade with them, they were probably more to the westward. Dobbs located them n. of L. Huron. The term is a collective one, referring to wandering bands of different tribes, possibly to the Têtes de Boule, and to those called O'pimittish Ininiwac by Henry.

Kariak. A summer settlement of Aivilirmiut Eskimo on Lyon inlet, n. end of Hudson bay.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 450, 1888.

Karigouistes. The name given by the Iroquois to the Catholic Indians of Canada, probably more especially to the Caughnawaga. The name seems to have reference to a long dress, possibly the gowns worn by the priests. (J. N. B. H.) Caraguistes.—Colden (1727). Five Nations, 163. 1747. Kariguistes.—Bacqueville de la Potherie, III, 200, 1753. Kariqet.—Dellins (1694) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IV, 95, 1854.

Karkin. A division of the Costanoan Indians inhabiting the country s. of Carquinez straits, San Francisco bay, Cal., the name of the straits being derived from that of the Indians. According to Kotzebue they extended e. as far as the mouth of San Joaquin r.

Karmakdjuin (Qarmagdjuin, 'large huts'). A summer settlement of the Akudnirmiut Eskimo on Home bay, Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 441, 1888.

Karmakdjuin. A village of Padlimiut Eskimo on the coast just n. of Exeter sd., Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Karmang (Qarmang, 'hut'). A summer settlement of Talirpingmiut Okomuiut Eskimo at the n. w. end of Netilling lake, w. of Cumberland sd.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Karmenak. An Ita Eskimo settlement in n. Greenland.—Kane, Arct. Explor., II, 127, 1856.

Karmenaraka. A former village of the Rumsen, connected with San Carlos mission, Cal.

Karmenaraka.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Karok (karuk, 'upstream'; they have no name for themselves other than that for 'men' or 'people', arur, whence Arra-arra, Ara-ara, etc.). The name by which the Indians of the Quoratean family have, as a tribe, been generally called. They lived on Klamath r. from Reileap cr. to Indian cr., n. w. Cal. Below them on the river were the Yurok, above them the Shasta, to their e. were other Shastan tribes, while on the w. they were separated by a spur of the Siskiyou mts. from the Yurok and the Athapascan Tolowa. Salmon r., a tributary of the Klamath, was not Karok territory except for about 5 m. from its mouth, but was held mainly by Shastan tribes. While the Karok language is fundamentally different from the languages of the adjacent Hupa and Yurok, the Karok people closely resemble these two tribes in mode of life and culture, and any description given of the latter will apply to the Karok. They differ from the Yurok principally in two points: One, that owing to the absence of redwood they do not make canoes but buy them from the Yurok; the other, that they celebrate a series of annual ceremonies called "making the world," which are held at Panamenik, Katimin, and Inam, with a similar observance at Amaikiara, while the Yurok possess no strictly analogous performances. The Karok had no divisions other than villages, and while these extended along the entire extent of their territory, three important clusters are recognizable, in each of which there was one village at which certain ceremonies were held that were observed nowhere else. Panamenik, on the site of Orleans Bar, and several other settlements formed the first group; the second was about the mouth of Salmon r. and comprised Amaikiara, Ashipak, Ishipishi, Katimin, Shanamkarak, and others; in the third and northernmost group the most important villages were Inam, at the mouth of Clear cr., and Asisufuunnuk at Happy Camp. In the first two groups a single dialect was spoken; in the last, the farthest upstream, a divergent dialect called Karakuka was employed.

Following is a list of the Karok villages: Amaikiara, Aperger, Apyu, Aranimokw, Ashipak, Asisufuunnuk, Chainiki, Chawakoni, Chinita, Couth, Homnipa, Homuarup, Ift, Inani, Inotuku, Ishipishi, Ishwidip, Iyis, Katimin, Katipara, Kakanan, Kworatem, Ohetur, Olegi, Oler, Opegoi, Panamenik, Pasara, Sawuara, Shanamkarak, Shogoshkwu, Sunaun, Sunum, Supasip, Tishrawa, Tsano, Twofkara, Tui, Uchapa, Unharik, Wetsitsiko, Wopum, and Yutoyara.

Ara.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. 1, xlv, 1890 (sig. 'man'). Ara-ara.—Ibid. Arra-arra.—Crook, ibid., III, 447, 1877. Cahroca.—Powers in Overland Mo., IX, 157, 1872. Cahroce.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 504, 1878. Cisquiwawa.—Meek in H. R. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 194, 1853. Fatih-rika.—Meyer, Nach dem Sacramento, 282, 1855. Peh-tak.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853 (Yurok name; sig. 'upstream'—Kroeber). Petit-siak.—McKee, op. cit., 161. Petaikia.—Kroeber, inf'n, 1903 (Yurok name). Upper Klamath.—McKee, op. cit., 194.

Karrihaet. Given as the name of a tribe, probably in Canada, with whom the Iroquois made peace in 1701. Mentioned with the Chippewa, Missisauga, Nipissing, and others.—Livingston (1701) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IV, 899, 1854. Cf. Karigouistes, Karhadage.

Kashunuk. A Magemiut Eskimo village on the Kashunuk outlet of Yukon r., Alaska; pop. 125 in 1880, 232 in 1890, 208 in 1900.

Kashunahmiut.—11th Census, Alaska, 111, 1893. Kashunok.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 54, 1884. Kashunuk.—Nelson (1878) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Kosuna.—12th Census Rep.

Kashutuk.—A Chngamiut Eskimo village on an island of the Yukon delta, Alaska; pop. 18 in 1880.

Kashutok.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884. Kashutuk.—Nelson (1878) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Kashutuk.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899.

Kasianguit ('little freshwater seals.'—Boas). An Eskimo village near Ameralik fjord, w. Greenland, lat. 64° 10'.—Nansen, First Crossing of Greenland, II, 376, 1890.

Kasihta. A former Lower Creek town on the e. bank of Chattahoochee r. in Chattahoochee co., Ga., 2½ m. below Kawita, its branch settlements extending along the w. side of the river. It was visited by De Soto in 1540, and is referred to under the name Casiste by the Gentleman of Elvas as a great town. In 1799 it was considered the largest of the Lower Creek towns, containing, with its dependencies, 180 warriors and in 1832 it had 620 families and 10 chiefs. Hawkins (Sketch, 58, 1843), in 1799, described a large conical mound, with the "old Cussetah town" near it, which afterward was settled by the Chickasaw. Apatai, now spelled Upatoie, was a branch village. The Kasihta people believed they were descended from the sun, and a curious migration legend, preserved by Von Reck, existed among them (see Gatchet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 133-34, 1884), from which it appears that the Kawita were originally the same people as those of Kasihta, and that they separated in very ancient times. Cusseta, a variant of Kasihta, is now the name of a town in Chambers co., Ala., and another is in Chattahoochee co., Ga. A district in the Creek Nation, Okla., was once called Cuseta. (A. S. G.)

Casawda.—Crawford (1836) in H. R. Doc. 274, 25th Cong., 2d sess., 24, 1838. Casaitas.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 126, 1816. Casita.—Barcia (1698), Ensayo, 287, 1728. Casista.—Ibid., 383. Casiste.—Gentleman of Elvas (1567) in French, Hist. Kasipsa (kisl's 'a point', pū locative: 'at the point'). A Paloo village at Ainsworth, at the junction of Snake and Columbia rs., Wash.

Casipsa.—Ross, Fur Hunters, I, 185, 1855. Kas'ap.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 735, 1896.

Kaska. Given by Dawson (Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 1898, 1889) as a division of the Nahane, comprising the Achetotena (Etchareottine) and Dahotena (Etogottine) tribes. They are described as undersized and of poor physique, have the reputation of being timid, and are lazy and untrustworthy, but are comparatively prosperous, as their country yields good furs in abundance. According to Morice (Trans. Can. Inst., VII, 519, 1892-93), however, "Kaska is the name of no tribe or subtribe, but McDane cr. is called by the Nahane Kasha . . . and this is the real word which, corrupted into Cassiar by the whites, has since a score of years or more served to designate the whole mining region from the Coast range to the Rocky mts., along and particularly to the n. of the Stickeen r." The name Kaska is not recognized by the Indians themselves, who form the third division of Morice's classification of the Nahane. They number about 200. (A. F. C.)

Kaskakoedi ('people of Kasek'). A division of the Raven phratry of the Tlingit, living at Wrangell, Alaska. They are said to have come from among the Masset Haida and to have received their name from a place (Kāsq'le'k') where they camped during the migration. Kas-ka-qua-tee.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859. K'asq'agw'dé.—Boas, 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes of Can., 25, 1899. Kasq'akue'di.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904. Kasra-khédi.—Krause, Tlingit Ind., 120, 1885.

Kaskanakh.—Post route map, 1903. Kaskanek.—Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, map, 1880. Kaskinakh.—Ibid., 45.

Kaskaskia (perhaps akin to kāskāka-hamva, 'hesitates off by means of a tool'). The Foxes have always held the Peoria in low esteem, and in their traditions claim to have destroyed most of them on a rocky island in a river.—Wm. Jones). Once the leading tribe of the Illinois confederacy, and perhaps rightly to be considered as the elder brother of the group. Although the first knowledge of this confederacy obtained by the whites related, in all probability, to the Peoria while they yet resided on the Mississippi, it is probable that the references to them in the Jesuit Relations of 1670 and 1671, from the reports of Father Allouez, apply to the Kaskaskia on upper Illinois r. and possibly to some minor tribes or bands connected therewith whose names have not been preserved. Although it has been asserted that earlier visits than that of Marquette in 1673 were made to this people by the whites, there is no satisfactory evidence to justify this conclusion. Their chief village, which had the same name as that of the tribe, is supposed to have been situated about the present site of Utica, La Salle co., Ill. Marquette states that at the time of his first visit the village was composed of 74 cabins. He returned again in the spring of 1674 and established the mission of Immaculate Conception among them. It appears that by this time the village had increased to somewhat more than a hundred cabins. Allouez, who followed as the next missionary, states that when he came to the place in 1677 the village contained 351 cabins, and that while the village formerly consisted of but one nation (tribe), at the time of his visit it was composed of 8 tribes or peoples, the additional ones having come up from the neighborhood of the Mississippi. Although the known Peoria village was some distance away, it may be that at this time this tribe and the Moingwena resided at the Kaskaskia village. This is implied in an expression by Gravier, who speaks of the Mugulasha "forming a village with the Baiongoula [Bayougoula] as the Ploüaroua [Peoria] do with the Kaskaskia." This, however, would lead to the supposition, if the statement by Allouez be accepted as correct, that there were other bands or tribes collected here at the time of his mission whose names have not survived. Possibly they may have been bands of the Mascoutin or the Miami. Kaskaskia was the village of the Illinois which La Salle reached about the close of Dec., 1679, on his first visit southward from the lakes. He found it unoccupied, however, the inhabitants being on a hunting expedition. The French mission was maintained at this place under Fathers Rasles, Gravier, Binneteau, Pinet, and Marest, until about the close of 1700. At that time the Kaskaskia, influenced by a desire to join the French in Louisiana, resolved to separate from their brethren and migrate to the lower Mississippi. Gravier was much opposed to this movement, and although he arrived on the ground too late to prevent their departure, he was successful in checking the blow which the indignant Peoria and Moingwena were about to inflict on them. It was also through his influence that they were induced to halt at the mouth of Kaskaskia r., where they made their home, on or near the site of the present town of Kaskaskia, Randolph co., Ill., until their removal w. of the Mississippi under the treaty of Oct. 27, 1832. According to Hutchins, in 1764 the Kaskaskia numbered 600, but he gives the number in 1778 as 210 individuals, including 60 warriors. They were then in a village about 3 m. n. of the present town of Kaskaskia, greatly degenerated and debauched. The tribe participated in the treaties of Greenville, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1795, and Ft Wayne, Ind., June 7, 1803, made by the tribes of the n. w. with Anthony Wayne and William H. Harrison. In the treaty of Aug. 13, 1803, at Vincennes, Ind., it is stated that the tribe constitutes "the remains of and rightfully represents all the tribes of the Illinois Indians, originally called the Kaskaskia, Mitchigamia, Cahokia, and Tamaroi." By this treaty they were taken under the immediate care and patronage of the United States and promised protection against the other Indians. By treaty made at Castor Hill, Mo., Oct. 27, 1832, they ceded to the United States all their lands e. of the Mississippi except a single tract reserved to Ellen Ducoigne, the daughter of their late chief. Previous to this, however, the remnants of the various tribes of the Illinois confederacy had consolidated with the Kaskaskia and Peoria. By the treaty of Washington, May 30, 1854, the consolidated tribes ceded to the United States part of the tracts held by them under the treaty of 1832, above mentioned, and under the treaty with the Piankashaw and Wea, Oct. 29, 1832, reserving 160 acres for each member of the tribe and 10 sections as a tribal reserve. By the treaty of Washington, Feb. 23, 1867, land was assigned them in the n. e. corner of Indian Ter.

The consolidated bands, including also the remnant of the Wea and Piankashaw and now known officially as Peoria, numbered altogether in 1905 only 195, hardly one of whom was of pure Indian blood.

Their totem or crest was an arrow notched at the feather, or two arrows supporting each other like a St Andrew's cross.

Kasta (Q'ā'tā). A legendary Haida town on Copper bay, Moresby id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It was named for the creek (Skidegate cr.), which ran near it, and was occupied by the Daiyuahl-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905.

Kastitohewanuk. A Cree band on Albany r. of Hudson bay in 1770.—Hutchins (1770) in Richardson, Arctic Exped., ii, 37, 1851.

Kata (K'ā'a, 'biters,' referring to the Arikara). A tribal division of the Kiowa; so called, not because of Arikara origin, but because they were more intimate with that tribe in trade and otherwise when the Kiowa lived in the N.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1079, 1896.

Katagemane (Kā-ta'-ge-mā-ne, 'starving'). Given by Morgan (Anc. Soc., 171, 1877) as a division of the Piegan tribe of the Siksika, q. v.

Katagkak. An Ikogmiut Eskimo village on Innoko r., above its junction with the Yukon, Alaska.

Ighelkestende.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., xxi, map, 1850. Katagka-mioute.—Ibid.

Katagwadi (Katagwa'di). A Tlingit division formerly resident at Sitka, Alaska, but now almost extinct. (J. R. S.)

Katahuac. A former Chumashan village connected with Santa Inez mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Katamoonchink ('hazelnut grove.'—Lewis). The Indian name of the site of Whiteland, Chester co., Pa., and perhaps also of a Delaware (?) village formerly near West Whiteland. Mentioned by Lewis (1824) in Day, Penn., 222, 1843.

Katana (K'ā'tana). A former Haida town on Louise id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col., in possession of the Kagiaks-kegawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Katchadi (people of Katch, a creek on Admiralty id.). A Tlingit division at Kake and Wrangell, Alaska. Some of them intermarried with the Athapascans on the upper Stikine.

Keady ett ee.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 489, 1856 (after Kane; misprint). Keady ett ee.—Kane, Wand. in N. A., app., 1859. Kā'ta'dé.—Boas, Fifth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 25, 1899. Katchadi.—Krause, Tlingit Ind., 120, 1885. Qā'tadi.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Katchanaak (Qātcxa'na-āk!, 'Hip lake'). The native name for the Tlingit town now known as Wrangell, the winter town of the Stikine Indians of Alaska. It was so named because the mountain behind it resembles a human hip and the inner harbor is so shut in as to appear like a lake. Indian pop. 228 in 1890; total population (white and Indian) 868 in 1900. (J. R. S.)

Katearas. One of the principal villages of the Tuscarora in 1669, "a place of great Indian trade and commerce"; situated on a s. branch of Roanoke r., N. C.

Katernuna (perhaps jargon 'Kater land'). A Talirpingmiut Eskimo village of the Okomiut tribe on Cumberland sd., Baffin land.—Howgate, Cruise of Florence, 84, 1879.

Kathio. A large village of the eastern Dakota, the Mdewakanton, Wahpekute, Sisseton, and Wahpeton, who were gathered about Mille Lac in the 17th and 18th centuries. Brower (Kathio, 33, 1901) locates the village at the outlet of Mille Lac, Minn., and thinks it was a Mdewakanton settlement. It was visited in 1659 by Radisson; in 1679 by Du Luth, who speaks of it as a great village; and by Hennepin in 1680. According to Warren (Hist. Ojibways, 160, 1885) it was destroyed by the Chippewa about 1750. See Du Luth in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 795, 1855.

Kathlaram. A body of Salish formerly under Fraser superintendency, British Columbia; now no longer officially reported.

Kathlaram.—Canadian Ind. Aff., 79, 1878. Kathlaram.—Ibid., 138, 1879.

Katimin. A Karok village in n. w. Cal., on the e. bank of Klamath r., a mile above the mouth of the Salmon, opposite Ishipishi. It was believed by the Karok to be the center of the world, contained a sacred house and sweat-house, and was the scene of the deer-skin dance and of an annual ceremony called "making the world." The village was burned by the whites in 1852.

Sohe-woh.—Gibbs (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 151, 1853. So-wah.—McKee (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 164, 1853. Shogwuu.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1903 (Yurok name). Si-waha.—McKee, op. cit., 211.

Katipara. A Karok village of two houses on the s. bank of Klamath r., Cal., nearly opposite Orleans Bar; described by Gibbs in 1852. See Tsana.

Kat-tee-pee-rah.—Gibbs, MS. Miscel., B. A. E., 1852. Katipara.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1904.

Katiru (Ka-ti'-ru). One of the 4 divisions of the main body of the Shasta, living in Klamath valley, from Seiad valley to Happy Camp, N. Cal. (R. B. D.)

Katkaayi ('island people', from an island at the mouth of Alek r.). A Tlingit division at Sitka belonging to the Raven phratry.

Chráka-Árt.—Krause, Tlinket Ind., 118, 1885. Qia'tkaayi.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Katkwashitu ('town on the point of a hill'). A Tlingit town about 6 m. above the mouth of Chilkat r., Alaska; pop. 125 in 1880.

Katkwaldá.—Krause, Tlinket Ind., 100, 1885. Katkwutlu.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 31, 1884. Qāq'wá'altu'.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Katlagulak (Kā'gulaq). A Chinookan tribe formerly living on the s. bank of Columbia r., in Columbia co., Oreg., 2 m. below Rainier.—Boas, Kathlamet Texts, 6, 1901.

Katlaminiimin. A Chinookan tribe formerly occupying the s. end of Sauvies id., Multnomah co., Oreg. Their principal village was on the s. w. side of the island, in Willamette r. In 1806 Lewis and Clark estimated their number at 280 in 12 houses. In 1850 they were said by Lane to be associated with the Cathlacumup and Namoit.

Cathlaminiimina.—Stuart in Nouv. Ann. Voy., x, 23, 1821. Oathlanamamama.—Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 368, 1822. Oathlanaminiimin.—Franchère, Narr., 135, 1854. Oathlanaminiimina.—Stuart, op. cit., 115. Olan-nah-min-na-mun.—Lewis and Clark Exped., Coues ed., 918, note, 1893. Olanaminamun.—Lewis and Clark Exped., ii, 212, 1814. Olanaminamun.—Ibid., ii, 268, 1817. Olanaminamun.—Ibid., ii, 226, 1814. Olan-nar-min-a-mom's.—Clark (1806) in Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, iv, 220, 1905. Olanaminamun.—Drake, Bk. Inds., vii, 1848. Olan-nar-min-a-mom.—Clark (1806) in Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, iv, 216, 1905. Olanaminamun.—Lewis and Clark Exped., ii, 473, 1814. Kathlaminiimin.—Framboise quoted by Gairdner in Jour. Geog. Soc. Lond., xi, 255, 1841. Wamanania.—Lane in Sen. Ex. Doc. 52, 31st Cong., 1st sess., 172, 1850. Wamananin.—Lane in Ind. Aff. Rep., 161, 1850. Towahnahiook.—Lewis and Clark Exped., Coues ed., iii, 913, 1893 (error).

Katlamoiik. Said by Boas (Kathlamet Texts, 6, 1901) to be a Chinookan tribe formerly living at the site of the present town of Rainier, Columbia co., Oreg., but later (inf'n, 1904) given as the Chinook name of the locality of the modern Rainier, and of Rainier itself.

Kāli'moik.—Boas, inf'n, 1904. Kāli'moik.—Boas, Kathlamet Texts, 6, 1901.

Katlany's Village. A summer camp of one of the Taku chiefs of the Tlingit named Qāti'nī; 106 people were there in 1880.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 32, 1884.

Katlian. The principal chief at Sitka, Alaska, at the time it was settled by the Russians under Baranoff. Also called Kotlian. The first fort established by Baranoff in 1799 was destroyed by the natives under Katlian's leadership, and they afterward entrenched themselves so strongly in a palisaded fort reinforced by stone that the Russians, returning 5 years later, had great difficulty in dislodging them. The name is that usually borne by the chief of the Kiksadi clan of the Tlingit. (J. R. S.)

Katluachtna ('lovers of glass beads'). A Knaikhotanaclan.—Richardson, Arct. Exped., i, 407, 1851.

Katmai. A Kaniagmute Eskimo village on the s. e. coast of Alaska penin.; pop. 218 in 1880, 132 in 1890.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 28, 1884.

Kato. A Kuneite tribe or band formerly living in Cahto and Long valleys, Mendocino co., Cal. These were probably the people mentioned by McKee as occupying the second large valley of Eel r., numbering about 500 in 1851, and differing in language from the Pomo, a fact which has long been lost sight of. Powers divides them into Kai Pomo, Kastel Pomo, and Kato Pomo, and gives a Kulanapan vocabulary. They have recently been found to belong to the Athapascan stock, and closely related to the Wailaki, although they resemble the Pomo in culture. (P. E. G.)

Batemdaikai.—Latham in Trans. Philol. Soc. Lond., 77, 1856. Batem-da-kai-ee.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 434, 1853. B.-tem-da-kai.—Powell in Cont. N. A. Kroeber, inf'n., 1903 (Yuki name). Tloksang.—Kroeber, Coast Yuki MS., Univ. Cal. (own name).

Katomemetunne ('people by the deep water'). A former village of the Mishikhwitmetunne on Coquille r., Oreg.

Ka'-to-mé-me yá-ná.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folklore, iii, 232, 1890.

Katsalgi (kátsa 'panther', algi 'people'). A Creek clan.

Kat'-ahá.—Brit. Adm. Chart, no. 1917. Katerie.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1878, 79. Katsey.—Can. Ind. Rep. 1901, pt. 2, 158. K'-s'tái.—Boas in Rep. 64th Meeting Brit. A. S., 454, 1894. Ka'tai.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 54, 1902.

Katshikotin. A part of the Hankutchin living on Yukon r., a short distance below Fortymile cr., near the Yukon-Alaska boundary.

Ka-tahk-éia.—Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can. for 1888, 202a, 1889. Ki t-a-k-lin.—Schwatka, Rep. on Alaska, 86, 1885 (name given by Russian half-breeds).

Katstayot (Kat-sta'-yót). A former Chumashan village between Pt Conception and Santa Barbara, Cal., at a locality now called Santa Anita.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Kattak. A former Kaniagmiut village on Afognak id., s. of Afognak, Alaska.

Katak.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Kattagmiut.—Russ.-Am. map (1849) quoted by Baker, ibid. Kattagmiut.—Holmberg, Ethnol. Skiz., map, 1855.

Katik. Two Indian settlements on the s. bank of lower Fraser r., below Sumass lake, Brit. Col. (Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872). Perhaps the name refers to the Katsey tribe.

Katimo (Ka-ti'-mo). The Keresan name of a precipitous mesa rising 430 ft above the basin of Acoma, and about 3 m. n. e. of the latter pueblo, in Valencia co., N. Mex. According to tradition its summit was the site of one of several prehistoric villages which the Acoma people successively occupied during their southwesterly movement from the mythic Shipapu in the indefinite N. The tradition relates that during a storm a part of the rock fell and some of the inhabitants, cut off from the valley beneath, perished. The site was henceforth abandoned, the survivors moving to another mesa on the summit of which they erected the present Acoma pueblo (q. v.). Katzimomesa is inaccessible by ordinary means, but it was scaled in 1897 by a party representing the Bureau of American Ethnology and evidences of its former occupancy observed, thus verifying the native tradition. See Bandelier in Century Cyclop. of Names, 1894; Hodge (1) in Century Mag., lvi, 15, May, 1898, (2) in Am. Anthrop., Sept. 1897, and the references noted below. (F. W. H.)

Inehanted Mesa.—Lummis, New Mexico David, 39, 1891. Katim-a.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Pap., iv, 314, 1892. Mesa Encantada.—Pullen in Harper's Weekly, 594, Aug. 2, 1890. Book of Katimo.—Lummis, op. cit., 40.

Kau. The Corn clan of the Patki (Water House) phratry of the Hopi.

Ká-sh.—Bourke, Snake Dance, 117, 1884. Ka'-e.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891. Kaá wá-wá.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 1901 (wá-wá = 'clan'). Ka'-á wá-wá.—Fewkes in Am. Anthrop., vii, 402, 1894.

Kaudjukdjuak (Qaudjukdjuak). A winter settlement of the Akudnirmiut Eskimo between Frobisher bay and Cumberland sd., Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Kaughii. A former Chumashan village at La Cañada del Corral, about 22 m. from Santa Barbara, Cal.

Ka-h's.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Kaughii.—Father Timeno (1856) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Kauhuk ('high place'). A former Alsea village on the s. side of Alsea r., Oreg.; noted by Lewis and Clark as containing 400 inhabitants in 1806, and as existing on the coast.

Kahunle.—Lewis and Clark, Exped., ii, 473, 1814. Kahunle.—Ibid., ii, 183, 1814. Ka-hun-le's.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, vi, 117, 1806. Kan'hák.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folklore, iii, 230, 1890.

Kauweh. An unidentified village on Klamath r., Cal., below its junction with the Trinity, and therefore in Yurok territory.—McKee (1851) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iii, 138, 1853.

Kaveasruk. A Kaviagmiut village at Port Clarence, Alaska.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Kaviagmiut. An Eskimo tribe occupying the s. part of Kaviak penin., Alaska, from Norton bay w. Many winter on the e. shore of Norton ed. Dall includes the Kinugumiut, whose lawless life and enterprise have been copied by the Kaviagmiut remaining in their old home. This was once a populous country, but the extermination of the arctic hare and the marmot, the disappearance of the reindeer, and the raids of the Kinugumiut have depopulated the peninsula and caused the inhabitants to migrate to other parts of arctic Alaska and become merged in other tribes. Local subdivisions of the existing Kaviagmiut, who numbered 427 in 1890, are as follows: Aziagmiut, of Sledge id.; Kaviagmiut, at the head of Port Clarence; Niktagemint, of Golofnin bay, and Ukiogmiut, of King id. Their villages are Aiacheruk, Akpaliut, Anelo, Anlik, Atnuak, Ayak, Aziak, Chaik, Chainruk, Chinik, Chinkak, Iknetuk, Imokte-gokshuk, Kachegaret, Kalulek, Kaveazruk, Kaviak, Kogluk, Kovogzruk, Metukatoak, Netsekawik, Niktak, Okino-yoktokawik, Opiktulik, Perebluk, Senikave, Shinnapago, Siningmon, Sinuk, Sitnazuak, Sunvulluk, Takchuk, Tubuktulik, Unuk, Ukiyak, Ukodliut, and Ukiuktulik.

Anligmut.—Holmberg quoted by Dall, Alaska, 408, 1870. Anligmüten.—Wraugell, Ethnog. Nachr. 1, 2, 1899. Kaveas.—Kelly, Arctic Eskimo, 9, 1890. Kaveaka.—Whymper, Trav. in Alaska, 143, 1863. Kaverong Mutes.—Kelly, Arctic Eskimo, chart, 1890. Kavlaaka.—Raymond in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1869, 591,

Kaviak. A Kaviagmiut village s. e. of Port Clarence, Alaska; pop. 200 in 1880.—Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902.

Kaviasagmiut. A subdivision of the Kaviagmiut, q. v.

Kaviagamiute.—Petroff, 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884. Kaviasagamiute.—Ibid., 11. Kaviasagmiut.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, map, 1887.

Kaviniah. A former Kawia village in Coahuila valley, Riverside co., Cal. Ka-vi-niah.—Barrows, Ethno-Bot. Coahuila Ind., 34, 1900. Indian Wells.—Ibid.

Kawa (K'wa, 'eel spring'). A Modoc camp at Yaneks, on Sprague r., s. Oreg. Kada.—Gatchet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., ii, pt. 1, 31; pt. 2, 122, 1890. Kawa.—Ibid.

Kawaibatunya (Ka-wi-ba-tu-ni-a). Given as the Watermelon clan of the Patki (Cloud) phratry of the Hopi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891.

Kawialia. The most westerly subdivision of the Ute-Chemehuevi linguistic division of the Shoshonean family. They occupy an isolated area on both sides of the Tehachapi mts., Cal., but particularly the w. side around Paiute mts., and the valleys of Walker basin and Caliente and Kelso crs. as far s. as Tehachapi.

Cobajala.—Garcés (1776), Diary, 489, 1900. Cobaji.—Ibid., 304, 445. Covaji.—Keane in Stanford Compend., 510, 1878. Kah-wia'-ah.—Merriam in Science, xix, 916, June 15, 1904. Kawialia.—Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (Yokuts name). Ká-wi'-a-ah.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 393, 1877 (Yokuts name). Kawialia.—Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (Tubatulabal name). Kow'-ah.—Merriam, op. cit. Kubakhye.—Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (Mohave name). Wewoo'-ah.—Merriam, op. cit. (= 'people'). Woches Ootches.—Garcés, op. cit., 295, 804 (so called by Mariposa people). Ta-hi-sha-pa-ha-na.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 393, 1877 (division around mtns. of same name). Ta-hi-sha-p'.—Ibid. (so called by Kern r. people).

Kawaiika. A ruined pueblo, attributed by the Hopi to the Kawaiika people, a name also applied by them to the pueblo of Laguna, N. Mex., and by the Lagunas themselves to designate their village; situated a short distance w. of the Keam's Canyon road, on the top of a mesa between two gorges tributary to Jeditho valley, in the Hopi country, N. E. Arizona. The ruin was surveyed and first described by V. Mindeleff in 1885, under the name Mishiptonga, apparently through confusion with Nesheptanga, another ruin near by. The ruin has been largely rifled of its art remains by Navaho diggers and the results mostly lost to science, but systematic excavation was conducted in the undisturbed portion by the National Museum in 1901. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 52, pl. 9, 1891; Mooney in Am. Anthropol., July, 1893; Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 590, 622, 1898; Hough in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 339, 1903.

Kawaiika.—Mooney, op. cit. Kawaiikah.—Hough op. cit. Mishiptonga.—Mindeleff, op. cit.

Kawaiiki (Hitchiti: oki 'water', awāiki 'hauling', 'carrying' [place]: 'water-carrying place'). A former Lower Creek town at the junction of the present Cow-kee cr. and Chattahoochee r., in the n. e. corner of Barbour co., Ala. It had 45 heads of families in 1833. (A. S. G.)

Cow ye ka.—Census of 1833 in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iv, 578, 1854. Kawāiki.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 134, 1884.

Kawanunyl (Kdwanūnyl, from kdwānd 'duck', yi locative: 'duck place'). A former Cherokee settlement about the present Ducktown, Polk co., s. e. Tennessee. (J. M.)

Cowanah.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887. Duck-town.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce, ibid., 144.

Kawarakish (Ka-wa-ra'-kish). One of the two divisions of the Pitahauerat, or Tapaje Pawnee, the other being the Pitahauerat proper.—Grinnell, Pawnee Hero Stories, 241, 1889.

Kawas (K'ā'was, 'fish eggs'). A subdivision of the Stustas, an important family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. One of their chiefs is said to have been blown across to the Stikine country, where he became a chief among the Stikine. (J. R. S.)

Kawchodinne (ka 'hare', cho 'great', dinne 'people': 'people of the great hares'). An Athapaskan tribe dwelling n. of Great Bear lake, Mackenzie Ter., Canada, on Mackenzie r., the lakes s. of it, and Anderson r. Mackenzie (Voy., i, 206, 1802) said they were a small tribe residing on Peace r., who spoke the language of the Chipewyan and derived their name from the Arctic hare, their chief means of support. At another time (Mass. Hist. Coll., ii, 43, 1814) he placed them on Porcupine r., Alaska. Franklin (Journ. to Polar Sea, 261, 1824) placed them immediately n. of the Thlingchadinne on the n. side of the outlet of Bear lake. Back (Journal, 497, 1833-35) located them on Mackenzie r. as far n. as 68°. Richardson (Arct. Exped., ii, 3, 1851) gave their habitat as the banks of Mackenzie r. from Slave lake downward. Hind (Lab. Penin., ii, 241, 1863) said they resorted to Ft Norman and Ft Good Hope on the Mackenzie, and also to Ft Yukon, Alaska. Ross (MS., B. A. E.) said they resided in 1859 in the country surrounding Ft Good Hope on Mackenzie r., extending beyond the Arctic circle, where they came in contact with the Kutchin, with whom by intermarriage they have formed the tribe of Bastard Loucheux (Nellagottine). Petitot (Dict. Dènè-Dindjié, xx, 1876) said the Kawchodinne lived on the lower Mackenzie from Ft Norman to the Arctic ocean. They are described as a thickset people, who subsist partly on fish and reindeer, but obtain their clothing and most of their food from the hares that abound in their country. Their language differs little from that of the Etchareottine, while their style of dress and their customs are the same, although through long intercourse with the traders, for whom they have great respect, most of the old customs and beliefs of the tribe have become extinct. They are on friendly terms with the Eskimo. The Kawchodinne have a legend of the formation of the earth by the muskrat and the beaver. The dead are deposited in a rude cage built above ground, the body being wrapped in a blanket or a moose skin; the property of relatives is destroyed, and their hair is cut as a sign of mourning. When the supply of hares becomes exhausted, as it frequently does, they believe these mount to the sky by means of the trees and return in the same way when they reappear. Polygamy is now rare. They are a peaceable tribe, contrasting with their Kutchin neighbors. In personal combat they grasp each other by their hair, which they twist round and round until one of the contestants falls to the ground. They are not so numerous as formerly, a great many having died from starvation in 1841, at which time numerous acts of cannibalism are said to have occurred. In 1858 Ross (MS., B. A. E.) gave the population as 467; 291 males, 176 females. Of these 103 resorted to Ft Norman and 364 to Ft Good Hope. Petitot (Dict. Dènè-Dindjié, xx, 1876) arranged them in five subdivisions: Nigottine, Katagottine, Katchogottine, Satchotgottine, and Nellagottine. In another list (Bull. Soc. Géog. Paris, 1875) instead of Nigottine he has Etatchogottine and Chintagottine. In a later grouping (Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891) Petitot identifies Katagottine with Chintagottine, suppresses Satchotgottine, and adds Kfwetragottine.

Dènè.—Petitot, Hare MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1869. Dènè Peaux-de-Lièvre.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 289, 1891. Harefoot Indians.—happell, Hudson Bay, 166, 1517. Hare Indians.—Mackenzie, Voy., i, 206, 1802. Harekins.—Petitot in Jour. Roy. Geog. Soc., 650, 1883. Kā-cho'-tinnè.—Richardson, Arct. Exped., ii, 3, 1851. Kah-cho-tinne.—Ross quoted by Gibbs, MS. B. A. E. ('Arctic hare people'). Kan ho.—Gallatin in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., ii, 19, 1836. Kat'-a-gottiné.—Petitot, MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1867. Ka'-t-a-gottiné.—Petitot, Dict. Dènè-Dindjié, xx, 1876 ('people among the hares'). Kawchodinne.—Franklin, Journ. to Polar Sea, 261, 1824. Kha'-t-a-tinnè.—Petitot in Bull. Soc. Géog. Paris, chart, 1875. Khatpa-Gottine.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891 ('people among the rabbits'). Kkoyttahare ottiné.—Petitot, Hare MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1869 (Chipewyan name). Nouga.—Macfarlane (1857) in Hind, Lab. Penin., ii, 258, 1863 ('spittle': Eskimo name). Peau de Lièvre.—Petitot in Bull. Soc. Géog. Paris, chart, 1875. Peaux-de-Lièvre.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891. Rabbitkins.—McLean, Hudson Bay, ii, 243, 1849. Slave.—Richardson, Arct. Exped., i, 242, 1851. Tā-nā-tin-ne.—Morgan, Consang. and Affin., 289, 1871.

Kawchogottine ('dwellers among the large hares'). A division of the Kawchodinne. Petitot, in 1867 (MS., B. A. E.), located them on the border of the wooded region N. E. of Ft Good Hope, and in 1875 (Bull. Soc. de Géog. Paris, chart, 1875) on the headwaters of Anderson r., N. of Great Bear lake. The same authority (Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891) says their habitat is on the large lakes of the interior E. of Mackenzie r.

K'a-tohō-gottiné.—Petitot, Dict. Dènè-Dindjé, xx, 1876. Katchō-Ottiné.—Petitot in Can. Rec. Sci., i, 49, 1884. Kha-tohō-gottiné.—Petitot in Bul. Soc. de Géog. Paris, chart, 1875. Natlé-tō-Gottine.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891 (= 'people among the little reindeer').

Kawia. The name, of uncertain derivation, of a Shoshonean division in s. California, affiliated linguistically with the Aguas Calientes, Juanefios, and Luisefios. They inhabit the N. tongue of the Colorado desert from Banning s. E. at least as far as Salton, as also the headwaters of Santa Margarita r., where the Kawia res. is situated. Formerly they are said to have extended into San Bernardino valley, but it seems more likely that this principal seat was about San Gorgonio pass. Burton (H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 115, 1857) gave 3,500 as the number of men alone in 1856, evidently an exaggeration. There were 793 Indians assembled under the name "Coahuila" at all the Mission reservations in 1885, while the Indians on Cabuilla res. under the Mission Tule r. agency in 1894 numbered 151, and in 1902, 159. This reserwas occupied, as at present, by the Seranos. They are not to be confounded with a Yokuts tribe bearing the same name. They were first visited in 1776 by Fray Francisco Garcés, who referred to them under their Mohave name, "Jeculich," obtained from his guide. At this time they lived about the N. slopes of the San Jacinto mts. and to the northward, and roamed E. to the Colorado, but their vation consists of 18,240 acres of unpatented land. Villages: Duanos, Juan Bautista, Kavinish, Kawia, Kwaleki, Lawilvan, Malki, Pachawal, Palseta, Palteawat, Panachesa, San Sebastian, Sechi, Sokut Menyil, Temalwahish, Torres, Tova, and Wewutnowhu.

Kawia. A Yokuts tribe formerly living on the edge of the plains on the N. side of Kaweah r., Cal., but now extinct. They were hostile to the American settlers. By agreement of May 13, 1851 (which was not confirmed), a reserve was set aside for this and other tribes between Kaweah and Chowchilla rs., Cal., which at the same time ceded their unreserved lands. This tribe is to be distinguished from the Kawia (Coahuila, Cahuillo, etc.), a Shoshonean tribe in Riverside co., Cal.

Cahuilla.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1902, 175, 1903.

Kawita. The name of two former Lower Creek towns on Chattahoochee r., in Russell co., Ala. They were situated 2½ m. apart and were commonly distinguished as Upper Kawita and Kawita Talahasi ('Kawita old town'), in various forms of spelling. The former was situated on the w. bank of the river, 3 m. below its falls, the latter ½ m. from the stream. Kawita Talahasi, or Old Kawita, was the "public establishment" of the Lower Creeks and the headquarters of the agent. In 1799 it could muster 66 warriors, and about the year 1833 the town contained 289 families. It was an offshoot from Kasihta, and in turn gave origin to Wetumpka, on Big Uchee cr. From the fact that Kawita was regarded as the assembly place and treaty capital of the Lower Creeks, the name was frequently used synonymously with Lower Creeks; as Kusa, the name of the capital of the Upper Creeks, was sometimes used to designate that portion of the tribe. In 1775 Bartram (Trav., 387, 1792) spoke of Kawita Talahasi as "the bloody town, where the micos, chiefs, and warriors assemble when a general war is proposed; and here captives and state malefactors are put to death." (A. S. G.)

Kayung (Q'ayá'n). A Haida town on Masset inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., just above Masset. It was occupied by the Kuna-lanas, who owned the place, and the Sagui-gitunai. John Work does not give separate figures for the population of this town in 1836-41, but the old people estimate the number of houses at 14, which would indicate about 175 people. The place was at one time entirely abandoned, but two or three families have recently returned to it.

Keohpukwaiwah. A former Chippewa village on a lake of the same name, near Chippewa r., Wis.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 314, 1885.

Kechipauan ('town of the spread-out grit'; evidently referring to the sandstone mesa). A former pueblo of the Zúfi on a mesa e. of Ojo Caliente, or Kyapkwainakwin, 15 m. s. w. of Zúfi pueblo, N. Mex. According to Cushing it was called also Kyanawe, which Bandelier identifies with the Canabi of Ofate in 1598, and therefore regards it as one of the Seven Cities of Cibola of Marcos de Niza and Coronado in 1539-42. Spanish Franciscans evidently began the establishment of a mission at this pueblo, probably in 1629, when the first missionaries resided among the Zúfi, but judging from the character of the church building, the walls of which are still standing, it was never finished. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 81, 1891, and authorities cited below. (F. W. H.)

Kánabe.—Cushing in Comptendu Internat. Cong. Am., vii, 156, 1890 (misprint of early Spanish form). Canabi.—Ofate (1598) in Doc. Ind., xvi, 133, 1871. Chan-a-bus.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Eth. and Arch., i, 101, 1891. Ká tchi-na.—Cushing in Millstone, ix, 55, Apr. 1884. Kechip-a-huan.—Bandelier in 10th Rep. Arch. Inst. Am., 107, 1889. Kechip-a-nan.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iii, 133, 1890; iv, 329, 1892; v, 171, 1891 (recorded as distinct from Kyanawe). Kia'naak.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 291, 1886. Kia'na-wa.—Cushing in Millstone, ix, 55, Apr. 1884. K'ya-na-wa.—Cushing in Comptendu Internat. Cong. Am., vii, 156, 1890. Village of Old Waters.—Cushing, Zúfi Folk-tales, 104, 1901 (possibly identical).

Keoughtan. A small tribe of the Powhatan confederacy residing in 1607 at the mouth of James r., in what is now Elizabeth City co., Va. According to Capt. John Smith their fighting men did not exceed 20.—Smith (1629), Hist. Va., i, 116, map, repr. 1819.

Keda-lanas (Q'éd'a lá'nas, 'strait people'). A subdivision of the Hagi-lanas, a family of Ninstints belonging to the Raven clan of the Haida. They received their name from a narrow strait in front of the town.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 268, 1905.

Kedlamik (Q'etamir, 'broad patch of bushes'). An Okinagan village near Nicola lake, Brit. Col.

Ketamir.—Telt in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, 174, 1900. Q'etamir.—Ibid.

Keches. Mentioned by Barbour (Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 61, 1853) as a hostile tribe living n. and e. of San Joaquin r., among the foot-hills of the Sierra Nevada, on the headwaters of the Tuolumne, Merced, and Mariposa rs., Cal., in 1851. It was probably of Moquelumnan stock.

Kegi. The House clan of the Tewa of Hano pueblo, N. E. Ariz.

Ke'gi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891. Ki-a'-ni.—Ibid. (Navaho name). Ki'-hu.—Ibid. (Hopiname).

Kegiktoiwigemint (Kegiktoiwig'emül). A subdivision of the Unaligmiut Eskimo whose chief village is Kiktaguk.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 17, 1877.

Kehsidatsoos (Keh-sid-atsoos). A former summervillage of the Makah of Washington.—Gibbs, MS. 248, B. A. E.

Kein ('turtle carriers,' because they have the ceremonies connected with the turtle.—Fletcher). A subgens of the Dhatada gens of the Omaha.

Kaetage.—Balbi, Atlas Ethnog., 56, 1826. Ka-ta-je.—Long, Exped. Rocky Mts., i, 327, 1823 ('those who do not touch turtles'). Ka'-ih.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877. Ke'-ih.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 226, 1897.

Keinouché (K'inōzhān, 'pickerel'). One of the divisions or chief bands of the Ottawa, q. v. The Jesuit Relation of 1640 locates them at that time, under the name Kinouncheperini, s. of the Isle of the Algonquins (Allumette id.) in Ottawa r. This would place them, if taken literally, some distance e. of L. Huron; but as the knowledge then possessed by the French was very imperfect, it is probable that the Relation of 1643, which places them on L. Huron, is more nearly correct. In 1658 they appear to have lived along the n. shore of the lake. Between 1660-70 they, with the Kiskakon and Sinago, were attached to the mission at Shaugawaumikong (now Bayfield), on the s. shore of L. Superior. It is probable, however, that at the time of Father Menard's visit, in 1660, they were at Keweenaw bay, Mich. In 1670-71 they returned to Mackinaw, some passing on to Manitoulin id.; but it is probable that the latter, or a part of them, were included in the Sable band, q. v. (J. M. C. T.)

Keinouché.—Jes. Rel. 1670, 87, 1858. Kinouché.—ibid., 1658, 22, 1858. Kinouchéperini.—ibid., 1643, 61, 1858. Kinouché.—Marquette (1670) quoted by Shea, Miss. Val., xlix, 1852. Kinouchéperini.—Jes. Rel. 1646, 34, 1858. Kinouchéperini.—ibid., 1640, 34, 1858. Queenoughin.—Champlain (1613), Cœuvres, iii, 298, 1870.

Kenim Lake. A Shuswap village or band on Kenim lake, which flows into North Thompson r., interior of British Columbia; pop. 87 in 1902, 67 in 1904.

Kenim Lake.—Can. Ind. Aff., 274, 1902. Kenim Lake.—Ibid., 271, 1889. Kenim Lake.—Ibid., 190, 1884. Kenim Lake.—Ibid., pt. ii, 72, 1902.

Kenipsim. A Cowichan tribe in Cowichin valley, near the S. E. end of Vancouver id.; pop. 53 in 1904.

Ke-nip-sim.—Can. Ind. Aff., 308, 1879. Ke-nip-sim.—Ibid., 302, 1893. Ke-nip-sim.—Ibid., 231, 1886. Ke-nip-sim.—Ibid., 190, 1893. Kenipsim.—Ibid., pt. ii, 164, 1901. Kenipsim.—Ibid., pt. ii, 69, 1904. Ke-nip-sim.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Kennebec ('at the long water'). A former village, probably of the Norridge-wock division of the Abnaki, on Kennebec r. between Augusta and Winslow, Me.

Mentioned by Capt. John Smith in 1616 and visited by Druillettes in 1646.

Kanébec.—Maurault, Hist. Abenakis, 120, 1866.
Kenebecka.—Smith (1629), Hist. Va., II, 177, 1819.
Kenebeke.—Ibid., 183. Kinibeki.—Jes. Rel. (1647), Thwaites ed., xxxi, 189, 1898.

Kennebunker. A word local in the Maine lumbering regions, defined (Dialect Notes, 390, 1895) as a "valise in which clothes are put by lumbermen when they go into camp for a 'winter operation.'" This term, of quite recent origin, has been formed, with the English suffix -er, from Kennebunk, a river and port in Maine; derived from the Passamaquoddy or a closely related dialect of Algonquian, probably signifying 'at the long water.' (A. F. C.)

Kenozho (K'inozhān, 'pickerel'). A gens of the Chippewa. Cf. Keinouche.
Ke-noushay.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 44, 1885 (trans. 'pike'). Ke-no-sha.—Tanner, Narrative, 314, 1830 ('pickerel'). Ke-no'-she.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 166, 1877 ('pike').
Kinōjā.—Wm. Jones, infn, 1906.

Kenta (probably from kēnt'a, 'field', 'meadow'.—Hewitt). A Tuscarora village in North Carolina in 1701.—Lawson (1714), Carolina, 383, 1860.

Kentanaska. A Tuscarora village in North Carolina in 1701.—Lawson (1714), Carolina, 383, 1860.

Kente (kēnt'a, 'field', 'meadow'). A Cayuga village existing about 1670 on Quinté bay of L. Ontario, Ontario.

Kenté.—Bruyas (1673) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 792, 1855. Kenté.—Frontenac (1673), Ibid., 96.
Kentais.—Homann Helms' map, 1756. Kentais.—Lotter, map, ca. 1770. Quenté.—La Hontan, New Voy., I, 32, 1703. Quintay.—Frontenac (1672), op. cit., 93. Quinté.—Doc. of 1698 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 681, 1855.

Kennunimik. An Ikogmint Eskimo village on the right bank of the lower Yukon, Alaska (Coast Surv. chart, 1898), 15 m. above Andreafski. Perhaps the same as Ankachak.

Keokuk (Kiyō'kagā, 'one who moves about alert'). A Sauk leader, a member of the Fox clan, born on Rock r., Ill., about 1780. He was not a chief by birth, but rose to the command of his people through marked ability, force of character, and oratorical power. His mother is said to have been half French. At an early age he was a member of the Sauk council, which he graced, but at first played only a subordinate role therein. He stepped into prominence later on when he was made tribal guest-keeper. While holding this office he was supplied at tribal expense with all the means of rendering hospitality, and played the part of a genial host with such pleasing effect that his lodge became a center for all things social and political. Quick to see the possibilities of this office he made use of the opportunity to further his own ambitions.

Keokuk was well aware of the fact that the rigid social organization of his people offered a barrier to the realization of his cherished desire, which was to become the foremost man of his tribe. Contrary to the manner of men of his training, environment, and tradition, he had no scruples against doing away with a practice if thereby he might reap profit for himself; and he worked his will against custom, not in an open, aggressive way, but by veiled, diplomatic methods. He was continually involved in intrigue; standing always in the background, he secretly played one faction against another. In time he became the leading councilor in the Sauk assembly, and enjoyed great popularity among his people. But the situation assumed a different aspect when the troubled period of the so-called Black Hawk war arrived. The immediate cause of this conflict grew out of an agreement first entered into between the Government and a small band of Sauk who, under their leader Kwaskwamia, were in winter camp near the trading post of St. Louis. By this compact the Sauk were to give up the Rock River country. As soon as the agreement became noised abroad among all the Sauk there was strong opposition, particularly to the form in which it had been made. Throughout the affair Keokuk assumed so passive an attitude that he lost at once both social and political prestige. Those of the Sauk who favored an appeal to arms then turned to a man of the Thunder clan, Black-big-chest, known to the whites under the name of Black Hawk (q. v.), who became their leader. Kernertok. A settlement of East Greenland Eskimo near Frederiksdal.—Meddelelser om Grönland, xxv, 246, 1902.

Kern River Shoshoneans. A small Shoshonean group in s. California which differs so much linguistically from all other peoples of this family as to form a major division, although numerically insignificant. It includes the Tubatulabal, who occupy the valley of Kern r. above the falls, and the Bankalachi of upper Deer cr.

Keroff. Mentioned among a number of Upper Creek towns in H. R. Ex. Doc. 276, 24th Cong., 1st sess., 162, 1836. It probably is a badly mutilated abbreviation of the name of a known Creek town, but is not identifiable in this form. The settlement appears to have been on the upper course of Coosa r., Ala.

Kershaw. See Cashaw.

Kesa (Q̄sa). A Haida town on the w. coast of Graham id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It was occupied by the Tadjilanas before moving to Alaska.—
 Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Keshkunuwu (Q̄eckunuwū), 'bluejay fort'. A former Tlingit village in the Sitka country, Alaska. (J. R. S.)

period the feeble bond of political union between the Sauk and the Foxes was broken, this result being due largely to internal dissensions brought on by the intrigues of Keokuk, who, with a following of unpatriotic Sauk, sought and obtained protection from the Foxes under their chief, Paweshik. The fighting began before Black Hawk was ready, and he was forced to take the field with but a small number of those on whose support he had depended. With his depleted forces he could not successfully contend against the Illinois militia and their Indian allies.

Keokuk loomed up again during the final negotiations growing out of the war, and played so deftly into the hands of the Government officials that he was made chief of the Sauk. It is said that the announcement of his elevation to supreme power was made in open council, and that it so aroused the anger and contempt of Black Hawk that he whipped off his clout and slapped Keokuk across the face with it. The act of creating Keokuk chief of the Sauk has always been regarded with ridicule by both the Sauk and the Foxes, for the reason that he was not of the ruling clan. But the one great occasion for which both the Sauk and the Foxes honor Keokuk was when, in the city of Washington, in debate with the representatives of the Sioux and other tribes before Government officials, he established the claim of the Sauk and Foxes to the territory comprised in what is now the state of Iowa. He based this claim primarily on conquest.

On his death, in 1848, in Kansas, whither he had moved three years before, the chieftainship, with its unsavory associations, went to his son, Moses Keokuk (Wunagisi*, 'he leaps up quickly from his lair'), who displayed many of the mental characteristics of the father. Those who knew them both maintain that the son was even the superior intellectually, and of higher ethics. He was fond of debate, being always cool, deliberate, and clear-headed. In argument he was more than a match for any Government officer with whom he ever came in contact at the agency. He bore an intense hatred for the Foxes, which was returned with more than full measure. Moses Keokuk was acknowledged the purest speaker of the Sauk dialect. The Sauk were never tired of his eloquence; it was always simple, clear, and pleasing. Late in life he embraced Christianity and was baptized a Baptist; but he never ceased to cherish a sincere regard for the old-time life and its fond associations. He succeeded in turning aside much of the odium that had early surrounded his office, and though he met with more political opposition during his whole life, yet when he died, near Horton, Kans., in August, 1903, his death was regarded by the Sauk as a tribal calamity.

In 1883 the remains of the elder Keokuk were removed from Kansas to Keokuk, Iowa, where they were reinterred in the city park and a monument erected over his grave by the citizens of the town. A bronze bust of Keokuk stands in the Capitol at Washington. (W. J.)

Keotus (prob. for Kiwätüg, 'he whose voice is heard roaming about.'—W. J.). A Potawatomi band, probably taking its name from the chief, living in Kansas in 1857.—Baldwin in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1857, 163, 1858.

Keowee (according to Wafford, Kuwéhiyt, or, in abbreviated form, Kuwéhi, 'mulberry grove place'). The name of two or more former Cherokee settlements. One, sometimes distinguished as Old Keowee, the principal of the Lower Cherokee towns, was on the river of the same name, near the present Port George, in Oconee co., S. C. Another, distinguished as New Keowee, was on the headwaters of Twelve-mile cr., in Pickens co., S. C.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 525, 1900.

Keowe.—Bartram, Travels, 372, 1792. New Keowee.—Mouzon's map quoted by Royce in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 143, 1887.

Kepatawagachik. Given as the name of a tribe formerly living near L. St John, Quebec, but driven off by the Iroquois (Jes. Rel. 1660, 12, 1858). Named in connection with Abittibi and Ouakouiechidek (Chisedec). Possibly the Papinachois.

Kepel. A Yurok village on lower Klamath r., about 12 m. below the mouth of the Trinity, in N. California. It was the only place in Yurok territory, besides Loolego, at which a fish dam was erected across the river.

Akharatipikam.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1904 (Karok name). Capel.—Gibbs in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, 111, 138, 1853. Cap-pel.—McKee in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 161, 1853. Kai-pel.—Gibbs, op. cit.

Kerahocak. A former village of the Powhatan confederacy on the N. bank of the Rappahannock, in King George co., Va.—Smith (1629), Virginia, 1, map, repr. 1819.

Kerechun (ke-re-tch'un, probably 'hawk'). A subgen of the Waninkikikarachada, the Bird gens of the Winnebago.—Dörsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897.

Keremen. A village or tribe formerly in the country between Matagorda bay and Maligne (Colorado) r., Tex. The name seems to have been given Joutel in 1687 by the Ebahano, who were probably affiliated to the neighboring Karankawa. They are probably the Aranam (q. v.) of the Spanish chroniclers. See Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., 23, 35, 46, 1891. (A. C. F.)

Keremen.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 137, 1846. Korimen.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., iii, 288, 1878 (mentioned as distinct from Keremen, but probably a duplication).

Keremeus. A Similkameen band of the Okanagan; pop. 55 in 1897, when last separately enumerated.

Kerem-eos.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1883, 191. Kerem-eos.—Ibid., 1889, 313. Keremeus.—Ibid., 1897, 364. Kéremya'ux.—Telt in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., ii, 174, 1900.

Keresan Family (adapted from K'eres, the aboriginal name). A linguistic family of Pueblo Indians including the inhabitants of several villages on the Rio Grande, in n. central New Mexico, between the Rito de los Frijoles (where, before being confined to reservations, they joined the Tewa on the n.) and the Rio Jemez, as well as on the latter stream from the pueblo of Sia to its mouth. The w. division, comprising Acoma and Laguna pueblos, are situated westward from the Rio Grande, the latter on the Rio San José. Like the other Pueblo tribes of New Mexico, the Keresan Indians maintain that they had their origin at the mythical Shipapu and that they slowly drifted southward to the Rio Grande, taking up their abode in the Rito de los Frijoles, or Tiyuonyi, and constructing there the cliff-dwellings found to-day excavated in the friable volcanic tufa. Long before the coming of the Spaniards they had abandoned the Rito, and, moving farther southward, separated into a number of autonomous village communities. According to Coronado, who visited the "Quirix" province in 1540, these Indians occupied 7 pueblos; 40 years later Espejo found 5; while in 1630 Benavides described the stock as numbering 4,000 people, in 7 towns extending 10 leagues along the Rio Grande. See Bandelier (1) in Arch. Inst. Papers, i, 114, 1883, (2) ibid., iv, 139 et seq., 1892, (3) Delight Makers, 1890.

According to Loew this stock constitutes two dialectic groups, the first or Queres group comprising the inhabitants of Santo Domingo, Santa Ana, Sia, San Felipe, and Cochiti; the other, the Siteime or Kawaiko group, comprehending Laguna and Acoma with their outlying villages.

The Keresan settlements are as follows, those marked with an asterisk being extinct: Acoma, Acomita, Cieneguilla*, Cochiti, Cubero*, Cueva Pintada*, Gipyu*, Haatzte*, Hasatch, Heashkowa*, Huashpatzena*, Kakanatzatia*, Kashkachuti*, Katzimo*, Kobasaya*, Kowina*, Kuapa*, Kuchtya*, Laguna, Moquino*, Pagate, Pueblo, Puerto (?), Punyeesty, Punyekia, Pusityicho, Rito, San Felipe, Santa Ana, Santo Domingo, Seemunah, Shumasisatcha*, Sia, Siam, Tapitsiama*, Tipoti*, Wapuchuseamma, Washpashuka*, Yapashi*. The following pueblos, now extinct, were perhaps also Keresan: Alipoti, Ayqui, Cebolleta, Pelchiu, Pueblo del Encierro, San Mateo, Tashkatze, Tojagua. (F. W. H.)

Keshkunuwu (Q'ekunuwu), 'bluejay fort'. A former Tlingit village in the Sitka country, Alaska. (J. R. S.)

Keshlakchuis (Ké'sh-lák'tchuish). A former Modoc settlement on the s. e. side of Tule (Rhett) lake, Modoc co., N. E. Cal.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. 1, xxxii, 1890.

Keskaechquerem. Mentioned as if a former Canarsee village near Maspeth, on the w. end of Long id., N. Y., in deed of 1638.—N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xiv, 14, 1883.

Keskistkonk. A former Nochpeem village which seems to have been on Hudson r., s. of the Highlands, in Putnam co., N. Y. Keskistkonk.—Van der Donck (1656) quoted by Rutenber. Tribes Hudson R., 80, 1872. Kis Kight-konk.—Doc. of 1663 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIII, 303, 1881 (used for the Nochpeem tribe).

Kesmali (Ké-s-má-li). A former village of the San Luis Obispo Indians of the Chumashan family, at Pt Sal, San Luis Obispo co., Cal.—Schumacher in Smithsonian Rep. 1874, 340, 1875.

Kespoogwit ('land's end'). One of the two divisions of the territory of the Micmac as recognized by themselves. According to Rand it includes the districts of Eskegwawage, Shubenacadie, and Annapolis (q. v.), embracing all of s. and e. Nova Scotia. In Frye's list of 1760, Kashpugowitk and Keshpugowitk are mentioned as two of 14 Micmac bands or villages. These are evidently duplicates, as the same chief was over both, and were intended for the Kespoogwit division. The inhabitants are called Kespoogwitunak. See Micmac. (J. M.)

Kashpugowitk.—Frye (1760) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 115-116, 1809. Keshpugowitk.—Ibid. (mentioned separately, but evidently the same). Kespoogwit.—Rand, First Micmac Reading Book, 81, 1875. Kespoogwitunak.—Ibid. (the people of Kespoogwit).

Kestaubuinok. A former Sinteink village in Westchester co., N. Y., between Singing cr. and Croton r.; mentioned by Van der Donck in 1656.—Rutenber, Tribes Hudson R., 72, 79, 1872.

Ket (Q'et, 'narrow strait'). A Haida town on Burnaby str., Moresby id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It was occupied by a branch of the Hagi-lanas, who from their town were called Keda-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Ketangheanyeko. A village, probably of the Abnaki, near the mouth of Kennebec r., Me., in 1602-09.—Purchas (1625) quoted in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 156, 1857.

Ketchewaundauginink ('large lick at.').—Hewitt). A former Chippewa village on Shiawassee r., on the trail between Detroit and Saginaw bay, in lower Michigan, on a reservation sold in 1837. (J. M.)

Big Lick.—Detroit treaty (1837) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 245, 1873. Big salt lick.—Williams (1872) in Mich. Pion. Coll., II, 476, 1880. Ohe-won-dor-goning.—Ibid., 477. Ke-che-wan-dor-goning.—Ibid., 476. Keche-e-waun-dau-gu-mink.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Mich. map, 765, 1899. Ketchewaundauginink.—Saginaw treaty (proclaimed 1820) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 112, 1873. Ketchewaundauginink.—Detroit treaty, op. cit. Ketchiwáwian-dágoning.—Wm. Jones, Inf'n, 1905. Keth-e-wan-dor-goning.—Williams, op. cit., 481. Saline.—Ibid., 476 (French name). Wan-dor-goning.—Ibid., 477.

Ketohigumiwisuwagi (Ké'tiggmíwísu-wagt, 'they go by the name of the sea'). A Sauk gens.

Ké-ké-kou-a-we'-so-uk.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 170, 1877 (trans. 'sea'). Ké'tigamiwisuwagi.—Wm. Jones, Inf'n, 1906.

Ketgohittan ('people of small-shark house'). Given as a subdivision of the Tlingit clan Nanyaayi, but in reality simply the name of those inhabiting a certain house.

Ké's'tgo hit tán.—Boas, 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 25, 1889. Q'á'tgu hit tán.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Ketlalam (Ké'tlálá'm, 'nipping grass', so called because deer come here in spring to eat the fresh grass). A Squawmish village community on the e. side of Howe sd., Brit. Col.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Brit. A. S., 474, 1900.

Ketlaynup. A body of Salish of Vancouver id., speaking the Cowichan dialect; pop. 24 in 1882.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1882, 258.

Ketnas-hadai (Ké'tnas had'á'i, 'sea-lion house people' [?]). Given by Boas (Fifth Rep. N. W. Tribes Canada, 27, 1889) as the name of a subdivision of the Yakulanas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida of s. w. Alaska; but it is in reality only a house name belonging to that family. There seems to be an error in the designation, the word for 'sea-lion' being qu-i. (J. R. S.)

Ketsilind (Ké'tsil'nd, 'people of the Rio Chiquito ruin'). A division of the Jicarilla who claim that their former home was s. of Taos pueblo, N. Mex. They are possibly of mixed Picuris descent. (J. M.)

Keuchishkeni (Ke-utchishxé'ni, 'where the wolf rock stands'). A former Modoc camping place on Hot cr., near Little Klamath lake, N. Cal.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. 1, xxxii, 1890.

Kevalingamint. A tribe of Eskimo whose country extended from C. Sep-pings and C. Krusenstern, Alaska, inland to Nunatak r. They were an offshoot of the Nunatogmiut, reinforced by outlaws from the Kinugumiut and Kaviagmiut. The main body of the tribe is now found about Pt Hope and farther n., having emigrated on account of disease and lack of food, and expelled the Tigaramiut from their northern hunting grounds. Their villages are Kechemudluk, Kiyualinak, and Ulezara.

Kevalinye Mutes.—Kelly, Arct. Eskimos, chart, 1890. Kevalinyes.—Ibid., 13. Kivalingamint (Tikhmenief (1861) quoted by Baker, Geog. Diet. Alaska, 115, 1902).

Kevlikivashalah. A body of Salish of Victoria superintendency, Vancouver id. Pop. 31 in 1882, when last separately enumerated.

Kevil-kiva-sha-lah.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1882, 256.

Kewatsana (Kéwátána, 'no ribs'). An extinct division of the Comanche.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1045, 1896.

Kewaughtohenemach. Given as a division of the Okinagan that lived 30 m. above Priests rapide, on Columbia r., Wash.

Ke-waught-chen-unaugha.—Ross, Adventures, 290, 1849. Ke-waught-tohen-emashs.—Ibid., 137.

Kewigoshkeem. A former Chippewa or Ottawa village, named after a chief who flourished in the latter part of the 18th century; situated on Grand r., at or near the present Grand Rapids, Mich., on land ceded to the United States by the treaty of Chicago, Aug. 29, 1821, proclaimed Mar. 25, 1832. Under this treaty half a section of land near the village was granted to Charles and Medart Beaubien, sons of Mannabenaqua.

Ke-wi-go-shkeem.—Treaty (proclaimed 1832) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 154, 1873. Ke-wi-go-sh-kum.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Mich. map, 1899. Kewigushkum.—Bennett (1779) in Mich. Pion. Coll., ix, 398, 1886 (the chief).

Keysa. The Badger clan of the Tewa pueblos of San Juan, Santa Clara, and San Ildefonso, N. Mex.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 349, 1896.

Keyatiwankwi (K'eyatiwankwi, 'place of upturning or elevation'). The first of the mythic settling places of the Zuni after their emergence from the underworld.—Cushing in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 388, 1896.

Keyauwee. A small tribe formerly living in North Carolina, affiliated with the Tutelo, Saponi, and Occaneechi. Nothing remains of their language, but they perhaps belonged to the Siouan family, from the fact of their intimate association with well known Siouan tribes of the E. In 1701 Lawson (Carolina, 1714, 87-89, repr. 1860) found them in a palisaded village about 30 m. N. E. of Yadkin r., near the present Highpoint, Guilford co., N. C. Around the village were large fields of corn. At that time they were about equal in number to the Saponi and had, as chief, Keyauwee Jack, who was by birth a Congaree, but had obtained the chieftaincy by marriage with their "queen." Lawson says most of the men wore mustaches or whiskers, an unusual custom for Indians. At the time of this traveler's visit the Keyauwee were on the point of joining the Tutelo and Saponi for better protection against their enemies. Shortly afterward they, together with the Tutelo, Saponi, Occaneechi, and Shakori, moved down toward the settlements about Albemarle sd., the five tribes with one or two others not named numbering then only about 750 souls. In 1716 Gov. Spotswood of Virginia proposed to settle the Keyauwee with the Eno and Sara at Enotown on the frontier of North Carolina, but was prevented by the opposition of that colony. They moved southward with the Sara, and perhaps also the Eno, to Pedee r., S. C., some time in 1733. On Jefferys' map of 1761 their village is marked on the Pedee above that of the Sara, about the bound-dary between the two Carolinas. With this notice they disappear from history, having probably been absorbed by the Catawba. (J. M.)

Keawe.—Jefferys, Fr. Dom. Am., i, 134, map, 1761. Keawee.—Bowen, map of the Brit. Am. Plantations, 1760. Keawawee.—Doc. of 1716 in N. C. Rec., 242, 1886. Keowawa.—Ibid., 248. Keowee.—Vaugondy, map Partie de l'Amér. Sept., 1756. Keiauwee.—Lawson (1701), Carolina, 884, 1860. Keomee.—Moll, map of Car., 1720 (misprint). Keawee.—Byrd (1733), Hist. Div. Line, ii, 22, 1866. Keyauwee.—Lawson (1701), Carolina, 87, repr. 1860. Keyawee.—Brickell, Nat. Hist. N. Car., 343, 1787.

Khahitan (Gha-hitá'n, pl. Gha-hitá'neo, 'ermine people', from gha-i 'ermine', hitá'neo 'people'). The Cheyenne name of an unidentified Pueblo tribe of the Rio Grande, known to the Cheyenne through visits and trade intercourse. They formerly accompanied Mexican traders in their journeys to the camps of the Plains tribes, and used Spanish as well as their own language. They formerly cut their hair across below the ears, with a short side plait wrapped with strings of white ermine skin, but have now adopted the ordinary hairdress style of the Plains tribes. From information of Cheyenne who met some of them on a recent visit to Taos, N. Mex., it is known that they are distinct from Ute, Navaho, Jicarilla, or Taos Indians, and live farther s. than any of these. They may possibly be the Picuris. (J. M.)

Ghá-hi-táneo.—Mooney, MS. Cheyenne notes, B. A. E., 1906. Ka-he'-ta-ni-o.—Hayden, Ethnog. and Philol. Mo. Vol., 290, 1862.

Kiabaha. A village or tribe, now extinct, said to have existed between Matagorda bay and Maligne [Colorado] r., Tex. The name seems to have been given to Joutel in 1687 by the Ebahamo Indians, probably closely affiliated to the Karankawa, whose domain was in this region. A rancheria called Cabras (apparently the same name as Kiabaha), with 26 inhabitants, was mentioned in 1785 as being near the presidio of Bahia and the mission of Espíritu Santo de Zúfiga (q. v.) on the lower Rio San Antonio (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, i, 659, 1886). See Gatschet, Karankawa Ind., 23, 35, 1891. Cf. Kabaye. (A. C. F.)

Cabras.—Bancroft, op. cit. Kiabaha.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., III, 288, 1878. Kiaboha.—Shea, note in Charlevoix, New France, IV, 78, 1870. Kiaboha.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Kiakima (K'yā'kima, 'home of the eagles'). A former Zuñi pueblo at the s. w. base of Thunder mtn., 4 m. s. e. of Zuñi pueblo, w. N. Mex. It was occupied in the 16th and 17th centuries as one of the "Seven Cities of Cibola," and, according to Zuñi tradition, was the scene of the death of the negro Estevanico, who had been a companion of Cabeza de Vaca, and had accompanied Fray Marcos de Niza on his journey from Mexico in 1539; but historical evidence places that event at Hawikuh. It was a visita of the mission of Halona, probably from 1629, and contained about 800 inhabitants, but on the insurrection of the Pueblos against Spanish authority in 1680, Kiakima was permanently abandoned, the inhabitants fleeing to Thunder mtn. for safety. See Bandler, cited below; Mindeleff in 8th Rep.

Kiaskusis ('small gulls'). A small Cræ band residing in 1856 around the fourth lake from Lac Qu'Apelle, N. W. Ter.,

Canada. They were formerly numerous, but had become reduced to 30 or 40 families owing to persistent Blackfeet raids.—Hayden, Ethnogr. and Philol. Mo. Val., 237, 1862.

Kiasutha (alias Guyasuta, 'it sets up a cross'.—Hewitt). A chief of some prominence as an orator in the Ohio region about 1760–1790. Although called a Seneca, he probably belonged to the mixed band of detached Iroquois in Ohio commonly known as Mingo, who sided with the French while their kinsmen of the New York confederacy acted as allies of the English. As a young warrior he accompanied Washington and Gist on their visit to the French forts on the Allegheny in 1753. After Braddock's defeat in 1755 he visited Montreal in company with a French interpreter and in 1759 was present at Croghan's conference with the Indians at Ft Pitt (now Pittsburg). He is mentioned also at the Lancaster conference in 1762, and in 1768 was a leading advocate of peace with the English both at the treaty of Ft Pitt in May and at Bouquet's conference there six months later. Washington visited him while on a hunting tour in Ohio in 1770. He is noted as at other conferences up to the time of the Revolution, and in 1782 is mentioned as leading an Indian raid on one of the frontier settlements. His name occurs last in 1790, when he sent a written message to some friends in Philadelphia. See Darlington, Christopher Gist's Journal, 1893.

Kiatagmiut. A division of the Aglemiut Eskimo of Alaska, inhabiting the banks of Kvichivak r. and Iliamna lake. They numbered 214 in 1890. Their villages are Chikak, Kakanak, Kaskanak, Kichik, Kogiung, Kvichak, and Nogeling.

Kiatagmiut.—Schanz in 11th Census, Alaska, 95, 1893. Kiatagmiute.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 135, 1884. Kiatenes.—Lutke, Voyage, I, 181, 1833. Kijataigmjuten.—Holmberg, *Ethnogr. Kiawaw. A small tribe, of unknown affinity, formerly on Kiawah id., Charleston co., S. C., but long extinct. They were regarded as one of the tribes of the Cusabo group.

Kayawah.—Moll, map, 1715. Kayawaah.—Moll, map in Humphrey, Arct., 1790. Keawaw.—Milla, Stat. S. C., 459, 1826. Kiawaw.—Rivers, Hist. S. C., 38, 1856. Kyewaw.—Doed of 1675 quoted by Milla, op. cit., app., I, 1826.

Kiawetnan. The Yokuts name of the territory about Porterville, Cal. Given by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 370, 1877) as the name of a tribe (Ki-a-wét-ni, which lacks the locative suffix -nu).

Kichai (from Kitsish, their own name). A Caddoan tribe whose language is more closely allied to the Pawnee than to the other Caddoan groups. In 1701 they were met by the French on the upper waters of the Red r. of Louisiana and had spread southward to upper Trinity

r. in Texas. In 1712 a portion of them were at war with the Hainai, who dwelt lower down the Trinity. They were already in possession of horses, as all the Kichai warriors were mounted. They seem to have been allies of the northern and western tribes of the Caddoan confederacy and to have intermarried with the Kadohadacho. In 1719 La Harpe met some of the Kichai on Canadian r., in company with other Caddoan tribes, on their way toward New Mexico to wage war against the Apache. At that time they pledged friendship to the French, to whom they seem to have remained faithful. In common with all the other tribes they suffered from the introduction of new diseases and from the conflicts incident to the contention of the Spaniards, French, and English for control of the country, and became greatly reduced in numbers. In 1772 the main Kichai village was e. of Trinity r., not far from Palestine, perhaps a little n. e. At that time it was composed of 30 houses, occupied by 80 warriors, "for the most part young." In 1778 there was another village, "separated from the main body of the tribe," farther s. and in nearly a direct line from San Pedro to the Tawakoni villages, probably on the site of the present Salt City. The junta de guerra held in the same year estimated the strength of the Kichai at 100 fighting men (Bolton, inf'n, 1906). With several other small Texas tribes they were assigned by the United States Government to a reservation on Brazos r. in 1855, but on the dispersal of the Indians by the Texans three years later they fled s. and joined the Wichita, with whom they have since been associated, and whom they resemble in their agriculture, house-building, and general customs. About 50 souls still keep the tribal name and language.

Kichesipirini ('men of the great river,' from kiche 'great', sipi 'river', iriniouek 'men'). By the Huron they were called Ehonkeronon; from the place of their residence they were often designated Algonquins of the Island, and Savages of the Island). Once an important tribe living on Allumette id., in Ottawa r., Quebec province. They were considered as the typical Algonkin, and in order to distinguish them from the other tribes included under the term in this restricted sense were called "Algonquins of the Island," a name first applied by Champlain (see Algonkin). As Ottawa r. was the line of travel between the upper-lake country and the French settlements, the position of the tribe made it at times troublesome to traders and voyageurs, although as a rule they appear to have been peaceable. In 1645 they, together with the Hurons, made a treaty of peace with the Iroquois; but it was of short duration, for 5 years later both the Hurons and the Kichesipirini fled for safety to more distant regions. What became of them is not known. It is probable that they were consolidated with the Ottawa or with some other northwestern Algonquian tribe. (J. M. J. N. B. H.)

Kickapoo (from Kiwigapawā, 'he stands about,' or 'he moves about, standing now here, now there'). A tribe of the central Algonquian group, forming a division with the Sauk and Foxes, with whom they have close ethnic and linguistic connection. The relation of this division is rather with the Miami, Shawnee, Menominee, and Peoria than with the Chippewa, Potawatomi, and Ottawa.

History.—The people of this tribe, unless they are hidden under a name not yet known to be synonymous, first appear in history about 1667–70. At this time they were found by Allouez near the portage between Fox and Wisconsin rs. Verwyst (Missionary Labors, 1886) suggests Alloo, Columbia co., Wis., as the probable locality, about 12 m. s. of the mixed village of the Mascouten, Miami, and Wea. No tradition of their former home or previous wanderings has been recorded; but if the name Outitchakouk mentioned by Druilletes (Jes. Rel. 1658, 21, 1858) refers to the Kickapoo, which seems probable, the first mention of them is carried back a few years, but they were then in the same locality. Le Sueur in Indian Ter. Others have come in since, but the remainder, constituting at present nearly half the tribe, are now settled on a reservation, granted them by the Mexican government, in the Santa Rosa mts. of E. Chihuahua.

Customs and Beliefs.—The Kickapoo lived in fixed villages, occupying bark houses in the summer and flag-reed oval lodges during the winter. They raised corn, beans, and squashes, and while dwelling on the E. side of the Mississippi they often wandered out on the plains to hunt buffalo. On these hunting trips they came to know the horse, and previous to the Civil war they had gone as far as Texas for the sole purpose of stealing horses and mules from the Comanche. No other Algonquians of the central group were more familiar with the Indians of the plains than the Kickapoo; and yet, with all this contact, their culture has remained essentially the same as that of the Sauk and the Foxes.

Like the Sauk and Foxes they believe in a cosmic substance prevailing throughout all nature, and the objects endowed with the mystic property are given special reverence. Far in the past they claim to have practised the Midéwiwin; but to-day their most sacred ceremony is the Kigá-novin, the feast dance of the clans. The dog is held in special veneration and is made an object of sacrifice and offering to the manitos. The mythology is rich, and is characterized by a mass of beast fable. The great cosmic myth centers about the death of the younger brother of the culture-hero, whose name is Wisea ká. To him they attribute all the good things of this world and the hope of life in the spirit world, over which the younger brother presides. The brothers are idealized as youths.

The gentile system prevailed, and marriage was outside of the gens. The name had an intimate connection with the gens, and children followed the gens of the father. The gentes to-day are Water, Tree, Berry, Thunder, Man, Bear, Elk, Turkey, Bald-eagle, Wolf, and Fox.

Population.—In 1759 the population of the Kickapoo was estimated at about 3,000; in 1817 at 2,000, and in 1825 at 2,200. Since the last-mentioned date they have greatly decreased. In 1875 those in Kansas and Indian Ter. together, including all of those recently brought from Mexico, were officially reported to number 706, while 100 more were supposed to be in Mexico, making a total for the tribe of about 800. In 1885 those in the United States numbered about 500, of whom 235 were in Kansas, while the Mexican band in Indian Ter. (including some Potawatomi) numbered about 325. It is supposed that there were at the same time about 200 living in Mexico. Those in the United States in 1905 were officially reported at 432, of whom 247 were in Oklahoma and 185 in Kansas. There are supposed to be about 400 or more in Mexico. Within the last two years there has been considerable effort by private parties to procure the removal of the Oklahoma band also to Mexico.

The following are known as Kickapoo villages: Etnataek (with Sauk and Foxes), Kickapougowi, and Necongá.

Kicking Bear. A Sioux medicine-man of Cheyenne River agency, S. Dak., who acquired considerable notoriety as leader of a hostile band and priest of the Ghost-dance craze among the Sioux in 1890. He organized and led the first dance at Sitting Bull's camp on Standing Rock res., and was prominent in the later hostilities, for which he was afterward held for some time as a military prisoner. See Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896.

Kicking Bird (Téné-angpóte). A Kiowa chief. He was the grandson of a Crow captive who was adopted into the tribe, and early distinguished himself by his mental gifts. In tribal traditions and ceremonial rites he was a thorough adept, and as a warrior he won a name, but had the sagacity to see the hopelessness of the struggle with the whites and used all his influence to induce the tribe to submit to inevitable conditions. He signed the first agreement to accept a reservation on Aug. 15, 1865, at Wichita, and the treaty concluded at Medicine Lodge on Oct. 21, 1867, definitively fixing the Kiowa-Comanche-Apache res. in the present Oklahoma. In the resistance to removal to the reservation in 1868 and in the subsequent raids into Texas he took no part. When the Federal authorities in 1873 failed to carry out their agreement to release the Kiowa chiefs imprisoned in Texas, he lost faith in the Government and was tempted to join the expeditions against the Tonkawa tribe and the white buffalo-hunters of Texas in 1874; but when Lone Wolf decided to join the hostiles who were defying United States troops, Kicking Bird induced two-thirds of the tribe to return with him to the agency at Ft. Sill, and was treated thenceforth as the head chief of the Kiowa, Lone Wolf's offer to surrender and join the friendlies being refused. He invited and assisted in the establishment of the first school among the Kiowa in 1873. At one time when his constant advocacy of peace brought him into disrepute and the charges that he was a woman and a coward caused his counsels to be treated with contempt, he gathered a band for a Texas raid and fought a detachment of troops victoriously, regaining his old repute for courage and success in war. He died suddenly, by poison if the suspicions of his friends were just, on May 5, 1875, and at the request of his family was buried with Christian rites.—Mooney in 17th Rep., B. A. E., II, 190, 216, 252, 1898.

Kinbiniyol (Navaho: kin 'pueblo house', bi 'its', niyol 'whirlwind': 'Whirlwind pueblo'.—Matthews). One of the best preserved of the pueblo ruins of the Chaco canyon group in s. w. New Mexico. It is not in the canyon proper, but in the basin of an arroyo tributary to it. The ruin lies 500 yds. e. of the wash, at the base of a low mesa, about 10 m. w. and 5 m. s. of Pueblo Bonito. It is rectangular in form, having 3 wings extending to the s., one at the center and one at each extremity of the main building. The exterior dimensions of the parallelogram occupied by the building are approximately 320 by 270 ft. The 2 courts formed by the wings are 91 by 125 and 76 by 83 ft respectively, the former being inclosed by a low wall, the latter open. Ten circular kivas are built within the walls of the structure, the largest being 26 ft in diameter and the smallest 15 ft. The largest rectangular room is 16½ by 17 ft, the smallest 7 by 11 ft. The walls of the ruin stand 30 ft above the plain. Of the n. exterior wall 120 ft are still standing to above the second story. Parts of a fourth story wall are still in place. Probably half the original walls are still standing. The doors average 22 by 34 in. in size, the windows 8 by 12 in. Walls and corners are true to the plummet and try-square, an exceptional occurrence in aboriginal structures. The remains of extensive irrigation works exist in close proximity, the most elaborate that have been observed in the San Juan drainage. (E. L. H.)

King Philip. Metacomb, second son of Massasoit, sachem of the Wampanoag, who attained that office himself through the death of his father and elder brother in 1661-62, and to the English was better known as Philip of Pokanoket, or King Philip. He was the most remarkable of all the Indians of New England. For 9 years after his elevation to the chieftaincy, although accused of plotting against the colonists, he seems to have devoted his energies to observation and preparation rather than to overt actions of a warlike nature. He even acknowledged himself the king's subject. But war with the English was inevitable, and the struggle called King Philip's war (1675-76) broke out, resulting in the practical extermination of the Indians after they had inflicted great losses upon the whites. The ability of King Philip is seen in the plans he made before the war began, the confederacy he formed, and the havoc he wrought among the white settlements. Of 90 towns, 52 were attacked and 12 were completely destroyed. The bravery of the Indians was in many cases remarkable. Only treachery among the natives in all probability saved the colonists from extinction. In the decisive battle, a night attack, at a swamp fortress in Rhode Island, Aug. 12, 1676, the last force of the Indians was defeated with great slaughter, King Philip himself being among the slain. His body was subjected to the indignities usual at that time, and his head is said to have been exposed at Plymouth for 20 years. His wife and little son were sold as slaves in the West Indies. Widely divergent estimates of King Philip's character and achievements have been entertained by different authorities, but he can not but be considered a man of marked abilities. Weeden (Ind. Money, 12, 1884) says: "History has made him 'King Philip,' to commemorate the heroism of his life and death. He almost made himself a king by his marvelous energy and statecraft put forth among the New England tribes. Had the opposing power been a little weaker, he might have founded a temporary kingdom on the ashes of the colonies." King Philip has been the subject of several poems, tales, and histories. The literature includes: Church, History of King Philip's War, 1836; Apes, Eulogy on King Philip, 1836; Freeman, Civilization and Barbarism, 1878; Markham, Narrative History of King Philip's War, 1883. (A. F. C.)

Kings River Indians. A collective term for Indians on Tule River res., Cal., in 1885, embracing the tribes formerly on and about Kings r., some at least of whom were the Choinimni, Wachahet, Iticha, Chukaimina, Michahai, Holkoma, Tuhukmache, Pohoniche, and Wilmilche, according to Wessells (Sen. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 31, 1853). The number gathered under this name, together with the Wikhamni and Kawia, was 135 in 1884.

Kinklishin (Navaho, 'black house'). An important pueblo ruin of the Chaco canyon group of n. w. New Mexico, 64 m. w. and 2 m. s. of Pueblo Bonito. It is not in the canyon, but stands, facing e., on a sand hill 200 yds. w. of a dry wash which enters the Chaco about 4 m. below. Its length was 145 ft, greatest width 50 ft. A semicircular wall, 450 ft long, connects the n. e. and s. e. corners, inclosing an irregular court. In the wall at a point 285 ft from the s. e. corner of the building was a circular tower, 4 or 5 ft in diameter, which must have been from 20 to 30 ft high. On the w. side 50 ft of exterior wall still stands, 26 ft above the débris and 38 ft above ground. The wall is 36 in. thick at the base, diminishing in thickness a few inches at the base of each additional story. Portions of a fourth-story wall still stand; the original height was 5 stories. The masonry, which is of dark-brown sandstone, consists of alternating courses of large and small stones. There are 3 small windows, 6 by 8 in. Four circular kivas, 10 by 16 ft in diameter, are built within the walls, and one, 35 ft in diameter, partly within the front wall and partly within the court. The smaller kivas are built within rectangular rooms, and the space between the room and the kiva walls is filled in with masonry. An ancient system of irrigation works, consisting of stone dam, wasteway reservoir, and ditches, is plainly traceable. (E. L. H.)

Kinklik.—Schrader (1900) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 1902. Kinklik.—Baker, ibid.

Kinipetu ('wet country'). A central Eskimo tribe on the w. coast of Hudson bay, extending s. from Chesterfield inlet 250 m. They hunt deer and muskoxen, using the skins for clothing and kaiaik covers, coming to the coast only in winter when seals are easily taken.

Agutit.—Petitot in Bib. Ling. et Ethnog. Am., III, x, 1876. Kiaknuamiut.—Boas in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Kinkash. A Potawatomi band, so named in treaties of 1832 and 1836. Their village or reservation, which was sold to the United States in 1836, was on Tippecanoe r., Kosciusko co., Ind.

Kin-Kash.—Tippecanoe treaty (1832) in U. S. Ind. Treaties, 701, 1873. Kin-kraah.—Chippewaynaung treaty (1836), ibid., 713.

Kinkletsoi (Navaho: 'yellow house'). A small pueblo ruin about $\frac{1}{4}$ m. n. w. of Pueblo Bonito, on the n. side of the arroyo, at the base of the canyon wall, in Chaco canyon, n. w. N. Mex. Its ground-plan is a perfect parallelogram, with no inner court. Its dimensions are 135 by 100 ft, and originally it probably contained 4 stories; fragments of the third story walls are still standing from 20 to 25 ft above the ground. The masonry consists of blocks of yellow sandstone, averaging 8 by 5 by 3 in., fairly well shaped and laid in adobe mortar. The pueblo walls are from 18 to 24 in. thick. The remaining doorways, all interior, average 27 by 42 in. Three circular kivas, 18 to 22 ft in diameter, are built within the walls. It is Ruin No. 8 of Jackson (10th Rep. Hayden Surv., 1878). (E. L. H.)

Kinnasinde (probably Kinazhi, or Kiniazhi, 'little pueblo'). The Navaho name of a small, ancient, circular pueblo near Kintyel (q. v.), Ariz.; believed to have been occupied by the people of the latter place as a summer settlement. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., pl. LXVI, 91, 1891; Fewkes in 22d Rep. B. A. E., 134, 1904.

Kinna-zinde.—Mindeleff, op. cit. Ziani jin'a ä.—Cushing quoted by Powell in 4th Rep. B. A. E., xxxviii, 1886 (confused with Kintye).

Kinnikinnick. An Indian preparation of tobacco, sumac leaves, and the inner bark of a species of dogwood, used for smoking by the Indians and the old settlers and hunters in the W. The preparation varied in different localities and with different tribes. Bartlett quotes Trumbull as saying: "I have smoked half a dozen varieties of kinnikinnick in the N. W., all genuine." The word, which has as variants, kinnik-kinnik, k'nickk'neck, kinnikinik, killikinnick, etc., is derived from one of the Cree or Chippewa dialects of Algonquian. The literal signification is, 'what is mixed.' In Chippewa, knikininye means 'he mixes,' from the radical kinika, 'mixed.' The name was also applied by the white hunters, traders, and settlers to various shrubs, etc., the bark or leaves of which are employed in the mixture: Red osler (Cornus stolonifera), bearberry (Arctostaphylos uva-ursi), silky cornel (Cornus sericea), ground dogwood (C. canadensis). Matthews (Am. Anthropol., v, 170, 1903) maintains that the ordinary source of kinnikinnick was not the red willow, as has often been said, but the silky cornel, a species of dogwood, bearing, especially in winter, a marked resemblance to the red-bark willow. See Smoking, Tobacco.

Kinship. The foundation of social organization, and hence of government, the tangible form of social organization, was originally the bond of real and legal blood kinship. The recognition and perpetuation of the ties of blood kinship were the first important steps in the permanent social organization of society.

Among the North American Indians kinship is primarily the relation subsisting between two or more persons whose blood is derived from common ancestors through lawful marriage. Persons between whom kinship subsists are called kin or kindred. Kinship may be lineal or collateral. By birth through the natural order of descent kindred are divided into generations or categories, which represent lineally and collaterally relationships or degrees of kinship, which in turn are sometimes modified by the age and the sex of the persons so affected. In noting the degrees of kinship in the direct line all systems appear to agree in assigning one degree to a generation. Thus is developed a complex system of relationships. The extent and the complexity of the system in any case vary with the social organization of the people. These degrees of kinship may be called relationships, and they define more or less clearly the station, rights, and obligations of the several individuals of the kinship group specified. The distinction between relationship and kinship must not be confused, for there are persons who are related but who do not belong to the same kin.

In speaking of the entire body of a group of kindred it is necessary that reference be made to some person, the propositus, as the starting point. In general every person belongs naturally to two distinct families (see Family) or kinship groups, namely, that of the father and that of the mother. These two groups of kindred, which before his birth were entirely distinct for the purposes of marriage and the inheritance of property and certain other rights, privileges, and obligations, unite in his person and thereafter form only subdivisions of his general group of kindred, and both these groups share with him the rights, privileges, and obligations of kindred.

There are two radically different methods of naming these relationships; the one is called the classificatory, the other the descriptive method. In the descriptive phrase the actual relationship becomes a matter of implication—that is, the relationship is made specific either by the primary terms of relationship or by a combination of them. Under the first, kindred are never described, but are classified into categories and the same term of relationship is applied to every person belonging to the same category. In the descriptive system of naming kinship degrees there is usually found a number of classificatory terms.

There has been prevalent hitherto among many ethnologists the opinion that the tracing of descent through the paternal line is in most cases a development from the system of tracing descent exclusively through females, and that, therefore, the latter system is antecedent and more primitive than the former. But it is not at all clear that there has been adduced in support of this contention any conclusive evidence that it is a fact or that either system has been transformed from the other; but it is evident that such an improbable procedure would have caused the disregard and rupture of a vast body of tabus—of tabus among the most sacred known, namely, the tabus of incest.

The kinship system in vogue among the Klamath Indians of California and Oregon is apparently typical of those tribes in which, like the Kiowa, both the clan and the gentile systems of kinship are wanting. This lack of either system, so far as known, is characteristic of nearly all the tribes of the plains, the Pacific slope, and the N.W. coast. The Klamath system recognizes only two degrees in ascending above and only two in descending below the propositus in the direct line, and four collateral degrees of the paternal line, that of father's brothers, that of father's uncles, and then that of father's sisters and that of father's aunts; and four collateral degrees of the maternal line, that of mother's sisters, that of mother's aunts, that of mother's brothers, and that of mother's uncles, or eight collateral degrees in all. Hence in reckoning descent below himself in the direct line the offspring of propositus recognizes one degree of kinship below the lower of the two admitted by his father; but in the ascending direct line, the offspring of propositus does not recognize as a relation the higher of the two admitted by his father. So that in this system the circle of relationships shifts with the person selected as the starting point of the reckoning. The father recognizes relations which his child does not admit, and the child recognizes relations which the father does not admit.

Where the blood ties appear to be so limited and so disregarded in the social organization, the cohesion of the tribe is accomplished more or less satisfactorily through military, religious, or other societies.

In North America those tribes among whom the clan system prevailed, with the tracing of descent through the female line, became the most important peoples of modern times. The Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma and the Iroquois peoples are examples of this.

Among the Omaha a man must not marry in his own gens. A law of membership requires that a child belong to its father's gens. This is descent in the male line, but children of white or black persons (negroes) belong to the gens of the mother, into which they are forbidden to marry. Moreover, a stranger can not belong to any gens of the tribe because there is no ceremony of adoption into a gens. A man is prohibited from marrying a woman of the gens of his father, as the women of this gens are his grandmothers, aunts, sisters, nieces, daughters, or granddaughters. For the same reason he can not marry a woman of the gens of his father's mother, but he can marry a woman belonging to any other gens of his paternal grandmother's phratry, as she would not be of his kindred.

Consanguineous or blood kinship embraces not only the gens of the father, but also that of the mother and grandmothers, and these kindred with reference to a man fall into fourteen groups, and with reference to a woman into fifteen groups.

Among the Omaha, within the phratry in which gentes exist, those who occupy the one side of the fire are not regarded as full kindred by those occupying the other side of the fire, and they are prohibited from intermarrying. But were it not for the institution of these gentes or quasi-kindred groups within the phratry, a man would be compelled to marry outside of his tribe, for the reason that all the women of the tribe would otherwise be his kindred through the previous intermarriages among the ten original "gentes" or phratryes.

The Omaha kinship system may be taken as typical of the gentile organization, tracing descent through the male line. In this system the relationships are highly complex and the terms, or rather their approximate English equivalents, denotive of these relationships are employed with considerable latitude and in quite a different manner from their use in English. For example: If the propositus be a male or a female, he or she would call all men his or her 'fathers' whom his or her father would call 'brothers', or whom his or her mother would call her potential 'husbands.' He or she would call all women his or her 'mothers' whom his or her mother would call 'sisters', 'aunts', or 'nieces', or whom his or her father would call his potential 'wives.' Moreover, he or she would call all men 'brothers' who are the sons of such fathers or mothers, and their sisters would be his or her 'sisters.' He or she would call all men his or her 'grandfathers' who are the fathers or grandfathers of his or her fathers or mothers, or whom his or her fathers or mothers would call their mothers' 'brothers.' He or she would also call all women his or her 'grandmothers' who are the real or potential wives of his or her grandfathers, or who are the mothers or grandmothers of his or her fathers or mothers, or whom his or her fathers would call their fathers' 'sisters.'

If the propositus be a male he would call all males his 'sons' who are the sons of his brothers or of his potential wives, and the sisters of these sons are his 'daughters.' If the propositus be a female person she would call all children of her sisters her 'children', because their father is or their fathers are her potential or actual husband or husbands; and she would call those males her 'nephews' who are the sons of her brothers, and the daughters of her brothers would be her 'nieces.'

If the propositus be a male, he would call his sister's son his 'nephew' and her daughter his 'niece'; but whether male or female, the propositus would call all male and female persons who are the children of his sons, daughters, nephews, or nieces, 'grandchildren'; and, in like manner, he or she would call all men 'uncles' whom his or her mothers would call their 'brothers', and would call all female persons 'aunts' who are his or her father's sisters as well as those who are the wives of his or her uncles. But the father's sisters' husbands of a male person are his brothers-in-law, because they are the actual or potential husbands of his sisters; and when the propositus is a female person they are her actual or potential husbands.

Any female person whom a man's own wife calls 'elder sister' or 'younger sister', her father's sister, or her brother's daughter is his potential wife.

Any male person whom a man's wife would call 'elder brother' or 'younger brother' is his brother-in-law; also any other male person who is the brother of his wife's niece or of his brother's wife. But his wife's father's brother is his grandfather, not his brother-in-law, although his sister is his potential wife. When his brother-in-law is the husband of his father's sister or of his own sister, his sister is his grandchild, and not his potential wife. A male person is the brother-in-law of a man if he be the husband of the sister of the other's father, since that man could marry his (the other's own) sister, but his aunt's husband is not his brother-in-law when he is his own uncle or his mother's brother. Any male person is the brother-in-law of the man whose sister is his wife. But since his sister's niece's husband is his sister's potential or actual husband, he is his son-in-law, because he is his daughter's husband.

A male or female person would call any male person his or her 'son-in-law' who is the husband of his or her daughter, niece, or grandchild, and his father is his or her son-in-law. When a male person or a female person would call the father of his or her daughter-in-law his or her 'grandfather,' her brother is his or her grandson.

A male or female person would call any other female person who is the wife of his or her son, nephew, or grandson, his or her 'daughter-in-law'; and the mother of his or her son-in-law is so called by him or her.

The father, mother's brother, or grandfather of a man's wife, of his potential wife, or of his daughter-in-law (the last being the wife of his son, nephew, or grandson) is the grandfather (or father-in-law) of that man. Any female person who is the mother, mother's sister, or grandmother of a man's wife, of his potential wife, or of his daughter-in-law (a wife of his son, nephew, or of his grandson) is the grandmother (or mother-in-law) of that man.

By the institution of either the clan (q. v.) or the gens system of determining and fixing degrees of relationship, kinship through males or through females acquired increased importance, because under either form of organization it signified 'clan kin' or 'gentile kin' in contradistinction to non-gentile kin. The members of either were an organized body of consanguinei bearing a common clan or gentile name, and were bound together by ties of blood and by the further bond of mutual rights, privileges, and obligations characteristic of the clan or the gens. In either case, 'clan kin' or 'gentile kin' became superior to other kin, because it invested its members with the rights, privileges, and obligations of the clan or gens.

Where a man calls his mother's sister 'mother', and she in turn calls him her 'son', although she did not in fact give him birth, the relationship must in strictness be defined as a marriage relationship and not as a blood relationship. Under the clan or the gentile system of relationships kinship was traced equally through males and through females, but a broad distinction was made between the paternal and the maternal kindred, and the rights, privileges, and obligations of the members of the line through which descent was traced were far more real and extensive than were those of the other line. Among North American Indians kinship through males was recognized just as constantly as kinship through females. There were brothers and sisters, grandfathers and grandmothers, grandsons and granddaughters, traced through males as well as through females. While the mother of a child was readily ascertainable, the father was not, but because of this uncertainty, kinship through males was not therefore rejected, and probable fathers, probable brothers, and probable sons were placed in the category of real fathers, real brothers, and real sons.

In every Iroquois community the degree of security and of distinction which every member of the community enjoyed, depended chiefly on the number, the wealth, and the power of his kindred, hence the tie uniting the members of the kinship group was not lightly or arbitrarily broken.

It appears that where the clan organization is in vogue the adoption (q. v.) of alien persons was customary.

With descent in the female line a male person had in his clan grandfathers and grandmothers, mothers, brothers and sisters, uncles, rarely nephews and nieces, and grandsons and granddaughters, some lineal and some collateral; at the same time, with the exception of uncles, he had the same relationships outside of his clan, and fathers, aunts, sons and daughters, and cousins, in addition. A woman had the same relationships in the clan as a man, and in addition sons and daughters; and at the same time she had the same relationships outside of her clan as had the man.

In certain communities there are terms in use applied to polyandrous and polygynous marriage relations. For instance, in Klamath the term p'tekēp denotes (1) the relationship of the two or more wives of a man, and (2) the relationship of two or more men (who may be brothers) who marry sisters or a single woman among them. And in the Cree the term n't'ayim, employed by both men and women, signifies 'my (sexual) partner'; for example, a wife will apply this term to the cowife of the husband or husbands; and the term nikusdk is applied by one man to another with whom he shares a wife or wives, or to whom he has loaned his own wife. This term is employed also as a term of friendship among men.

The distinction between one's own father and mother and the other persons so called was sometimes marked by the use of an explanatory adjective, 'real,' 'true,' or the like; sometimes by calling all the others 'little fathers' or 'little mothers.'

The following chart, which applies especially to the Haida, may be taken as typical of a two-clan system with female descent, self being male:

In paternal succession analogous series of terms of relationship develop.

The persons belonging to one's own clan being accounted blood relations, marriage with any of them was not permitted, and where there were many clans this prohibition usually extended to the father's clan also. After marriage, terms of affinity corresponding to 'father-in-law,' 'mother-in-law,' 'brother-in-law,' and 'sister-in-law,' were applied not only to persons who could be so designated in English, but to all members of the same clans of corresponding age and sex as well. Where there were but two clans the terms of affinity might be applied to those who had previously been known as uncles, aunts, uncles' children, nephews, and nieces, as indicated in the above table.

Where clans did not exist blood relationship was recognized on both sides as far as the connection could be remembered, and marriage with any person within this circle was, generally speaking, less usual than with one entirely outside, though such marriages were not everywhere prohibited, and in some cases were actually preferred. There was the same custom, however, of extending the terms of relationship to groups of individuals, such as the brothers of one's father, and the sisters of one's mother. Among the Salish tribes of British Columbia, who appear to have had a special fondness for recording genealogies, the number of terms of relationship is very greatly increased. Thus four or even five generations back of that of the parents and below that of the children are marked by distinct terms, and there are distinguishing terms for the first, second, third, and youngest child, and for the uncle, aunt, etc., according as one's father, mother, or other relative through whom the relationship exists is living or dead, and different terms for a living and a dead wife. There are thus 25 terms of relationship among the Lillooet, 28 among the Shuswap, and 31 among the Squamish. By way of illustration, the kinship system of the last-mentioned tribe is subjoined (see Boas in Rep. on N. W. Tribes of Can., 136, 1890):

1. Direct relationship. Haukwēyuk, great-great-grandparent or great-great-great grandchild; tsopeyuk, great-great-grandparent or great-great-grandchild; stshamik, great-grandparent or great-grandchild; seel, grandfather, grandmother, great-uncle, or great-aunt; emats, grandchild, grandnephew, or grandniece; man, father; chisha, mother; men, child; seentl, eldest child; anonatsh, second child; menchechit, third child; saut, youngest child; kupkuopits, brothers, sisters, and cousins together; kuopits, elder brother or sister, or father's or mother's elder brother's or sister's child; stak, younger brother or sister, or father's or mother's younger brother's or sister's child; mchoilt, cousin.

2. Indirect relationship. (A) When the intermediate relative is alive: sisi, father's or mother's brother or sister; staeall, brother's or sister's child; chemash, wife's or husband's cousin, brother, or sister; or cousin's brother's or sister's wife or husband; saak, son-in-law, daughter-in-law, father-in-law, or mother-in-law; skuewas, any relative of a husband or wife.

(B) When the intermediate relative is dead: uotsaeqoil, father's or mother's brother or sister; minemaitl, brother's or sister's child; chiaie, wife's or husband's cousin, brother, or sister, or cousin's brother's or sister's wife or husband; slikoail, son-in-law, daughter-in-law, father-in-law, or mother-in-law.

3. Indirect affinity. Skeel, wife's grandfather or grandmother, or stepfather's or stepmother's father or mother; skaman, aunt's husband or stepfather; skechisha, uncle's wife or stepmother; skemen, stepchild; skemats, grandson's or granddaughter's wife or husband; skeesak, wife's or husband's stepfather or stepmother, or stepchild's husband or wife.

It will be noted that many of these are reciprocal terms, and such were very common in Indian kinship systems, used between persons of different generations, as above, or sometimes between persons of opposite sex of the same generation, such as husband and wife. Out of 14 terms in Klamath and Modoc 11 are reciprocal. On the other hand, persons of different sexes will often indicate the same relative, such as a father or a mother, by entirely different terms, and different terms are applied to those of a person's own phratry and to members of the opposite one, while the Iroquois use the equivalent for 'brother' for persons inside and outside the tribe indiscriminately. In all tribes, no matter how organized, a distinction is made between the elder and the younger members of the generation of self, at least between older and younger members of the same sex.

The terms corresponding to 'grandfather' and 'grandmother,' except among a few peoples, like the Salish, were extended to all those of a generation older than that of the parents and sometimes even to persons of that generation, while the term for 'grandchild' was applied to very young people by old ones quite indiscriminately. There were also terms to indicate the potential relationship of husband and wife, applied by a man to his wife's sisters, his aunt, or his niece, not because she was or had been, but because she might become, his wife, as usually happens to the wife's sister after the wife's death.

Besides the natural import of terms of kinship, they were employed metaphorically in a great number of ways, as to indicate respect, to avoid the use of a man's personal name, to indicate the clan or phratry to which a person belonged, or to indicate the possession of special privileges. Naturally enough, they often took the place of clan or even tribal designations, a fact which undoubtedly has led to serious errors in attempts to trace the history of Indian tribes. Again, they were applied to animals or supernatural beings, and with the Haida this use was intended to mark the fact that the being in question belonged to such and such a phratry or that a representation of it was used as a crest in that phratry. As this classification of animals by phratries or clans is often traced back to the intermarriage of a human being and an animal, we have an extension of the idea of kinship quite beyond any civilized conceptions. Kintecaw, Kintecoy, Kinte Kaye, Kinticks. See Cuntico.

Kintpuash ('having the water-brash'—Gatschet; also spelled Keintpoos, but commonly known as Captain Jack). A subchief of the Modoc on the Oregon-California border, and leader of the hostile element in the Modoc war of 1872-73.

The Modoc, a warlike and aggressive offshoot from the Klamath tribe of s. e. Oregon, occupied the territory immediately to the s. of the latter, extending across the California border and including the Lost r. country and the famous Lava-bed region. They had been particularly hostile to the whites up to 1864, when, under the head chief Sconchin, they made a treaty agreeing to go upon a reservation established on Upper Klamath lake jointly for them and the Klamath tribe. The treaty remained unratified for several years, and in the meantime Jack, with a dissatisfied band numbering nearly half the tribe and including about 70 fighting men, continued to rove about the Lost r. country, committing frequent depredations and terrorizing the settlers. He claimed as his authority for remaining, in spite of the treaty, a permission given by an Indian agent on the California side. With some difficulty he was finally induced in the spring of 1870 to go with his band upon the reservation, where the rest of the tribe was already established under Sconchin. He remained but a short time, however, and soon left after killing an Indian doctor, who, he said, was responsible for two deaths in his own family. He returned to Lost r. demanding that a reservation be assigned to him there on the ground that it was his home country and that it was impossible to live on friendly terms with the Klamath. One or two conferences were arranged both by the military and civil authorities, but without shaking his purpose, and it became evident that he was planning for a treacherous outbreak at the first opportunity. At a final conference, Nov. 27, 1872, he absolutely refused to go on the reservation or to discuss the matter longer, and the attitude of the Indians was so threatening that an order was sent the military at Ft Klamath to put him and his head men under arrest. The attempt was made by Capt. Jackson with 36 cavalymen at Jack's camp on Lost r., Oreg., Nov. 29, but the Indians resisted, killing or wounding 8 soldiers with a loss to themselves of 15. The Modoc, led by Jack, fled into the impenetrable Lava-beds on the s. shore of Rhett (Modoc or Tule) lake, just across the California border, killing a number of settlers on the way. Those under Sconchin remained quietly on the reservation.

KINTPUASH (AFTER MEACHAM)

The war was now begun, and volunteer companies were organized to assist the small body of troops available. A number of friendly Modoc, Klamath, and other Indians also enlisted. The Modoc position was so strong with rocks and caves and hidden passages that it was practically impossible for the troops to enter with any prospect of success. On Dec. 22, 1872, the Indians attacked a wagon train with ammunition supplies and a skirmish ensued in which one or two were killed on each side. On Jan. 17, 1873, an attempt was made by Col. Greer to storm the Modoc stronghold by the entire force of regulars and volunteers, numbering nearly 400 men, assisted by a howitzer battery, but after fighting all day among the rocks against a concealed foe the troops were obliged to retire with the loss of 9 killed and 30 wounded.

Soon afterward civil indictments for murder were procured by the settlers against 8 Modocs concerned in the killing of settlers. Another conference was appointed under a regular peace commission, consisting of Gen. E. R. S. Canby, Indian superintendent A. B. Meacham, Rev. E. Thomas, and Indian agent L. S. Dyar. By agreement with Jack, the commissioners, together with Frank F. Riddle and his Indian wife, Toby (Winema), as interpreters, met Jack and several of his men near the Modoc camp, Apr. 11, 1873, to debate terms of settlement. Hardly had the talk begun when, by premeditated treachery, Jack gave a signal, and drawing a revolver from his breast shot General Canby dead, while his companions attacked the other commissioners, killing Mr Thomas and putting 5 bullets into Meacham, who fell unconscious. The others escaped, pursued by the Indians until the latter were driven off by a detachment of troops who came up just in time, one of the officers having already been killed in the same treacherous fashion by another party of the same band.

Active measures were now put into operation and a company of Warm Spring Indian scouts from N. Oregon, under Donald McKay, was secured to assist the troops in penetrating the maze of the Lava-beds. With these and the aid of the field guns the Modoc were soon compelled to vacate their stronghold and take refuge in the rocks farther along the lake shore. On Apr. 26 a search detachment of about 85 men, under Lieuts. Thomas and Wright, was suddenly attacked by the Indians from cover, with the loss of 26 killed, including both officers, besides 16 wounded. In consequence of this defeat Col. Jefferson C. Davis, in command of the Department of the Columbia, restored control of operations to Col. Wheaton, who had been temporarily superseded by another officer. Other minor encounters took place, in one of which Jack in person led the attack, clad in the uniform which he had stripped from Gen. Canby. By this time the Indians were tired of fighting, and many of Jack's warriors had deserted him, while he, with the rest, had vacated the Lava-beds entirely and taken up a new position about 20 m. farther s. The pursuit was kept up, and on May 22, 1873, a party of 65 hostiles surrendered, including several of the most prominent leaders. Others came in later, and on June 1 Jack himself, with his whole remaining party, surrendered to Capt. Perry at a camp some miles e. of Clear lake, N. W. Cal. The whole military force then opposed to him numbered 985 regulars and 71 Indians, while he himself had never had more than about 80 warriors, who were now reduced to 50, besides about 120 women and children. The whites had lost 65 killed, soldiers and civilians, including two Indian scouts, with 63 wounded, several mortally. The Modoc prisoners were removed to Ft Klamath, where, in July, 6 of the leaders were tried by court-martial for the murder of Gen. Canby, Mr Thomas, and the settlers, and 4 of them condemned, namely, Jack, young Sconchin, Black Jim, and Boston Charley, who were hanged together Oct. 3, 1873, thus closing what Bancroft calls "their brave and stubborn fight for their native land and liberty—a war in some respects the most remarkable that ever occurred in the history of aboriginal extermination." The remainder of the band were not permitted to rejoin their people on Klamath res., but were deported to the s. e. corner of Oklahoma, where a part of them still remain. See Modoc. Kintyel (Navaho: K'inyti, or K'inyti'li, from kin 'pueblo house', tyel 'broad': 'broad house.'—Matthews). An unusually large, ancient, circular pueblo ruin on Leroux wash, about 23 m. n. of Navajo station, on the S. F. Pac. R. R., Ariz. According to Zuñi tradition the village was built by the Hleetakwe, during the migration of the Bear, Crane, Frog, Deer, Yellow-wood, and other Zuñi clans. The Zuñi origin of the pueblo has been borne out by archeological study of the ruins. See Cushing in 4th Rep. B. A. E., xxxviii, 1886; Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 91-94, 1891; Fewkes in 22d Rep. Kinugamiut. An Eskimo tribe of Alaska, inhabiting the region of C. Prince of Wales on Kaviak penin. About 1860 they overran the country as far as Selawik r., oppressing other tribes and collecting annual tribute from the Kaviagmiut. They now visit the shores of Kotzebue sd. to barter with the inland tribes, and are the keenest traders among the Eskimo and the most vicious, perhaps from longer intercourse with whalers. Their dialect is more guttural than that of the Kaviag-miut and other tribes of Alaska, resembling that of the Yuit. They numbered 400 in 1880, 652 in 1890. Their villages are: Eidenu, Kingegan, Mitletukeruk, Nuk, Pikta, Shishmaref, Sinauk, and Takchuk. For illustrations of types see Eskimo.

Kinyaah (Navaho: K'yaah', 'high house.'—Matthews). A small ruined pueblo about 30 m. s. and 5 m. w. of Pueblo Bonito, on the Thoreau road, n. w. New Mexico. It is in the Chaco drainage, but on an open plain. The ruin is rectangular, 165 by 90 ft, and without an inclosed court; the foundations are true to the cardinal points and a perfect parallelogram. Some circular depressions indicate the former presence of kivas. A small wing 30 ft square is at the s. e. corner of the building. A portion of the w. wall stands 30 ft high and partly incloses a large kiva which still stands 3 stories high. The material is dark-brown laminated sandstone, which must have been brought from the mountains 3 m. away. The stones used were the largest employed in the construction of any of the Chaco canyon group of buildings, to which group Kinyaah is evidently related by all cultural affinities that have been discovered. Some small pueblo ruins exist near by, and a large irrigation ditch and two reservoirs are discernible. (E. L. H.)

Kio. The Pine clan of the pueblo of Jemez, N. Mex. A corresponding clan existed also at the former related pueblo of Pecos.

Kiota. Mentioned in connection with the Shasta and several small Athapascan tribes of s. Oregon as being hostile to white settlers in 1854. They numbered only 8 and their name was possibly that of their leader.—Ambrose in H. R. Ex. Doc. 93, 34th Cong., 1st sess., 90, 1856.

Kiowa (from Gd'-i-gwü, or Kd'-i-gwü, 'principal people,' their own name). A tribe at one time residing about the upper Yellowstone and Missouri, but better living on the North Platte. According to the Kiowa account, when they first reached Arkansas r. they found their passage opposed by the Comanche, who claimed all the country to the s. A war followed, but peace was finally concluded, when the Kiowa crossed over to the s. side of the Arkansas and formed a confederation with the Comanche, which continues to the present day. In connection with the Comanche they carried on a constant war upon the frontier settlements of Mexico and Texas, extending their incursions as far s., at least, as Durango. Among all the prairie tribes they were noted as the most predatory and bloodthirsty, and have probably killed more white men in proportion to their numbers than any of the others. They made their first treaty with the Government in 1837, and were put on their present reservation jointly with the Comanche and Kiowa Apache in 1868. Their last outbreak was in 1874-75 in connection with the Comanche, Kiowa Apache, and Cheyenne. While probably known as centering about the upper Arkansas and Canadian in Colorado and Oklahoma, and constituting, so far as present knowledge goes, a distinct linguistic stock. They are noticed in Spanish records as early, at least, as 1732. Their oldest tradition, which agrees with the concurrent testimony of the Shoshoni and Arapaho, locates them about the junction of Jefferson, Madison, and Gallatin forks, at the extreme head of Missouri r., in the neighborhood of the present Virginia City, Mont. They afterward moved down from the mountains and formed an alliance with the Crows, with whom they have since continued on friendly terms. From here they drifted southward along the base of the mountains, driven by the Cheyenne and Arapaho, with whom they finally made peace about 1840, after which they commonly acted in concert with the latter tribes. The Sioux claim to have driven them out of the Black hills, and in 1805 they were reported by Lewis and Clark as never very numerous, they have been greatly reduced by war and disease. Their last terrible blow came in the spring of 1892, when measles and fever destroyed more than 300 of the three confederated tribes.

The Kiowa do not have the gentile system, and there is no restriction as to intermarriage among the divisions, of which they have six, including the Kiowa Apache associated with them, who form a component part of the Kiowa camp circle. A seventh division, the Kuato, is now extinct. The tribal divisions in the order of the camp circle, from the entrance at the E. southward, are Kata, Kogui, Kaigwu, Kingep, Semat (i. e., Apache), and Kongtalyui.

Although brave and warlike, the Kiowa are considered inferior in most respects to the Comanche. In person they are dark and heavily built, forming a marked contrast to the more slender and brighter complexioned prairie tribes farther N. Their language is full of nasal and choking sounds and is not well adapted to rhythmic composition. Their present chief is Gui-pigo, 'Lone Wolf,' but his title is disputed by Apiatan. They occupied the same reservation with the Comanche and Kiowa Apache, between Washita and Red rs., in s. w. Oklahoma; but in 1901 their lands were allotted in severalty and the remainder opened to settlement. Pop. 1,165 in 1905. Consult Mooney, Ghost-dance Religion, 14th Rep. B. A. Kiowa Apache. A small Athapascan tribe, associated with the Kiowa from the earliest traditional period and forming a component part of the Kiowa tribal circle, although preserving its distinct language. They call themselves Na-i-sha'i-dina, 'our people'. In the earliest French records of the 17th century, in Lewis and Clark's narrative, and in their first treaty in 1837, they are called by various forms of 'Gattacka', the name by which they are known to the Pawnee; and they are possibly the Kaskaia, 'Bad Hearts', of Long in 1820. The Kiowa call them by the contemptuous title Semát, 'Thieves', a recent substitute for the older generic term Tagúí, applied also to other Athapascan tribes. They are commonly known as Kiowa Apache, under the mistaken impression, arising from the fact of their Athapascan affinity, that they are a detached band of the Apache of Arizona. On the contrary, they have never had any political connection with the Apache proper, and were probably unaware of their existence until about a century ago. A few Mescalero Apache from New Mexico are now living with them, and individuals of the two tribes frequently exchange visits, but this friendly intimacy is of only 60 or 80 years' standing. The Kiowa Apache did not emigrate from the S. W. into the plains country, but came with the Kiowa from the N. W. plains region, where they lay the scene of their oldest traditions. It is probable that the Kiowa Apache, like the cognate Sarsi, have come down along the E. base of the Rocky mts. from the great Athapascan body of the Mackenzie r. basin instead of along the chain of the sierras, and that, finding themselves too weak to stand alone, they took refuge with the Kiowa, as the Sarsi have done with the Blackfeet. As they are practically a part of the Kiowa in everything but language, they need no extended separate notice. Their authentic history begins nearly 70 years earlier than that of the Kiowa, they being first mentioned under the name Gattacka by La Salle in 1681 or 1682, writing from a post in what is now Illinois. Hesays that the Pana (Pawnee) live more than 200 leagues to the W. on one of the tributaries of the Mississippi, and are "neighbors and allies of the Gattacka and Manrhou, who are S. of their village and who sell to them horses which they probably steal from the Spaniards in New Mexico." It is therefore plain that the Kiowa Apache (and formerly also the Kiowa) ranged even at this early period in the same general region where they were known more than a century later, namely, between the Platte and the frontier of New Mexico, and that they already had horses taken from the Spanish settlements. It appears also that they were then in friendship with the Pawnee, unless, as seems more probable, by Pana is meant the Arikara, an offshoot of the Pawnee proper and old trading friends of the Kiowa and the Kiowa Apache. From the fact that they traded horses to other tribes, and that La Salle proposed to supply himself from them or their neighbors, it is not impossible that they sometimes visited the French post on Peoria lake. In 1719 La Harpe speaks of them, under the name of Quataquois, as living in connection with the Tawakoni and other affiliated tribes in a village on the Cimarron near its junction with the Arkansas, in the present Creek Nation, Okla. In 1805 Lewis and Clark described the Kiowa Apache as living between the

from the Kiowa and attached to the Cheyenne and Arapaho on account of the unfriendly attitude of the Kiowa toward the whites; but the arrangement had no practical force, and in the treaty of Medicine Lodge, in 1867, they were formally reunited with the Kiowa, although a part of them continued to live with the Cheyenne and Arapaho until after the readjustment at the close of the outbreak of 1874-75. In keeping with the general conduct of the tribe they remained peaceable and friendly throughout these troubles. In 1891 their population was 325; together with the Kiowa they suffered terribly in 1892 from an epidemic of measles and fever, losing more than one-fourth of their number. In 1905 they numbered only 155. (J. M.)

The Kiowa then lived on the North Platte, and both tribes had the same alliances and general customs. They were rich in horses, which they sold to the Arikara and Mandan. In 1837, in connection with the Kiowa and Tawakoni, the Kiowa Apache (under the name Kataka) made their first treaty with the Government. Their subsequent history is that of the Kiowa. In 1853 they are mentioned as a warlike band ranging the waters of Canadian r. in the same great plains occupied by the Comanche, with whom they often joined in raiding expeditions. By the treaty of Little Arkansas in 1865 they were detached at their own request Kishi. The Panther clan of the Caddo.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1093, 1896.

Kishkakon (Chippewa: kishki, 'cut' (past participle); ano, from anowe, 'tail to have,' especially a bushy tail; hence, 'those who have cut tails,' referring to the naturally short tail of the bear.—Hewitt). The Bear gens or band of the Ottawa, usually found associated with two other bands, the Sinago or Black Squirrel, and the Keinouche or Pike. In 1658 the Kishkakon were allied with about 500 Christian Tionontati Hurons, who occupied contiguous territory, and they were neighbors of the Potawatomi, who at this time occupied the islands at the outlet of Green bay and the mainland to the southward along the w. shores of L. Michigan. Father Allouez found these three bands occupying a single village at La Pointe du Saint Esprit, near the present Bayfield, Wis., in 1668. For three years the Kishkakon refused to receive the gospel announced to them by Father Allouez; but in the autumn of 1688 they resolved in council to accept the teaching of the Christian doctrine. The Kishkakon, having been invited to winter near the chapel at La Pointe du Saint Esprit, left the other bands to draw near the mission house. Marquette found them divided into five "bourgades." In 1677 they were with the Hurons at Mackinaw, Mich., where in 1736 they had 180 warriors and about 200 in the vicinity of Detroit. They appear to have been more closely affiliated with the Sinago and the Keinouche than with the other Ottawa bands. For their history and customs, see Ottawa.

Kiskitomas. A name for the walnut or hickory nut, formerly common in New Jersey and Long Island. The word has been variously spelled kisky thomas, kis- katomas, kiskytom, cuscatomin, etc. The Canadian French name is noyer tendre ('soft-nut'), referring to the shell of the nut; and

J. H. Trumbull suggests connecting the word with the Abnaki kouskádamen,

'crack with the teeth' (given by Basle), cognate with the Chippewa kishkibidon,

'tear with the teeth,' the Cree kiskikatew,

'it is cut or gnawed.' The terms kisky

thomas and kisky thomnut are folk-etymological corruptions of this Algonquian

word. (A. F. C.)

Kiskominitoes ('plenty of walnuts'.—

Hewitt). A former Delaware village on the n. bank of Ohio r., in Ohio, between Hocking and Scioto rs. The word seems to be identical with Kiskemeneco and Kiskiminetas (q. v.) in Pennsylvania.

On Lattre's map "Kiskowanitas" is located on the e. side of Maumee r., Ohio.

Kitchawank (perhaps akin to Chippewa Kichichtwink, 'at the great mountain'.—W. Jones). Apparently a band or small tribe, or, as Ruttenber designates it, a "chieftaincy" of the Wappinger confederacy, formerly residing on the E. bank of the Hudson in what is now Westchester co., N. Y. Their territory is believed to have extended from Croton r. to Anthony's Nose. Their principal village, Kitchawank, in 1650, appears to have been about the mouth of the Croton, though one authority (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., xiii, 14, 1881) locates it at Sleepy Hollow. They also had a village at Peekskill which they called Sackhoes. Their fort, or "castle," which stood at the mouth of Croton r., has been represented as one of the most formidable and ancient of the Indian fortresses s. of the Highlands. Its exact situation, according to Ruttenber, was at the neck of Teller's, called Senasqua. The Kitchawank were a party to the treaty of peace made with the Dutch, Aug. 30, 1645. (J. M. C. T.)

Kitchigami ('great water,' from kitchi 'great,' gami 'water,' the Chippewa name for L. Superior). A tribe living in 1669-70, about central or s. w. Wisconsin, with the Kickapoo and Mascoutens, with which tribes they were ethnically and linguistically related. Little has been recorded in relation to the Kitchigami, and after a few brief notices of them, chiefly by Fathers Allouez and Marquette, they drop from history, having probably been absorbed by the Mascoutens or the Kickapoo. The first mention of them is in a letter written by Marquette, probably in the spring of 1670 (Jes. Rel. 1670, 90, 1858), in which he says: "The Illinois are thirty days' journey by land from La Pointe, the way being very difficult. They are southwestward from La Point du Saint Esprit. One passes by the nation of the Kitchigamis, who compose more than 20 large lodges, and live in the interior. After that the traveler passes through the country of the Miamiouek [Miami], and traversing great deserts (prairies) he arrives at the country of the Illinois." It appears from his statement that they were at this time at war with the Illinois. In the same Relation (p. 100) it is stated that along Wisconsin r. are numerous other nations; that 4 leagues from there "are the Kickapoos and the Kitchigamis, who speak the same language as the Mascoutens." Tailhan, who is inclined to associate them with the Illinois, says the above statement is confirmed by the inedited relation of P. Beschefer. As neither Marquette nor Allouez speaks of them when they reach the section indicated, but mention the Kickapoo, Mascouten, and Illinois, and as it appears that they had been at war with the Illinois, it is probable that the Kitchigami formed a part of the Kickapoo or the Mascoutens tribe. They are not noted on Marquette's true map, but are located on Thevenot's so-called Marquette map, under the name Kithigami, as immediately w. of the Mississippi, opposite the mouth of Wisconsin r. The fact that they drop so suddenly and entirely from history would indicate that they became known under some other name. (C. T.)

Kithigamiwininiwug ('men of the great lake'). A collective term for those Chippewa formerly living on and near the shores of Lake Superior, in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. By the treaty of Lapointe in 1854 the bands officially recognized as "Chippewas of Lake Superior" were declared to be those living at Fond du Lac (Minnesota), La Pointe, Lac du Flambeau, Lac Court Oreilles (Wisconsin), Desert lake, L'Anse, Ontonagon, Grand Portage, and Bois Forte (Michigan). Their history, except as regards treaty relations with the United States, is the same as that of the southern Chippewa (see Chippewa). By the treaty of Fond du Lac, Minn., Aug. 2, 1847, they joined the Chippewa of the Mississippi in relinquishing their claim to a tract of land about the mouth of Crow Wing r., Minn. By treaty of Lapointe, Wis., Sept. 3, 1854, they ceded all their lands in upper Michigan and N. Wisconsin, the United States agreeing to reserve for the use of each of said bands a specified tract within the ceded area. By act of June 5, 1872, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to remove, with their consent, the bands from Lac du Flambeau, Lac Court d'Oreilles, and Fond du Lac res. to Bad River res., but this removal was not carried into effect, the Indians refusing permission. By Executive Order of Mar. 1, 1873, the reservation in Wisconsin selected for the Lac Court Oreilles band was approved. By order of Dec. 20, 1881, a reservation at Vermillion Lake, Minn., was set aside for the Bois Forte band. The Executive order of June 30, 1883, set apart the Deer Creek res., Minn., for the same band. By agreements of Oct. 24, Nov. 12, and Nov. 21, 1889, the Grand Portage, Bois Forte, and Fond du Lac bands ceded such of their lands at Red Lake, Fond du Lac, Bois Forte, and Deer Creek, as were not needed for allotment. In 1867 they were officially reported to number about 5,560; in 1880, 2,813; in 1905, 4,703.

Kitkehahki ('on a hill.'—Grinnell). One of the tribes of the Pawnee confederacy (q. v.), sometimes called Republican Pawnee, as their villages were at one time on Republican r. Their villages were always w. of those of the Chaui, or up stream, and were spoken of as the upper villages. The tribe lived with its kindred on Loup r., Nebr., where their reservation was established in 1857. In 1875 they were removed to Oklahoma, where they now dwell. In 1892 they took their lands in severalty and became citizens of the United States. In tribal organization, customs, and beliefs the Kitkehahki did not differ from their congeners. Grinnell (Pawnee Hero Stories, 241, 1889) mentions three divisions, the Great Kitkehahki, Little Kitkehahki, and Blackhead Kitkehahki.

Kitksan ('people of Skeena [Ksian] river'). One of the three dialectic divisions of the Chimmesyan stock, affiliated more closely with the Niska than with the Tsimshian proper. The people speaking the dialect live along the upper waters of Skeena r., Brit. Col. Dorsey enumerates the following towns: Kauldaw, Kishgagass, Kishpiyeoux, Kitanmaiksh, Kitwingach, Kitwinskole, and Kitzegukla. To these must be added the modern mission town of Meamskinisht. A division is known as the Glen-Vowell Band. Pop. 1,120 in 1904.

Kitsanaka. Given by Dawson (Queen Charlotte Ids., 134, 1880) as the name of one of four Haida clans, the word being supposed to signify "crow." As there are only two Haida clans, the Raven (Hoya) and the Eagle (Got), and the word for crow is k'aldjida, it is evident that Dawson misunderstood his informant. (J. R. S.)

Kittamaquindi (properly Kittamaquink, 'place of the old great beaver.'—Hewitt). The principal village of the Conoy (Piscataway) in Maryland in 1639. In that year the Jesuits established there a mission, which was removed in 1642 to Potopaco on account of the inroads of the Conestoga and their allies. According to Brinton the village was at the junction of Tinkers cr. with the Piscataway, a few miles above the Potomac, in Prince George co. (J. M.)

Kittamaque-ink.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 27, 1895 (proper form). Kittamaquindi.—Writer of 1639 in White, Relatio Itineris, 63, 1874. Kittamaquindi.—White, ibid., 127, note.

Kittanning ('on the great stream', from kil, 'large, superior'; hanne, 'stream'; ing, the locative). An important village of mixed Iroquois, Delaware, and Caughnawaga, formerly about the site of the present Kittanning, on Allegheny r., in Armstrong co., Pa. It was destroyed by the Pennsylvanians in 1756 after a desperate fight. It seems to have consisted of two or three settlements. The most important, called Upper Kittanning, was on the E. side of the river. Middle Kittanning was on the W. bank. (J. M.)

Soc., n. s., iv, 368, 1834. Kittaning.—Johnson Hall conf., op. cit. Kittanning.—Croghan (?), ca. 1756, in Rupp, West. Pa., 116, 1846. Kittanoes.—Lattre, map, 1784.

Kitteanmut. A village of Christian Indians in the S. part of Plymouth co., Mass., near Monument Ponds, in 1674, perhaps under the dominion of the Wampanoag. See Cotton (1674) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., i, 199, 1806.

Kittisao. The southernmost division and town of the Tsimshian, on the S. side of Swindle id., N. W. of Millbank sd., Brit. Col. The town is now almost deserted. Gyidesdo.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 9, 1889. Kityagoo.—Colyer in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1869, 534, 1870. Kitatus.—Brit. Col. map, Victoria, 1872. Kitistao.—Tolmie and Dawson, Vocab. Brit. Kittawat. A Ntlakyapamuk village near Lytton, Brit. Col., with 4 inhabitants in 1897 (Can. Ind. Aff. Rep.), the last time the name appears.

Kituhwa (Kitūhwā). A former important Cherokee settlement on Tuckasegee r., and extending from above the junction of the Oconaluftee nearly to the present Bryson City, Swain co., N. C. The name, which appears also as Ket-tooah, Kittoa, Kittowa, etc., has lost its meaning. The people of this and the subordinate settlements on the waters of the Tuckasegee were known as Anf-Kit-ūhwagī, and the name was frequently extended to include the whole tribe. For this reason it was adopted in later times as the name of the Cherokee secret organization, commonly known to the whites as the Ketoowah society, pledged to the defence of Cherokee autonomy.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 525, 1900. Kantika.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887. Kettoah.—Mooney, op. cit. Kittoa.—ibid. Kittowa.—Doc. of 1755 quoted by Royce, op. cit., 143.

Kituitsach-hade. A name given by Krause (Tlinkit Indianer, 304, 1885) to a supposed branch of the Haida on Queen Charlotte Ids., Brit. Col. Unidentified.

Kitunahan Family. A linguistic family established by Powell (7th Rep. B. A. E., 85, 1891) to include the single Kutenai tribe (q. v.). The name is adopted from Hale's term, Kitunaha, applied to the tribe. This family has since been found to consist of two tribes with slightly differing dialects, viz., the Upper Kutenai and the Lower Kutenai, the former being properly the Kitōnā'qā, the latter the Ākkoql'ātlqō. Certain other minor differences exist between these two sections. The following family synonyms are chronological. (A. F. C.)

Kiusta (K'iū'sta, 'where the trail comes out' [?]). A former Haida town on the N. W. coast of Moresby id., opposite North id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was owned by the Stustas. Possibly the town given in John Work's list as "Lu-lan-na," with 20 houses and 296 inhabitants in 1836-40, included this place and the neighboring town of Yaku. The old people remember 9 houses as having stood here and 8 at Yaku. After the population of Kiusta had decreased considerably, the remainder went to Kung, in Naden harbor. (J. R. S.)

Kiva. The Hopi name of the sacred ceremonial, assembly, and lounging chamber, characteristic of ancient and modern Pueblo settlements of Arizona and New Mexico and the prehistoric pueblos of Colorado and Utah. They were first described by the early Spanish explorers of the S. W., who designated them estufas, meaning 'hot rooms,' evidently mistaking their chief use as that of sweat-houses. One of the kivas at the pueblo of Taos in 1540 is described by Castañeda (14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896) as containing "12 pillars, 4 of which, in the center, were as large as 2 men could reach around," while "some that were seen were large enough for a game of ball." The kivas of the Rio Grande villages were described as "underground, square or round, with fine pillars," which is largely true to-day. The early Spaniards also state that "the young men lived in the estufas," that "if a man repudiated his woman he has to go to the estufa," and that "it is forbidden for women to sleep in the estufas, or to enter these for any purpose, except to give their husbands or sons something to eat," which is still the case save in the few instances in which kivas are used by women's religious societies or where women are witnesses of the ceremonies. "The kivas," says Castañeda, "belong to the men, while the houses belong to the women." Elsewhere he asserts that the kivas belong to the whole village, meaning that they are not the property of a single individual or household.

The oldest form of kiva seems to have been circular, and some of these are still used in Rio Grande pueblos, as Santo Domingo, Santa Clara, and Nambe, although in this section, where Spanish influence was strongest, the persistence of this type might be least expected. At Zuni and in the Hopi villages, on the other hand, the kivas are rectangular, in the latter wholly or partly underground and usually isolated, in the former partly subterranean and forming part of the village cluster. Originally the Zuni kivas were in the courtyards of the villages, but, probably by reason of Spanish restrictions, their situation was later hidden among the dwellings, where they are today. The number of kivas in a pueblo varied with its size and the number of the religious organizations using them. Oraibi alone has 13 kivas, while some of the smaller pueblos contain but one. Those of the Hopi, which number 33, are rectangular, and are generally so built that they are approximately on a N. and

a. line, the exceptions probably being due to the exigencies of the sites. This latter circumstance, however, is not permitted to interfere with the subterranean or semi-subterranean character of the kivas, for so persistently is this feature preserved that convenience of use is sacrificed for sites that admit of partial excavation in the rock or the sinking of the chamber below the surface of the mesa summit. Kivas contain few wall openings, and these are very small. The chambers are invariably entered by means of a ladder to the roof and another through a hatchway. The roof is supported by beams covered with osiers or boards and adobe mortar well tamped; the floors consist usually of smooth sandstone slabs; the walls, which are sometimes decorated with symbolic paintings of directional animals in directional colors, are wholly or partly surrounded by a solid stone-capped adobe bench, and at one end, behind the ladder, is a low platform or dais. A shallow fire-pit occupies the center of the floor, the hatchway being the only means for the passage of the smoke. At the end of some kivas, facing the ladder, is a small round hole in a stone or slab of cottonwood—the sipapu or shipapulima (the name varying with the language of the tribes)—symbolizing the place of origin and the final place of departure of the Pueblo peoples and the medium of communication with the beings of the underworld. When not in use the sipapu is kept plugged. Behind this orifice an altar, varying with the society and the ceremony, is usually erected, and before it a dry-painting is sometimes made, and numerous symbolic paraphernalia are assembled in prescribed order. See Altar, Ceremony, Pueblos, Shrines.

Klamath (possibly from máklaks, the Lutuami term for 'Indians,' 'people,' ever, many former slaves and members of other tribes who have become more or less assimilated with the Klamath since the establishment of the reservation. Slavery was a notable institution among the Klamath, and previous to the treaty of 1864 they accompanied the Modoc every year on a raid against the Achomawi of Pit r., Cal., for the capture of women and children whom they retained as slaves or bartered with the Chinook at The Dalles. The Klamath took no part in the Modoc war of 1872-73, and it is said that their contemptuous treatment of the Modoc was a main cause of the dissatisfaction of the latter with their homes on the reservation which led to their return to Lost r. and thus to the war. The following are the Klamath settlements and divisions so far as known: Awalakaksaksi, Kohashti, Kulshetgeush, Kuyamskaiks, Nilakshi, Shuyakeksh, Yaaga, and Yulalona. See also Kumbatlash. Klamatuk. An old village, probably belonging to the Comox, on the S. coast of Vancouver id., opposite the E. end of Valdes id.

KLAMATH MEDICINE-MAN

'community'; lit. 'the encamped'). A Lutuamian tribe in S. W. Oregon. They call themselves Eukshikni or Auksni, 'people of the lake,' referring to the fact that their principal seats were on Upper Klamath lake. There were also important settlements on Williamson and Sprague rs. The Klamath are a hardy people and, unlike the other branch of the family, the Modoc, have always lived at peace with the whites. In 1864 they joined the Modoc in ceding the greater part of their territory to the United States and settled on Klamath res., where they numbered 755 in 1905, including, how-

Kie-miak-sac.—Lee and Frost, Oregon, 176, 1844.

Klikitat (Chinookan: 'beyond,' with reference to the Cascade mts.). A Shahaptian tribe whose former seat was at the headwaters of the Cowlitz, Lewis, White Salmon, and Klickitat rs., n. of Columbia r., in Klickitat and Skamania cos., Wash. Their eastern neighbors were the Yakima, who speak a closely related language, and on the w. they were met by various Salishan and Chinookan tribes. In 1805 Lewis and Clark reported them as wintering on Yakima and Klickitat rs., and estimated their number at about 700. Between 1820 and 1830 the tribes of Willamette valley were visited by an epidemic of fever and greatly reduced in numbers. Taking advantage of their weakness, the Klikitat crossed the Columbia and forced their way as far s. as the valley of the Umpqua. Their occupancy of this territory was temporary, however, and they were speedily compelled to retire to their old seat n. of the Columbia. The Klikitat were always active and enterprising traders, and from their favorable position became widely known as intermediaries between the coast tribes and those living e. of the Cascade range. They joined in the Yakima treaty at Camp Stevens, Wash., June 9, 1855, by which they ceded their lands to the United States. They are now almost wholly on Yakima res., Wash., where they have become so merged with related tribes that an accurate estimate of their number is impossible. Of the groups still recognized on that reservation the Topinash are probably their nearest relatives (Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 738, 1896) and may be regarded as a branch of the Klikitat, and the Taitinapam, speaking the same tongue, as another minor branch. One of the settlements of the Klikitat was Wiltkun. (L. F.)

Kliksiwi (liks'i-wé², 'clover root at mouth of river.'—Boas). A former Kwakiutl village at the mouth of Kliksiwi r., on the e. side of Vancouver id. All traces of it have disappeared.

Klik-si-wi.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1887, sec. 11, 72. liks'i-wé².—Boas, Inf'n, 1905.

Klimmim. A former Chehalis village on the N. shore of Grays harbor, Wash. Klimmim.—Gibbs, MS., no. 248, B. A. E. Weh-tamish.—Ibid.

Klinkwan (Tlingit: lingod'n, 'shellfish town'; or 'town where they split yellow cedar bark into long strings [tán]'). A Haida town, occupied by the Yaku-lanas, on Cordova bay, Prince of Wales id., Alaska. In John Work's list (1836-41) 26 houses and 417 inhabitants are assigned to a town called Click-ass. This is a camping place near Klinkwan, and the Klinkwan people are evidently intended. Petroff gives the population in 1880-81 as 125, and the census of 1890 as 19. (J. R. S.)

Klinquit. One of the bands or tribes taking part in the Yakima treaty of 1855 (U. S. Stat., xii, 951, 1863). They are not otherwise identifiable, and should not be confounded with the Tlingit.

Klikohtl (Kl-kóh'u). The Chehalis name for an ancient village on the s. side of Grays harbor, Wash.—(Gibbs, MS. no. 248, B. A. E.)

Klochwatone. Mentioned as a Tlingit family under the leadership of Annahootz, residing in and near Sitka, Alaska, and consisting of 200 people in about 40 families. The name is said to mean 'warriors,' but in all probability it is a corruption of Eú'koa-hú-tán, 'people of the house on the point.' A house of this name stood on the point at Sitka, where Baranoff's fort was afterward built. It belonged to the Kiksadi and not to Annahootz's people, therefore possibly the word is corrupted from Goch-hú-tán ('wolf house people'), to whom Annahootz belonged. (J. R. S.)

Klochwatone.—Beardslee in Sen. Ex. Doc. 105, 46th Cong., 1st sess., 31, 1880. Klukwatone.—Ibid., 32. Klukwatone.—Ibid.

Klodesscottine ('hay river people'). A division of the Etchareottine on Hay r., Mackenzie Ter., Canada. In 1904 there were 247 enumerated on the upper and 115 on the lower river.

Klokesottine ('prairie people'). A Nahane division living between Mackenzie r. and lakes La Martre, Grandin, and Taché, Mackenzie Ter., Canada.

Klú-ká-Gottiné.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891. Klú-ká-ottiné.—Petitot, MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1865. Kl'e-ke-ottiné.—Ibid. Thlo-oo-shanias.—Campbell quoted by Dawson in Rep. Geol. Surv. Can., 2003, 1889. Tyótome.—Morice, MS. letter, 1890 (Takulli name). Tyótoma-na.—Ibid. (trans. 'grass people').

Klondike (el dorado, a rich strike, a fortune). This word, which entered the English language of America during the Alaskan gold fever of 1898-1900, is the name of a tributary of the Yukon in extreme n. w. Canada. Klondike is a corruption of the name of this stream in one of the Athapaskan dialects prevailing in that region. In the literature of the day, 'Klondiker,' and even 'to Klondike,' also occur. Of the name Baker (Geog. Dict. Alaska, 244, 1902) says: "This [Klondike] river was named Deer river by the Western Union Telegraph Expedition, in 1867, and so appeared on various maps. Later it was called Raindeer and afterwards Reindeer. Ogilvie, writing September 6, 1896, from Cudahy, says: 'The river known here as the Klondike'; and in a footnote says: 'The correct name is Thron Duick.' It has also been called Clondyke and Chandik, or Deer." (A. F. C.)

Kloo (Xe-u, 'southeast,' the name of a town chief). A former Haida town at the E. end of Tanoo id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was one of the largest towns in the Haida country and was occupied by three families, the Kona-kegawai, Diguahlanas, and Kadusgo-kegawai, to the first of which the town chief belonged. John Work (1836-41) assigned 40 houses and 545 inhabitants to this town; old people still remember 26 houses. Although abandoned, the houses and poles here are in better condition than in most uninhabited Haida villages. (J. R. S.)

(own name; the name of a kind of sea grass). Tanú Haidé.—Harrison in Proc. and Trans. Roy. Soc. Can., 125, 1895. Tlu.—Ibid.

Kloo. A temporary settlement on the N. side of Cumshewa inlet, occupied by Haida from the older town of Kloo for a few years before they passed on to Skidegate. (J. R. S.)

Klothchetunne (K'loč-teš'-junné). A Chastacosta village on or in the vicinity of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1890.

Klitasen (Qild'sen). A Songish band at McNeill bay, S. end of Vancouver id.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 17, 1890.

Kluchhaitkwu. A band of Okinagan formerly living at the falls of Okinakane r., Wash.

Kluch-hait-kwoe.—Stevens in Ind. Aff. Rep., 445, 1864. Kluchhaitkwu.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., I, 412, 1865.

Klughugue. Given as a Huna village on Chichagof id., but probably identical with the Chlül-chágu of Krause, which he places on the mainland opposite. It is perhaps also identical with Tlushashakian (q. v.). Pop. 108 in 1880.

Chlül-chágu.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 104, 1885. Klughugue.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 31, 1884.

Klukluk (from Lowt'q, 'slides,' applied to places where gravel, small stones, or sand slides or falls down). A village of the Spences Bridge band of the Ntlakya-pamuk, on Nicola r., 8 m. from Spences Bridge, Brit. Col.

Klukluk.—Hill-Tout in Rep. Ethnol. Surv. Can., 4, 1899. Lowt'q.—Telt in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 173, 1900.

Klukwan ('old and celebrated place'). The principal Chilkat village on Chilkat r., 20 m. from its mouth. Indian pop. in 1890, 320.

Klukwan.—Willard, Life in Alaska, 78, 1884. Klukwan.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 3, 1893. Klukwan.—Krause, Tlinkit Ind., 100, 1885. Klukquan.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 31, 1884. Lik'-án.—Swanton, field notes, B. A. E., 1904.

Klumaitumsh. Given by Gibbs (MS., B. A. E., ca. 1858) as the Chehalis name for an ancient village on the S. side of Grays harbor, Wash., but according to Boas it is an island near the entrance to Grays harbor. Lewis and Clark, in 1805, spoke of it as a tribe of about 260 people in 12 houses.

Glamootomicha.—Lewis and Clark, Exped., II, 119, 1814. Glamootomicha.—Ibid., 474. Glamootomicha.—Domenech, Deserts, I, 441, 1860. Glamootomicha.—Orig. Jour. Klutak. An Eskimo village in the Kuskokwim district, Alaska; pop. 21 in 1890.

Klutagmiut.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 164, 1893.

Knato. A former Iroquois, probably Seneca, village on the N. bank of Chemung r., N. Y.—Pouchot, map (1758) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., x, 694, 1858.

Knaiahkotana. An Athapascan tribe inhabiting Kenai penin., Alaska, the basins of Knik and Sushitna rs., and the shores of Iliamna and Cook lakes. It is the only northern Athapascan tribe occupying any large portion of the seacoast. They came in contact with the Russians at an early date and were subjugated only after much fighting; a permanent trading settlement was established in 1792 by Zalkoff and Lastochkin, and in 1793 missionaries settled on Cook inlet. In the latter year Baranoff brought 30 convicts to teach agriculture to the people of Kenai penin.; the natives attacked him during his explorations, but were repulsed, the Russians losing 11 men. Father Juvenati in 1796 attempted to suppress polygamy among the natives, but was killed while preaching near Iliamna lake. Hostilities were resumed against Baranoff in 1801. An attempt to explore the region N. of Cook inlet was made in 1816 by the Russian-American Co., and in 1819 they had 4 settlements on Cook inlet. In 1838 an epidemic of smallpox carried off nearly half the native population. In 1861 Kenai penin. was designated one of the 7 missionary districts of the Russian church. The Knaiahkotana are taller and darker than their Eskimo neighbors, but their customs differ little from those of the neighboring tribes. Hunting and fishing are the chief occupations, birch-bark canoes being used for river journeys in the interior, while for coast voyages bidarkas are purchased from the Eskimo.

The Knaiakhotana are the most civilized of all the northern Athapaskan tribes. They use dogs mainly for hunting, not harnessing them to their sleds even in the long journeys they perform in winter from one trapping ground to another. Occasionally in summer dogs are employed as pack animals. Their log houses are more solidly and warily built than those of the moving Kutchin tribes; they are divided into an outer room for cooking and rough labor, and an inner sleeping apartment, floored and ceiled, lighted through a pane of glass or gut, and impenetrable to the outer air. In some villages the bedroom is used as a bathroom, being then heated with red-hot stones; but most villages have a bath hut or two. In the more primitive villages on the Sushitna and Knik r. is found the old communal log house, occupied by several families, each having its separate sleeping apartment connected with the central structure by a hole in the wall. Provisions are kept out of the reach of dogs in a storehouse built of logs and elevated on posts (11th Census, Alaska, 187, 1893).

They bury their dead in wooden boxes, in which they put also the property of the deceased, and pile stones upon the grave. They express grief by smearing their faces with black paint, singeing their hair, and lacerating their bodies. Most of their clothing is made of the skin of the mountain goat, which they kill in large numbers. Their language is extremely guttural, compared with that of the Eskimo (Dall, Alaska, 430, 1870).

Richardson (Arct. Exped., i, 406, 1851) stated that the Knaiakhotana have two phratries, one containing 6 and the other 5 clans. The clans, according to their mythology, are descended from two women made by the raven, and are as follows: 1, Kachgiya (The Raven); 2, Tlachitana (Weavers of Grass Nets); 3, Montochitana (A Corner in the Back Part of the Hut); 4, Tschichgi (Color); 5, Nuchshi (Descended from Heaven); 6, Kali (Fishermen). 1, Tultschina (Bathers in Cold Water); 2, Katluchitna (Lovers of Glass Beads); 3, Schischlachitana (Deceivers Like the Raven); 4, Nutschichgi; 5, Zaltana (Mountain). Hoffman (Ajaluyamut MS., B. A. E., 1882) gives the following Chugachigmiut names for divisions of the Knaiakhotana: 1, Kanikaligamut (People Close to the River); 2, Maltshokamut (Valley People); 3, Nanualikmut (People Around the Lake). The same authority (Kadiak MS., B. A. E., 1882) gives the Kaniagmiut names for 5 divisions: 1, Nanualuk (=Nanualikmut); 2, Kuinruk (Sea-hunting People); 3, Tuinuk (=Tyonok, Marsh People); 4, Knikamut (=Knik, Fire-signal People); 5, Tigikpuk (People Living at the Base of a Volcano).

The Knaiakhotana villages are Chinila, Chuitna, Kasilof, Kasnatchin, Kenai, Kilchik, Knakatnuk, Knik, Kultuk, Kustatan, Nikhkak, Nikishka, Ninilchik, Nitak, Skilak, Skittok, Sushitna, Titukilsk, Tyonek, Tyonok, and Zdluiat.

The natives of Cook inlet in 1818 numbered 1,471, of whom 723 were males and 748 females. Baron Wrangell, in 1825, gave their population as 1,299, the females being slightly in excess. In 1839 Veniaminof made the number 1,628, and in 1860 the Holy Synod gave 937, declaring that the natives had become Christians. At the acquisition of Alaska by the United States in 1868, Gen. Halleck and Rev. Vincent Colyer erroneously estimated the Knaiakhotana at 25,000 (Petroff, Rep. on Alaska, 40, 1884). The population in 1880 consisted of 614 natives, and in 1890 they numbered 724 (11th Census, Alaska, 158, 1893).

Knakatnuk. A Knaiakhotana village and trading post of 35 natives in 1880 on the w. side of Knik bay, at the head of Cook inlet, Alaska.

Knakatnuk.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884. Knik Station.—Post route map, 1903.

Knatomita (Kndts-o-mi'-ta, 'all crazy dogs'). A society of the Ikunukhaitsi, or All Comrades, in the Piegan tribe; it is composed of men about 40 years of age.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 221, 1892.

K'nick K'neck. See Kinnikinnick.

Knik (Eskimo: 'fire,' a name given by the Eskimo of Kodiak because, having no seaworthy boats of their own, they signaled for other tribes across the bay to send aid). A Knaiakhotana settlement of several villages on Knik r., at the head of Cook inlet, Alaska. The chief village had 46 people in 1880 (Petroff, 10th Census, Alaska, 29, 1884); in 1900 the population was 160 in 31 houses. This branch of the tribe numbers altogether between 200 and 300, who obtain their subsistence by hunting and trapping and by bartering with the Ahtena, who bring fur skins over the divide between Knik and Copper rs. every winter and stay weeks or months with the Knik, who through this trade obtain the clothing, utensils, and even luxuries of the whites. Their houses are built above ground of logs tightly calked with moss and covered with bark (11th Census, Alaska, 70, 1893). They use the birch-bark canoe on the inland rivers, but purchase skin bidarkas of the Kenai or Nishka people to fish and travel along the coast.

Knik.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, map, 1884.

Kinniek.—Petroff, Ibid., 39. K'niq'-a-müt.—Hoffman, Kadiak MS., B. A. E., 1882.

Knives. Cutting tools are indispensable to primitive men, and the greatest ingenuity was exercised by the northern tribes in their manufacture. Every material capable of taking and retaining an edge was utilized—wood, reed, bone, antler, shell, stone, and metal. Teeth are nature's cutting tools, and the teeth of animals (shark, beaver, etc.) were much employed by primitive men, as also were sharp bits of stone and splinters of wood and bone, the natural edges of which in symbolism and ceremony, and one of the most cherished symbols of rank and authority was the great stone knife chipped with consummate skill from ob-sidian or flint. According to Culin the stone knife is used among the Pueblos as a symbol of divinity, especially of the war gods, and is widely used in a healing ceremony called the "knife ceremony."

Differentiation of use combined with differences in material to give variety to the blade and its hafting; the so-called ulu, or woman's knife of the Eskimo, employed in various culinary arts, differs from the man's knife, which is used in carving wood and for various other purposes (Mason); and the bone snow knife of the Arctic regions is a species by itself (Nelson). The copper knife is distinct from the stone knife, and the latter takes a multitude of forms, passing from the normal types in one haft is in evidence. The flaked knife blade of flint is straight like a spearhead or is curved like a hook or sickle, and it is frequently beveled on one or both edges. The ceremonial knife is often of large size and great beauty. Certain Tennessee flint blades, believed to be of this class, though very slender, measure upward of 2 ft in length, while the beautiful red and black obsidian blades of California are hardly less noteworthy. Speaking of the latter, Powers says: "I have seen several which were 15 in.

Pieces as large as these are carried lifted in the hands in the dance, wrapped with skin or cloth to prevent the rough edges from lacerating the hands, but the smaller ones are mounted in wooden handles and glued fast. The large ones can not be purchased at any price." See Implementa.

Knots. The Indians, and especially the Eskimo, whose difficulties with unfastening lines in a frozen area made them ingenious, tied for various purposes many kinds of knots and splices in bark, stems, roots, sinew thongs, strings, and ropes. There were knots and turk's heads in the ends of lines for buttons and toggles and for fastening work, loops and running nooses for bowstrings and tent fastenings, knots for attaching one line to another or to some object, the knots in netting for fish nets and the webbing in snowshoes and rackets, knots for attaching burdens and for packing and cinching, decorative knots in the dress of both sexes, and memorial knots used in calendars and for registering accounts and in religion. The bight, seen on Yuman carrying baskets, was universal, and the single, square, and granny knots and the half hitch were also quite common. In 1680 the Pueblo Indians communicated the number of days before their great uprising against the Spaniards by means of a knotted string, and some of their descendants still keep personal calendars by the same means, but in North America the quipu was nowhere so highly developed as it was in Peru. Boas (Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xv, 1901) illustrates the many splices, hitches, loops, and knots of the Eskimo; Murdoch (9th Rep. B. A. E., 1892) has treated the knots used in nets, snowshoes, and sinew-backed bows; Dixon (Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xvii, 1905) shows the knots of the northern Maidu of California; and Mason (Smithson. Rep. for 1893) gives details of those generally used on bows and arrows. (O. T. M.)

Koas. Mentioned as a tribe residing with the Hutenuwu, Chilkat, and others, in Sitka, Alaska (Beardslee in Sen. Ex. Doc. 105, 46th Cong., 1st sess., 31, 1880). It possibly refers to the Kuui, otherwise the name is unidentifiable.

Koasati. An Upper Creek tribe speaking a dialect almost identical with Alibamu and evidently nothing more than a large division of that people. The name appears to contain the word for 'cane' or 'reed,' and Gatschet has suggested that it may signify 'white cane.' During the middle and latter part of the 18th century the Koasati lived, apparently in one principal village, on the right bank of Alabama r., 3 m. below the confluence of the Coosa and Tallapoosa, where the modern town of Coosada, Ala., perpetuates their name; but soon after w. Florida was ceded to Great Britain, in 1763, "two villages of Koasati" moved over to the Tombigbee and settled below the mouth of Sukanatcha cr. Romans and other writers always mention two settlements here, Sukta-loosa and Occhoy or Hychoy, the latter being evidently either Koasati or Alibamu. The Witumka Alibamu moved with them and established themselves lower down. Later the Koasati descended the river to a point a few miles above the junction of the Tombigbee and the Alabama, but, together with their Alibamu associates, they soon returned to their ancient seats on the upper Alabama. A "Coosawda" village existed on Tennessee r., near the site of Langston, Jackson co., Ala., in the early part of the 19th century, but it is uncertain whether its occupants were true Koasati. In 1799 Hawkins stated that part of the Koasati had recently crossed the Mississippi, and Sibley in 1805 informs us that these first settled on Bayou Chicot but 4 years later moved over to the E. bank of Sabine r., 80 m. s. of Natchitoches, La. Thence they spread over much of E. Texas as far as Trinity r., while a portion, or perhaps some of those who had remained in Alabama, obtained permission from the Caddo to settle on Red r. Schermerhorn (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., ii, 26, 1814) states that in 1812 the Koasati on Sabine r. numbered 600, and in 1820 Morse gave 350 on Red r., 50 on the Neches, 40 m. above its mouth, and 240 on the Trinity, 40 to 50 m. above its mouth. Bollaert (1850) estimated the number of warriors belonging to the Koasati on the lower Trinity as 500, in 2 villages, Colete and Batista. In 1870 50 were in Polk co., Tex., and 100 near Opelousas, La. They were honest, industrious, and peaceful, and still dressed in the Indian manner. Powell (7th Rep. B. A. E., 1891) says that in 1886 there were 4 families of Koasati, of about 25 individuals, near the town of Shepherd, San Jacinto co., Tex. As part of the true Alibamu were in this same region it is not improbable that some of them have been included in the above enumerations. Those of the Koasati who stayed in their original seats and subsequently moved to Indian Territory also remained near the Alibamu for the greater part, although they are found in several places in the Creek Nation, Okla. Two towns in the Creek Nation are named after them. (J. R. S.)

Koetas (Q'ōē'tas, 'earth-eaters'). A family of the Raven clan belonging to the Kaigani or Alaskan branch of Haida. According to the southern Haida they derived their name from the fact that in a legendary Haida town whence all the Ravens came (see Tadji-lanas) they used to live near the trails. The Kaigani themselves, however, say that when they first settled at Ilgan, on the w. coast of Graham id., they were called, from the town, Hlun-staa-lanas (ḥ'ān stā'a lā'nas, 'holding-up-the-fin-town-people'). Afterward they began to cook and eat a plant called hikunit (tk'u'nūt) which grows under the salmon-berry bushes. Some of them then joked at this, saying, "We are even eating earth," hence the name Koetas. On the Alaska mainland their town was Sukkwān. There were 5 subdivisions: Chats-hadai, Huadjinaas-hadai, Nakalas-hadai, Hlka-onedis, and Naden-hadai. (J. R. S.) K'ōē'tas.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 22, 1898. Q'ōē'tas.—Swanton, Cont. Korosa. A small tribe, perhaps related to the Tonika, whose home was on the w. bank of the Mississippi below the Natchez, on the Yazoo, and in the country intervening westward from the Mississippi. They were visited early in 1682 by La Salle, who described their cabins as dome-shaped, about 15 ft high, formed chiefly of large canes, and without windows (Margry, Déc., i, 558, 1876). They were considered warlike, and were cruel and treacherous. In 1705 a party of them, hired by the French priest Foucault to convey him by water to the Yazoo, murdered him and two other Frenchmen. La Salle observed that their language differed from that of the Taensa and Natchez, but their customs were the same. All afterward moved to and settled on Yazoo r., Miss., where in 1742 they lived in the same village as the Yazoo. They were then allies of the Chickasaw, but were later merged with the Choctaw and their identity as a separate organization was lost. Allen Wright, whose grandfather was of this tribe, informed Gatschet (Creek Migr. Leg., i, 48, 1884) that the term Korosa, or Corosa, was neither Choctaw nor Chickasaw, and that the Korosa spoke a language differing entirely from the Choctaw.

Akorosa.—Marquette, map (1673) in Shea, Discov. Miss., 1852. Coiras.—Richebourg (cc. 1716) in French, *Hist. Coll. Kotta ('mescal' or 'tobacco'). Given by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, II, 181, 1889) as a clan of the Mohave, q. v.

Kouchnas-hadai (Q'ō'ute nas had'ā'i, '[grizzly-] bear house people'). Given by Boas (Fifth Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 27, 1889) as a subdivision of the Yakulanas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida. It is in reality only a house name belonging to the family.

Koukdjuaq ('big river'). A Talirpingmiut Eskimo village of the Okomuti tribe formerly on L. Nettilling, Baffin land.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1888.

Kounaouons. A tribe or band, probably in Canada near the Maine frontier, mentioned as allies of the French in 1724.

Kōnaōns.—Rawle (1724) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., VIII, 246, 1819.

Koungmiut ('river people'). An Eskimo tribe on the w. coast of Hudson bay, s. of the Kinipetu, in the region of Pt Churchill.—Boas in Bull. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., xv, 6, 1901.

Kouse. A plant (Peucedanum ambiguum) used by the Indians of the Columbia-Oregon region for making bread. Lewis and Clark in 1804-06 used the form cous. Thornton (Oreg. and Cal., I, 355, 1849) speaks of "the covich or biscuit root." The word is derived from kovich, the name of this root in the Nez Percé and closely related dialects of the Shahaptian stock. (A. F. C.)

Kouyam. A village or tribe mentioned by Joutel in 1687 as being n. of Maligne (Colorado) r., Tex. It is probably the tribe called Caba by Manzanet, which may have been Coahuiltecan or Karankawan. See Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., 1891.

Cavalanes.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723. Kavagan.—Joutel (1687), Jour. Voy., 90, 1719. Kouayan.—Shea, note in Charlevoix, New France, iv, 78, 1870. Kouayon.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 152, 1846. Kouyam.—Joutel in Margry, Déc., iii, 288, 1878.

Kovogzruk. A Kaviagmiut village at Port Clarence, Alaska.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Kowagmiut ('big-river people'). A tribe of western Eskimo of Alaska, numbering 81 in 1890, dwelling on Kowak r. e. of Kotzebueds. Their chief food besides fish and ptarmigan consists of marmots, but the number of these is rapidly decreasing. Their villages are Kikiktak, Kowak, Umokalukta, Unatak, and the summer settlement of Sheshalik. By some these Eskimo have been included in the Nunatogmiut; by others, together with the Selawigmiut, in the Malemiut. Koogamutes.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 60, map, 1884. Koo-og-ameuta.—Cooper, Cruise of Corwin, 26, 1880. Kowag'-müt.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 12, 1877. Kowāg'-mūn.—Simpson quoted by Dall, ibid. Kū-āg-müt.—Dall in Proc. A. A. S., xxxiv, 377, 1886. Kuanagmiut.—Woolfe in 11th Census, Alaska, 130, 1894. Kuwā'miun.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 44, 1892.

Kowallochow. A coast Salish tribe said by Gibbs (Pac. R. R. Rep., i, 433, 1855) to live n. of the Semiamio, principally if not altogether in Canada. Unless intended for the Cowichan they are not mentioned elsewhere.

Kowak (? 'great river'). A Kowagmiut village at the mouth of Kowak r., Alaska. Koovuk.—Kelly, Aret. Eskimos, 15, 1890. Kubok.—Zagoskin, Desc. Russ. Poes. in Amer., pt. 1, 73, 1847.

Kowanga. A former Gabrieleño rancharia near San Fernando mission, Los Angeles co., Cal. Probably identical with Okowvinjha, or with Cahuenga, q. v. Kowanga.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 11, 1860. Owngos.—Lawson in Ind. Aff. Rep., 13, 1879.

Kowasayee. A small Shahaptian tribe, speaking the Tenino language and formerly living on the n. side of Columbia r., in Klickitat co., Wash., nearly opposite the mouth of the Umatilla. They were included in the Yakima treaty of 1855, and the survivors are on Yakima res., but their number is unknown.

K'k'k'wi.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 739, 1896. Kowasayee.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1856, 266, 1857. Kowasayee.—U. S. Stat., xii, 951, 1863. Kowwasayee.—Keane in Stanford, Compend., 518, 1878.

Kowasikka. A village formerly occupied by the Eel River Miami until they removed, under the treaty of Feb. 11, 1828, to a reserve near the mouth of Eel r. It was on Sugar cr., near the present Thortown, Boone co., Ind., and was commonly known as Thortown. (J. M.)

Kow-a-uk-ka.—Hough in Ind. Geol. Rep., map, 1883. Thortown.—Common name. Thortown Miami.—Drake, Ind. Chron., 206, 1886.

Kowina. A prehistoric circular pueblo on a low mesa opposite the spring at the head of Cebollita valley, about 15 m. w. of Acoma and 35 m. s. e. of Grant station on the Santa Fé Pac. R. R., Valencia co., N. Mex. The pueblo is attributed to the Calabash (Tanyí) clan of Acoma and is noted for the high class of masonry of its remaining walls. (F. W. H.)

Ka-uin-a.—Bandler in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 324, 1892 (Acoma name). Ké-wi-na.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1895.

Kowsis. A tribe mentioned as roaming in the Tule r. country—territory occupied by Yokuts tribes—in s. central California in 1869 (Purcell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1869, 193, 1870), but not further identifiable.

Koyeti. A Yokuts tribe formerly living in s. central California, in the vicinity of Tule r. and southward. Mentioned in 1852 as a friendly tribe on Paint (White) cr., and described as possessing unusual courage and intelligence. They are entirely extinct.

Co-ye-te.—Wessells (1853) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 32, 1857. Co-ye-tie.—Barbour (1852) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 256, 1853. Ko-ya-te.—Johnston (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 61, 32d Cong., 1st sess., 23, 1852. Ko-ya-te.—Barbour (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 122, 1853. Ko-ya-tes.—Barbour in Ind. Aff. Rep., 232, 1851. Koyeti.—A. L. Kroeber, Inf'n, 1906 (usual name among neighboring Yokuts tribes). Ko-ye-to.—Barbour in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 255, 1853.

Koyugmiut (Koyūg'mūt). A division of the Malemiut Eskimo on Koyuk r., Alaska.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 16, 1877.

Koyuhow (Ko-yu-how). A Paviotso band formerly living about McDermitt, N. Nev.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Koyuktolik. A Malemiut Eskimo village on Koyuk r., Alaska.

Khoouchiulik-miouta.—Zagoskin in Nouv. Ann. Voy., 5th s., xxi, map, 1850. Kuyuktolik.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 162, 1893.

Koyukuk. A Koyukukhotana village, of 150 people in 1880, near the junction of Koyukuk and Yukon rs., Alaska.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 12, 1884.

Koyukukhotana ('people of Koyukuk river'). A division of the Unakhotana inhabiting the basin of Koyukuk r., Alaska. Zagoskin in 1843 attempted to explore the Koyukuk country, but failed on account of the hostility of the natives. Lieut. Barnard in 1851 was killed by the Koyukukhotana, and Nulato destroyed because he sent for their chief. Maj. Kennicott also visited their territory, dying at Nulato, May 13, 1866. In the following year Dall explored the Koyukuk. Petroff visited the Koyukukhotana in 1880, and Allen made an exploration of their country in 1885. The Koyukukhotana were sedentary, but fierce and warlike, and hostile toward the Kaiyukhotana, although the manners, customs, and language of the two tribes are now similar. Their chief occupation is hunting deer and mountain sheep; they also act as middlemen in trade between the Malemiut and the Kaiyukhotana. They seem to have no system of totems (Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 27, 1877). Zagoskin found 289 living in permanent villages in 1843. In 1890 the population was given as 502: 242 males and 260 females, while the number in permanent villages was 174 in 32 houses. The villages are Batza, Bolshoigor, Dotle, Hussliakatna, Kakliaklia, Kaltat, Kanuti, Kautas, Kotil, Koyukuk, Mentokakat, Nohulchinta, Nok, Notaloten, Onilgachtkhokh, Soonkakak, Tashoshgon, Thialil, Tok, Zakatlatan, Zogliakten, and Zonagogliakten.

Koyoukous.—Whymper quoted by Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 27, 1877. Co-Yukon.—Whymper, Alaska, 182, 1868 (=Koyukukhotana and Unakhotana). Intai-Dindjitch.—Petitot, Dict. Dène-Dindjé, xx, 1876 (=‘men of iron’). Jünakā-hotāna.—Holmberg quoted by Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 27, 1877. Koyoukon.—Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 29, 1874. Koyoukuk-kouttane.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 361, 1891. Koyū-kūkh-otā-nā.—Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 27, 1877 (=‘people of Koyukuk r.’). Koyūkūna.—Ibid. (traders’ name). Koyūkūnakol.—Ibid. (used by Russian traders). Kūkunaki.—Raymond in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., iii, 175, 1873. Kuyuknachi.—Raymond in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1869, 593, 1870. Kūyūkātai.—Worman quoted by Dall in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 27, 1877. Kuyukuka.—Raymond in Sen. Ex. Doc. 12, 42d Cong., 1st sess., 31, 1871. Kuyukunaki.—Ibid., 32. Yunnakakhotana.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884.

Kpayipa-Gottine.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 319, 1891.

Kraylongottine (‘people at the end of the willows’). A Nahane division living between Mackenzie r. and Willow lake, Mackenzie Ter., Canada. Their totem is the otter.

Kka-lon-Gottine.—Petitot, Grand lac des Ours, 66, 1893 (‘people at the end of the willows’). Kkaylon-Gottine.—Petitot, Autour du lac des Esclaves, 362, 1891.

Krentpoos. See Kintpuash.

Kretan (‘hawk’). A subgens of the Cheghita gens of the Missouri tribe.

Kre-ta.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897. Kul-pa-ki-a-ko.—ten Kate, Synonymie, 10, 1884 (Klowa name: ‘pearls people’).

Krimerskumalek. An Igloodirmiut Eskimo village on the w. coast of Hudson bay.—McClintock, Voyage of Fox, 165, 1881.

Ksalokul (Qad’loqul). A division of the Nanaimo on the E. coast of Vancouver id.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Ksapsem (Qa’psem). A Songish division residing at Esquimalt, s. end of Vancouver id.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 17, 1890.

Kshiwukshiwu (K’ciwuk’ciwu). A former Chumashan village on Santa Rosa id., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Kthas (K’ch’-’ē). A former Kuitsh village on lower Umpqua r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 321, 1890.

Kthelutlitunne (Kçç’-lūt-li’ yūnnē’, ‘people at the forks’). A former village of the Chastacosta at the junction of Rogue r., Oreg., and a southern tributary.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 234, 1890.

Kthotaime (K’ço-tai-me). A former Takelma village on the s. side of Rogue r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 235, 1890.

Kthukhwestunne (K’çu-qwēs’ yūnnē’, ‘good-grass people’). A former village of the Mishikhwutmetunne on Coquille r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 232, 1890.

Kthukhwutunne (K’çu-qwūt’ yūnnē’, ‘people where good grass is’). A former village of the Tututni on the coast of Oregon, n. of Rogue r.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 233, 1890.

Kthunataashuntunne (K’çu-na’-ta-a tēn’ yūnnē’, ‘people by a small grassy mountain’). A former village of the Mishikhwutmetunne on Coquille r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 232, 1890.

Kthutetmetsetuttun. A former village of the Tututni on the Pacific coast just n. of the mouth of Rogue r., Oreg.

Ktu-tē-me tse’-tūt-tūn.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 233, 1890. Kwi-tūt-qwūt.—Ibid. Nu’-tēu-ma’-tūn yūnnē.—Ibid. (‘people in a land full of timber’).

Ktlaeshatikik (‘people of Lgā’cālx’). A Cathlamet tribe named from a town on a creek of the same name, at the site of the present town of Cathlamet, Wahkiakum co., Wash.

Guithila-ishalxi.—Gatschet, field notes, B. A. E. Ktā’cālx’.—Boas, Cathlamet Texts, 6, 1901. ktā’cālxē.—Boas, inf’n, 1905.

Ku. The Stone clan of the Tewa pueblos of San Ildefonso, N. Mex., and Hano, Ariz. That of the latter is extinct. Cf. Nang.

Ku-tāa.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 352, 1896 (San Ildefonso form; tāa = ‘people’). Ku-tēwa.—Ibid. (Hano form).

Kua. The Bear clan of the pueblo of Taos, N. Mex.

Kūa-tāina.—Hodge, field notes, B. A. E., 1899 (talina = ‘people’).

Kuaiath. A division of the Seshat, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Kualirnang. A winter residence of the Akulirmiut on North bay, Baffin land.

Kuairnang.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., no. 80, 67, 1886. Quairnang.—Boas in 6th Rep. B. A. E., 421, 1888.

Kuakaa. A prehistoric ruined pueblo of the Tanos on the s. bank of Arroyo Hondo, 5 m. s. of Santa Fé, N. Mex. It housed about 800 people. Not to be confounded with San Marcos, to which the same name was applied.

Quá-cá.—Bandelier, Gilded Man, 221, 1893. Qua-kaa.—Ibid., 283. Kua-kaa.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 90, 1892. Kua-kay.—Ibid.

Kuakumchen (Kuá'kumtēn). Given as a division of the Squawmish, on Howe sd., coast of British Columbia.—Boas, MS., B. A. E., 1887.

Kuapa. A ruined pueblo in the Cañada de Cochiti, 12 m. n. w. of Cochiti pueblo, N. Mex., by whose inhabitants it was formerly occupied and to whom are attributed the execution of the panther statues on the neighboring Potrero de los Idolos. It was the third place of settlement of the Cochiti after their abandonment of the Potrero de las Vacas, and from which they moved to their present pueblo.

Qua-pa.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Bul., i, 15, 1883. Quá-pa.—Lummis in Scribner's Monthly, 98, 1893. Kua-pa.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 162, 1892.

Kuapooqe ('place of the shell beads near the water,' or 'mussel pearl place on the water'). A prehistoric Tewa pueblo which, with Analco, occupied the site of the present Santa Fé, N. Mex. Kuapooqe was situated where old Ft Marcy was erected on the heights at the northern outskirts of the town by United States troops in 1847.

Apoga.—Ritch, New Mexico, 196, 1885. Apoge.—Ibid., 151. Qua P'Hoge.—Bandelier, Delight Makers, 453, 1890 (San Juan name). Qua-P'o-o-ge.—Bandelier, Gilded Man, 284, 1893. Quá-po-oge.—Ibid., 221. Qua-Po-o-qué.—Ladd, Story of N. Kuasse. An unidentified village or tribe mentioned by Joutel in 1687 as situated n. or n. w. of Maligne (Colorado) r., Tex. This region was controlled mainly by Coahuiltecan tribes, but Karankawan and Tonkawan Indians also roamed there. The name seems to have been given to Joutel by Ebahamo Indians, who were probably of Karankawan affinity. The Kuasse may possibly be identical with the Acafes and the Cacafes of Spanish writers and the Akasquy of Cavalier's narrative. Kiafess.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 138, 1846 (cf. p. 152). Kiaasses.—Shea, note in Charlevoix, New France, iv, 78, 1870. Kiaasas-ohasere.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723 (combined with Chancres; see Lipan). Kuasse.—Joutel in Margry, Déc., iii, 289, 1878.

Kuato (K'uatō, 'pulling up from the ground, or a hole'). An extinct tribal division of the Kiowa, speaking a slightly different dialect, who were exterminated by the Sioux in battle about the year 1780. On this occasion, according to tradition, the Kiowa were attacked by an overwhelming force of Sioux and prepared to retreat, but the chief of the Kuato exhorted his people not to run, "because, if they did, their relatives in the other world would not receive them." So they stood their ground and were killed, while the others of the tribe escaped. Their place in the tribal camp circle is not known.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1080, 1896.

Kuana. A former Tigua pueblo, the ruins of which lie n. of the bridge across the Rio Grande above Bernalillo, N. Mex. According to Bandelier the main building, which is of adobe, is one of the largest pueblo houses in New Mexico, but whether or not the pueblo is historic is indeterminable. It is also known by the Spanish name Torreón, but should not be confounded with the Torreón e. of the Rio Grande, in lat. 34° 45'.

Kua-ua.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 225, 1892. Torreón.—Ibid.

Kuant. A Shuswap village at the head of Little Shuswap lake, interior of British Columbia; pop. 83 in 1904.

Knant.—Can. Ind. Aff., supp., 60, 1902. Kroasout.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1883, 189. Kualit.—Ibid., 1895, 361. Kuant.—Ibid., 1898, 419. Ku-a-ut.—Ibid., 1885, 196. Kwout.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1891, sec. ii, 44, 1892. Little Shuswap.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1878, 74. Little Shuswap Lake.—Ibid., 1882, 259. Little Shuswap Lake.—Ibid., 1879, 309. Shuswap.—Ibid., 1878, 78.

Kuchaptuvela ('ash-hill terrace'). A Hopi village, now in ruins, on the terrace of the East mesa of Tusayan, n. e. Arizona, below the present Walpi pueblo. It was occupied by the ancestors of the Hopi of Walpi evidently at the time of the arrival of the Spaniards in 1540. The occupants abandoned it in 1629, or shortly afterward, and moved to Kisakobi, farther up the mesa.

Kuchaptuvela.—Fewkes in 17th Rep. B. A. E., 578, 685, 1898. Kwetap tutwi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 18, 1891. Old Walpi.—Ibid.

Kuchichi ('the small ones'). A small rancheria of the Tarahumare, not far from Norogachic, w. Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Kuna-lanas (Ku'na lā'nas, 'town people of the point'). An important family of the Raven clan of the Haida. According to one story it was so named because its people lived on a point in the legendary town of Skena (see Tadji-lanas); but more probably it refers to the point at Naikun where these people were at one time settled. The Teeskun-Inagai, Hielung-kun-Inagai, Saguikun-Inagai, and Yagun-kun-Inagai were subdivisions. (J. R. S.)

Ku'na lānas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 270, 1905. Kun lā'nas.—Boas, 12th Rep. N. W. Tribes Canada, 23, 1898. Kwun Lennas.—Harrison in Proc. and Trans. Roy. Soc. Canada, sec. ii, 125, 1895.

Kundji (Ku'ndji). A legendary Haida town on the s. shore of Copper bay, Moresby id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. The family living there is said to have been the Daiyuah-lanas. Another town of this name formerly stood on the w. side of Prevost id., in the Ninistints country.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 279, 1905.

Kunechin (Quñ'tcin). A Seechelt sept which formerly lived at the head of Queen's reach, Jervis inlet, Brit. Col. The founder of this division is said to have come from St. Rupert.—Hill-Tout in Jour. Anthr. Inst., 23, 1904.

Kuneste (Wailaki: 'Indian'). The southernmost Athapascan group on the Pacific coast, consisting of several tribes loosely or not at all connected politically, but speaking closely related dialects and possessing nearly the same culture. They occupied the greater part of Eel r. basin, including the whole of Van Duzen fork, the main Eel to within a few miles of Round valley, the s. fork and its tributaries to Long and Cahto valleys, and the coast from Bear River range s. to Ussal. Their neighbors were the Wishosk on the n., the Wintun on the w., and on the s. the Yuki, whose territory they bisect at Cahto, where they penetrate to the Pomo country. The Kuneste subdivisions are Lassik, Wailaki, Sinkine, Kato, and Mattole. (P. E. G.)

Kungyi. The Antclan of Nambe pueblo, N. Mex.

Kuyi-táda.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 348, 1896 (táda = 'people').

Kunhalas (Ku'nzalas). A former Haida town or camp just inside of Cumshewa pt., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It belonged to the Kona-kegawai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Kunhittan (Kün-hittan, 'people of flicker house'). Given by Krause (Tlingit Ind., 120, 1885) as a Tlingit division, but in reality it is merely a name for the inhabitants of a house at Kuui belonging to the Nastedi, q. v.

Kunipalgi (K'uno, k'ono, 'skunk'; algi, 'people'). A Creek clan.

Ku'-mu.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 161, 1877. Kunipalgi.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., 1, 156, 1881.

Kunjeskie. A Tlingit settlement in Alaska; location not given; pop. 150 in 1835, according to Veniaminoff.

Koonjeskie.—Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 227, 1875 (transl. from Veniaminoff).

Kunkhogliak. A Kaiyuhkhotana village on Yukon r., Alaska, containing 11 people in 1844.—Zagoskin quoted by Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 37, 1884.

Kunkia (Q/a'nkia). A former Haida town on the n. coast of North id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Kunmiut ('river people'). An Eskimo tribe living on Kok r. above Wainwright inlet, Alaska. They have been displaced by Nunatogmiut immigrants, and in 1890 had only 3 settlements left, each containing from 1 to 4 families. One of these was Kilimantavie.

Kilawitawi'amün.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 44, 1892. Koogomutes.—Elliott, Our Arct. Prov., map, 1886. Koogmutes.—Kelly, Arct. Eskimos, 14, 1890. Koog Mutes.—Ibid., chart. Kummiut.—Eleventh Census, Alaska, 162, 1893. Ku'amün.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 44, 1892.

Kunnas-hadai (Kun nas had'ái, 'whale-house people'). Given by Boas (Fifth Report N. W. Tribes Canada, 27, 1889) as the name of a subdivision of the Yakulanas, a family of the Raven clan of the Haida, but in reality it is only a house name belonging to that group. (J. R. S.)

Kunnesee. See Dragging-canoe.

Kunniwunname (Kün-ni'-wün-ne'-me). An Oregon tribe e. of the Tillamook (Dorsey, Naltúnnetúnne MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884), identified as in Athapascan territory, but otherwise unknown.

Kunnapiyu (K'un-nu'-pi-yu'). A former Yaquina village on the n. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 229, 1890.

Kunstamish (Kun-sta-mish). A village of the Guauaenok Kwakiutl on the e. side of Claydon bay, Wells passage, Brit. Col.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1887, sec. II, 73.

Kuosugru (Kuosu'gru). A summer village of the Utkiavimmiut Eskimo, on a dry place inland from Pt Barrow, Alaska.—Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 83, 1892.

Kupimithla (Ku-di'-míçl-tá'). A former Siuslaw village on Siuslaw r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Kusa (Gatschet suggests kósa, the name of a small forest bird resembling a sparrow, or ó'au, ósá, 'pokedew,' as the origin of the word; but if the people of Kusa are identical with the Conshac of the French, the name would mean 'cane,' 'reed,' or 'reedbrake.' See Conshac). A former town of the Upper Creeks, on the high e. bank of Coosa r., between Columbiana and Talladega, in Talladega co., Ala., between the points where Talladega and Tallahatchie crs. join the Coosa, and on the site of the present Coosa station. The town was once regarded as an important center, a sort of capital. The De Soto expedition of 1540-41 saw it in its flourishing condition, but when Bartram passed it, about 1775, it was mostly in ruins and half deserted, a part of its inhabitants evidently having joined the Abikudshi, while the others went to the nearby Natchez town. Up to 1775, according to Adair, Kusa was a place of refuge for "those who kill undesignedly." The Upper Creeks were frequently called "Coosas," from the name of the town.

Kusan Family. A small linguistic stock formerly occupying villages on Coos r. and bay, and on lower Coquille r., Oreg. (see Powell in 7th Rep. B. A. E., 89, 1891). The name is from that of the tribe, Coos (q. v.) or Kusa, which is said to be taken from one of the Rogue River dialects in which it means 'lake,' 'lagoon,' or 'inland bay.' Within historic times there have been 4 villages in this region in which the Kusan language was spoken. It is probable that at an earlier period the family extended much farther inland along the tributaries of Coos bay, but had been gradually forced into the contracted area on the coast by the pressure of the Athapascan tribes on the s. and e. and the Yakonan on the n. The stock is now practically extinct; the few survivors, for the greater part of mixed blood, are on the Siletz res. in Oreg., whither they went after ceding their lands by (unconfirmed) treaty of 1855. Practically nothing is known of the customs of this people, but there is no reason to suppose that they differed markedly from their neighbors on the n. The social unit was apparently the village, and there is no trace of a clan or gentile system other than the relationships naturally arising in a locally restricted group. It is interesting to note also that the practice of deforming the head was not current among the Kusan, although prevalent among the Yakonan, their northern neighbors. The Kusan villages known to have existed are: Melukitz, n. side of Coos bay; Anasitch, s. side of Coos bay; Mulluk (speaking a different dialect), n. side of Coquille r.; Nasumi, s. side of Coquille r. (L. F.)

Kuseehyaka. The extinct White-corn clan of Acoma pueblo, N. Mex. See Yaka.

Kuseehyaka-hanoq^{ch}.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., ix, 349, 1896 (yaka = 'corn', hanoq^{ch} = 'people').

Kushapokla ('divided people'). One of the two Choctaw phratries, consisting of 4 clans: Kushikisa, Lawokla, Lulakikisa, and Linoklulsha.

Kashapokla.—ten Kate, Reizen in N. A., 402, 1885. Kashap-ukla.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 104, 1884. Ku-shap'. Ok'-la.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 162, 1877.

Kuskunnk. A Kaiialigamut Eskimo village on Hooper bay, Alaska.—Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1899.

Kuskuski (seemingly from kūshkūsh-king, 'hog place'). An important village of mixed Delawares and Iroquois, in 1753-1770, on Beaver cr., Pa., near Newcastle, in Lawrence co. A note in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist. x, 949, says it was at the forks of Beaver cr., in Beaver co. Another authority (Darlington, Gist's Jour., 101, 1898) says it was on the w. bank of Mahoning r., 6 m. above the forks of Beaver cr. and just s. of the present Edinburg, Lawrence co. An older village of the same name had formerly stood on the Shenango, at the site of the present Newcastle. In 1758 Kuskuski was composed of 4 distinct settlements, having a total population of about 1,000 souls. (J. M.)

Kuskusu (Kûs-kûs-sû). A former Siislaw village on Siislaw r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 230, 1890.

Kuskogmiut. An Eskimo tribe inhabiting the shores of Kuskokwim bay and the banks of Kuskokwim r. and its tributaries as far as Kolmakof, Alaska. They are the most numerous of the tribes and the least modified through contact with whites. They live in underground huts, with frames of driftwood covered with sods. They hunt the walrus, the beluga, and the hair seal. Sea birds provide them with meat and eggs, and the feathered skins with clothing. The streams and lakes of the interior abound in trout, and herds of reindeer feed on the tundra. Their fuel is driftwood. They drink the foul water of the lagoons, yet are healthy and strong. Every male has a kaiak. Above tide water they use birch-bark canoes. They catch salmon and whitefish in wicker weirs, and trap foxes and otters. There is little that the natives can obtain to sell, and therefore they remain in their aboriginal condition. They are skillful carvers of ivory and wood. The dwellers on the tundra, where wild fowl and berries are plenty, repair with their kaiaks in the summer to trap and dry their winter supply of salmon. Villages on the upper reaches are built of wood, and each has its large ceremonial house in which masked dances take place in winter. Besides the summer houses roofed with sod there are the usual underground winter habitations reached by a tunnel.

The tribe numbered 3,287 in 1899. The Kuskogmiut villages are as follows: Agomekelenanak, Agulakpak, Aguliak, Agumak, Akiachak, Akiak, Aklut, Akmiut, Anagok, Apahiachak, Apokak, Atchaluk, Bethel, Chimiak, Chuarlilitik, Ekaluktaluk, Etoluk, Igiachak, Iliutak, Kahniut, Kakuak, Kakuikak, Kaltshak, Kaluktuk, Kamegli, Kanagak, Kanak, Kenachananak, Kiktak, Kinak, Kinegnagak, Kinegnak, Klchakuk, Kleguchek, Klutak, Kolmakof, Kongiganak, Kuilkluk, Kukluktuk, Kulvavik, Kuskok, Kuskokvak, Kweleluk, Kwik, Kwikak, Kwilokuk, Kwinak, Lomavik, Mumtrak, Mumtrelek, Nak, Nakolkavik, Napai, Napaisak, Napakiak, Nochak, Novoktolak, Okaganak, Oknagak, Oyak, Papka, Shevenak, Shimiak, Shoklak, Takiketak, Togiaratsorik, Tuliak, Tularka, Tuluksak, Tunagak, Ugovik, Uknavik, Ulolak, Vinasale, and Yakchilak.

Kutchakutchin ('giant people'). A Kutchin tribe in Alaska, inhabiting both banks of the Yukon from Birch cr. to Porcupine r., including the Ft Yukon district. In 1847 McMurray descended Porcupine r. to the Yukon and built Ft

Yukon at the confluence. In 1860 Robert Kennicott wintered at Ft Yukon, and in 1866 Ketchum explored the country about the fort. In May, 1867, Dall and Whymper (Dall, Alaska, 277, 1870) visited Ft Yukon, being the first to reach that point by way of the river. The Kutchakutchin are somewhat nomadic, living principally by hunting and trapping the fox, marten, wolf, wolverene, deer, lynx, rabbit, marmot, and moose. They are traders, making little for themselves, but buying from the tribes which use Ft Yukon as a common trading post. Nakiek, their standard of value, consists of strings of beads, each string 7 ft long. A string is worth one or more beaver skins according to the kind of beads, and the whole nakiek is valued at 24 pelts. Their dwellings, shaped like inverted teacups are of sewed deerskins fastened over curved poles. The women are said to perform most of the drudgery, but the men cook. Lacking pottery, their utensils are of wood, matting, sheep horns, or birch bark; their dishes are wooden troughs; and their spoons of wood or horn hold a pint. Kettles of woven tamarack roots are obtained from the Hankutchin. Jones says they are divided into three castes or clans: Tchitcheah (Chitesa), Tengeratsey (Tangesatsa), and Nateshi (Natesa). Formerly a man must marry into another clan, but this custom has fallen into disuse. Polygamy and slavery are practised among them. They formerly burned their dead, but now use a coffin placed upon a raised platform, a feast accompanying the funeral ceremony. Richardson (Arct. Exped., I, 386, 1851) placed the number of men at 90. They have a village at Ft Yukon. Senati, on the middle Yukon, was settled by them. The Tatsakutchin and Tennuthkutchin, offshoots of the main tribe, are extinct. Kert-kai-lee.—Parry quoted by Murdoch in 9th Rep. B. A. E., 61, 1892. Fort Indians.—Ross, MS. notes on Tinne, B. A. Kutchin ('people'). A group of Athapascan tribes in Alaska and British North America, inhabiting the region on the Yukon and its tributaries above Nuklukayet, the Peel r. basin, and the lower Mackenzie valley. They have decreased to half their former numbers owing to wars between the tribes and the killing of female children. Chiefs and medicine-men and those who possess rank acquired by property have two or more wives. They usually live in large parties, each headed by a chief and having one or more medicine-men, the latter acquiring an authority to which even the chiefs are subject. Their dances and chants are rhythmical and their games are more manly and rational than those of their congeners. They have wrestling bouts which are begun by little boys, those next in strength coming in in turn until the strongest or freshest man in the band remains the final victor, after which the women go through the same progressive contest. They are exceedingly hospitable, keeping guests for months, and each head of a family takes his turn in feasting the whole band, on which occasion etiquette requires him to fast until the guests have departed (Hardisty in Smithsonian Rep. for 1866, 313). The Kutchin tribes are Tenankutchin, Natsitkutchin, Kutahakutchin, Hankutchin, Trotsikkutchin, Tutchonekutchin, Vuntakutchin, Tukkuhkutchin, Tatlitkutchin, Nakotchokutchin, and Kwitchakutchin.

Kutenai (corrupted form, possibly by way of the language of the Siksika, of Kútonáq, one of their names for themselves). A people forming a distinct linguistic stock, the Kitunahan family of Powell, who inhabit parts of s. e. British Columbia and n. Montana and Idaho, from the lakes near the source of Columbia r. to Pend d'Oreille lake. Their legends and traditions indicate that they originally dwelt e. of the Rocky mts., probably in Montana, whence they were driven westward by the Siksika, their hereditary enemies. The two tribes now live on amicable terms, and some intermarriage has taken place. Before the buffalo disappeared from the plains they often had joint hunting expeditions. Recollection of the treatment of the Kutenai by the Siksika remains, however, in the name they give the latter, Sahantla ('bad people'). They entertained also a bad opinion of the Assiniboin (Tlutlamaeka, 'cut-throats'), and the Cree (Gutskiawe, 'liars').

The Kutenai language is spoken in two slightly differing dialects, Upper and Lower Kutenai. A few uncertain points of similarity in grammatical structure with the Shoshonean tongues seem to exist. The language is incorporative both with respect to the pronoun and the noun object. Prefixes and suffixes abound, the prefix aq(k)- in nouns occurring with remarkable frequency. As in the Algon-quian tongues, the form of a word used in composition differs from that which it has independently. Reduplication is very rare, occurring only in a few nouns, some of which are possibly of foreign origin. There are a few loan-words from Salishan dialects.

The Upper Kutenai include the following subdivisions: Akiskenukinik, Akamnik, Akanekunik, and Akiyenik.

The Lower Kutenai are more primitive and nomadic, less under the influence of the Catholic church, and more given to gambling. They have long been river and lake Indians, and possess peculiar bark canoes that resemble some of those used in the Amur region in Asia (Mason in Rep. Nat. Mus., 1899). Of late years many of them have taken to horses and are skillful in their management. The Upper Kutenai keep nearer the settlements, often obtaining a living by serving the settlers and miners in various ways. Many of them have practically ceased to be canoe-men and travel by horse. Both the Upper and the Lower Kutenai hunt and fish, the latter depending more on fish for food. Physically, the Kutenai are well developed and rank among the taller tribes of British Columbia. Indications of race mixture seem to be shown in the form of the head. Their general character from the time of De Smet has been reported good. Their morality, kindness, and hospitality are noteworthy, and more than any other Indians of the country they have avoided drunkenness and lewd intercourse with the whites. Their mental ability is comparatively high, and the efforts of the missionaries have been rewarded with success. They are not excessively given to emotional instability, do not lack a sense of interest, and can concentrate attention when necessary. Their social system is simple, and no evidence of the existence of totems or secret societies has been found. The chieftainship, now more or less elective, was probably hereditary, with limitations; slavery of war prisoners was formerly in vogue; and relatives were responsible for the debts of a deceased person. Marriage was originally polygamous; divorced women were allowed to marry again, and adultery was not severely punished. Adoption by marriage or by residence of more than a year was common. Women could hold certain kinds of property, such as tents and utensils. A wergild was customary. Religion was a sort of sun worship, and the belief in the ensoulment of all things and in reincarnation prevailed. The land of the dead was in the sun, from which at some time all the departed would descend to L. Pend d'Oreille to meet the Kutenai then living. In the old days the medicine-men were very powerful, their influence surviving most with the Lower Kutenai, who still paint their faces on dance occasions; but tattooing is rare. Except a sort of reed pipe, a bone flute, and the drum, musical instruments were unknown to them; but they had gambling, dancing, and medicine songs. The Lower Kutenai are still exceedingly addicted to gambling, their favorite being a noisy variety of the widespread guess-stick game. The Kutenai were in former days great buffalo hunters. Firearms have driven out the bow and arrow, save as children's toys or for killing birds. Spearing, the basket trap, and wicker weirs were much in use by the Lower Kutenai. Besides the bark canoe, they had dugouts; both skin and rush lodges were built; the sweat house was universal. Stone hammers were still in use in parts of their country in the last years of the 19th century. The Lower Kutenai are still noted for their watertight baskets of split roots. In dress they originally resembled the Plains Indians rather than those of the coast; but contact with the whites has greatly modified their costume. While fond of the white man's tobacco, they have a sort of their own made of willow bark. A large part of their food supply is now obtained from the whites. For food, medicine, and economical purposes the Kutenai use a large number of the plant products of their environment (Chamberlain in Verh. d. Berl. Ges. f. Anthr., 551-6, 1895). They were gifted also with esthetic appreciation of several plants and flowers. The diseases from which the Kutenai suffer most are consumption and ophthalmic troubles; venereal diseases are rare. Interesting maturity ceremonies still survive in part. The mythology and folklore of the Kutenai consist chiefly of cosmic and ethnic myths, animal tales, etc. In the animal tales the coyote, as an adventurer and deceiver, is the most prominent figure, and with him are often associated the chicken-hawk, the grizzly bear, the fox, the cricket, and the wolf. Other creatures which appear in these stories are the beaver, buffalo, caribou, chipmunk, deer, dog, moose, mountain lion, rabbit, squirrel, skunk, duck, eagle, grouse, goose, magpie, owl, snowbird, tomtit, trout, whale, butterfly, mosquito, frog, toad, and turtle. Most of the cosmogonic legends seem to belong to the N. W. Pacific cycle; many of the coyote tales belong to the cycle of the Rocky mt. region, others have a Siouan or Algonquian aspect in some particulars. Their deluge myth is peculiar in several respects. A number of tales of giants occur, two of the legends, "Seven Heads" and "Lame Knee," suggesting Old World analogies. The story of the man in the moon is probably borrowed from French sources.

While few evidences of their artistic ability in the way of pictographs, birch-bark drawings, etc., have been reported, the Kutenai are no mean draftsmen. Some of them possess an idea of map making and have a good sense of the physical features of the country. Some of their drawings of the horse and the buffalo are characteristically lifelike and quite accurate. The ornamentation of their moccasins and other articles, the work of the women, is often elaborate, one of the motives of their decorative art being the Oregon grape. They do not seem to have made pottery, nor to have indulged in wood carving to a large extent. The direct contact of the Kutenai with the whites is comparatively recent. Their word for white man, Süy-äpi, is identical with the Nez Percé Süéapo (Parker, Jour., 381, 1840), and is probably borrowed. Otherwise the white man is called Nütlu'qenë, 'stranger.' They have had few serious troubles with the whites, and are not now a warlike people. As yet the Canadian Kutenai are not reservation Indians. The United States seems to have made no direct treaty with the tribe for the extinguishment of their territorial rights (Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 856).

Within the Kutenai area, on the Columbia lakes, live a colony of Shushwap (Salishan) known as Kinbaskets, numbering 56 in 1904. In that year the Kutenai in British territory were reported to number 553, as follows: Lower Columbia Lake, 80; Lower Kutenai (Flatbow), 172; St Mary's (Ft Steele), 216; Tobacco Plains, 61; Arrow Lake (West Kutenai), 24. These returns indicate a decrease of about 150 in 13 years. The United States census of 1890 gave the number of Kutenai in Idaho and Montana as 400 to 500; in 1905 those under the Flathead agency, Mont., were reported to number 554. The Kutenai have given their name to Kootenai r., the districts of East, West, and North Kootenay, Brit. Col., Kootenai lake, Brit. Col., Kootanie pass in the Rocky mts., Kootenai co. and the town of Kootenai, Idaho, and to other places on both sides of the international boundary (Am. Anthropol., iv, 348-350, 1902).

Kutshamakin. One of the Massachusetts sachems who signed the treaties of 1643 and 1645. He was properly the sachem of the country about Dorchester, Mass., part of which he sold to the English. It was his people to whom John Eliot first preached. Though at first opposed to the English, Kutshamakin afterward became Christianized and served them in many ways, particularly as interpreter. To his killing and scalping a Pequot Indian in 1636 has been attributed (Drake, Inds. of N. A., 116, 1880) the outbreak of a horrible war. (A. F. C.)

Kutshittan ('bear house people'). Given as a subdivision of the Tlingit group Nanyasay (q. v.), but in reality it is merely the name of the occupants of a certain house.

Kwaiantikwokets ('on the other side of the river'). An isolated Paiute band, formerly living in N. W. Arizona, E. of Colorado. Pop. 62 in 1873. They affiliated largely with the Navaho.

Kuraintu-kwakats.—Ingalls in H. R. Ex. Doc. 66, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 2, 1873 (misprint). Kwai-an-ti-twok-ets.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Kwaitshi (Kwa-ai'-tē'i). A former Yaquina village on the S. side of Yaquina r., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 229, 1890.

Kwaituki. The ruins of a former village of the Hopi, on the W. side of Oraibi arroyo, 14 m. above Oraibi, N. E. Ariz.—Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 57, 1891.

Kwakina ('town of the entrance place'). A ruined pueblo of the Zuni, 7 m. S. W. of Zuni pueblo, W. N. Mex. It formed one of the Seven Cities of Cibola, and was possibly the Aquinas of Oñate, in 1598. The town is mentioned in Zárate-Salmeron's relation, ca. 1629, hence must have been abandoned subsequently to that date and prior to 1680, when but 4 of the cities of Cibola remained. Cf. Pinawan. Aquinas.—Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 136, 1889 (misquoting Oñate). Aquinas.—Oñate (1598) in Doc. inéd. xvi, 133, 1871. Quakyina.—Bandler in Arch. Inst. Pap., iii, 133, 1890. Kua-kyi-na.—Ibid., v, 171, 1890. Kwá-ki-na.—Cushing in Comptendu Internat. Cong. Amér., vii, 156, 1890. Kya-kuina.—Bandler in Arch. Inst. Kwakinawan ('town of the entrance place'). A former Zuni pueblo S. E. of Thunder mt., which lies about 4 m. E. of Zuni pueblo, N. Mex. It is distinct from Kwakina, although not unlikely it was built and for a time inhabited by the people formerly occupying the latter village after one of the descents of the Zuni from their stronghold on Thunder mt. and the abandonment of the Seven Cities of Cibola. (F. H. C.)

KWAKIUTL MAN. (AM. MUS. NAT. HIST.)

Kwakiutl (according to their own folk-etymology the name signifies 'smoke of the world', but with more probability it means 'beach at the north side of the river'). In its original and most restricted sense this term is applied to a group of closely related tribes or septs living in the neighborhood of Ft. Rupert, Brit. Col. These septs are the Guetela, Komkutis, Komoyue, and Walaskwakiutl, and their principal village Tsahis, surrounding Ft. Rupert. Other former towns were Kalokwis, Kliksiwi, Noohtamuh, Tsaitse, and Whulk, of which the last two were summer villages shared with the Nimkish during the salmon season. Those who encamped at Tsaitse belonged to the Komoyue sept. In comparatively recent times a portion of the Kwakiutl separated from the rest and are known as Matilpe. These and the Konoyue are enumerated separately by the Canadian Department of Indian Affairs, thus limiting the term Kwakiutl to the Guetela, Komkutis, and Walaskwakiutl. In one place it is applied to the Guetela alone. The population of the Kwakiutl proper in 1904 was 163.

KWAKIUTL CHIEFTAINESS IN CEREMONIAL COSTUME. (B245)

In more extended senses the term Kwakiutl is applied to one of the two great divisions of the Wakashan linguistic stock (the other being the Nootka), and to a dialect and a subdialect under this. The following is a complete classification of the Kwakiutl divisions and subdivisions, based on the investigations of Boas: Haisla dialect—Kitamat and Kitlope. Heiltsuk dialect—Bellabella, China Hat, Nohuntsitk, Somehulitk, and Wikeno. Kwakiutl dialect—Koskimo subdialect—Klaskino, Koprino, Koskimo, and Quatsino. Naviti subdialect—Nakomgilisala and Tlatlasikoala. Kwakiutl subdialect—Awaitlala, Goasila, Guauaenok, Hahua-mis, Koeksotenok, Kwakiutl (including Matilpe), Lekwiltok, Mamalelekala, Nakoaktok, Nimkish, Tenaktak, Tlauit-sis, and Tsawatenok. The Hoyalas were an extinct Kwakiutl division the minor affinities of which are unknown.

The total population of the Kwakiutl branch of the Wakashan stock in 1904 was 2,173, and it appears to be steadily decreasing.

Kwalhioqua (from Tkulriyo-gōā'tke:kulgi, 'at a lonely place in the woods', their Chinook name.—Boas). An Athapascan tribe which formerly lived on the upper course of Willoughby r., w. Wash. Gibbs extends their habitat e. into the upper Chehalis, but Boas does not believe they extended e. of the Coast range. They have been confounded by Gibbs and others with a Chinookan tribe on the lower course of the river called Willopah (q. v.). The place where they generally lived was called Nqulá'was. The Kwahioqua and Willopah have ceded their land to the United States (Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., pt. 2, 832, 1899). In 1850 two males and several females survived. Hale (Ethnog. and Philol., 204, 1846), who estimated them at about 100, said that they built no permanent habitations, but wandered in the woods, subsisting on game, berries, and roots, and were bolder, harder, and more savage than the river and coast tribes.

Gitá'qulawaa.—Boas, letter, 1904 (from name of the place where they generally lived, Nqulá'was). Kivalbioqua.—Buschmann in König. Kwantlen. The main Kwantlen village, situated at Ft Langley, on lower Fraser r., Brit. Col.; pop. 39 in 1904.

Kwa'tlen.—Hill-Tout in Ethnol. Surv. Can., 54, 1902. Langley.—Can. Ind. Aff., pt. II, 72, 1902.

Kwapahag. Mentioned in a letter sent by the Abnaki to the governor of New England, in 1721, as one of the divisions of their tribe.

Kwapahag.—Abnaki letter (1721) in Mass. Hist. Soc. coll., 2d s., VIII, 262, 1819.

Kwa'shkinawan ('is-there-no-water town'). A ruined Zuñi pueblo n. w. of the Manuelito road, 15 m. n. w. of Zuñi pueblo, near the Arizona and New Mexico boundary. (F. H. C.)

Kwatami ('on the gulf'). A subdivision of the Tututni, formerly living on or near Sixes r., Oreg., but now on Siletz rcs. Parker (Jour., 257, 1840) regarded them as a part of the Umpqua. Parrish (Ind. Aff. Rep. 1854, 496, 1855) placed them in 3 villages on the Pacific coast s. of Coquille r., near the mouth of Flores cr., at Sixes r., and at Port Orford. In 1854 they were governed by a principal chief, Hahhultalah, living at Sixes r., and a subchief, Tayonecia, residing at Port Orford. This band claimed all the country between the coast and the summit of the Coast range, from the s. boundary of the Nasumi to Humbug mt., 12 m. s. of Port Orford. In 1854 (Ind. Aff. Rep., 495, 1855) the Kwatami consisted of 53 men, 45 women, 22 boys, and 23 girls; total, 143. In 1877 (Ind. Aff. Rep., 300, 1877) they numbered 72.

Labor, Division of. The common impression that the Indian woman was a mere slave and drudge for her husband is an error due to ignorance of the Indian division of labor in accordance with the necessities of savage life. Briefly stated, it was the man's business to provide meat and skins from the forest and plain and to protect the home from enemies, while the woman attended to the household duties of preparing the food, arranging the house interior, and caring for the children. The preparation of the food implied also the principal work of cultivation among the agricultural tribes, with the bringing of the wood and water, while household work included the making of pottery, basketry, and mats. The men themselves frequently made their own buckskin dress, and almost always their ceremonial costume. Among the Pueblos the greater part of the buckskin clothing, including leggings and moccasins, for both sexes, was made by the men. The heavier part of the Pueblo weaving also was the work of the men, the women confining themselves for the greater part to the production of belts and other small pieces. Among the Navaho, on the other hand, the weaving work was about evenly divided. The men fashioned their weapons, and the articles of more laborious construction, as stone hatchets, canoes, fish weirs, etc. As tribes were constantly at war one with another and the pursuit of game carried the hunter into disputed territory, the first business of every man was to be a warrior, forever on the alert for danger. This condition left him very little leisure for other pursuits excepting during the season when his enemies also were unable to travel. His wife, recognizing this fact, took up her share of the burden cheerfully, and would have scorned as effeminate the husband who took any other view of the situation. Among the more sedentary and agricultural tribes, where the procuring of food did not necessitate hostile collision with other tribes, the men usually did their fair share of the home work, laboring in the fields together with the women. In general, it may be said that the man assumed the dangerous duty, the woman the safer routine work. The frequent sacrifice ordeals, intended to win the favor of the gods of the tribe, were borne almost entirely by the men, the part of the women being chiefly that of applauding spectators. The woman remained mistress of the home, and in spite of the variety of her duties, the number of women's games furnish testimony that she enjoyed her leisure in her own way. See Popular fallacies, Women. (J. M.)

Labrets. Ornaments worn in holes that are pierced through the lips. Cabeza de Vaca notes of Indians of the Texas coast: "They likewise have the nether lip bored, and within the same they carry a piece of thin cane about half a finger thick." It is quite certain that this custom prevailed for some distance inland along the Colorado r. of Texas and in neighboring regions, while large labrets were also found by Cushing among the remains on the W. coast of Florida. Outside of this region they were almost restricted to an area in the N. W., the habitat of the Aleut, Haida, Heiltsuk, Tlingit, Tsimshian, and Eskimo tribes, extending from Dean inlet to Anderson r. on the Arctic coast. They were also adopted by some of the western Athapascans. Here the lower lip alone was pierced. While the southern tribes made a single aperture in the middle of the lip, and consequently used but one labret, the Aleut and Eskimo usually punctured a hole below each corner of the mouth and inserted two. Moreover, among the southern tribes the ornament was worn only by women, while Aleut men used it occasionally and Eskimo men more and more generally, as one proceeded northward, until beyond the Yukon the use of labrets was confined to males. Among the Haida, Heiltsuk, Tlingit, and Tsimshian the labret was a mark of high birth, superseding in this respect the head-flattening of the tribes living farther S. The piercing was consequently done during potlatches, a small aperture being bored first, which was enlarged from year to year until it sometimes became so great that the lip proper was reduced to a narrow ribbon, which was liable to break, and sometimes did. The labrets were made of wood, stone, bone, or abalone shell, often inlaid, and present two general types, namely, a long piece inserted into the lip at one end, or a round or oval stud hollowed on each side and protruding but slightly from the face. George Dixon noted one of this latter type that was $3\frac{1}{2}$ in. long by $2\frac{1}{2}$ in. broad. The last labrets used were small plugs of silver, and the custom has now been entirely abandoned. On account of the use of these ornaments the Tlingit were called Kolosch by their northern neighbors and the Russians, whence the name Koluschan, adopted for the linguistic stock.

Among the Eskimo and Aleut bone labrets predominated, though some very precious specimens were of jade. They were shaped like buttons or studs, or, in the case of some worn by women, like sickles. The lips of men were pierced only at puberty, and the holes were enlarged successively by means of plugs, which were often strung together afterward and preserved. For further illustration of the use of labrets, see Adornment.

Lackawanna. A variety of coal. From Lackawanna, the name of a tributary of the Susquehanna and a county in Pennsylvania, which represents lechawanne in the Lenape (Delaware) dialect, signifying 'the stream forks'; from lechau, 'fork', and -hanne, 'stream,' 'river'. (A. F. C.)

Lackawaxen (Lechawueksink, 'the forks of the road'). Mentioned by Alcedo (Dic. Geog., II, 565, 1787) as a former Indian (Delaware?) settlement on the e. branch of Delaware r., Pa. The e. branch of the Delaware is in New York, and the settlement, if ever existing, was probably on Lackawaxen cr., a tributary of the Delaware in N. E. Pennsylvania. Heckewelder (Trans. Am. Philos. Soc., IV, 359, 1834) mentions this as the Delaware name for two places, one in Wayne co. and the other in Northampton co., Pa.

Laenukhuma (La'nu'xuma). Given by Boas (Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887) as the ancestor of a gens of the Quatsino; also applied to the gens itself.

La Flesche, Francis. Son of Estamaza, or Joseph La Flesche, former head chief of the Omaha, born in Thurston co., Nebr., Dec. 25, 1857. He attended the Presbyterian mission school on the Omaha res., where he laid the foundation of his later education. In 1878-79 he accompanied the Ponca chief Standing Bear on his eastern tour and interpreted his presentation of the wrongs his people had suffered in the removal from their home in South Dakota. During an investigation of the Ponca removal by a committee of the U. S. Senate he served again as interpreter and attracted the attention of the chairman by the impartial manner in which he performed his work. In 1881, when Hon. S. J. Kirkwood, the chairman of that committee, became Secretary of the Interior, he called Mr La Flesché to Washington and gave him a position in the Office of Indian Affairs, where he remains. In 1893 he was graduated from the National University Law School. The memory of the tribal life of his childhood stimulated him to study his people, for which his father's position gave him unusual advantage. His mastery of English has enabled him accurately to set forth the results of his ethnological investigations, in which he is still actively engaged. His published writings have appeared in the Journal of American Folk-lore and other scientific periodicals, in the "Study of Omaha Indian Music," by Alice C. Fletcher (Peabody Museum Pub.), and in popular magazines. He is the author also of "The Middle Five," a book giving the story of his school days. Mr La Flesché has made ethnological collections for the University of Berlin, the University of California, the Peabody Museum of American Archaeology and Ethnology, and other institutions of learning. He is a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and a member of the American Anthropological Association and of the Anthropological Society of Washington. In 1906 Mr La Flesché married Miss Rosa Bourassa, of Chippewa descent. (A. C. F.)

Laco.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863

Lagrimas de San Pedro (Span.: 'tears of St Peter'). A former group of Alchedoma rancherías, on or near the Rio Colorado, in California, more than 50 m. below the mouth of Bill Williams fork. They were visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés in 1776.—Garcés, Diary, 427, 1900.

Laguna (Span.: 'lagoon', on account of a large pond west of the pueblo; aboriginal name Ka-waik', an old Keresan word of unknown signification). A Keresan tribe whose principal pueblo, which bears the same popular name, is situated on the s. bank of San José r., Valencia co., N. Mex., about 45 m. w. of Albuquerque. It was formerly the seat of a Spanish mission, dating from its establishment as a pueblo in July, 1699, and having Acoma as a visita after 1782. The lands of the Lagunas consist of a Spanish grant of 125,225 acres, mostly of desert land. The Laguna people are composed of 19 clans, as follows, those marked with an asterisk being extinct: Kohaia (Bear), Ohshahch (Sun), Chopi (Badger), Tyami (Eagle), Skurshka (Water-snake), Sqowi (Rattlesnake), Tsushki (Coyote), Yaka (Corn; divided into Kochinish-yaka, or Yellow-corn, and Kukinish-yaka, or Red-corn), Sits (Water), Tsina (Turkey), Kakhan (Wolf), Hatsi (Earth), Mokaioqch (Mountain lion), Shawiti (Parrot), Shuwimi (Turquoise), Shiaska (Chaparral-cock), Kurtai (Antelope), Meyo (Lizard), Hapai (Oak). Most of the clans constitute phratral groups, as follows: (1) Bear, Badger, Coyote, and Wolf; (2) Mountain-lion and Oak; (3) Water-snake, Rattlesnake, Lizard, and Earth; (4) Antelope and Water. According to Laguna tradition, the Bear, Eagle, Water, Turkey, and Corn clans, together with some members of the Coyote clan, came originally from Acoma; the Badger, Parrot, Chaparral-cock, and Antelope clans, and some members of the Coyote clan, came from Zufii; the Sun people originated probably in San Felipe; the Water-snake in Sia; the

JOSÉ PAISANO—LAGUNA

Rattlesnake probably in Oraibi; the Wolf and Turquoise in Sandia; the Earth clan in Jemez; the Mountain-lion and Oak people claim to have come from Mt Taylor; the Lizard clan is of unknown origin. Laguna therefore is not only the most recent of the New Mexican pueblos, but its inhabitants are of mixed origin, being composed of at least four linguistic stocks—Keresan, Tanoan, Shoshonean, and Zuni. It is said that formerly the people were divided into two social groups, or phratries, known as Kapaitis and Kayomasho, but these are now practically political parties, one progressive, the other conservative. Until 1871 the tribe occupied, except during the summer season, the single pueblo of Laguna, but this village is gradually becoming depopulated, the inhabitants establishing permanent residences in the former summer villages of Casa Blanca, Cubero, Hasatch, Paguate, Encinal, Santa Ana, Paraje, Tsiamia, and Puertecito. Of these, Paguate is the oldest and most populous, containing 350 to 400 inhabitants in 1891. Former villages were Shinats and Shunaiki. The Laguna people numbered 1,384 in 1905. See Keresan Family, Moquino, Pueblos, Rito, Shumasitscha, and the villages above named. (F. W. H.)

Lahoocat. Mentioned by Lewis and Clark as an old Arikara village, occupied in 1797, abandoned about 1800. It was situated on an island in Missouri r., below the present Cheyenne River agency, S. Dak., and when occupied consisted of 17 lodges arranged in a circle and walled. Lahoocat.—Lewis and Clark, Exped., i, 97, 1814. La hoo cat.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, i, 179, 1904.

Laidukatuwiwait (Lai'-du-ka-tu-wi-wait). A Paviotso band formerly living about the sink of the Humboldt, in w. Nevada.—Powell, Paviotso MS., B. A. E., 1881.

Laimon. Venegas (Hist. Cal., i, 55, 1759) states that the Indians of Loreto-Concho mission have specific names for the tribes of Lower California according to the regions occupied by them, as the Edu, Eduu, or Edues in the s.; that they call themselves Monquis, and those n. of Loreto are called Laymones; the latter are in fact Cochimi, the Edues virtually Pericui, though both, the Edues and the Laymones, contain some tribes of the Monquis. Cagnaguet and Kadakaman are given as Laimon divisions.

Tribes, vi, 701, 1857 (after Lane). Suchamier.—Ibid., 689. Suck-a-mier.—Lane in Ind. Aff. Rep., 161, 1850.

Lakseel (Laq'sel, 'on the ocean'). A Niska division belonging to the Kanhada clan, living in the towns of Andeguale and Kitlakdamix on Nass r., Brit. Col.—Boas in 10th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 49, 1895.

Lakskiyek (Laq'ski'yek, 'on the eagle'). One of the 4 Chimmesyan clans. Local subdivisions bearing the same name are found in the Niska towns of Lakkulzap and Kitlakdamix, and in the Kitsan town of Kitwingach.—Boas in 10th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 49, 50, 1895.

Laktiakli (Laq'id'k'u). A Niska division of the Lakeybo (Wolf) clan, settled in the town of Kitwinshilk, on Nass r., Brit. Col.—Boas in 10th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 49, 1895.

Lakteemelik (Laq'sme'lin, 'on the beaver'). A Niska division of the Lakskiyek clan, living in the town of Kitlakdamix, on Nass r., Brit. Col.—Boas in 10th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 49, 1895.

Lakungida (perhaps a Haida name). A Niska town near the mouth of Nass r., Brit. Col. In 1870 its inhabitants exceeded 400, but in 1897 it contained not more than 50.—Dorsey in Am. Antiq., xix, 279, 1897.

Lakweip (Niska: Laq'uyi'p, 'on the prairie.'—Boas). An isolated Athapascan tribe, related to the Tahltan, formerly living on Portland canal, Alaska, but having quarreled with the Niska are now on the headwaters of Stikine r., Brit. Col. Their chief village is Gunakhe.

Lackweips.—Scott in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1869, 563, 1870. Laq'uyi'p.—Boas in 10th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 34, 1895. Naqyina.—Ibid. (Tsetsaut name: 'on the other side').

Lakeybo (Laqkyebō, 'on the wolf'). One of the 4 clans into which all the Chimmesyan are divided. The name is applied specifically to various local subdivisions as well, there being one such in the Niska town of Lakkulzap and another in the Kitsan town of Kishpiyeux.—Boas in 10th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 49, 50, 1895.

Lalautila (Lā'lāuila, 'always crossing the sea'). Agents of the Tlatlasikoala, subdivided into the Gyegyote and Hahekolatl.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1895, 329, 1897.

Lamasconson. One of several tribes or bands displaced from their homes in St Mary and Charles cos., Md., in 1651, and settled on a reservation at the head of Wicomico r. (Bozman, Maryland, II, 421, 1837). Perhaps a small branch of the Conoy.

Lamochattes. See Weatherford, William.

La Montagne (Fr.: 'the mountain'). A mission village established in 1677 for Caughnawaga and other Catholic Iroquois on a hill on Montreal id., Quebec. They were afterward joined by others, many of whom were not Christians. The village was temporarily deserted in 1689 on account of the Iroquois. In 1696 a part of the converts established a new mission village at Sault au Re collet, and were joined by the others until in 1704 La Montagne was finally abandoned. (J. M.)

The Mountain.—Shea, Cath. Miss., 309, 1865.

Lamps. See Illumination.

Lamsim. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Lamtama. A Nez Percé band living on White Bird cr., a tributary of Salmon r., Idaho, so called from the native name of the stream.—Gatschet, MS., 1878, B. A. E. Buffalo Indians.—Owen in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 424, 1860. Lamtama.—Gatschet, MS., 1878, B. A. E. White Bird Nez Percés.—Ibid. (so called from the name of their chief).

Lana-chaadus (Lā'na tē'ad'as). A family of low social rank belonging to the Eagle clan of the Haida. Before becoming extinct they occupied, with the Gitin-gidjats, a town on Shingle bay, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. Some are said to have lived with the Kaiiahl-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 274, 1905.

Lanadagunga (Lā'na dā'gaña, 'bad [or common] village'). A former Haida town, owned by the Saki-kegawai, on the coast of Moresby id., s. of Tangle cove, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was so called by the people of Hagi, opposite, because the Lanadagunga people used to talk against them.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 277, 1905.

Lanagahlkehoda (Lānā'ga tē'xoda, 'town that the sun does not shine on'). A Haida town on a small island opposite Kaisun, w. coast of Moresby id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. It was so named because it faces n. This is a semi-mythical town, said to have been occupied by the Kas-lanas.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Lanagukunhlin-hadai (Lā'na gu qa'n-tin xā'da-i, 'resting-the-breast-on-a-town people'). A subdivision of the Chaahl-lanas, a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. Lanagukunhlin was the name of a chief.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 276, 1905.

Lanahawa (Lā'na xā'wa, 'swampy village'). A former Haida town on the w. coast of Graham id., opposite Hippa id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col. It was also called Lanahegus (Lā'na xē'-gans, 'town where there is a noise [of drums]') and Lanahltungua (Lā'na tū'ngua, 'town where there are plenty of feathers'). It was occupied by the Skwahladas and Nasto-kegawai before they moved to Rennell sd., and afterward by the Kianusili.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Lanahawa. A former Haida town on the w. coast of Burnaby id., Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., s. of the Ninstints town of Ket.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 278, 1905.

Lanahilduns (Lā'na hī'ldans, 'moving village'; also called Chahlolnagai, from the name of the inlet on which it was situated). A former Haida town on the s. w. side of Rennell sd., Graham id., Queen Charlotte group, Brit. Col.; occupied by the Nasto-kegawai or the Skwahladas family group.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 1905.

Lanashnagai (Lā'nas Inagā'-i, 'peoples' town'). The name of three distinct Haida towns on Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col. One stood on the e. coast of Graham id., s. of C. Ball, and was owned by the Naikun-kegawai; another belonged to the Kuna-lanas and was on the w. side of Masset inlet where it broadens out; the third, which belonged to the Yagunatlan-nagai, was on Yagun r.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 280, 281, 1905.

Lanaunguls (Lā'na 'a'nsals, 'town [that] hides itself'). A Haida town on Masset inlet, Queen Charlotte ids., Brit. Col., belonging to the Aoyaku-Inagai.—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 281, 1905.

Lances. As an implement of the chase or of war the lance had a wide distribution among the ancient and the modern tribes of the United States. Though none of the objects of chipped stone called lance-heads that have been found in numbers on widely separated archeological sites are attached to shafts, there is reason to believe that many of the leaf-shaped blades were lance-heads. The only survivals of the use of the ancient lance are found among the Hupa of California and the western Eskimo, but earlier writers have mentioned their existence among various tribes. Lances for the chase were used occasionally in war by the Eskimo, but the Plains Indians, whenever possible, used two distinct varieties for war and for hunting, the hunting lance blade being shorter and heavier. The lance appears to have originated through the need of striking animals from some distance in order to escape personal danger and to produce surer results than were possible with a stone knife or other implement used at close quarters. The efficiency and range of the lance when thrown from the hand was increased by the throwing stick (q. v.), and the original lance or spear developed into a number of varieties under the influences of environment, the habits of animals, acculturation, etc. The greatest number of forms sprang up among the Eskimo, whose environment was characterized by a great variety and alternation of animal life, while in most other regions a simple lance was perpetuated.

LANCE HEAD; WESTERN ESKIMO. (MURDOCH)

The Plains tribes, as a rule, living in a region conducive to warfare and aggression through its lack of physical boundaries, made more use of the lance in war than did coast, woodland, desert, or mountain tribes. Since the general occupancy of the plains appears to have been coincident with the introduction of the horse, the use of the war lance has been associated with that animal, but it is evident that the tribes that occupied the plains were acquainted with the lance with a stone head as a hunting implement before they entered this vast region. A Kiowa lance in the National Museum is headed with a part of a sword blade and is reputed to have killed 16 persons.

In accord with the tendency of objects designed for especially important usage to take on a religious significance, the lance has become an accessory of ceremonies among the Plains Indians. Elaborately decorated sheaths were made for lances, varying according to the society or office of the owner. At home the lance was leaned against the shield tripod, tied horizontally above the tipi door, or fastened lengthwise to an upright pole behind the tipi. In both earlier and recent times offerings of lance-heads were made to springs, exquisitely formed specimens having been taken from a sulphur spring at Afton, Okla.

Land tenure. The Indian conceived of the earth as mother, and as mother she provided food for her children. The words in the various languages which refer to the land as "mother" were used only in a sacred or religious sense. In this primitive and religious sense land was not regarded as property; it was like the air, it was something necessary to the life of the race, and therefore not to be appropriated by any individual or group of individuals to the permanent exclusion of all others. Other words referring to the earth as "soil" to be used and cultivated by man, mark a change in the manner of living and the growth of the idea of a secular relation to the earth. Instead of depending on the spontaneous products of the land the Indian began to sow seeds and to care for the plants. In order to do this he had to remain on the soil he cultivated. Thus occupancy gradually established a claim or right to possess the tract from which a tribe or an individual derived food. This occupancy was the only land tenure recognized by the Indian; he never of himself reached the conception of land as merchantable, this view having been forced on his acceptance through his relations with the white race. Tecumseh claimed that the Northwest Territory, occupied by allied tribes, belonged to the tribes in common, hence a sale of land to the whites by one tribe did not convey title unless confirmed by other tribes. Furthermore, among most of the Algonquian tribes, at least, according to Dr William Jones, if land were ceded to the whites, the cession could not be regarded as absolute, i. e., the whites could hold only to a certain depth in the earth such as was needful for sustenance. Each tribe had its village sites and contiguous hunting or fishing grounds; as long as the people lived on these sites and regularly went to their hunting grounds, they could claim them against all intruders. This claim often had to be maintained by battling with tribes less favorably situated. The struggle over the right to hunting grounds was the cause of most Indian wars. In some tribes garden spots were claimed by clans, each family working on its own particular patch. In other tribes the favorable localities were preempted by individuals regardless of clan relations. As long as a person planted a certain tract the claim was not disputed, but if its cultivation were neglected anyone who chose might take it. Among the Zuni, according to Cushing, if a man, either before or after marriage, takes up a field of unappropriated land, it belongs strictly to him, but is spoken of as the property of his clan, or on his death it may be cultivated by any member of that clan, though preferably by near relatives, but not by his wife or children, who must be of another clan. Moreover, a man cultivating land at one Zuni farming settlement of the tribe can not give even of his own fields to a tribesman belonging to another farming village unless that person should be a member of his clan; nor can a man living at one village take up land at another without the consent of the body politic of the latter settlement; and no one, whatever his rank, can grant land to any member of another tribe without consent of the Council and certain other clans.

During the early settlement of the country absolute title was vested in the Crown by virtue of discovery or conquest, yet the English acknowledged the Indian's right of occupancy, as is shown by the purchase of these rights both by Lord Baltimore in 1635 and by William Penn in 1682, although colonizing under royal grants. The Puritans, however, coming without royal authority, were necessitated to bargain with the Indians. Absolute right to the Indian lands was fully stated in a proclamation by George III in 1763. In 1783 the Colonial Congress forbade private purchase or acceptance of lands from Indians. On the adoption of the Constitution the right of eminent domain became vested in the United States, and Congress alone had the power to extinguish the Indian's right of occupancy. The ordinance of 1787, relative to all territory n. w. of the Ohio, made the consent of the Indians requisite to the cession of their lands. Until the passage of the act of Mar. 3, 1871, all cession was by treaty, the United States negotiating with the tribes as with foreign nations; since then agreements have been less formal, and a recent decision of the U. S. Supreme Court makes even the agreement or consent of the Indians unnecessary. The tribes living in Arizona, California, Nevada, New Mexico, and Utah came under the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, most of the Pueblos holding their lands under Spanish grants. All Indian reservations have been established either by treaty or by order of the President, but in both cases the Indian's tenure is that of occupancy only. "They may not cut growing timber, open mines, quarry stone, etc., to obtain lumber, coal, building material, etc., solely for the purpose of sale or speculation. In short, what a tenant for life may do upon the lands of a remainderman the Indians may do upon their reservations, but no more." In a few cases reservations have been patented to tribes, as those of the Five Civilized Tribes, and a limited number of tribes have had their lands apportioned and received patents for individual holdings, yet no general change in the Indian land tenure took place until the passage of the severalty act in 1887. This act provided for the allotment to each man, woman, and child of a certain portion of the tribal land and the issuance of a patent by which the United States holds the allotment in trust, free of taxation and encumbrance, for 25 years, when the allottee is entitled to a patent in fee simple. On the approval of their allotments by the Secretary of the Interior the Indians become citizens of the United States and subject to its laws. Seventy-three tribes already hold their lands under this tenure. See Governmental policy, Legal status, Reservations, Treaties, Social organization.

Languages. The American languages show considerable variety in phonetics and structure. While some are vocalic and appear melodious to our ear, others contain many consonant sounds to which we are unaccustomed and which seem to give them a harsh character. Particularly frequent are sounds produced by contact between the base of the tongue and the soft palate, similar to the Scotch ch in loch, and a number of explosive ʔ's, which are produced by pressing the tongue against the palate and suddenly expelling the air between the teeth. Harshness produced by clustering consonants is peculiar to the N. W. coast of America. Sonorous vocalic languages are found in a large part of the Mississippi basin and in California. Peculiar to many American languages is a slurring of terminal syllables, which makes the recording of grammatical forms difficult.

Contrary to the prevalent notion, the vocabularies are rich and their grammatical structure is systematic and intricate. Owing to the wealth of derivatives it is difficult to estimate the number of words in any American language; but it is certain that in every one there are a couple of thousand of stem words and many thousand words, as that term is defined in English dictionaries.

A considerable variety of grammatical structure exists, but there are a few common traits that seem to be characteristic of most American languages. The complexity of grammar is often great because many ideas expressed by separate words in the languages of other continents are expressed by grammatical processes in the languages of the Indians. The classification of words differs somewhat from the familiar grouping in Indo-European languages. The demarcation between noun and verb is often indistinct, many expressions being both denominative and predicative. Often the intransitive verb and the noun are identical in form, while the transitive verb only is truly verbal in character. In other languages the transitive verb is nominal, while the intransitive only is truly verbal. These phenomena are generally accompanied by the use of possessive pronouns with the nominal and of personal pronouns with the verbal class of words. In other cases the verbal forms are differentiated from the noun, but the close relationship between the two classes is indicated by the similarity of the pronominal forms. The intransitive verb generally includes the ideas which Indo-European languages express by means of adjectives. Independent pronouns are often compounds, and the pronoun appears in most cases subordinated to the verb.

In the singular are distinguished self (or speaker), person addressed, and person spoken of; in the plural, corresponding to our first person, are often distinguished the combination of speaker and persons addressed, and speaker and persons spoken of, the so-called inclusive and exclusive forms.

The demonstrative pronouns are analogous to the personal pronoun in that they are generally developed in three forms, indicating respectively the thing near me, near thee, near him. Their development is sometimes even more exuberant, visibility and invisibility, present and past, or location to the right, left, front and back of, and above and below the speaker, being distinguished.

The subordination of the pronoun to the verb is often carried to extremes. In many languages the pronominal subject, the object, and the indirect object are incorporated in the verb, for which reason American languages have often been called "incorporating languages." There are, however, numerous languages in which this pronominal subordination does not occur. In some the process of incorporation does not cease with the pronoun; but the noun, particularly the nominal object, is treated in the same manner. Where such incorporation is found the development of nominal cases is slight, since the incorporation renders this unnecessary.

The occurrence of other classes of words depends largely on the development of another feature of American languages, which is probably common to them all, namely, the expression of a great number of special ideas by means of either affixes or stem modification. On account of the exuberance of such elements American languages have been called "polysynthetic." The character of the subordinated elements shows great variations. In some languages most of the ideas that are subordinated are instrumental (with the hand, the foot, or the like; with the point or the edge of something, etc.); in others they include all kinds of qualifying ideas, such as are generally expressed by auxiliary verbs, verbal compounds, and adverbs. The Eskimo, for instance, by composition of other elements with the stem "to see," may express "he only orders him to go and see"; a Chimesyan composition with the verb to go is, "he went with him upward in the dark and came against an obstacle." The existence of numerous subordinate elements of this kind has a strong effect in determining the series of stem words in a language. Whenever this method of composition is highly developed many special ideas are expressed by stems of very general significance, combined with qualifying elements. Their occurrence is also the cause of the obviousness of Indian etymologies. These elements also occur sometimes independently, so that the process is rather one of coordinate composition than of subordination. The forms of words that enter composition of this kind sometimes undergo considerable phonetic modification by losing affixes or by other processes. In such cases composition apparently is brought about by apocope, or decapitation of words; but most of these seem to be reducible to regular processes. In many languages polysynthesis is so highly developed that it almost entirely suppresses adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions.

The categories of Indo-European languages do not correspond strictly to those of Indian languages. This is true particularly of the ideas of gender and plurality. Grammatical gender based on sex distinction is very rare in America. It is based on other qualities, as animate and inanimate, or noble and ignoble, and often relates only to shape, as round, long, or flat. Complete absence of such classification is frequent. Plurality is seldom clearly developed; it is often absent even in the pronoun; its place is taken by the ideas of collectivity and distribution, which are expressed more often than plurality. Tense is also weakly developed in many languages, although others have a complex system of tenses. Like other adverbial ideas tense is often expressed by affixes. Moods and voice of the verb are also sometimes undeveloped and are expressed by adverbial elements.

In the use of grammatical processes there is great diversity. Suffixes occur almost everywhere; prefixes are not quite so frequent. Infixes seem to be confined to the Siouan languages, although infixation by metathesis occurs in other languages also. Reduplication is frequent, sometimes extending to triplication; but in some groups of languages it does not occur at all. Other forms of modification of stem also occur.

Indian languages tend to express ideas with much graphic detail in regard to localization and form, although other determining elements which Indo-European languages require may be absent. Those languages are, therefore, not so well adapted to generalized statements as to lively description. The power to form abstract ideas is nevertheless not lacking, and the development of abstract thought would find in every one of the languages a ready means of expression. Yet, since the Indian is not given to purely abstract speculation, his abstract terms always appear in close connection with concrete thought; for instance, qualities are often expressed by nominal terms, but are never used without possessive pronouns.

According to the types of culture served by the languages we find holophrastic terms, expressing complex groups of ideas. These, however, are not due to a lack of power to classify, but are rather expressions of form of culture, single terms being intended for those ideas that are of prime importance to the people.

The differentiation of stocks into dialects shows great variation, some stocks comprising only one dialect, while others embrace many that are mutually unintelligible. While the Eskimo have retained their language in all its minor features for centuries, that of the Salish, who are confined to a small area in the N. Pacific region, is split up into innumerable dialects. The fate of each stock is probably due as much to the morphological traits of the language itself as to the effects of its contact with other languages. Wherever abundant reduplication, phonetic changes in the stem, and strong phonetic modifications in composition occur, changes seem to be more rapid than where grammatical processes are based on simple laws of composition. Contact with other languages has had a far-reaching effect through assimilation of syntactic structure and, to a certain extent, of phonetic type. There is, however, no historical proof of the change of any Indian language since the time of the discovery comparable with that of the language of England between the 10th and 13th centuries.

A few peculiarities of language are worth mentioning. As various parts of the population speaking modern English differ somewhat in their forms of expression, so similar variations are found in American languages. One of the frequent types of difference is that between the language of men and that of women. This difference may be one of pronunciation, as among some Eskimo tribes, or may consist in the use of different sets of imperative and declarative particles, as among the Sioux, or in other differences of vocabulary; or it may be more fundamental, due to the foreign origin of the women of the tribe. In incantations and in the formal speeches of priests and shamans a peculiar vocabulary is sometimes used, containing many archaic and symbolic terms. See Chinook jargon, Linguistic families, Sign language. (F. B.)

Languntennenk. A village of Moravian Delawares founded in 1770 on Beaver r., probably near the present Darlington, in Beaver co., Pa., by Indians who removed from Lawunkhannek. In 1773 they abandoned the village and joined the other Moravians on the Muskingum, in Ohio. The missionaries called it Friedensstadt, q. v. (J. M.)

Lansing Man. The name given to a partially dismembered human skeleton found in 1902 under 20 ft of undisturbed silt, 70 ft from the face of the Missouri r. bluff, near Lansing, Kans. The remains lay partly under a large limestone slab imbedded in a mass of talus at the foot of a shale and limestone cliff, against which the silt was deposited. The position of the bones denoted an intentional burial, and not the accidental lodgment of a body at this point. In the walls of the excavations made in the formation there was no indication of slipping, sliding, caving, or prolonged surface wash from a higher level; no indication of direct wind or wave action, except a narrow thin layer of dark clay at one part; no distinct lamination, stratification, or assortment of material; no indication that vegetation had ever taken hold; in short, no evidence that the mass of silt was due to any other process than a slow, steady accumulation, mainly or wholly in quiet water. There were small patches of gravel at irregular intervals, many snail shells, angular fragments of limestone up to 3 or 4 in. thick, small scraps of shale, a few pebbles of glacial drift origin, and a number of pieces of charcoal, some with fractures and angles not in the least worn. These facts point to an upbuilding partly by wash, partly by winds, partly by creep from the adjacent hills, and partly by sediment from the Missouri. It appears that this deposit could have accumulated within a comparatively short period. Even allowing the utmost limit of time that can be reasonably claimed, namely, that the river has cut its way from the top of the silt deposit to its present grade, the time necessary for accomplishing this will fall very far within the period that must have elapsed since the existing topography was created, in part at least by streams that could not begin their work until after glacial floods had ceased to act. The bones themselves do not favor the theory of great antiquity for the remains. According to Hrdlicka (Am. Anthropol., v, 323, 1903) the skull and bones are not perceptibly fossilized, and are practically identical in their physical characters with the crania and bones of some of the historic Indians of the general region. The cranium has been placed for safe-keeping in the U. S. National Museum by its owner, Mr M. C. Long, of Kansas City, Mo.

As the geologists who examined the site when the deep trenches cut by the Bureau of American Ethnology were open hold widely divergent opinions with respect to the age of the formation inclosing the remains, some of them considering it true loess, further investigation is necessary ere the question of antiquity can be finally settled.

Of the geologists referred to, those favoring great antiquity are Upham (Am. Antiq., xxiv, 413, 1902, and Am. Geologist, Sept. 1902, 135); Winchell (Am. Geologist, Sept. 1902); Williston (Science, Aug. 1, 1902), and Erasmus Haworth, Professor of Geology, University of Kansas. Those favoring a comparatively recent date are Chamberlin (Jour. of Geology, x, 745, 1903); Holmes (Smithson. Rep., 455, 1902); R. D. Salisbury, Professor of Geology, University of Chicago; Samuel Calvin, State Geologist of Iowa, and Gerard Fowke, who conducted the excavations on the site for the Bureau of American Ethnology. La Piche. A small rancheria, probably Luisefio, on Potrero res., 75 m. from Mission Tule River agency, s. Cal. With La Joya the population was officially given as 225 in 1903. Cf. Apeche.

La Posta (Span.; probably here meaning 'post station'). A reservation of 238.88 acres of unpatented desert land occupied by 19 so-called Mission Indians, situated 170 m. from Mission Tule River agency, s. Cal.

Lappawinze ('getting provisions'). A Delaware chief—one of those who were induced to sign at Philadelphia the treaty of 1737, known as the "walking purchase," confirming the treaty of 1686, which granted to the whites land extending from Neshaming cr. as far as a man could walk in a day and a half. When the survey was made under this stipulation the governor of Pennsylvania had a road built inland and employed a trained runner, a proceeding that the Delawares denounced as a fraud. See Pa. Archives, 1st ser., i, 541, 1852; Thompson, Inquiry into Alienation of Delaware and Shawnee Inds., 69, 1759.

La Prairie. The first mission village of the Catholic Iroquois, established in 1668 on the s. bank of the St Lawrence, at La Prairie, La Prairie co., Quebec. The first occupants were chiefly Oneida with other Iroquois, but it soon contained members of all the neighboring Iroquoian and Algonquian tribes. The Mohawk, from Caughnawaga, N. Y., finally gained the leading position and their language came into vogue in the settlement. In 1676 the Indians removed to Portage r., a few miles distant, and built the present Caughnawaga, q. v.

Laptambif.—Gatschet, Atfalati MS., B. A. E., 368, 1877. Long-tongue-buff.—Ross, Adventures, 236, 1849.

La Punta (Span.; 'the point'). A former Diegueño rancheria near San Diego, s. Cal.—Ortega (1775) quoted by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 253, 1884.

Lapwai. A Nez Percé band formerly living near the mouth of Lapwai cr., Idaho, now under the Lapwai school superintendent.

Las Flores (Span.; 'the flowers'). A former Luisefio village in n. San Diego co., Cal. (Hayes, 1850, quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 460, 1882). Arguello (H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 117, 1857) mentions a Las Flores as a Diegueño pueblo in San Diego co., established after the secularization act of 1834, which may be the same.

Las Mulas (Span.: 'the mules'). A rancheria near the presidio of La Bahia and the mission of Espiritu Santo de Zúñiga on the lower Rio San Antonio, Tex., in 1785, at which date it had only 5 inhabitants (Bancroft, No. Mex. States, 1, 659, 1886), who were probably of Karankawan affinity.

Lassik (Las'-sik, the name of their last chief). A people of the Athapascan family formerly occupying a portion of main Eel r., Cal., and its e. tributaries, Van Duzen, Larrabee, and Dobbin crs., together with the headwaters of Mad r. They had for neighbors toward the n. the Athapascan inhabitants of the valley of Mad r. and Redwood cr.; toward the e. the Wintun of Southfork of Trinity r.; toward the s. the Wailaki, from whom they were separated by Kekawaka cr.; toward the w. the Sinkine on Southfork of Eel r. They occupied their regular village sites along the streams only in winter. Their houses were conical in form, made of the bark of Douglas spruce. They had neither sweat lodges nor dance houses. The basketry was twined, but differed considerably from that of the Hupa in its decoration. Beside the methods employed elsewhere for securing deer and elk, the Lassik used to follow a fresh track until the animal, unable to feed or rest, was overtaken. They intermarried with the Wintun, to whom they were assimilated in mourning customs, etc. Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 121, 1877) gives the impression that the Lassik belong with the Wintun in language, but this is a mistake. Their dialect resembles the Hupa in its morphology and the Wailaki in its phonology. The majority of them perished during the first few years of the occupancy of their country by white people, a bounty being placed on their heads and the traffic in children for slaves being profitable and unrestrained. A few families of them are still living in the neighborhood of their former homes. (P. E. G.)

Leatherlips (native name Shá'teiaron'-hiú', 'Two clouds of equal size'.—Hewitt). A Huron (Wyandot) chief of the Sandusky tribe of Ohio who, in Aug., 1795, signed the treaty of Greenville in behalf of his people. His honorable character and friendship for the whites inflamed the jealousy of Tecumseh, who ruthlessly ordered him to be killed on the plea that he was a wizard, Tecumseh's fanaticism being so overmastering that he assigned the execution of Shateiaronhia to another Huron chief named Roundhead. He was apprised of his condemnation by his brother, who was sent to him with a piece of bark on which a tomahawk was drawn as a token of his death. The execution took place near his camp on the Scioto, about 14 m. n. of Columbus, in the summer of 1810, there being present a number of white men, including a justice of the peace, who made an effort to save the life of the accused, but without success. He was tomahawked by a fellow tribesman while kneeling beside his grave, after having chanted a death song. The Wyandot Club of Columbus, Ohio, in 1888, erected a granite monument to Shateiaronhia in a park surrounded by a stone wall, including the spot where he died. See Curry in Ohio Archaeol. and Hist. Quar., XII, no. 1, 1906; Drake, Life of Tecumseh, 1852; Heckewelder, Hist. Ind. Nat., 1876; Howe, Hist. Coll. Ohio, I, 611, 1898.

Leatherwood (Leatherwood's Town). A former Cherokee settlement at or near the present Leatherwood village in the n. part of Franklin co., N. E. Ga. The name was probably that of a prominent chief or mixed-blood. (J. M.)

Ledyanoprolivskoe. Perhaps a town of the Tlingit, locality not given, numbering 200 in 1835.

Laydanopodevakie.—Elliott, Cond. Aff. Alaska, 227, 1875 (transliterated from Veniaminoff). Ledyanoprolivakie.—Veniaminoff, Zapiski, II, pt. III, 29, 1840.

Leekwinai (Lee-kuin-a-i', 'snapping turtle'). A subclan of the Delawares (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Leelaha. Supposed to be a division of the Kalapooian family; not identified.—Slocum in H. R. Rep. 101, 25th Cong., 3d sess., 42, 1839.

Leeshtelosh (Leesh-te-losh). Probably a Kalapooian band, said to have lived near the headwaters of Willamette r., Oreg.—Hunter, Captivity, 73, 1823.

Legal status. The act of July 22, 1790, contains the earliest provision relating to intercourse with Indians. By it any offense against the person or property of a peaceable and friendly Indian was made punishable in the same manner as if the act were committed against a white inhabitant (U. S. Stat., I, 138). The act of May 19, 1796, empowered the President to arrest within the limits of any state or district an Indian guilty of theft, outrage, or murder (ibid., 472). During the next 20 years the idea that the Indian tribes were distinct nations, having their own form of government and power to conduct their social polity, took form and was distinctly stated in treaties. The Indians' right to punish intruding white settlers was stipulated in treaties made with the Cherokee, Chickasaw, Chippewa, Choctaw, Creeks, Delawares, Ottawa, Potawatomi, Shawnee, Hurons, and other tribes. The act of Mar. 3, 1817, provided that the power given to the President under the act of May 19, 1796, "should not be so construed as to affect any treaty in force between the United States and any Indian nation or to extend to any offense committed by one Indian against another within any Indian boundary." The courts decided that for the United States to assume "to exercise a general jurisdiction over Indian countries within a state is unconstitutional and of no effect." The crime of murder charged against a white man for killing another white man in the Cherokee country, within the state of Tennessee, it was decided, could not be punished in the courts of the United States (U. S. v. Bailey, McLean's C. Cls. Rep., I, 234). In the case of the Cherokee Nation v. the State of Georgia (5 Peters, I) the court states: "It may well be doubted whether those tribes which reside within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States can with strict accuracy be denominated foreign nations. They may more correctly, perhaps, be denominated domestic dependent nations. They occupy a territory to which we assert title independent of their will, which must take effect in point of possession when their right of possession ceases; meanwhile they are in a state of pupillage. Their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian." This confused relation—neither dependence nor independence—led to many difficulties. From time to time appeals were made by the Indian Commissioner for the extension of the laws of the land over Indian reservations. On Mar. 3, 1885, an act was passed extending the law over Indians to a limited extent (U. S. Stat. L., XXIII, 385): "The right of the Indians to the reservation ordinarily occupied by them is that of occupancy alone. They have the right to apply to their own use and benefit the entire products of the reservation, whether the result of their own labor or of natural growth, so they do not commit waste. If the lands in a state of nature are not in a condition for profitable use they may be made so; if desired for the purpose of agriculture, they may be cleared of their timber to such an extent as may be reasonable under the circumstances, and the surplus timber taken off by the Indians . . . may be sold by them. The Indians may also cut dead and fallen timber and sell the surplus not needed for their own use; they may cut growing timber for fuel and for use upon the reservation; they may open mines and quarry stone for the purpose of obtaining fuel and building material; they may cut hay for the use of the live stock, and may sell any surplus . . . They may not, however, cut growing timber, open mines, quarry stone, etc., to obtain lumber, coal, building material, etc., solely for the purpose of sale or speculation. In short, what a tenant for life may do upon lands of a remainder-man the Indians may do on their reservations (Instructions, sec. 262, 1880; U. S. v. Cook, 19 Wallace, 591; acts of Mar. 22 and 31, 1882; Rep. Sec. Interior, May 19, 1882, 9636; Reg. Ind. Dept., sec. 525, 526, 527).

By their treaty of July 31, 1855, the Chippewa of Michigan were permitted to receive the title to lands taken up under the act of Aug. 4, 1854 (U. S. Stat., x, 574) without "actual occupancy or residence," in order to dispose of them (ibid., xi, 627). An act promulgated in Mar., 1875, permitted Indians to homestead land (ibid., xviii, 240). Those Indians who had availed themselves of this act were by the act of July 4, 1884, to receive from the Government a trust patent, to the effect that the United States would hold the land for 25 years, and at the expiration of that period convey it in fee to the Indian who had made entry or to his heirs "free of all charge or incumbrance whatever" (ibid., xxiii, 961). "Indians can not preempt public lands and can not remove disability by declaring their intention to become citizens. . . . Citizenship is not requisite for the ordinary purchase of public lands. . . . It may be done by a foreign alien and a fortiori by a mere denizen or domestic alien, such as the Indians" (Opinions Atty. Gen., vii, 753).

The severalty act of Feb. 8, 1887, made the allotted Indian subject to all the laws, civil and criminal, of the state in which he resides, and also conferred upon him citizenship. The courts have decided that those who come under the provision of this act are no longer wards or subject to the restrictive control of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or his agents.

Members of the following tribes can become citizens by treaty stipulation: Delaware, Kaskaskia, Kickapoo, Miami, Munsee, Ottawa, Peoria, Piankashaw, Sioux, Stockbridge, Wea, Winnebago living in Minnesota, and the Pueblo Indians and other sedentary tribes that come under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden Purchase. The status of mixed bloods, the court has decided, is determined by that of the father (Ex parte Reynold: 5 Dillon, 394).

The courts of Kansas and Washington have held that "an Indian sustaining tribal relations is as capable of entering into binding contracts as any other alien," except that said contract shall not touch his lands, annuities, or statute benefits. "The right to contract necessarily draws after it the liability to be sued; therefore upon contracts of the aforesaid character Indians can sue and be sued" (Washington Rep., i, 325). The state court has jurisdiction of the person and property of Indians, except while such Indians or property are actually situated on a reserve excluded from the jurisdiction of the state (Kansas Rep., xii, 28). Lema. One of the more important of the old villages of the Pomo; situated in Knight's valley, about 4 m. n. w. of Hopland, Mendocino co., Cal. (s. A. B.)

Lá-ma.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 172, 1877. Lema.—S. A. Barrett, inf'n, 1906.

Lemaltcha (Le-mal-tcha). A former Lummi village on Waldron id., Wash. (Gibbs, Clallam and Lummi, 39, 1863). The name is the same as Lilmalche, q. v.

Lemitas. Mentioned by Villa-Señor (Theatro Am., pt. 2, 412, 1748) as a wild tribe hostile to the people of New Mexico. Possibly the local name of an Apache band or of its chief.

Lenahuon. One of the tribes formerly occupying "the country from Buena Vista and Carises lakes and Kern r. to the Sierra Nevada and Coast range," Cal. (Barbour (1852) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 256, 1853). By treaty of June 10, 1851, these tribes reserved a tract between Tejon pass and Kern r., and ceded the remainder of their lands to the United States. Kroeber suggests that the name is perhaps intended for Sanahuon, Spanish orthography of Sanakhwin, a Yokuts and perhaps other Indian corruption of San Joaquin or a similar Spanish geographical term.

Lenahuon.—Barbour, op. cit. Senahuow.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 782, 1899.

Lenape stone. A perforated tablet of shale, of the form usually classed as gorgets, found by Bernard Hansell while plowing on his father's farm half a mile e. of Doylestown, Bucks co., Pa. A large fragment of the stone was found on the surface of the ground in the spring of 1872; and a second, the smaller piece, was picked up in 1881. The length is nearly $4\frac{1}{2}$ in., and the width varies from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to $1\frac{3}{4}$ in. The surface on both sides has been smoothed, and on one side are carved in outline the figure of an elephant or mammoth, two rude human forms, the sun, and a number of unidentified objects. On the other are outline figures of a turtle, fishes, a bird, a pipe, etc. There are two round perforations in the tablet, about a third of its length from the ends. The specimen may possibly be genuine Indian workmanship, but the carving is apparently modern and executed after the stone had been broken. For further notice consult Mercer, The Lenape Stone, or the Indian and the Mammoth, 1885. See Gorgets, Perforated Tablets. (C. T.)

Lengya. The Flute phratry of the Hopi, consisting of the Flute (Lelengtu), Blue-flute (Shakwalengya), Drab-flute (Masilengya), and Mountain-sheep (Pangwa) clans, and probably others. They claim to have come from a region in s. Arizona called Palatkwabi and from Little Colorado r., and after their arrival in Tusayan joined the Ala (Horn) phratry, forming the Ala-Lengya group.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 583, 567, 1901.

Lengyanobi ('high place of the Flute clans'). The legendary home of the Lengya (Flute) clans of the Hopi, now a large ruin on a mesa about 30 m. n. e. of Walpi, n. e. Ariz. The village is said to have been abandoned just before the arrival of the Spaniards (1540), its inhabitants becoming amalgamated with the Hopi. The people of Lengyanobi at that time belonged to two consolidated phratries, the Ala (Horn) and the Lengya (Flute), of which the latter built the village. (J. W. F.)

Lentes. Said to have been a former pueblo of the Tigua, but more likely a village established for the benefit of Genizaros (q. v.), on the w. bank of the Rio Grande near Los Lunas, N. Mex. By 1850 the natives had become completely "Mexicanized."

Lesamaiti. A former village of the Awani about one-fifth of a mile from Notomidula, in Yosemite valley, Mariposa co., Cal.

Laysamite.—Powers in Overland Mo., x, 333, 1874.
Le-sam'-ai-th.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., iii, 365, 1877.

Leschi. A Nisqualli chief, prominent in the war which involved all the tribes of Washington and adjacent regions in 1855-58, and commonly known as the Yakima war. While Kamaikan (q. v.) headed the Yakima and their confederates e. of the mountains, Leschi took command w. of the Cascades, particularly about Puget sd. His most notable exploit was an attack on the new town of Seattle, Jan. 29, 1856, at the head of about 1,000 warriors of several tribes. The assailants were driven off by means of a naval battery upon a vessel in the harbor. On the collapse of the outbreak Leschi fled to the Yakima, who, having already submitted, refused him shelter except as a slave. A reward was offered for his capture, and being thus outlawed, he was at last treacherously seized by two of his own men in Nov., 1856, and delivered to the civil authorities, by whom, after a long legal contest, he was condemned and hanged, Feb. 19, 1857. See Bancroft, Hist. Wash., 1890. (J. M.)

Les Noire Indians. Mentioned by Say (Long, Exped. Rocky Mts., ii, lxxxiv, 1823) as a people known to the Hidatsa, who applied to them the name At-te-shu-pe-sha-loh-pan-ga, which Matthews states is probably an attempt to give the Hidatsa word for Black-lodge people.

Letaiyo. The Gray-fox clan of the Kokop (Firewood) phratry of the Hopi. Letaiyo wüwä.—Fewkes in 19th Rep. B. A. E. 584, 1900 (wüwä = 'clan'). Le-tai-yo wüwä-wä.—Fewkes in Am. Anthropol., VII, 408, 1894.

Loush (Le'-ush). A former Modoc settlement on the N. side of Tule (Rhett) lake, S. W. Oreg.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxxii, 1890.

Lewistown. A village of Shawnee and Seneca, taking its name from the Shawnee chief Captain Lewis, formerly near the site of the present Lewistown, Logan co., Ohio, on lands granted to them by treaty of Sept. 29, 1817, but sold under the provisions of the Lewistown treaty of July 20, 1831. See Howe, Hist. Coll. Oh'o, II, 102, 1896; Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 686, 732, 1899. (J. M.)

Leyva. Located on various early maps apparently as a settlement of New Mexico, but in reality designed to indicate a point supposed to have been reached by Francisco Leyva Bonilla on an unauthorized expedition, about 1594-96, to the Quivira region, by whose inhabitants he and his party were killed. See Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 108, 1889; D'Anville, map Am. Sept., 1746; Squier in Am. Revue, II, 520, 1848.

Leyva.—Günsefeld, Charte America, 1797 (misprint).

Lgalai-guhl-lanas (L'gala'-igul lä'-nas). A former subdivision of the Gitins of Skidegate, Queen Charlotteids., Brit. Col., a family of the Eagle clan of the Haida. It has long been extinct. The name may mean 'people of the town of Lgalai.'—Swanton, Cont. Haida, 274, 1905.

Liam. A former Chumashan village in Ventura co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, July 24, 1863.

Liaiywas. An unidentified tribe which participated in the Yakima treaty of 1855, and was placed on Yakima res., Wash. It may have been a division of the Yakima. (L. F.)

Li-ay-was.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1855), II, 624, 1903.

Linguistic families. The linguistic diversity of the Indians is perhaps the most remarkable feature of American ethnology. While certain general features, such, for example, as incorporation, use of verb and pronoun, employment of generic particles, use of nongrammatical genders, etc., usually occur, most of the languages of the New World exhibit analogies justifying their classification, on psychic grounds at least, as a single family of speech; nevertheless, the comparison of their vocabularies leads to the recognition of the existence of a large number of linguistic families or stocks having lexically no resemblance to or connection with each other. Boas (Science, xxiii, 644, 1906) is of the opinion, however, that, considering the enormous differences in the psychological bases of morphology in American Indian languages, such psychic unity in one family of speech can hardly be predicated with confidence. Also, it may be that the Paleo-Asiatic languages of Siberia may perhaps belong with the American tongues. This linguistic diversity was perceived and commented on by some of the early Spanish historians and other writers on American subjects, such as Hervas, Barton, and Adelung; but the "founder of systematic philology relating to the North American Indians" (in the words of Powell) was Albert Gallatin, whose Synopsis of the Indian Tribes within the United States East of the Rocky Mountains and in the British and Russian Possessions in North America was published in 1836 in the Transactions and Collections of the American Antiquarian Society (Archæologia Americana, 11), of Worcester, Mass. The progress of research and of linguistic cartography since Gallatin's time is sketched in Powell's epoch-marking article, "Indian linguistic families" (7th Rep. B. A. E., 1-142, 1891), with accompanying map, embodying the author's own researches and those of the experts of the Bureau. Taking vocabulary and dictionary as the factors of discrimination, Powell recognized, n. of the Mexican boundary, the following 58 "distinct linguistic families" or stocks: Adaizan (since determined to be a part of the Caddoan), Algonquian, Athapascan, Attacapan, Beothukan, Caddoan, Chimakuan, Chimarikan, Chimmesyan, Chinookan, Chitimachan, Chumashan, Coahuiltecan, Copehan, Costanoan, Eskimauan, Esselenian, Iroquoian, Kalapooian, Karankawan, Keresan, Kiowan, Kitunahan, Koluschan, Kulanapan, Kusan, Lutuamian, Mariposan, Moquelumnan, Muskogean, Natchesan, Palaihnihan (since consolidated with Shastan), Piman, Pujunan, Quoratean, Salinan, Salishan, Sastean (Shastan), Shahaptian, Shoshonean, Siouan, Skittagetan, Takilman, Tanoan, Timuquanan, Tonikan, Tonkawan, Uchean, Wailatpuan, Wakashan, Washoan, Weitspekan, Wishoskan, Yakonan, Yanan, Yukian, Yuman, Zuñian. This is the working list for students of American languages, and, with minor variations, will remain the authoritative document on the classification of American linguistic stocks. (See Kroeber in Am. Anthropol. VII, 570-93, 1905, where modifications are proposed.) A revised edition of the map, containing the results of the latest investigations, appears in this Handbook.

A marked feature of the distribution of Indian linguistic families n. of Mexico is the presence or former existence in what are now the states of California and Oregon of more than one-third of the total number, while some other stocks (Algonquian, Athapascan, Siouan, Shoshonean, Eskimauan) have a very wide distribution. The Pacific coast contrasts with the Atlantic by reason of the multiplicity of its linguistic families as compared with the few on the eastern littoral. The distribution of the Eskimauan family along the whole Arctic coast from Newfoundland to Bering sea, and beyond it in a portion of Asia, is remarkable. The Uchean and the extinct Beothuk of Newfoundland are really the only small families of the Atlantic slope. The Catawba and related tribes in the Carolinas prove the earlier possession of that country by the primitive Siouan, whose migrations were generally westward. The Tuscarora and related tribes of Virginia and southward show the wanderings of the Iroquois, as do the Navaho and Apache those of the Athapascans.

In 1896 McGee (The Smithsonian Inst., 1846-96, 377, 1897) estimated the number of tribes belonging to the various linguistic families as follows: Algonquian 36, Athapascan 53, Attacapan 2, Beothukan 1, Caddoan 9, Chimakuan 2, Chimarikan 2, Chimmesyan (Tsimshian) 8, Chinookan 11, Chitimachan 1, Chumashan 6, Coahuiltecan 22, Copehan 22, Costanoan 5, Eskimauan 70, Esselenian 1, Iroquoian 13, Kalapooian 8, Karankawan 1, Keresan 17, Kiowan 1, Kitunahan 4, Koluschan 12, Kulanapan 30, Kusan 4, Lutuamian 4, Mariposan 24, Moquelumnan 35, Muskogean 9, Nahuatlan ?, Natchesan 2, Palaihnihan 8, Piman 7, Pujunan 26, Quoratean 3, Salinan 2, Salishan 64, Sastean 1, Serian 3, Shahaptian 7, Shoshonean 12, Siouan 68, Skittagetan (Haida) 17, Takilman 1, Tanoan 14, Timuquanan 60, Tonikan 3, Tonkawan 1, Uchean 1, Wailatpuan 2, Wakashan (Kwakiutl-Nootka) 37, Washoan 1, Weitspekan 6, Wishoskan 3, Yakonan 4, Yanan 1, Yukian 5, Yuman 9, Zuñian 1. Of this large number of tribes, some are of little importance, while others may be local divisions and not tribes in the proper sense of the term. This is true, for example, of two at least of the divisions of the Kitunahan family, and of not a few of the Algonquian "tribes." Some families, it will be seen, consist of but a single tribe: Beothukan, Chitimachan, Esselenian, Karankawan, Kiowan, Takilman, Tonkawan, Uchean, Washoan, Yanan, Zuñian; but of these a few (such as Zuñian and Kiowan) are very important. The amount of linguistic variation serving as an index of tribal division varies considerably, and in many cases, especially with the older writers, the delimitations are very imperfect. Researches now in progress will doubtless elucidate some of these points.

Besides the classification noted above, based on vocabulary, certain others are possible which take into consideration grammatical peculiarities, etc., common to several linguistic families. Thus, groups may be distinguished within the 56 families of speech, embracing two or more of them which seem to be grammatically or syntactically related, or in both these respects, while in nowise resembling each other in lexical content. From considerations of this sort Boas finds resemblances between several of the n. w. Pacific coast families. Grammatically, the Koluschan (Tlingit) and Skittagetan (Haida) and the Athapascan seem to be distantly related, and some lexical coincidences have been noted. The occurrence of pronominal gender in the Salishan and Chimakuan stocks is thought by Boas to be of great importance as suggesting relationship between these two families. The Wakashan (Kwakwilt-Nootka), Salishan, and Chimakuan stocks all possess suffix-nouns and inflected adverbs, similarities pointing, perhaps, to a common source (Mem. Internat. Cong. Anthropol., 339-346, 1894). The languages of California have recently been carefully studied by Dixon and Kroeber (Am. Anthropol., v, 1-26, 1903; vii, 213-17, 1905; viii, no. 4, 1906), and the former has determined, as Gatschet had suspected, that the Sastean and Palaihnihan (Achomawi) constitute one stock, to which the Bureau of American Ethnology applies the name Shastan. A similar coalescence of the Costanoan and Moquelumnan stocks is also suggested. Taking other than lexical elements into consideration, the languages of California (exclusive of the Yuman and Yana) may be arranged in three groups: Southwestern, or Chumash type; northwestern, or Yurok type; central, or Maidu type—the last being by far the most numerous. This systematization for California rests on pronominal incorporation, syntactical cases, etc.

Morphological peculiarities, possessed in common, according to some authorities, indicate a relationship between Piman, Nahuatlan (Mexican), and Shoshonean. The Kitunahan of N. Idaho and S. E. British Columbia has some structural characteristics resembling those of the Shoshonean, particularly the method of object-noun incorporation. Gatschet, in 1891 (Karank. Inds., 1891), suggested the probability of some relationship between the Karankawan, Pakawa (Coahuiltecan), and Tonkawan. It is nearly certain also, as supposed by Brinton, that Natchez is a Muskogean dialect. The now extinct Beothukan of Newfoundland has been suspected of having been a mixed and much distorted dialect of one or other of the great linguistic families of the region adjacent. Brinton (Amer. Race, 68, 1891) was of opinion that "the general morphology seems somewhat more akin to Eskimo than to Algonkin examples."

The amount of material extant in the languages of the various stocks, as well as the literature about them, is in nowise uniform. Some, like the Beothukan, Esselenian, and Karankawan, are utterly extinct, and but small vocabularies of them have been preserved. Of others, who still survive in limited or decreasing numbers, like the Chimakuan, Chimarikan, Chitimachan, Chumashan, Coahuiltecan, Costanoan, Kalapooian, Mariposan, Moquelumnan, Natchesan, Pujunan, Salinan, Shastan, Takilman, Washoan, Weitspekan, Yakonan, and Yukian, the vocabularies and texts collected are not very extensive or conclusive. The Algonquian, Athapaskan, Ekimauan, Iroquoian, Muskogean, Salishan, Skittagetan, Koluschan, and Siouan families are represented by many grammars, dictionaries, and native texts, both published and in manuscript. The extent and value of these materials may be seen from the bibliographies of the late J. C. Pilling, of the Algonquian, Athapaskan, Chinookan, Ekimauan, Iroquoian, Muskogean, Salishan, Siouan, and Wakashan stocks, published as bulletins by the Bureau of American Ethnology. (A. F. C.)

Lipan (adapted from Ipa-n'de, apparently a personal name; n'de = 'people'). An Apache tribe, designating themselves Náizhan ('ours', 'our kind'), which at various periods of the 18th and 19th centuries roamed from the lower Rio Grande in New Mexico and Mexico eastward through Texas to the Gulf coast, gaining a livelihood by depredations against other tribes and especially against the white settlements of Texas and Mexico. The name has probably been employed to include other Apache groups of the southern plains, such as the Mescaleros and the Kiowa Apache. The Franciscan mission of San Sabá (q. v.) was established among the Lipan in Texas in 1757, but it was soon destroyed by their enemies, the Comanche and Wichita. In 1761-62 the missions of San Lorenzo and Candelaria were also founded, but these met a like fate in 1767. In 1805 the Lipan were reported to be divided into 3 bands, numbering 300, 350, and 100 men, respectively; this apparently gave rise to their subdivision by Orozco y Berra in 1864 into the Lipajenne, Lipanes de Arriba, and Lipanes de Abajo. In 1839, under chief Castro, they sided with the Texans against the Comanche (Schoolcraft, Thirty Years, 642, 1851); they were always friends with their congeners, the Mescaleros, and with the Tonkawa after 1855, but were enemies of the Jicarillas and the Ute. Between 1845 and 1856 they suffered severely in the Texan wars, the design of which was the extermination of the Indians within the Texas border. Most of them were driven into Coahuila, Mexico, where they resided in the Santa Rosa mts. with Kickapoo and other refugee Indians from the United States, until the 19 survivors were taken to n. w. Chihuahua, in Oct., 1903, whence they were brought to the United States about the beginning of 1905 and placed on the Mescalero res., N. Mex., where they now (1905) number about 25 and are making more rapid progress toward civilization than their Indian neighbors. In addition there are one or two Lipan numbered with the 54 Tonkawa under the Ponca, Pawnee, and Oto agency, Oakland res., Okla., and a few with the Kiowa Apache in the same territory, making the total population about 35. The Lipan resemble the other Apache in all important characteristics. They were often known under the designation Cancy, Chanze, etc., the French form of the Caddo collective name (Kū'ntsi) for the eastern Apache tribes. (F. W. H.)

Little Crow (Chetañ wakan mañi, 'the sacred pigeon-hawk which comes walking'). A chief of the Kaposia division of the Mdewakanton Sioux, which, under his father Little Crow, as under his grandfather Little Thunder, had its headquarters at Kaposia (Kapoza), a village on the w. bank of the Mississippi, 10 or 12 m. below the mouth of Minnesota r. In 1846, while intoxicated, he was shot and wounded by his brother; this caused him to try to discourage drinking among his followers, and probably induced him the same year to ask of the Indian agent at Ft Snelling a missionary to reside at his village, as a result of which Rev. Thomas S. Williamson was sent. Although Little Crow was a signer (under the name of Ta-o-ya-te-duta, 'His people are red') of the treaty of Mendota, Minn., Aug. 5, 1851, by which the Dakota ceded most of their Minnesota lands to the United States, he used the treaty as a means of creating dissatisfaction and ultimately in bringing on the disastrous outbreak of 1862. In this outbreak, during which more than a thousand settlers were killed, Little Crow was the recognized leader. Subsequent to the cession of 1851 several bands, including the Kaposia, were removed to a large reservation on the upper Minnesota, where they dwelt peacefully, professing genuine friendship for the white settlers, until they rose suddenly on Aug. 18, 1862, and spreading themselves along the frontier for more than 200 m., killed white men, women, and children without mercy. Little Crow led the fierce though unsuccessful attack on Ft Ridgely, Minn., Aug. 20-22, 1862, in ther w. He was killed by a settler named Lampson, July 3, 1863, at a place n. of Hutchinson, McLeod co., Minn. He was probably nearly 60 years of age at the time of his death. Little Crow had had Little Forks. A Chippewa res. formerly on Tittibawassee r., in lower Michigan, sold in 1837.

Little Munsee Town. A former Munsee village a few miles E. of Anderson, Madison co., Ind., on land sold in 1818 (Royce in 1st Rep. B. A. E., map, 1881). It may be identical with Kiktheswemud.

Little Osage Village. A former Osage village on Osage res., Okla., on the w. bank of Neosho r.—McCoy (1837) in Sen. Doc. 120, 25th Cong., 2d sess., map, 952, 1838.

Little Raven (Hóga, 'Young Crow'). An Arapaho chief. He was first signer, for the Southern Arapaho, of the treaty of Fort Wise, Colo., Feb. 18, 1861. At a later period he took part with the allied Arapaho and Cheyenne in the war along the Kansas border, but joined in the treaty of Medicine Lodge, Kans., in 1867, by which these tribes agreed to go on a reservation, after which treaty all his effort was consistently directed toward keeping his people at peace with the Government and leading them to civili-which he was slightly wounded. After the defeat of the hostiles at Wood Lake, Sept. 23, 1862, by Gen. Sibley, Little Crow with 200 or 300 followers fled to the protection of his kindred on the plains farzation. Through his influence the body of the Arapaho remained at peace with the whites when their allies, the Cheyenne and Kiowa, went on the warpath in 1874-75. Little Raven died at Cantonment, Okla., in the winter of 1889, after having maintained for 20 years a reputation as the leader of the progressive element. He was succeeded by Nawat, 'Left-hand'. (J. Little Rock Band. Mentioned by Parker (Minn. Handbk., 141, 1857) as a Sisseton division. Not identified.

Little Rock Village. A Potawatomi village in N. E. Illinois in 1832 (Camp Tippecanoe treaty (1832) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 698, 1873); situated on the N. bank of Kankakee r., about the boundary of Kankakee and Will cos.

Little Thunder. A Brulé Sioux chief during the middle of the 19th century. He was present at the Grattan massacre near Ft Laramie in 1854, and assumed command when chief Singing Bear was killed; he also took part in the battle of Ash Hollow, Nebr., with Gen. Harney, in 1855, and continued chief until his death some years later. Physically Little Thunder was a giant, fully six feet six inches tall and large in proportion, and is spoken of as of superior intelligence.

Little Turtle (Michikinikwa). A chief of the Miami tribe, born at his village on Eel r., Ind., in 1752. His father was a Miami chief and his mother a Mahican; hence, according to the Indian rule, he was a Mahican and received no advantage from his father's rank—that is, he was not chief by descent. However, his talents having attracted the notice of his countrymen, he was made chief of the Miami while a comparatively young man. Little Turtle was the principal leader of the Indian forces that defeated Gen. Harmar on Miami r. in Oct. 1790, and Gen. St. Clair, at St. Marys, Nov. 4, 1791, and he and Bluejacket were among the foremost leaders of the Indians in their conflict with Gen. Wayne's army in 1795, although he had urged the Indians to make peace with this "chief who never sleeps." After their defeat by the whites he joined in the treaty at Greenville, Ohio, Aug. 3, 1795, remarking, as he signed it, "I am the last to sign it, and I will be the last to break it." Faithful to this promise he remained passive and counseled peace on the part of his people until his death at Ft Wayne, July 14, 1812. Early in 1797, accompanied by Capt. Wells, his brother-in-law, he visited President Washington at Philadelphia, where he met Count Volney and Gen. Kosciuszko, the latter presenting him with his own pair of elegantly mounted pistols. Although Tecumseh endeavored to draw him away from his peaceful relations with the whites, his efforts were in vain. Little Turtle's Indian name as signed to different treaties varies as follows: Greenville, Aug. 3, 1795, Meshekunnoghquoh; Ft Wayne, June 7, 1803, Meseekunnoghquoh; Vincennes, Aug. 21, 1805, Mashekakahquoh; Ft Wayne, Sept. 30, 1809, Meshekenoghqua. Consult Drake, Inds. N. Am., 1880; Brice, Hist. Fort Wayne, 1868; Appleton's Cyclop. Am. Biog., III, 1894. (C. T.)

Little Turtle's Village. A former Miami village on Eel r., Ind., about 20 m. N. W. of Ft Wayne; named after the celebrated chief, Little Turtle, who was born there in 1752 and made it his home. It was in existence as late as 1812, the year of Little Turtle's death.

LITTLE TURTLE. (FROM A PAINTING BY STUART IN 1797, SINCE DESTROYED)

Lituya. A name given by Niblack to a Tlingit division living about Lituya bay, S. E. Alaska. They are properly a part of the Huna, q. v.

Lituya.—Niblack, Coast Ind. of Alaska, chart 1, 1889. Ltuiskoe.—Veniaminoff, Zapiski, II, pt. III, 29, 1840 (a town with 200 pop.). Shitaja.—Holmberg, Ethnog. Skizz., map, 1855.

Livangebra. A former rancheria, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.

Livangebra.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Livangelva.—Ibid. (mentioned as distinct, though seemingly identical). Luianeglua.—Ibid. (also mentioned as distinct).

Liwaito (Wintun: = liwai, 'waving'). A former village of the Patwin subfamily of the Wintun, on the site of the present town of Winters, Yolo co., Cal. The Wintun applied the name also to Putah cr. (S. A. B.)

Lewytes.—Powers in Overland Mo., XIII, 542, 1874. Liguaytoy.—Bancroft, Hist. Cal., IV, 71, 1886.

Liyam (Li'-ydm). A former Chumashan village on Santa Cruz id., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Llagas (Span.: 'wounds'). A former group of Cocopa rancherias on the w. side of the Rio Colorado, just below tidewater, about lat. 32°, in N. E. Lower California. Visited and so named by Fray Francisco Garcés, Sept. 17, 1771, which is given as the day of the wounds or sores of St Francis Assisi.—Garcés (1775), Diary, 188, 1900.

Llaneros (Span.: 'plainsmen'). A term indefinitely applied to the former wild tribes of the Staked plains of w. Texas and N. New Mexico, including the Kwahari Comanche (q. v.) and parts of the Jicarillas and the Mescaleros. See Gohlkahin, Guhlkainde.

Llano. A Papago village in s. Arizona; pop. 70 in 1858.

Del Llano.—Bailey in Ind. Aff. Rep., 208, 1858.

Lochchiiocha. A former Seminole town 60 m. E. of Apalachicola, and near Okloknee, Fla.; Okoskaamathla was chief in 1823.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 74 (1823), 19th Cong., 1st sess., 26, 1826.

Locobo. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Locust Necktown. A village in Maryland, occupied in 1792 by that band of the Nanticoke known as Wiwash, q. v.

Locust Neck.—Mt. Johnson conf. (1756) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VI, 983, 1856. Locust Necktown.—Gallatin in Trans. Am. Antiq. Soc., II, 58, 1836.

Lodges. See Earth lodge, Grass lodge, Habitations.

Lodges without horses. A former Crow band.—Culbertson in Smithson. Rep. 1850, 144, 1851.

Lofka. A former Kaiyuhkhotana settlement on the w. bank of Yukon r., Alaska. The place probably consisted of only a single hut occupied by an Indian named Lofka, at which the earliest American travelers on the Yukon used to spend the night.

Lofka's barrabara.—Dall, Alaska, 211, 1870.

Logan. A synonym of pokeloken, in use in Maine, and probably a corruption of that word. (A. F. C.)

Logan, John (?) (native name Tah-gah-jute, lit. 'his eyelashes stick out or above,' as if looking through or over something, and so could well mean 'spying.'—Hewitt). A noted Indian chief, born at Shamokin, Pa., about 1725. His father, called by the English Shikellamy and by the Moravians Shikellemus, according to Crantz (Hist. of the Brethren, 269, 1780), was a white man, taken prisoner in Canada and reared among the Indians, and was later made chief of all or a part of the Indians residing at Shamokin. He is usually spoken of as a Cayuga chief, while others call him a Mingo, the common term in the colonial period for those Iroquois living beyond their proper boundaries. Bartram says that he was a Frenchman born in Montreal, but as a prisoner was adopted by the Oneida. The same authority further states that his son (presumably Tah-gah-jute) took the name Logan from his friend James Logan, who was secretary and for a time acting governor of Pennsylvania. He lived a number of years near Reedsville, Pa., supporting himself and family by hunting and the sale of dressed skins. Later, about 1770, he removed to the Ohio and was living at the mouth of Beaver cr. when visited by Heckewelder in 1772; and in 1774, about the time of the Dunmore war, he resided at Old Chillicothe, now Westfall, on the w. bank of Sciota r., Pickaway co., Ohio. In 1774 a number of Indians, including some of Logan's relatives, were brutally massacred at the mouth of Yellow cr. by settlers on the Ohio, in retaliation, it was claimed, for the murder of white emigrants, and for a time Michael Cresap was supposed to be the leader in this massacre. There has been much controversy as to the facts in this case. A careful study of the evidence given by Jefferson in the appendix to his Notes on Virginia, by J. J. Jacob in his Biographical Sketch of the Life of Michael Cresap, and by Brantz Mayer in his Tah-gah-jute, leads to the conclusion that the massacre of the Indians was by Greathouse and a party of white settlers, and that Cresap was not present; that Logan's sister, and possibly some other relative, were killed; that his wife was not murdered, and that he had no children. It seems evident, however, that Logan was brought in some way to believe that Cresap led the attack. For several months Logan made war on the border settlements, perpetrating fearful barbarities upon men, women, and children. In the celebrated speech attributed to him he boasts of these murders. This supposed speech was probably only a memorandum written down from his statement and afterward read before the treaty meeting at Chillicothe, at which Logan was not present. His intemperate habits, begun about the time of his removal to the Ohio, grew upon him, and after the return of peace compelled him to forswear the use of the tomahawk he became an abandoned sot. On his return from a trip to Detroit in 1780 he was killed by his nephew, apparently in a quarrel. His wife, who was a Shawnee woman, survived him, but no children resulted from their union. A monument to Logan stands in Fair Hill cemetery, near Auburn, N. Y. (C. T.)

Logstown. An important village formerly on the right bank of Ohio r., about 14 m. below Pittsburg, in Allegheny co., Pa. It was originally settled by Shawnee and Delawares prior to 1748, and in the following year was reported by Céloron to contain 40 cabins occupied by Iroquois, Shawnee, "Loups" (Delaware, Munsee, and Mahican), as well as Iroquois from Sault St Louis and Lake of Two Mountains, with some Nipissing, Abnaki, and Ottawa. Father Bonnacamps, of the same expedition, estimated the number of cabins at 80, and says "we called it Chingué, from its vicinity to a river of that name" (Mag. Am. Hist., II, 142, 1878); but it should not be confounded with the Shenango some distance n., on Beaver cr. Croghan in 1765 (Thwaites, Early West. Trav., I, 127, 1904) speaks of Logstown as an old settlement of the Shawnee. It was abandoned about 1750 and reoccupied by a mixed population of Mingo (chiefly Seneca), Mahican, Ottawa, and others in the English interest. About this time a new village was built with the aid of the French on a hill overlooking the old site. Logstown was an important trading rendezvous, one of Croghan's trading houses being established there; it was also the home of Half-King (Scrunityatha or Monakatuatha) in 1753-54 (although it is stated that his dwelling was situated a few miles away), and was a customary stopping place of colonial officers and emissaries, as Weiser, Gist, Croghan, Céloron, and Washington, the latter remaining here five days while on his way to Venango and Le Beuf in 1753, and again making it a resting place while on his way to Kanawha r. in 1770. Logstown was also the scene of the treaty between the Virginia commissioners and the Indians of this section in 1752. According to the author of Western Navigation (76, 1814), and Cuming (Western Tour, 80, 1810), there was also a settlement known as Logstown on the opposite side of the Ohio. It was abandoned by the Indians in 1758, immediately after the capture of Ft Du Quesne. In addition to the authorities cited, see Darlington, Christopher Gist's Journals, 1893; Pa. Col. Rec., v, 348 et seq., 1851.

Lohastahni (Lo-hds-idh-'ni). A former Chumashan village in Ventura co., Cal.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Lohim. A small Shoshonean band living on Willow cr., a s. affluent of the Columbia, in s. Oregon, and probably belonging to the Mono-Paviotso group. They have never made a treaty with the Government and are generally spoken of as renegades belonging to the Umatilla res. (Mooney). In 1870 their number was reported as 114, but the name has not appeared in recent official reports. Ross mistook them for Nez Percés. Lo-him.—Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 743, 1896. Low-him.—Ross, Fur Hunters, I, 186, 1855. Willow Creek Indians.—Mooney, op. cit.

Lomavik. A Kuskwogmiut Eskimo village on the left bank of Kuskokwim r., Alaska; pop. 81 in 1880, 53 in 1900.

Lomavigamute.—Nelson (1879) quoted by Baker, Geog. Dict. Alaska, 269, 1902. Lomavik.—Baker, ibid. Lomavigamute.—Petoff, Rep. on Alaska, 58, 1881.

Lompo. A former Chumashan village near Purisima mission, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Lone Wolf (Gúipá'go). A Kiowa chief, one of the 9 signers of the treaty of Medicine Lodge, Kans., in 1867, by which the Kiowa first agreed to be placed on a reservation. In 1872 he headed a delegation to Washington. The killing of his son by the Texans in 1873 embittered him against the whites, and in the outbreak of the following year he was the recognized leader of the hostile part of the tribe. On the surrender in the spring of 1875 he, with a number of others, was sent to military confinement at Ft Marion, Fla., where they remained 3 years. He died in 1879, shortly after his return, and was succeeded by his adopted son, of the same name, who still retains authority in the tribe. (J. M.)

LONE WOLF

Longe. An abbreviation in common use among English-speaking people of the region of the great lakes, particularly the n. shore of L. Ontario, for maskalonge, a variant of maskinonge (q. v.). The form lunge represents another variant, muskelunge. The name is applied also to the Great Lake trout (Salvelinus namaycush). See MacKinaw. (A. F. C.)

Long Island. (Amäye'n-günähi'ta, from amäye'n 'island', günähi'ta 'long'). A former Cherokee town at the Long id. in Tennessee r., on the Tennessee-Georgia line. It was settled in 1782 by Cherokee who espoused the British cause in the Revolutionary war, and was known as one of the Chickamauga towns. It was destroyed in the fall of 1794. See Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., map, 1887; Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 508, 526, 1900. (J. M.)

Long Lake. A former Chippewa village on Long lake, in Bayfield co., N. Wis.—Warren (1852) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v, 191, 1885.

Long Lake. A Chippewa band on Long lake, n. of L. Superior, between Nipegon lake and Pic r., Ontario; pop. 311 in 1884, 341 in 1904.

Long Sioux. The chief of one of the Dakota bands not brought into Ft Peck agency, Mont., in 1872 (H. R. Ex. Doc. 96, 42d Cong., 3d sess., 5, 1873). It had 28 tipis. Not identified.

Long Tail. In 1854 a Shawnee chief of this name ruled a band at "Long Tail's settlement" in Johnson co., Kans.—Washington treaty (1854) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 795, 1873.

Longushharkarto (Long-ush-har-kar'-to, 'brush log'). A sub-clan of the Delawares (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Lookout Mountain Town (adapted from the Cherokee Á'tält da'ndaka'nihd, 'mountains looking at each other'). A former Cherokee town at or near the present Trenton, Dade co., N. W. Ga. It was settled in 1782 by Cherokee who espoused the British cause in the Revolutionary war, and was known as one of the Chickamauga towns. It was destroyed in the fall of 1794. (J. M.)

Á'tält da'ndaka'nihd.—Mooney, inf'n, 1906 (full Cherokee name). Danda' gáná.—Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 514, 1900 ('Two looking at each other': Cherokee name). Lookout Mountain.—Doc. of 1799 quoted by Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 144, 1887. Lookout Mt. Town.—Royce in 5th Rep. B. A. Loolego (Lo-o-le-go). A Yurok village on lower Klamath r., Cal., 2 m. above the fork with the Trinity. A fish dam was regularly built here.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1904.

Lopotatimni. A division of the Miwok formerly living in Eldorado or Sacramento co., Cal.

Lopototot.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 450, 1874. Lopotatimnes.—Gallatin in Trans. Am. Ethnol. Soc., ii, 123, 1848. Lopotatimnes.—Hale in U. S. Expl. Exped., vi, 630, 1846. Lopotatimnes.—Bancroft, op. cit. (misquoted from Hale). Sapototot.—Ibid.

Loquasqucit. A former Wampanoag "plantation" near Pawtucket r., Providence co. (?), R. I. It was sold in 1646. Loquasqucit.—Deed of 1646 in R. I. Col. Rec., i, 33, 1856. Loquasqucit.—Ibid., 32. Loquasquitt.—Ibid.

Lorenzo. A former Diegueño village N. E. of San Diego, Cal.—Hayes (1850) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 458, 1882.

Loreto. A village, probably of the Tubare, on the N. bank of the S. fork of Rio del Fuerte, lat. 26° 45', lon. 107° 30', S. W. Chihuahua, Mexico.

Loreto. A Varohio village and the seat of a Spanish mission, situated N. of Chinipas valley, lat. 27° 48', lon. 108° 30', N. Sinaloa, Mexico.

Nuestra Señora de Loreto de Voragias.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 324, 1864. Sinoyeca.—Ibid. (native name).

Lorette. A Huron village situated 8 m. N. W. of Quebec, Canada. The present village, properly distinguished as Jeune Lorette, is some miles distant from Ancienne Lorette, the old village, w. of and nearer to Quebec, which was abandoned for the present location after 1721. The inhabitants are a remnant of the Hurons (q. v.) who fled from their country on account of the Iroquois about 1650. After stopping on Orleans id. they removed in 1693 to Ancienne Lorette. In 1884 they numbered 289; in 1904, 455. See Huron, Missions.

Los Angeles. A former rancheria, inhabited apparently by both Pima Alta and Seri, on the w. bank of Rio Horcasitas, central Sonora, Mexico. It dates from early Spanish times, but is probably not now known by this name.

Angeles.—Kino, map (1702) in Stöcklein, Neue Welt-Bott., 74, 1725. Los Angeles.—Doc. of 1730 quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 513, 1884.

Los Luceros (Span.: 'the morning stars'). A small settlement situated at the site of the ancient pueblo of Pioge, on the e. bank of the Rio Grande, near Plaza del Alcalde, Rio Arriba co., N. Mex. Mentioned by Gatschet in 1879 as a pueblo of the Tewa Indians, whereas it is a Mexican village, although it may have contained at that time a few Tewa from San Juan pueblo, about 3 m. s.

Los Leucuros.—Yarrow in Ann. Rep. Wheeler Surv., app. LL, 143, 1875. Los Luceros.—Gatschet in Wheeler Surv. Rep., Archæol., VII, 417, 1879.

Lost Ten Tribes of Israel. The belief, for which no positive authority seems to exist, has long been current that in 721 B. C., Sargon, king of Assyria, the successor of Shalmaneser, carried off into captivity ten of the twelve tribes of Israel. Other deportations are attributed to Tiglath-Pileser and Shalmaneser. Not all the people were deported; nor were those who were, actually lost. Still, the assumption that they were lost has given rise to absurd theories, according to which these missing tribes have been discovered in every quarter of the globe. The most popular theories are one which identifies them with the Anglo-Saxons and another which sees their descendants in the American Indians. Father Duran in 1585 was one of the first to state explicitly that "these natives are of the ten tribes of Israel that Shalmaneser, king of the Assyrians, made prisoners and carried to Assyria." The latest variants of the theory may be met with in the present-day newspapers. Antonio de Montezinos, a Marano (secret Jew), while journeying in South America in 1641 claimed that he met savages who followed Jewish practices. This story he repeated in Holland, in 1644, to Manasseh ben Israel, who printed it in his work, Hope of Israel.

From it Thomas Thorowgood, in 1652, published Digitus Dei, in which he sought to prove that the Indians were the Jews "lost in the world for the space of near 2,000 years." From this work many subsequent writers obtained their chief arguments. This theory, however, found opponents even in the 17th century. Among these were William Wood, author of the curious New England's Prospect (1634); L'Estrange in Americans no Jews (1652); Hubbard in History of New England (ca. 1680). The identification of the American aborigines with the "lost ten tribes" was based on alleged identities in religions, practices, customs and habits, traditions, and languages. Adair's History of the American Indians, published in 1775, was based on this theory. An enthusiastic successor of Adair was Dr Elias Boudinot, whose work, A Star in the West; or, a Humble Attempt to Discover the Long Lost Ten Tribes of Israel, Preparatory to Their Return to Their Beloved City, Jerusalem, was published at Trenton, N. J., in 1816. Lord Kingsborough's magnificent Antiquities of Mexico (9 vols., 1830-48) represents a fortune spent in efforts to sustain this theory. To-day the idea crops out occasionally in pseudo-scientific works, missionary literature, etc., while the friendly interest which the Mormon church has always taken in the Indians is said to be due to this belief. Certain identities and resemblances in customs, ideas, institutions, etc., of the American Indians and the ancient Jews are pointed out by Mallory in his Israelite and Indian: A Parallel in Planes of Culture (Proc. A. A. A. S., xxxviii, 287-331, 1889), though the address contains many misconceptions. It may be remarked that the Jews and the Indians have no physical characteristics in common, the two races belonging to entirely distinct types. See Popular fallacies.

In addition to the above works consult Neubauer in Jewish Quarterly Review, I, 1889; Jacobs in Jewish Encyclopedia, XII, 249-53, 1906. (A. F. C.)

Lotlemaga (Lō'temaga, 'ghost-face woman.'—Boas). The ancestor of a gens of the Nakongilisala, also applied to the gens itself.
Lō'temag.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Loucheux (Fr.: 'squinters'). The Kutchin speaking the dialect of the Tukukthutchin. This language, which resembles more nearly the Chipewyan than the intervening Etahogottine and Kawchogottine dialects, is spoken by the Tatlitkutchin, Vuntakutchin, Kutchakutchin, Natsitkutchin, and Trotsikkutchin (Hardisty in Smithson. Rep. 1866, 311, 1872). The term was extended by the Hudson's Bay Co. men to include all the Kutchin, though the Tukkuthkutchin, or they and the Tatlitkutchin together, constituted the Loucheux proper.

The Loucheux of Alaska are reported by Hardisty to have been divided into three castes, Chitsah, Tangesatsah, and Natsingh, names which seem to signify 'fair,' 'partly swarthy,' and 'swarthy,' respectively. Those of the first caste lived principally on fish, and those of the last mentioned by hunting. They occupied different districts, and marriage between two individuals of the same caste was almost prohibited. Petitot gives the names of these bands as Etchian-Kpét, 'men of the left,' Natséin-Kpét, 'men of the right,' and Teendjidhaettset-Kpét, 'men of the middle.' As the children belonged to the mother's clan, but lived usually with that of the father, these people are said to have exchanged countries slowly in successive generations. The three clans or castes are now represented by the Chitsa, Tangesatsa, and Natesa. According to Strachan Jones (Smithson. Rep., op. cit., 326), this system of castes of successive rank prevailed generally among the Kutchin. For the synonymy, see Kutchin.

Love songs. See Music and Musical instruments.

Lowako ('northern (?) people'). A people mentioned in the Walam Olum record of the Delawares (Brinton, Lenape Leg., 206, 1885). Rafinesque says the name refers to the Eskimo, but Brinton says it may mean any northern people.

Lowako.—Walam Olum (1833) in Brinton, Lenape Leg., 206, 1885. Lowaniwi.—Ibid., 182. Lowanuaki.—Ibid., 198. Lowushkia.—Rafinesque (1833) quoted by Brinton, Ibid., 232.

Lower Chehalis. A collective term for the Salish tribes on lower Chehalis r. and affluents, as well as those about Grays harbor and the n. end of Shoalwater bay, Wash. It included the Satsop, Wenatchi, Whiskah, Humptulip, and other small tribes. According to Ford (Ind. Aff. Rep. 1857, 341, 1858) the term is properly restricted to the Grays Harbor Indians, and Gibbs confines it to those about the n. end of Shoalwater bay. See Atamitl.

Artamitl.—Swan quoted by Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., pl. lxxxviii, 1896. Salt-water band.—Simmons in Ind. Aff. Rep., 238, 1868.

Lower Chinook. Chinookan tribes of the lower Columbia r., strictly the Chinook proper and the Clatsop, who speak one language, while all the other tribes (Upper Chinook) present marked dialectic differences. Most writers include all the tribes from the mouth of the Columbia to Willamette r. under the term.

Absi'pudin.—Gatschet, Kalapuya MS., B. A. E. (Atfalati name). Bas-Tchinouks.—Dufot de Mofras, Explor. de l'Oregon, II, 335, 1844. Lower Chinook.—Hale in U. S. Expl. Exped., VI, 215, 1846. Tyax-wā'tyah.—Gatschet, MS., B. A. E. (Clackama name).

Lower Creeks. The name formerly applied to that part of the Creek confederacy centering on the lower Chattahoochee and its tributaries, in South Carolina and Alabama, as distinguished from the Upper Creeks on the Coosa and Tallapoosa. They included Muscogee, Hitchiti, and Yuchi. In the 18th century the terms Coweta (Kawita) and Apalachicola (Apalachicola) were often used to designate the Lower Creeks. Bartram and other authors use the term Seminole as an equivalent, but the Seminole were an offshoot of the Lower Creeks and owed no allegiance to the confederacy. According to Rivers the Lower Creeks had 10 villages with 2,406 people in 1715, but by 1733 they had lost 2 of their 10 towns, according to the statement of a Kawita chief to Oglethorpe at the Savannah council. The chief did not give the names of the 2 lost towns, but the 8 remaining ones were Apalachicola, Chiaha, Hitchiti, Kasihta, Kawita, Oconee, Osochi, and Enfaula. In 1764 (Smith, Bouquet's Exped., 1766) the Lower Creeks numbered 1,180 men, representing a total population of about 4,100. In 1813, according to Hawkins (Am. St. Papers, Ind. Aff., I, 842, 1832), they had 14 towns on Flint and Chattahoochee rs., but in the same year (ibid., 851) these had increased to 16. The Lower Creeks were frequently called Ucheesee, or Ocheesee (Ochisi), from the town of that name. According to Barton they called the Upper Creeks "uncles," and by them were called "cousins." For a list of their towns, see Creeks.

(A. S. G.)

Bassee Riviere.—Gatschet, infra (French name for Lower Creeks). Lower Creeks.—Smith, Bouquet's Exped., 71, 1766. Maakō'ki Maakō'ki.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., I, 237, 1884. Creek name.—Ocheesee.—Rivers, Hist. S. C., 94, 1874. Ucheesee.—Gussefeld, Charte der 13 Ver. Staaten, 1784.

Lower Delaware Town. A former Delaware village on the extreme headwaters of Mohican r., 5 or 6 m. directly n. of the site of the city of Ashland, in Ashland co., Ohio.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Ohio map, 1899.

Lower Kutenai. A division of the Kutenai living on Kootenai lake and r., and in the neighboring plains of Idaho and British Columbia. From the time of their earliest contact with the whites they have been called Flatbows, for what reason is not known, but they are now generally called Lower Kootenay. They numbered 172 in British Columbia in 1904, and 79 from Idaho were connected with the Flathead agency, Montana.

Akokiako.—Tolmie and Dawson, Comp. Vocab., 124a, 1884 (corruption of Akōqōlā'tlōqō). Akōchākiactas.—Wilson in Trans. Ethnol. Soc. Lond., 304, 1866 (corruption of Akōqōlā'tlōqō). Akōqōlā'tlōqō.—Chamberlain in 8th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 6, 1892. Aquēnu'tqō.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 10, 1889. Aquēlā'tlōqō.—Boas, ibid.

Are Platts.—Mayne, Brit. Col., 298, 1862. Arca-plata.—De Smet, Oreg. Miss., 112, 1847. Arca-plata.—Duffot de Mofras, Expt., II, 335, 1844. Arca-plattes.—Anderson quoted by Gibbins in Hist. Mag., 80, 1863. Flachbogen.—Berghaus, Physik. Atlas, map 17, 1852. Flat Bow.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1902, pt. 2, 74. Flat-bow.—Hale in U. S. Expt., Exped., VI, 204, 1846 (said to be a translation of Aghkôkall, the Kutenai name of Kootenai r., but this is doubtful). Indians of the Lower Kootenay.—Chamberlain, op. cit., 6. Kertani.—Kingsley, Stand. Nat. Hist., VI, 140, 1883. Lake Indians.—Henry (1811) quoted by Maclean, Canad. Sav. Folk, 139, 1896. Lower Kootenais.—Mayne, Brit. Col., 298, 1862. Lower Kootanie.—Tolmie and Dawson, Comp. Vocab., 1243, 1884. Lower Kootenay.—Boas, op. cit., 10. Lower Kootenays.—Chamberlain, op. cit., 6.

Lower Quarter Indians. A tribe or division in 1700, living 10 m. from Neuse r. and 40 m. from Adshusheer town, probably about the site of Raleigh, N. C.—Lawson (1714), Hist. Car., 98, 1860.

Lower Sauratown. A Cheraw village in 1760, situated on the s. bank of Dan r., N. Car., near the Virginia border.—Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bul. B. A. E., 59, 1894.

Lower Thompson Indians. The popular name for the Ntlakypamuk living on Fraser r., between Siska and Yale, Brit. Col.

Oaño Indians.—Telt in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 168, 1900. Lower Thompson Indians.—Ibid. Lower Thompsons.—Ibid. Utá'mat.—Boas, infn., 1906 (own name). Utá'matamux.—Telt, op. cit. ('people below': own name).

Lowertown. A name applied at different periods to two distinct Shawnee villages in Ohio. The one commonly so called was originally on the Ohio, just below the mouth of the Scioto, until it was carried off by a flood, when it was rebuilt on the opposite side of the Scioto, about the site of Portsmouth, Scioto co. It was here in 1750-54, but before 1766 the inhabitants removed upstream to Chillicothe, in Ross co., which was frequently known as Lowertown, or Lower Shawnee Town, to distinguish it from Lick Town, 25 m. above. See Chillicothe, Scioto. (J. M.)

Lower Shawnee Town.—Common names used by early writers. Lowertown.—Common name used by early writers. Shawnoah Basse Ville.—Esnaux and Rapilly, map, 1777.

Lowrey, George. A cousin of Sequoyia and second chief of the Eastern Cherokee under John Ross, commonly known as Major Lowrey. His native name was Agi'li ('He is rising'), possibly a contraction of an old personal name, Agin'-agi'li ('Rising-fawn'). He joined Ross in steadily opposing all attempts to force his people to move from their eastern lands, and later, after this had been accomplished, he was chief of council of the Eastern Cherokee at the meeting held in 1839 to fuse the eastern and western divisions into the present Cherokee Nation. See Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 115, 135, 1900.

Lowrey, John. A Cherokee chief, commonly known as Colonel Lowrey. He commanded the friendly Cherokee who helped Gen. Andrew Jackson in the war against the Creeks in 1813-14, and with Col. Gideon Morgan and 400 Cherokee surrounded and captured the town of Hillabi, Ala., Nov. 18, 1813. The two were conspicuous also in the battle of Horseshoe Bend, Mar. 27, 1814, for which they were commended. Lowrey was one of the signers of the treaties made at Washington, June 7, 1806, and Mar. 22, 1816. See Mooney in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 90, 1900.

Lowwalts. A former Seminole village, probably e. of Apalachee bay, Fla., as the map of Bartram (Travels, I, 1799) notes a Noowalta r. emptying into the bay. It was settled by Creeks from Coosa r., who followed their prophets McQueen and Francis after the war of 1813-14.—Bell in Morse, Rep. to Sec. War, 306, 1822.

Loyola. See Etsowish Semmegce-itshin.

Lu ('mud,' 'clay'). A former Attacapa village on L. Prien (Cyprien), in Calcasieu parish, La.

Lu.—Gatschet, Attacapa MS., B. A. E., 45, 1885.

Lu.—Ibid.

Luchasmi. A Costanoan village situated in 1819 within 10 m. of Santa Cruz mission, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 5, 1860.

Luckton. A tribe, comprising 200 people, residing in 1806 on the Oregon coast s. of the Tillamook.

Luck-tona.—Orig. Jour. Lewis and Clark, VI, 117, 1905. Lukton.—Amer. Pioneer, 189, 1843.

Lugups. A former Chumashan village near Santa Barbara, Cal. (Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 24, 1863); perhaps the same as Luupch, q. v.

Luidag. A former village, presumably Costanoan, connected with Dolores mission, San Francisco, Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861.

Luißeño. The southernmost Shoshonean division in California, which received its name from San Luis Rey, the most important Spanish mission in the territory of these people. They form one linguistic group with the Aguas Calientes, Juaneños, and Kawia. They extended along the coast from between San Onofre and Las Animas crs., far enoughs. to include Aguas Hedionda, San Marcos, Escondido, and Valley Center. Inland they extended n. beyond San Jacinto r., and into Temescal cr.; but they were cut off from the San Jacinto divide by the Diegueños, Aguas Calientes, Kawia, and Serranos. The former inhabitants of San Clemente id. also are said to have been Luißeños, and the same was possibly the case with those of San Nicolas id. Their population was given in 1856 (Ind. Aff. Rep., 243) as between 2,500 and 2,800; in 1870, as 1,299; in 1885, as 1,142. Most of them were subsequently placed on small reservations included under the Mission Tule River agency, and no separate tribal count has been made. Their villages, past and present, are Ahuanga, Apeche, Bruno's Village, La Joya, Las Flores, Pala, Pauma, Pedro's Village, (?) Potrero, Rincon, Saboba, San Luis Rey (mission), Santa Margarita (?), Temecula, and Wahoma. Taylor (Cal. Farmer, May 11, 1860) gives the following list of villages in the neighborhood of San Luis Rey mission, some of which may be identical with those here recorded: Cenyowprekel, Ehutewa, Enekelkawa, Hamechuwa, Hatawa, Hepowwoo, Itaywi, Itukemuk, Milkwanen, Mokaskel, and Mootaeyuhew.

Ghecham.—A. L. Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (from Ghech, native name of San Luis Rey mission, and sometimes appears to be applied to themselves). Keehi.—Gatschet in Wheeler Surv. Rep., vii, 413, 1879. Keehia.—Shea, Cuth. Miss., 108, 1855. Khecham.—Kroeber, inf'n, 1905 (alternative for Ghecham). San Luis Indians.—Winder in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 84th Cong., 3d sess., 124, 1857. San Luisenians.—Couts quoted by Henley in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1856, 240, 1857. San Luisenios.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, i, 460, 1882. San Luisenios.—Ibid. San Luis Rey [tribe].—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1871, 682, 1872.

Lukaiasta. A former village of the Kalindaruk division of the Costanoan family, connected with San Carlos mission, Cal.

Lucayasta.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860.

Lukfa ('clay', 'loam'). A former village of the Opatukla or "Eastern party" of the Choctaw, on the headwaters of a branch of Sukinatcha cr., in Kemper co., Miss.

Lookfa.—W. Florida map ca. 1775. Lukfa.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 424, 1902.

Lulakikisa. A Choctaw clan of the Kushapokla phratry.

Lulak.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 162, 1877. Lu-lak Ik'-sa.—Ibid.

Lulanna. A Haida town referred to by Work in 1836-41. It is perhaps intended for Yaku, opposite Graham id., Queen Charlotte ids., Alaska, or it may have been that town and Kiusta considered as one. Its population was estimated by Work at 296 in 20 houses.

Lu lan na.—Work in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 489, 1855. Su-lan-na.—Kane, Wand. N. A., app., 1869 (misprint from Work).

Lululungturkwi (Hopi: 'plumed-serpent mound.'—Fewkes). A ruined pueblo, of medium size, situated across the Jeditoh valley from Kokopki, in the Hopi country, N. E. Arizona. It was possibly one of a group of pueblos built and occupied by the Kawaika people. See Hough in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 336, pl. 82, 1903.

Lululungtuqui.—Hough, ibid., pl. 82. Lululungtur-qui.—Ibid., 336.

Lummi. A Salish tribe on and inland from Bellingham bay, N. W. Wash. They are said to have lived formerly on part of a group of islands E. of Vancouver id., to which they still occasionally resorted in 1863. According to Gibbs their language is almost unintelligible to the Nooksak, their northern neighbors. Boas classes it with the Songish dialect. The Lummi are now under the jurisdiction of the Tulalip school superintendent, Washington, and numbered 412 in 1905. Their former villages were Hutatchl, Lemaltcha, Statshum, and Tomwhiksen. The Klalakamish, of Orcas id., were a former band.

Hi-lum-mi.—Gibbs, Clallam and Lummi, vi, 1863 (name given them by some other (Salish?) tribes). Hooklummi.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, i, 621, 1851. Lummas.—Fitzhugh (1856) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 37, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 75, 1857. Lummi.—Gibbs in Pac. R. R. Rep., i, 433, 1855. Lummi.—Stevens (1856) in H. R. Ex. Doc. 37, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 46, 1857. Lummi-neuk-sack.—Shaw in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 398, 1860 (two tribal names connected through error). Nooh-lum-mi.—Tolmie (1844) in Pac. R. R. Rep., i, 434, 1855. Nooklummi.—Lane (1849) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 52, 31st Cong., 1st sess., 173, 1850. Nooklummu.—Lane in Ind. Aff. Rep., 162, 1850. Nooklummi.—Bauer in Am. Quar. Rep., iii, 339, 1849. Nooklummi.—Thornton (1849) in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, vi, 701, 1857. Nooh-lum-mi.—Starling in Ind. Aff. Rep., 170, 1862. Nooh-lum-mi.—Ibid., 171. Nugh-lemmy.—Mallet in Ind. Aff. Rep., 194, 1877. Nuh-lum-mi.—Gibbs in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., i, 180, 1877 (proposed as a collective name for Samish, Lummi, and Nooksak). Nukhlash.—Gibbs, Clallam and Lummi, vi, 1863 (so called by Skagit). Nukh'-lum-mi.—Ibid (own name). qtiumi.—Boas in 5th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 10, 1889.

Lunge. See Longe, Maskinonge.

Lunikashinga ('thunder-being people').

A Kansa gens.

Leda-unikashinga.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 232, 1897 ('gray hawk people'). Lo-ne'-ka-sho-ga.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877. Loe nika-shing-a.—Stubbs, Kaw MS. vocab., B. A. E., 25, 1877. Lu.—Dorsey in Am. Natur., 671, 1886 ('thunder'). Lu nikashinga.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 232, 1897. Thunder.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877.

Lupies. Mentioned in connection with some mythical as well as existent tribes of the plains in the 17th century (Vetancurt, 1693, Teatro Am., iii, 303, repr. 1871). Possibly the Pawnee Loups.

Lushapa. A former Choctaw town, evidently in Neshoba co., Miss., and possibly on Lussalaka cr., a small tributary of Kentucky cr.—Halbert in Pub. Miss. Hist. Soc., vi, 430, 1902.

Lushapa.—Romans, Florida, map, 1775. Lush-hapa.—West Florida map, ca. 1775.

Lutchapoga (Creek: lutcha 'terrapin', poka 'gathering place'; 'terrapin pen').

A former Upper Creek town, of which Atchinaalgi was a branch or colony, probably on or near Tallapoosa r., Ala. Lookoportay.—Ex. Doc. 425, 21th Cong., 1st sess., 279, 1836. Loe-chau po-gau.—Hawkins (1799). Sketch. 47, 1848. Lushchoga.—Tanner, map, 1827. Lu chi paga.—Parsons in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, iv, 578, 1854. Luchipoga.—Campbell (1836) in H. R. Doc. 274, 25th Cong., 2d sess., 20, 1838. Lushchegatowa.—Garrett (1837) in H. R. Doc. 452, 25th Cong., 2d sess., 58, 1838. Lutchapoga.—Gatschet, Creek Migr. Leg., i, 138, 1884.

Lutchapoga. A township in the Creek Nation, on middle Arkansas r., Okla.

Lutuamian Family. A linguistic family consisting of two branches, the Klamath and the Modoc (q. v.), residing in S. W. Oregon E. of the Cascade range and along the California border. Their former boundary extended from the Cascades to the headwaters of Pit and McCloud rs., thence E. to Goose lake, thence N. to lat. 44°, and thence W. to the Cascades. The more permanent settlements of the family were on the shores of Klamath lakes, Tule lake, and Lost r., the remainder of the territory which they claimed being hunting ground. In 1864 both divisions of the family entered into a treaty with the United States whereby they ceded the greater part of their lands to the Government and were placed on Klamath res. in Oregon. It was an attempt on the part of the Modoc to return to their former seat on the California frontier that brought about the Modoc war of 1872-73 (see Kintpuash). The climate and productions of their country were most favorable, edible roots and berries were plentiful, and the region abounded in game and fish. As a consequence the tribes were fairly sedentary and seem to have made no extensive migrations. They were not particularly warlike, though the Modoc had frequent struggles with the tribes to the S., and after the coming of the whites resisted the aggressions of the latter with persistence and fierceness.

Slavery seems to have been an institution of long standing, and the Modoc, assisted by the Klamath, made annual raids on the Indians of Pit r. for the capture of slaves, whom they either retained for themselves or bartered with the Chinook of Columbia r. The habitations were formerly of logs, covered with mud and circular in shape, a type of building which is still occasionally seen on the reservation. The women were noted as expert basket weavers. No trace of a clan or gentile system has been discovered among them. The family organization is a loose one and inheritance is in the male line. The language spoken by the two divisions of the Lutuamian family is ordinarily called Klamath, and while there are dialectic differences between the speech of the Klamath proper and the Modoc, they are so slight that they may be disregarded. The Lutuamian language is apparently entirely independent, though further study may disclose relationship with the Shahaptian. (L. F.) Glamets.—Hale in U. S. Expl. Exped., VI, 218, 569, 1846 (alternative of Lutuami). Klamath.—Gatschet in Mag. Am. Hist., 164, 1877 (used for family). Lutami.—Irving, Astoria, map, 1849. Lutuami.—Hale, op. cit., 199, 204. Lutuanis.—Domenech, Deserts of N. A., I, 442, 1860. Lutumani.—Latham, Opuscula, 341, 1860 (misprint). Luturim.—Gallatin in Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 402, 1853 (misprint). Maklaka.—Gatschet in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., II, pt. I, xxxiii, 1890 (collective name for Klamath and Modoc). Sutuami.—Medill in H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 30th Cong., 1st sess., 7, 1848 (misquoted from Hale). Tlamati.—Hale, op. cit., 218, 569 (alternative of Lutuami).

Luupch. A former Chumashan village in Ventura co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, July 24, 1863. Cf. Luupch.

Luápta.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884.

Lynx. See Peshkewah.

Lytton band. One of 4 subdivisions of the Upper Thompson Indians, in the interior of British Columbia. In 1904 they numbered 463, under the Kamloops-Okanagan agency.

Ikamtel'nemux.—Telt in Mem. Am. Mus. Nat. Hist., II, 170, 1900 ('people of Ikamtel'n [Lytton]'). Lytton band.—Ibid. Niak'a'pamux.—Ibid. (generally used for all the Nlak'yapamuk). Niak'apamux's's.—Ibid. (the Nlak'a'pamux proper).

Maak ('loon'). A gens of the Potawatomi (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 167, 1877. Cf. Mong.

Maakoath (Maa'kōath). A sept of the Toquart, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 32, 1890.

Maam (Ma'-am). Apparently a gentile organization among the Pima, belonging to the Suwuki-ohimal, or Red Ants, phratral group.—Russell, Pima MS., B. A. E., 313, 1903.

Maamtagyila. A gens of the Kwakiutl, found in two septs, the Guetela and the Matilpe.

Maa'mtagyila.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus., 1895, 330, 1897. Mataki'la.—Boas in Petermanns Mitt., pt. 5, 131, 1887.

Maangreet (Mā-an'-greet, 'big feet'). A subclan of the Delawares (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Maate (Mā-āte). A summer village of the Koskimo on the S. side of Quatsino sd., Vancouver id.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1887, sec. II, 69.

Maawi. The extinct Antelope clan of the Zuni of New Mexico.

Māawi-kwe.—Cushing in 13th Rep. B. A. E., 368, 1896 (kwe = 'people').

Macamo. A former Chumashan village on San Lucas id., Cal.; so named by Cabrillo in 1542.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 181, 1857.

Macaque. See Mocuck.

Macariz. A former Yamasi (?) town a mile N. of St Augustine, Fla., existing in 1680 and with others destroyed by Col. Palmer in 1727.

Macarisqui.—Fairbanks, Hist. Fla., 189, 1858. Macarasi.—Barcia, Ensayo, 240, 1723.

Maccarib. The old and original form from a cognate of which has been derived the Algonquian word caribou. Josselyn (N. Eng. Rar., 1672, 55, repr. 1865) wrote of "the Maccarib, Caribo, or Pohano, a kind of Deer, as big as a Stag." Maccarib corresponds to the Passamaquoddy megallip. See Caribou. (A. F. C.)

Maccos. The name of a chief and of a small tribe living on the S. coast of South Carolina, in the vicinity of St Helena id., where they were visited by Ribault in 1562. They possibly belonged to the Cusabo group, long since extinct.

Maccos.—Laudonnière (1562) in French, Hist. Coll. La., n. s., 205, 1869. Maccou.—Ibid., 209.

McGillivray, Alexander. A mixed-blood Creek chief who acquired considerable note during the latter half of the 18th century by his ability and the affection in which he was held by his mother's people. Capt. Marchand, in command of the French Ft Toulouse, Ala., in 1722, married a Creek woman of the strong Htali or Wind clan, from which it was customary to select the chief. One of the children of this marriage was Sehoy, celebrated for her beauty. In 1735 Lachlan McGillivray, a Scotch youth of wealthy family, landed in Carolina, made his way to the Creek country, married Sehoy, and established his residence at Little Talasi, on the E. bank of Coosa r., above Wetumpka, Elmore co., Ala. After acquiring a fortune and rearing a family he abandoned the latter, and in 1782 returned to his native country. One of his children was Alexander, born about 1739; he was educated at Charleston under care of Farquhar McGillivray, a relative. At the age of 17 he was placed in a counting house in Savannah, but after a short time returned to his home, where his superior talents began to manifest themselves, and he was soon at the head of the Creek tribe. Later his authority extended also over the Seminole and the Chickamauga groups, enabling him, it is said, to muster 10,000 warriors. McGillivray is first heard of in his new rôle as "presiding at a grand national council at the town of Coweta, upon the Chattahoochie, where the adventurous Leclerc Milfort was introduced to him" (Pickett, Hist. Ala., 345, 1896). Through the advances made by the British authorities, the influence of Col. Tait, who was stationed on the Coosa, and the conferring on him of the title and pay of colonel, McGillivray heartily and actively espoused the British cause during the Revolution. His father had left him property on the Savannah and in other parts of Georgia, which, in retaliation for his abandonment of the cause of the colonists, was confiscated by the Georgia authorities. This action greatly embittered him against the Americans and led to a long war against the western settlers, his attacks being directed for a time against the people of E. Tennessee and Cumberland valley, whence he was successively beaten back by Gen. James Robertson. The treaty of peace in 1783 left McGillivray without cause or party. Proposals from the Spanish authorities of Florida through his business partner, Wm. Pantton, another Scotch adventurer and trader, induced him to visit Pensacola in 1784, where, as their "emperor," he entered into an agreement with Spain in the name of the Creeks and the Seminoles. The United States made repeated overtures to McGillivray for peace, but he persistently refused to listen to them until invited to New York in 1790 for a personal conference with Washington. His journey from Little Talasi, through Guilford, Richmond, Fredericksburg, and Philadelphia, was like a triumphal march, and the prospective occasion for such display was a strong inducement for the shrewd chief to accept the invitation. According to Pickett (p. 406) there was, in addition to the public treaty, a secret treaty between McGillivray and Washington which provided "that after two years from date the commerce of the Creek nation should be carried on through the ports of the United States, and, in the meantime, through the present channels; that the chiefs of the Okfuskees, Tookabatchas Tallases, Cowetas, Cussetas, and the Seminole nation should be paid annually by the United States $100 each, and be furnished with handsome medals; that Alexander McGillivray should be constituted agent of the United States with the rank of brigadier-general and the pay of $1,200 per annum; that the United States should feed, clothe, and educate Creek youth at the North, not exceeding four at one time." The public treaty was signed Aug. 7, 1790, and a week later McGillivray took the oath of allegiance to the United States. Nevertheless he was not diverted from his intrigue with Spain, for shortly after taking the oath he was appointed by that power superintendent-general of the Creek nation with a salary of $2,000 a year, which was increased in 1792 to $3,500.

The versatile character of McGillivray was perhaps due in part to the fact that there flowed in his veins the blood of four different nationalities. It has been said that he possessed "the polished urbanity of the Frenchman, the duplicity of the Spaniard, the cool sagacity of the Scotchman, and the subtlety and inveterate hate of the Indian." Gen. James Robertson, who knew him well and despised the Spaniards, designated the latter "devils" and pronounced McGillivray as the biggest devil among them—"half Spaniard, half Frenchman, half Scotchman, and altogether Creek scoundrel." That Alexander McGillivray was a man of remarkable ability is evident from the consummate skill with which he maintained his control and influence over the Creeks, and from his success in keeping both the United States and Spain paying for his influence at the same time. In 1792 he was at once the superintendent-general of the Creek nation on behalf of Spain, the agent of the United States, the mercantile partner of Pantton, and "emperor" of the Creek and Seminole nations. As opulence was estimated in his day and territory, he was a wealthy man, having received $100,000 for the property confiscated by the Georgia authorities, while the annual importations by him and Pantón were estimated in value at £40,000 (Am. St. Papers, Ind. Aff., 1, 458, 1832). Besides two or three plantations, he owned, at the time of his death, 60 negroes, 300 head of cattle, and a large stock of horses. In personal appearance McGillivray is described as having been six feet in height, sparely built, and remarkably erect; his forehead was bold and lofty; his fingers long and tapering, and he wielded a pen with the greatest rapidity; his face was handsome and indicative of thought and sagacity; unless interested in conversation he was inclined to be taciturn, but was polite and respectful. While a British colonel he dressed in the uniform of his rank; when in the Spanish service he wore the military garb of that country; and after Washington appointed him brigadier-general he sometimes donned the uniform of the American army, but never when Spaniards were present. His usual costume was a mixture of Indian and American garments. McGillivray always traveled with two servants, one a half-blood, the other a negro. Although ambitious, fond of display and power, crafty, unscrupulous in accomplishing his purpose, and treacherous in affairs of state, the charge that he was bloodthirsty and fiendish in disposition is not sustained. He had at least two wives, one of whom was a daughter of Joseph Curnell. Another wife, the mother of his son Alexander and two daughters, died shortly before or soon after her husband's death, Feb. 17, 1793, at Pensacola, Fla. He was buried with Masonic honors in the garden of William Pantón, his partner. (C. T.)

Machapunga ('bad dust'; from matchi 'bad', pungo 'dust' (Heckewelder), or perhaps 'much dust,' from massa 'great', in allusion to the sandy soil of the district). An Algonquian tribe formerly living in Hyde co., N. E. N. C. In 1701 they numbered only about 30 warriors, or perhaps 100 souls, and lived in a single village called Mattamuskeet. They took part in the Tuscarora war of 1711-12 and at its conclusion the remnant, together with the Coree, were settled on a tract on Mattamuskeet lake, where the two tribes occupied one village. (J. M.)

Machemoodus (properly Matche-mo-dosé, 'there is a bad noise.'—Trumbull). A tract on the E. bank of Connecticut r., now included in East Haddam tp., Middlesex co., Conn., formerly the residence of a "numerous tribe," who were independent and famous for conjuring. The Indians sold the tract in 1662. For an account of the "Moodus noises" see Trumbull, Hist. Conn., II, 91, 92, 1818; Barber, Hist. Coll., 525, 1839. (J. M.)

Machonee. An Ottawa village, commonly called "Machonee's village," from the name of the resident chief, formerly near the mouth of Au Vaseau r., which flows into L. St Clair, in lower Michigan, on land ceded to the United States by treaty of May 9, 1836. The chief, whose name is also spelled Machonce, Maconce, and Makonee, was drowned, while intoxicated, about the year 1825 (Mich. Pion. Coll., v, 464, 1884). (J. M.)

MacIntosh, Chilly. A Creek chief. After his brother William was slain by Menewa for having betrayed the Creeks by "selling the graves of their ancestors," he became the head of the minority party that acquiesced in the proposed emigration to Indian Ter. As such he frequently visited Washington to treat with officials regarding the transfer of lands and acquitted himself as a capable man of business.—Stanley, Portraits Am. Inds., 13, 1852.

MacIntosh, William. A mixed-blood Creek, son of a Scotch trader and an Indian woman. The United States, in consideration of the relinquishment by Georgia of the Mississippi territories, engaged in 1802 to extinguish the Indian titles to lands within the borders of the state as early as could be peaceably done on reasonable terms. A cession was procured in 1805 by which millions of acres of Creek lands were transferred to Georgia. The people of the state constantly clamored for the fulfilment by the Government, of its compact, and the Creeks, alarmed at the prospective wholesale alienation of their ancient domain, on the motion of MacIntosh made a law in general council in 1811 forbidding the sale of any of the remaining land under penalty of death. MacIntosh, who by his talents and address had risen to be chief of the Lower Creeks, led the Creek allies of the Americans in the war of 1812 with the rank of major and took the chief part in the massacre of 200 of the hostile Creeks, who were surprised at Atasi on Nov. 29, 1813. He was prominent also in the final battle with the hostiles, Mar. 27, 1814, when, at Horseshoe Bend, Ala., nearly a thousand warriors were exterminated. A large part of the territory of the conquered tribe was confiscated and opened to whitesettlement. In 1818 more lands were acquired by treaty, and in 1821 the fifth treaty was negotiated by Georgian citizens acting on behalf of the United States, with MacIntosh, who was in the pay of the whites, and a dozen other chiefs controlled by him, while 36 chiefs present refused to sign and made clear to the commissioners the irregularity of a cession arranged with a party representing only a tenth of the nation, which to be legal must have the consent of the entire nation assembled in council. After an attempt made by MacIntosh to convey more land in 1823 the law punishing with death any Creek who offered to cede more land was reenacted in 1824, when 15,000,000 acres had already been transferred and 10,000,000 acres remained in possession of the Creeks, who had so advanced in education and agriculture that they valued their lands far more highly than before. In the beginning of 1825 Georgian commissioners, working upon the avarice of MacIntosh, induced him and his followers to set their names to a treaty ceding what remained of the Creek domain. Although Secretary John C. Calhoun had declared that he would not recognize a treaty in which the chiefs of the Creek nation did not acquiesce, President Monroe laid it before the Senate, and after the accession of President Adams it was approved. The Creeks did not rise in rebellion, as was expected, but, in accordance with the tribal law already mentioned, formal sentence of death was passed on MacIntosh, and was executed on May 1, 1825, by a party of warriors sent for that purpose, who surrounded his house and shot him and a companion as they tried to escape. MacIntosh was a signer of the treaties of Washington, Nov. 4, 1805; Ft Jackson, Ala., Aug. 9, 1814; Creek Agency, Ga., Jan. 22, 1818; Indian Springs, Ga., Jan. 8, 1821, and Feb. 12, 1825. (J. M.)

Mackinaw. (1) A sort of bateau or large flatboat formerly much used by traders and others; also called Mackinaw boat. (2) A heavy blanket, also known as Mackinaw blanket, formerly an important item of western trade. (3) A coarse straw hat. (4) A species of lake trout (Salvelinus namaycush), also termed Mackinac trout. The word which has assumed all these meanings is the place-name Mackinac, applied to the famous trading post between L. Huron and L. Michigan. Mackinaw, representing the Canadian French Mackinac, is identical with makindk, the word for 'turtle' in Chippewa and closely related dialects of Algonquian; said also to be a reduction of Michilmackinac (q. v.), a corruption of an earlier mitchi makinak, signifying

'big turtle' in Chippewa. According to Dr William Jones the Chippewa of Minnesota claim the word to be a shortened form of mishintmā'ktunk, 'place of the big wounded or big lame person.' This, however, may be an instance of folk etymology. (A. F. C.)

Macocks (perhaps from mahcawq, 'pumpkin'.—Brinton. See Maycock). A village located on Smith's map of 1608 (Smith, Va., I, repr. 1819) some distance N. of Chikohoki, which, according to Brinton, was near the present Wilmington, Del. This would make Macocks a Delaware village in s. e. Pennsylvania, and Brinton thinks it may have been the village of the Okahoki (q. v.), a band of the Delawares, formerly in Delaware co., Pa. (J. M.)

Madawehsoos (Mā-dā'-weh-soos, 'porcupine'). A gens of the Abnaki (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 174, 1877.

Madokawando. A Penobscot chief, born in Maine about 1630, and adopted as a son by Assaminasqua, a Kennebec chief. His tribe was at peace with the English colonists until made their enemy by depredations upon his lands, when hostilities began, and, uniting with the French, war was waged against the English settlements. In 1691 he attacked York, Me., killed 77 of the inhabitants, and laid the place in ashes. This was but one of his many raids, in which he was generally aided by the French. His death occurred in 1698. It is stated that, although a determined foe, Madokawando's treatment of prisoners was humane. The wife, or perhaps more correctly the principal wife, of the notorious Baron Castine, was a daughter of Madokawando. (C. T.)

Magashnak. An "Indian cornfield" or settlement in 1678, 6 m. from Sudbury, Middlesex co., Mass., probably belonging to the Praying Indians of the Massachusetts confederacy. Mentioned by Salisbury (1678) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XIII, 520, 1881.

Magdalena. A former Spanish mission among the Indians of Lower California; consolidated with the mission of San Ignacio Kadakaman and abandoned prior to 1740. Distinct from Santa Maria Magdalena in the N.—Alcedo, Dic. Geog., III, 19, 1783; Taylor in Browne's Res. Pac. Slope, app., 50, 1869.

Magemint ('mink people'). An Eskimo tribe inhabiting the lake country of Alaska from C. Romanof almost to the Yukon. They differ from the Kuskwogmiut chiefly in dialect. They are vigorous and strong, finding in the waters of the tundra plenty of blackfish to nourish them at all seasons. In winter they kill many hair seal on the floes, on which they venture with their sleds, carrying canoes on which the sleds are transported in turn when it is necessary to take to the water. They build good houses of driftwood and the bones of whales killed by the whaling fleet, and the carcasses floating ashore have long supplied them with food. The tribe numbered 2,147 in 1890. The following are Magemint villages: Anovok, Chalit, Chifukluk, Gilak, Igiak, Kashunuk, Kipniak, Kweakpak, Nauwogalaklakpak, Nunochok, Tefaknak, and Tiengpak. Ikvagmutes.—Raymond in Sen. Ex. Magic. There are authentic accounts from various observers in many parts of the New World, from the earliest historical period to the present time, that the Indians practised so-called magic arts, or sorcery. The earlier writers marveled at these arts, and evidently wished their readers to marvel. They often attributed the power of the Indians to Satan. Father Acosta, in the 16th century, spoke in awe of the Mexican magicians flying through the air, assuming any form they pleased and having telepathic knowledge of events occurring at distant places, and the same may be said in a general way of the Eskimo. The Rev. Peter Jones wrote in the first decade of the 19th century: "I have sometimes been inclined prophecy and telepathy as the results of collusion. Their tricks are deceptions, very ingenious when it is considered how rude their tools and appliances are, but not to be compared with the acts of civilized conjurers who make claim to no superhuman aid.

Distinct from such tricks of illusion and deceit, there is evidence that the Indians were and still are versed in hypnotism, or, better, "suggestion." Carver (1776-78) speaks of it among the Sioux, and J. E. Fletcher observed it among the Menominee about the middle of the last century. Mooney describes and pictures the condition among modern Indians (see Ghost dance).

Sleight-of-hand was not only much employed in the treatment of disease, but was used on many other occasions. A very common trick among Indian charlatans was to pretend to suck foreign bodies, such as stones, out of the persons of their patients. Records of this are found among many tribes, from the lowest in culture to the highest, even among the Aztecs. Of course such trickery was not without some therapeutic efficacy, for it, like many other proceedings of the shamans, was designed to cure disease by influence on the imagination. A Hidatsa residing in Dakota in 1865 was known by the name Cherry-in-the-mouth because he had a trick of producing from his mouth, at any season, what seemed to be fresh wild cherries. He had found some way of preserving cherries, perhaps in whisky, and it was easy for him to hide them in his mouth before intending to play the trick; but many of the Indians considered it wonderful magic.

The most astonishing tricks of the Indians were displayed in their fire ceremonies and in handling hot substances, accounts of which performances pertain to various tribes. It is said that Chippewa sorcerers could handle with impunity red-hot stones and burning brands, and could bathe the hands in boiling water or syrup; such magicians were called "fire-dealers" and "fire-handlers." There are authentic accounts from various parts of the world of fire-dancers and fire-walks among barbarous races, and extraordinary fire acts are performed also among widely separated Indian tribes. Among the Arizara of what is now North Dakota, in the autumn of 1865, when a large fire in the center of the medicine lodge had died down until it became a bed of glowing embers, and the light in the lodge was dim, the performers ran with apparently bare feet among the hot coals and threw these around in the lodge with their bare hands, causing the spectators to flee. Among the Navaho performers, naked except for breechcloth and moccasins, and having to think that, if witchcraft still exists in the world, it is to be found among the aborigines of America." His personal experience was among the Chippewa. The Nipissing were called Jongleurs by the French on account of the expertness in magic of their medicine men. Some writers of the present day marvel as much as did their predecessors; but instead of attributing the phenomena to Satan, seek the cause in spirits or something equally occult. The feats of Indian magicians, as a rule, may be easily explained as sleight-of-hand tricks, and their their bodies daubed with a white infusorial clay, run at high speed around a fire, holding in their hands great fagots of flaming cedar bark which they apply to the bare backs of those in front of them and to their own persons. Their wild race around the fire is continued until the fagots are nearly all consumed, but they are never injured by the flame. This immunity may be accounted for by supposing that the cedar bark does not make a very hot fire, and that the clay coating protects the body. Menominee shamans are said to handle fire, as also are the female sorcerers of Honduras.

Indians know well how to handle venomous serpents with impunity. If they can not avoid being bitten, as they usually can, they seem to be able to avert the fatal consequences of the bite. The wonderful acts performed in the Snake dance (q. v.) of the Hopi have often been described.

A trick of Navaho dancers, in the ceremony of the Mountain chant, is to pretend to thrust an arrow far down the throat. In this feat an arrow with a telescopic shaft is used; the point is held between the teeth; the hollow part of the handle, covered with plumes, is forced down toward the lips, and thus the arrow appears to be swallowed. There is an account of an arrow of similar construction used early in the 18th century by Indians of Canada who pretended a man was wounded by it and healed instantly. The Navaho also pretend to swallow sticks, which their neighbors of the pueblo of Zuni actually do in sacred rites, occasionally rupturing the esophagus in the ordeal of forcing a stick into the stomach. Special societies which practise magic, having for their chief object rain making and the cure of disease, exist among the southwestern tribes. Swallowing sticks, arrows, etc., eating and walking on fire, and trampling on cactus are performed by members of the same fraternity.

Magicians are usually men; but among the aborigines of the Mosquito coast in Central America they are often women, who are called sukias, and are said to exercise great power. According to Hewitt Iroquois women are reported traditionally to have been magicians.

A trick of the juggler among many tribes of the N. W. was to cause himself to be bound hand and foot and then, without visible assistance or effort on his part, to release himself from the bonds. Civilized conjurers who perform a similar trick are hidden in a cabinet and claim supernatural aid; but some Indian jugglers performed this feat under observation. It was common for Indian magicians to pretend they could bring rain, but the trick consisted simply of keeping up ceremonies until rain fell, the last ceremony being the one credited with success. Catlin describes this among the Mandan in 1832, and the practice is still common among the Pueblo tribes of the arid region. The rain maker was a special functionary among the Menominee.

To cause a large plant to grow to maturity in a few moments and out of season is another Indian trick. The Navaho plant the root stalk of a yucca in the ground in the middle of winter and apparently cause it to grow, blossom, and bear fruit in a few moments. This is done by the use of artificial flowers and fruit carried under the blankets of the performers; the dimness of the firelight and the motion of the surrounding dancers hide from the spectators the operations of the shaman when he exchanges one artificial object for another. In this way the Hopi grow beans, and the Zuni corn, the latter using a large cooking pot to cover the growing plant. See Dramatic representation, Medicine and Medicine-men, Orenda.

Mahican ('wolf'). An Algonquian tribe that occupied both banks of upper Hudson r., in New York, extending s. almost to L. Champlain. To the Dutch they were known as River Indians, while the French grouped them and the closely connected Munsee and Delawares under the name of Loups ('wolves'). The same tribes were called Akochakanefi ('starumerers') by the Iroquois. On the w. bank they joined the Munsee at Catskill cr., and on the e. bank they joined the Wappinger near Poughkeepsie. They extended e. into Massachusetts and held the upper part of Housatonic valley. Their council fire was at Schodac, on an island near Albany, and it is probable that they had 40 villages within their territory. The name, in a variety of forms, has been applied to all the Indians from Hudson r. to Narragansett bay, but in practical use has been limited to two bodies, one on lower Connecticut r., Conn., known dialectically as Mohegan (q. v.), the other, on Hudson r., known as Mahican. They were engaged in a war with the Mohawk, their nearest neighbors on the w., when the Dutch appeared on the scene, which lasted until 1673. In 1664 the inroads of the Mohawk compelled them to remove their council fire from Schodac to Westenhuck, the modern Stockbridge, Mass. As the settlements crowded upon them the Mahican sold their territory piecemeal, and about 1730 a large body of them emigrated to Susquehanna r. and settled near Wyoming, Pa., in the vicinity of the Delawares and Munsee, with whom they afterward removed to the Ohio region, finally losing their identity. A previous emigration had formed the main body of the mixed tribe of the Seaticook. As early as 1721 a band of Mahican found their way to Indiana, where they had a village on Kankakee r. In 1736 those living in Housatonic valley were gathered into a mission at Stockbridge, Mass., where they maintained a separate existence under the name of Stockbridge Indians. These are the only Mahican who have preserved their identity. In 1756 a large body of Mahican and Wappinger removed from the Hudson to the e. branch of the Susquehanna, settling, with the Nanticoke and others, under Iroquois protection at Chenango, Chugnut, and Owego, in Broome and Tioga cos., N. Y. They probably later found their way to their kindred in the W. A few Mahican remained about their ancient homes on the Hudson for some years after the Revolution, but finally disappeared unnoticed. If any remain they are included among the Stockbridge.

According to Rutenber the Mahican confederacy comprised at least 5 divisions or subtribes—the Mahican proper, Wiekagjoc, Mechkentowoon, Wawychtonoc, and Westenhuck (Stockbridge). It is impossible to estimate their population, as the different bands were always confounded or included with neighboring tribes, of whom they afterward became an integral part.

According to Rutenber's account the government of the Mahican was a democracy, but his statement that the office of chief sachem was hereditary by the lineage of the wife of the sachem, which appears to be correct, does not indicate a real democracy. His statement in regard to the duties of the sachem and other officers is as follows: "The sachem was assisted by counselors, and also by one hero, one owl, and one runner; the rest of the nation were called young men or warriors. The sachem, or more properly king, remained at all times with his tribe and consulted their welfare; he had charge of the mnoti, or bag of peace, which contained the belts and strings used to establish peace and friendship with different nations, and concluded all treaties on behalf of his people. The counselors were elected, and were called chiefs. Their business was to consult with their sachem in promoting the peace and happiness of their people. The title of hero was gotten only by courage and prudence in war. When a war-alliance was asked, or cause for war existed with another tribe, the sachem and the counselors consulted, and if they concluded to take up the hatchet, the matter was put in the hands of the heroes for execution. When peace was proposed, the heroes put the negotiations in the hands of the sachem and counselors. The office of owl was also one of merit. He must have a strong memory, and must be a good speaker. His business was to sit beside his sachem, and proclaim his orders to the people with a loud voice; and also to get up every morning as soon as daylight and arouse the people, and order them to their daily duties. The business of runner was to carry messages, and to convene councils."

The Mahican were generally well built. As fighting men they were perfidious, accomplishing their designs by treachery, using stratagem to deceive their enemies, and making their most hazardous attacks under cover of darkness. The women ornamented themselves more than the men. "All wear around the waist a girdle made of the fin of the whale or of sewant." The men originally wore a breechcloth made of skins, but after the Dutch came those who could obtain it wore "between their legs a lap of duffels cloth half an ell broad and nine quarters long," which they girded around their waists and drew up in a fold "with a flap of each end hanging down in front and rear." In addition to this they had mantles of feathers, and at a later period decked themselves with "plaid duffels cloth" in the form of a sash, which was worn over the right shoulder, drawn in a knot around the body, with the ends extending down below the knees. When the young men wished to look especially attractive they wore "a band about their heads, manufactured and braided, of scarlet deer hair, interwoven with soft shining red hair." According to Van der Donck, the women wore a cloth around their bodies fastened by a girdle which extended below the knees, but next to the body, under this coat, they used a dressed deerskin coat, girt around the waist. The lower body of this skirt they ornamented with strips tastefully decorated with wampum which was frequently worth from 100 to 300 guilders ($40 to $120). They bound their hair behind in a club, about a hand long, in the form of a beaver's tail, over which they drew a square wampum-ornamented cap; and when they desired to be fine they drew around the forehead a band also ornamented with wampum, which was fastened behind in a knot. Around their necks they hung various ornaments; they also wore bracelets, curiously wrought and interwoven with wampum. Polygamy was practised to some extent, though mostly by chiefs. Maidens were allowed to signify their desire to enter matrimonial life, upon which a marriage would be formally arranged; widows and widowers were left to their own inclinations. In addition to the usual manifestations of grief at the death of a relative or friend, they cut off their hair and burned it on the grave. Their dead, according to Rutenber, were usually interred in a sitting posture. It was usual to place by the side of the body a pot, kettle, platter, spoon, and provisions; wood was then placed around the body, and the whole was covered with earth and stones, outside of which pickets were erected, so that the tomb resembled a little house. Their houses were of the communal sort and differed usually only in length; they were formed by long, slender, hickory saplings set in the ground in a straight line in two rows. The poles were then bent toward each other in the form of an arch and secured together, giving the appearance of a garden arbor; the sides and roof were then lathed with split poles, and over this bark was lapped and fastened by withes to the lathing. A smoke-hole was left in the roof, and a single doorway was provided. These houses rarely exceeded 20 ft in width, but they were sometimes 180 ft long. Their so-called castles were strong, firm structures, and were situated usually on a steep, high, flat-topped hill, near a stream. The top of the hill was inclosed with a strong stockade, having large logs for a foundation, on both sides of which oak posts, forming a palisade, were set in the ground, the upper ends being crossed and joined together. Inside the walls of such inclosures they not infrequently had 20 or 30 houses. Besides their strongholds they had villages and towns which were inclosed or stockaded and which usually had woodland on one side and corn land on the other. Their religious beliefs were substantially the same as those of the New England Indians.

Barton gives the Mahican 3 clans: Muchquauh (bear), Mechchaoh (wolf), Toonpaoh (turtle). According to Morgan they had originally the same clans as the Delawares and Munsee—the Wolf, Turtle, and Turkey; but these ultimately developed into phratries, subdivided into clans as follows: The Tooksetuk (wolf) phratry into the Nehjao (wolf), Makwa (bear), Ndeyao (dog), and Wapakwe (opossum) clans; the Tonebao (turtle) phratry into the Gakpomute (little turtle), — (mud turtle), Tonebao (great turtle), and Wesawmaun (yellow eel) clans; —, the Turkey phratry into the Naahmao (turkey), Gahko (crane), and — (chicken) clans.

The villages of the Mahican, so far as their names have been recorded, were Aepjin, Kaunaumek (Stockbridge), Maringoman's Castle, Monemius, Potic, Scaticook (3 villages in Dutchess and Rensselaer cos., N. Y., and Litchfield co., Conn.), Schodac, Wiatiac, Wiltmeet, Winoskeek, and Wyantenuc.

Mahktosis. The principal village of the Ahousaht (q. v.), on Matilda cr., Clayoquot ed., w. coast of Vancouver id.—Can. Ind. Aff., 264, 1902.

Mahoa. Probably the same as Maxua, the chief of the Maamtaygila, a Kwakiutl gens, but applied by Galiano (Relacion, 103, 1802), in the Spanish form Majoa, to his village or to the gens itself.

Mahohivas (Máhohivás, 'red shield'). A warrior society of the Cheyenne (q. v.); also sometimes known as Hótá-nútiqiu, 'Buffalo-bull warriors.' (J. M.) Red Shield.—Dorsey in Field Columbian Mus. Pub., no. 99, 15, 1905.

Mahoning ('at the lick.'—Heckewelder). A Delaware village in 1764 on the w. bank of Mahoning r., perhaps between Warren and Youngstown, Trumbull co., Ohio. (J. M.)

Mahoning.—Hutchins' map (1764) in Smith, Bouquet's Exped., 1766. Mahonink.—Heckewelder in Trans. Am. Philos. Soc., n. s., iv, 365, 1834 (correct form). Mahony Town.—Ibid., 390.

Mahow. A Chumashan village placed by Taylor at José Carrillo's rancho, Ventura co., Cal. Perhaps the site was the Las Posas rancho, as stated by Ventura Indians in 1884.

Ma-hau.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884 (name from Indian in 1884). Ma-how.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860 (name from 1856).

Mahoyum (Má-ho-yum, 'red tipi'). The name of a special heraldic tipi belonging to the Cheyenne, erroneously given by Clark (Cheyenne MS.) as the name of a band. (J. M.)

Miyatma.—Clark quoted by Mooney in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1026, 1896.

Mahsolamo. Given as the name of a body of Salish on the s. side of Chemamish lake, near the e. coast of Vancouver id.—Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff., Victoria, 1872.

Mahtoiowa ('the bear that whirls, 'Whirling Bear'). A Brulé Teton Sioux chief. While the Brulés, Oglala, and Miniconjou Sioux were camped near Ft. Laramie, Wyo., in 1854, having come to receive the annual presents from the Government, an ox belonging to some Mormon emigrants was killed by the Indians. According to the most reliable information, obtained by Grinnell from Wm. Rowland, who was at Ft. Laramie during the trouble, the commandant demanded the surrender of the offender, and Mahtoiowa, in response, pointed out the tipi of the guilty Indian, informing Lieut. Grattan that he might arrest him; but Grattan insisted that Mahtoiowa should bring the man out and deliver him. When the chief declined to do so, Grattan ordered his men to fire a howitzer at the lodge in the middle of the village. A shell killed an Indian, and 17 of the 18 soldiers were at once shot down with arrows, the single survivor escaping by the aid of an Indian friend. The Sioux besieged Ft. Laramie until it was relieved. Mahtoiowa was killed in an action before the fort, and the war, which was the beginning of Sioux hostilities, was carried on by Little Thunder.

Mahusquechikoken. A former village, under Iroquois rule, situated on Allegheny r., Pa., about 20 m. above Venango, and inhabited chiefly by Seneca and Munsee Delawares; it was destroyed by Broadhead in 1779. This village, together with Buckaloon and Cowawago, formed a settlement 8 m. in length along Allegheny r., the 3 villages together containing about 35 large houses (Broadhead (1779) in Jour. Mil. Exped. of Maj. Gen. Sullivan, 308, 1887). (J. N. B. H.)

Maicoba. A settlement of the Nevome and the seat of a mission established in 1676; situated on or near the upper Rio Yaqui, in e. Sonora, Mexico. In 1678 the population numbered 153. The town now consists of a mixed population of whites, Pima, Yaqui, and a few Mayo, numbering in all 199 in 1900.

Maicoba.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 351, 1864. S. Francisco Borja Maicoba.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 345, 1857.

Maidu ('man', 'Indian'). A tribe formerly dwelling in Sacramento valley and the adjacent Sierra Nevada in California. This single tribe constitutes the entire Pujunan linguistic family of Powell, all the divisions of which called themselves Maidu, and distinguished themselves one from another by their local names only. The Maidu proper, comprising the divisions N. of Bear r. valley, were formerly considered a different stock from the Nishinam, who are now recognized as the southern branch of the family. The names of the Maidu villages and of the inhabitants were usually local place names. It

Maize (from the Arawak marise, changed to maysi and mahiz in the Antilles). This giant cereal, known in the United States and Canada as 'Indian corn,' or simply 'corn,' and to botanists as Zea mays Linn., was the great food plant of those American Indians who sought the aid of cultivation in obtaining food. It is now generally supposed to have been derived from native grasses—the Euchlana mexicana of s. Mexico and E. luxurians of Guatemala, the latter approximating most nearly the cultivated corn. These are the only known species of North American endogens from which the numerous varieties now in use could have been developed. Harshberger says linguistic evidence shows that maize was introduced into the United States from the tribes of Mexico and from the Carib of the West Indies, but the time of this introduction can only be conjectured. That it was long before the appearance of Europeans, however, is evident, not only from its early and widespread cultivation by tribes of the area now embraced in the United States, but from the fact that indications of its cultivation are found in mounds and in the ancient pueblo ruins and cliff dwellings, while corroborative evidence is found in the fact that several varieties of maize had already been developed at the time of discovery, four being mentioned as in use among the Indians of Virginia (Beverley, Hist. Virginia, 125-128, 1722). Jacques Cartier, the first European to enter the St Makatapi ('black men.'—Hewitt). A name given in the Walam Olum of the Delawares as that of a tribe encountered by them during their migrations.—Brinton, Lenape Leg., 190, 1885.

Makawichia (Ma-ka-wi-chia', 'place of many doves'). A Tarahumare rancheria near Palanquo, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Makay. An unidentified village formerly on Pamlico r., N. C., marked on the map of the Homann heirs, 1756.

Makhelchel. A name applied by Powers to the people of the vicinity of Lower lake, one of the southern arms of Clear lake, Lake co., Cal. The name was used particularly to designate the people of Lower Lake id., who were supposed by Powers (Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 214, 1877) to belong to the Copehan (Wintun) linguistic stock, but who have been found to belong to the Kulanapan (Pomo) stock. The people inhabiting this island called the island and the village itself Koi. (S. A. B.)

Kealey.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 214, 1877 (from Makel'-ka, 'island', in the Makhelchel dialect; applied by the whites both to the island and its original inhabitants). Kealer.—Ibid. Kelsey.—Ibid. Kealer.—Ibid. Mak'-el-chel.—Ibid.

Makhenikashika (Maqe-nikaci'-ya, 'upper world people'). A Quapaw gens; probably identical with the Wakantaenikashika.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1897.

Makhiya-lita. See Red Cloud.

Makhiyamasa ('iron cloud'). A band of the Matantonwan division of the Mdewakanton Sioux, named from its chief. It numbered 153 in 1836 and 123 in 1859, at which latter date they resided on the w. bank of the Mississippi, above the mouth of St Croix, at the site of the present Hastings, Minn.

Makokos. See Maycock.

Makoma. A name used, evidently owing to some confusion on the part of early writers, for the Indians who formerly lived in the vicinity of Clear lake and the mountains of Napa and Mendocino cos., Cal., but they are said by Wrangell (Ethnogr. Nachr., 80, 1839) to have dwelt northward of Ft Ross in Russian r. valley. The term undoubtedly comes from Maiyákma, the name of a prominent Yukian Wappo village near Calistoga, Napa co. (S. A. B.)

Maiyákma.—S. A. Barrett, inf'n, 1906 (correct name). Mayasmas.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 451, 1874. Mayasmas.—Ibid., 363. Mipacmas.—Ibid., 362. Myasmas.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 22, 1860. Myasomapa.—Ibid., June 7, 1861.

Makomitak. An Algonquian tribe or band mentioned in 1671 as residing in the vicinity of Green bay, Wis. Tailhan identifies them with the Makoukuwe, which is doubtful.

Makomitak.—Sieur de St Luson (1671) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., IX, 803, 1855. Makomitaka.—Prise de Possession (1671) in Tailhan, Perrot Mém., 238, 1864.

Makoua ('bear'). A tribe or band living near the village of St Michel, in central Wisconsin, in 1673; probably a division or gens of the Foxes.

Arikara. The same causes soon reduced the other villages to 5, whose inhabitants subsequently joined those in the Arikara country, forming 2 villages, which in 1776 were likewise merged. Thus the whole tribe was reduced to 2 villages, Metutahanke and Ruptari, situated about 4 m. below the mouth of Knife r., on opposite sides of the Missouri. These two villages were visited by Lewis and Clark in 1804. In 1837 they were almost destroyed by smallpox, only 31 souls out of 1,600, according to one account, being left, although other and probably more reliable accounts make the number of survivors from 125 to 145. After that time they occupied a single village. In 1845, when the Hidatsa removed from Knife r., some of the Mandan went with them, and others followed at intervals. According to Matthews, some moved up to the village at Ft Berthold as late as 1858. By treaty at the Mandan village, July 30, 1825, they entered into peaceable relations with the United States. They participated in the Ft Laramie (Wyo.) treaty of Sept. 17, 1851, by which the boundaries of the tribes of the N.W. were defined, and in the unratified treaty of Ft Berthold, Dak., July 27, 1866. By Executive order of Apr. 12, 1870, a large reservation was set apart for the Mandan, Hidatsa, and Arikara Indians in North Dakota and Montana, along Missouri and Little Missouri rs., which included the Mandan village, then situated on the left bank of the Missouri in lat. $47^{\circ} 34'$, lon. $101^{\circ} 48'$. By agreement at Ft Berthold agency, Dec. 14, 1866, the Mandan, Arikara, and Hidatsa ceded that portion of their reservation N. of lat. 48° , and E. of a N. and S. line 6 m. W. of the most westerly point of the big bend of Missonri r., S. of lat. 48° . Provision was also made for allotment in severalty of the remaining portion.

According to Maximilian the Mandan were vigorous, well made, rather above medium stature, many of them being robust, broad-shouldered, and muscular. Their noses, not so long and arched as those of the Sioux, were sometimes aquiline or slightly curved, sometimes quite straight, never broad; nor had they such high cheek bones as the Sioux. Some of the women were robust and rather tall, though usually they were short and broad-shouldered. The men paid the greatest attention to their head-dress. They sometimes wore at the back of the head a long, stiff ornament made of small sticks entwined with wire, fastened to the hair and reaching down to the shoulders, which was covered with porcupine quills dyed of various colors in neat patterns. At the upper end of this ornament an eagle-feather was fastened horizontally, the quill end of which was covered with red cloth and the tip ornamented with a bunch of horse-hair dyed yellow. These ornaments varied and were symbolic. Tattooing was practised to a limited extent, mostly on the left breast and arm, with black parallel stripes and a few other figures.

The Mandan villages were assemblages of circular clay-covered log huts placed close together without regard to order. Anciently these were surrounded with palisades of strong posts. The huts were slightly vaulted and were provided with a sort of portico. In the center of the roof was a square opening for the exit of the smoke, over which was a circular screen made of twigs. The interior was spacious. Four strong pillars near the middle, with several crossbeams, supported the roof. The dwelling was covered outside with matting made of osiers, over which was laid hay or grass, and then a covering of earth. "The beds stand against the wall of the hut; they consist of a large square case made of parchment or skins, with a square entrance, and are large enough to hold several persons, who lie very conveniently and warm on skins and blankets." They cultivated maize, beans, gourds, and the sunflower, and manufactured earthenware, the clay being tempered with flint or granite reduced to powder by the action of fire. Polygamy was common among them. Their beliefs and ceremonies were similar to those of the Plains tribes generally. The Mandan have always been friendly to the United States, and since 1866 a number of the men have been enlisted as scouts.

In Lewis and Clark's time the Mandan were estimated to number 1,250, and in 1837 1,600 souls, but about the latter date they were reduced by smallpox to between 125 and 150. In 1850 the number given was 150; in 1852 it had apparently increased to 385; in 1871, to 450; in 1877 the number given was 420; it was 410 in 1885, and 249 in 1905.

There were, according to Morgan (Anc. Soc., 158, 1877), the following divisions, which seem to have corresponded with their villages before consolidation: (1) Horatamumake (Kharatanumanke), (2) Matonumake (Matonumanke), (3) Seepooshka (Sipushkanumanke), (4) Tanatsuka (Tanetsukanumanke), (5) Kitane-make (Khitanumanke), (6) Estapa (Histapenumanke), and (7) Meteahke.

Mangachqua (Mang-ach-gua). A Potawatomi village on Peble (?) r., in s. Michigan, on a tract sold in 1827.—Potawatomi treaty (1827) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 675, 1873.

Mangas Coloradas (Span: 'redsleeves'). A Mimbresio Apache chief. He pledged friendship to the Americans when Gen. S. W. Kearny took possession of New Mexico in 1846. The chief stronghold of the Mimbresños at that time was at the Santa Rita copper mines, s. w. N. Mex., where they had killed the miners in 1837 to avenge a massacre committed by white trappers who invited a number of Mimbresños to a feast and murdered them to obtain the bounty of $100 offered by the state of Chihuahua for every Apache scalp. When the boundary commission made its headquarters at Santa Rita trouble arose over the taking from the Mimbresio Apache of some Mexican captives and over the murder of an Indian by a Mexican whom the Americans refused to hang on the spot. The Mimbresños retaliated by stealing some horses and mules belonging to the commission, and when the commissioners went on to survey another section of the boundary the Indians conceived that they had driven them away. In consequence of indignities received at the hands of miners at the Pinos Altos gold mines, by whom he was bound and whipped, Mangas Coloradas collected a large band of Apache and became the scourge of the white settlements for years. He formed an alliance with Cochise to resist the Californian volunteers who reoccupied the country when it was abandoned by troops at the beginning of the Civil war, and was wounded in an engagement at Apache pass, s. e. Ariz., that grew out of a misunderstanding regarding a theft of cattle. His men took him to Janos, in Chihuahua, and left him in the care of a surgeon with a warning that the town would be destroyed in case he were not cured. According to one account, soon after his recovery he was taken prisoner in Jan., 1863, by the Californians and was killed while attempting to escape, goaded, it is said, with a red-hot bayonet (Dunn, Massacres of Mts., 365, 374, 382, 1886), while Bell (New Tracks, II, 24, 1869) states that in 1862 he was induced to enter Ft. McLane, N. Mex., on the plea of making a treaty and receiving presents. The soldiers imprisoned him in a hut, and at night a sentry shot him under the pretext that he feared the Indian would escape. croft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 1889; Bartlett, Pers. Narr., i-ii, 1854.

Mange. A Pima rancheria on the Rio Gila, s. Ariz., visited and named by Kino (after Juan Mateo Mange) about 1697.—Bernal quoted by Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 356, 1889.

Mangoraca. A village of the Powhatan confederacy in 1608, on the n. bank of the Rappahannock, in Richmond co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., i, map, repr. 1819.

Mangunkakuck ('place of great trees.'—Trumbull). A village in 1638, occupied by conquered Pequot subject to the Mohegan. It seems to have been on Thames r. below Mohegan, New London co., Conn.—Williams (1638) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., vi, 251, 1863. Cf. Magunkagug.

Manhasset ('an island sheltered by other islands' (Jones, Ind. Bull., 14, 1867), referring to Shelter id.). A small tribe or band, belonging to the Montauk group, formerly living on Shelter id., at the e. end of Long Island, N. Y. Their chief, according to some authorities, lived at Sachem's Neck on Shelter id., but according to Tooker either at Cockles Harbor or Menantic cr. For the application of the name to Shelter id., see Tooker, Algonq. Ser., vii, 1901. (J. M.)

Manhattan ('the hill island,' or 'the island of hills,' from manah 'island', -atin 'hill.'—Tooker). A tribe of the Wappinger confederacy that occupied Manhattan id. and the e. bank of Hudson r. and shore of Long Island sd., in Westchester co., N. Y. Early Dutch writers applied the name also to people of neighboring Wappinger tribes. The Manhattan had their principal village, Nappeckamack, where Youkers now stands, and their territory stretched to Bronx r. From their fort, Nipinicheen, on the n. bank of Spuyten Duyvil cr., they sallied out in two canoes to attack Hendrik Hudson when he returned down the river in 1609. Manhattan id. contained several villages which they used only for hunting and fishing. One was Sapohanikan. The island was bought from them by Peter Minuit on May 6, 1626, for 60 guilders' worth of trinkets (Martha J. Lamb, Hist. City of N. Y., i, 53, 1877). Their other lands were disposed of by later sales. See Rutenber, Ind. Tribes Hudson R., 77, 1872. (J. M.)

Manhasitanman (Man'hazi'tan'man, 'village on a yellow cliff'). A former Kansa village on Kansas r., near Lawrence, Kans.—Dorsey, Kansas MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Manhasulin (Man'hazulin, 'village at the yellow bank'). A former Kansa village on Kansas r., one of those occupied before the removal to Council Grove, Kans., in 1846.—Dorsey, Kansas MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Manhasulinman ('village where they dwell at a yellow cliff'). One of the last villages of the Kansa, on Kansas r., Kans. Ma'hazulin-ta'ma.—Dorsey, Kansas MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882. Mi'qudj-i-t'a.—Ibid. (= 'where Minkhudjein died').

Manhukdhintawan (Man'yuxin-tan'wan, 'dwelling place at a cliff village'). An ancient Osage village on a branch of Neosho r., Kans.—Dorsey, Osage MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1883.

Manico. A tribe mentioned by Manzanet (MS., 1690, cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906) as living on the road from Coahuila to the Texas country. Perhaps identical with the Maliacones of Cabeza de Vaca and the Meracouman of Joutel.

Maninose. A name used in Maryland for the soft-shell clam (Mya arenaria), called mananosa in more northerly parts of the Atlantic coast. Dr L. M. Yale, of New York (inf'n, 1903), states that the local name at Lewes, Del., is mullinose. The word appears also as manynose. The word is derived from one of the southern Algonquian dialects, Virginian or Delaware; probably the latter. The derivation seems to be from the radical man-, 'to gather.' (A. F. C.)

Manistee. Mentioned as if an Ottawa village in Michigan in 1836, of which Keway Goochcum (Kewigushkum) was then chief (U. S. Ind. Treaties, 656, 1837). Kewigushkum is earlier mentioned as an Ottawa chief of L'Arbre Croche (Waganakisi), in which vicinity, on Little Traverse bay, Manistee may have been.

Maniti (Mani-ti, 'those who camp away from the village'). A Sisseton band; an offshoot of the Kakhmistonwan.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 217, 1897.

Manito. The mysterious and unknown potencies and powers of life and of the universe. As taken over from Algon-quian into the vocabulary of the white man, it has signified spirit, good, bad, or indifferent; Indian god or devil, demon, guardian spirit, genius loci, fetish, etc. The spelling manitou indicates French influence, the earlier writers in English using manitto, manetto, manitoea, etc. Cuoq says that the Nipissing manito was formerly pronounced manitou. Some writers use manito, or good manito, for Good or Great Spirit, and evil manito for the devil. It is declared by some that the signification of such terms as Kitchi manito, Great Spirit, has been modified by missionary influence. The form manito of English literature comes from one of the E. Algonquian dialects, the Massachusetts manitto, he is a god, the Narraganset (Williams, 1643) manit, god, or the Delaware manitto. The form manitou comes with French intermediation from the central dialects, the Chipewya, and Nipissing or Cree manito (Trumbull in Old and New, I, 337, 1870). The term has given rise to many place names in Canada and the United States. For a discussion of manito from the Indian point of view, consult Jones in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, XVIII, 183-190, 1905. See Mythology, Orinda, Religion. (A. F. C.)

Manitsuk. An Eskimo village on the S. E. coast of Greenland, about lat. 62° 30'; pop. 8 in 1829.

Manetsuk.—Graah, Exped. Greenland, map, 1837.

Mankato (properly Ma-ka'-to, 'blue earth'). A former band and village of the Mdewakanton Sioux, probably at or near the site of the present Mankato, at the mouth of Blue Earth r., Faribault co., Minn., named from a chief known as Old Mankato. A later Mdewakanton chief who bore the name Mankato, the son of Good Road, was a member of the delegation who signed the Washington treaty of June 18, 1858, in which his name appears as "Makawto (Blue Earth)," and he is referred to also in the Indian Affairs Report for 1860, in connection with his band, as under the Lower Sioux Agency, Minn. He took an active part in the Sioux outbreak of 1862, and was one of the leaders in the second attack, in Aug. 1862, on Ft. Ridgely, Minn., in which, it is said, about 800 Sioux and Winnebago were engaged. He participated also in the fight at Birch Cohee, Minn., on Sept. 3 of the same year, and was killed by a cannon ball at the battle of Wood (or Battle) lake, Sept. 23. (C. T.)

Blue Earth band.—Gale, Upper Miss., 261, 1867.

Makato's band.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 68, 1860.

Mankoke ('owl'). An Iowa gens, now extinct.

Mannynose. See Maninose.

Manomet. A village of Christian Indians in 1674 near the present Monument, Sandwich township, Barnstable co., Mass. It may have belonged to the Nauset or to the Wampanoag. In 1685 it contained 110 Indians over 12 years of age.

Manosah ('houses-on-spit people'). A Nootka tribe formerly dwelling at Hesquiat pt., between Nootka and Clayoquot sds., W. coast of Vancouver id. In 1883, the last time their name appears, they numbered 18.

Mann-wouah.—Mayne, Brit. Col., 251, 1862. Man-oh-ah-sahs.—Can. Ind. Aff., 52, 1875. Mā'noosah.—Bous in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Can., 31, 1890. Manosah.—Sproat, Sav. Life, 308, 1868. Manosit.—Swan, MS., B. A. E. Man-os-ah.—Can. Ind. Aff. 1883, 188, 1884.

Manos de Ferro (Span.: 'dog-feet,' lit. 'dog hands'). One of the tribes formerly living near the lower Rio Grande in Texas; mentioned by Garcia (Manual, title, 1760) among those speaking the Coahuiltecan language, for which his Manual was prepared.

Manos Prietas (Span.: 'dark hands'). A former tribe of N. E. Mexico or S. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, although farther inland than the best determined Coahuiltecan tribes. They were found in the neighborhood of the Rio Grande and in 1677 were gathered into the mission of Santa Rosa de Nadores.

Manos Prietas.—Fernando del Bosque (1675) in Nat. Geog. Mag., XIV, 340, 1903. Manosprietas.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 302, 1864.

Manshkaenikashika ('crawfish people').

A Quapaw gens.

Mañ'ya tahn.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1897 ('large Mañ'ka'). Mañ'ka s'nikae'ya.—Ibid.

Manso (Span.: 'mild'). A former semi-sedentary tribe on the Mexican frontier, near El Paso, Tex., who, before the coming of the Spaniards, had changed their former solid mode of building for habitations constructed of reeds and wood. Their mode of government and system of kinship were found to be the same as those of the Pueblos proper—the Tigua, Piroe, and Tewa—from whom their rites and traditions clearly prove them to have come. They are divided into at least four clans—Blue, White, Yellow, and Red corn—and there are also traces of two Water clans. This system of clan-ship, however, is doubtful, since it bears close resemblance to that of the Tigua, with whom the Mansos have extensively intermarried.

According to Bandelier it is certain that the Mansos formerly lived on the lower Rio Grande in New Mexico, about Mesilla valley, in the vicinity of the present Las Cruces, and were settled at El Paso in 1659 ference. When Col. D. G. Miles started out to punish the Navaho in 1859 he destroyed the houses and shot the horses and cattle belonging to Manuelito's band. When the Navaho finally applied themselves thoroughly to peaceful and productive pursuits, their old war chief was chosen to take command of the native police force that was organized in 1872. He died in 1893. See Dunn, Massacres of Mts., 1886; Matthews, Navaho Leg., 11, 1897.

Manufactures. See Arts and Industries; Implements, Tools, and Utensils; Invention, and the articles thereunder cited.

Manumaig (Myānamāk, 'catfish'). A gens of the Chippewa, q. v.
Cat Fish.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 166, 1877. Man-umaig.—Warren in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., v. 44, 1885. Myānamāk.—Wm. Jones, Inf'n, 1906.

Many Horses. A Piegan Siksika chief, sometimes mentioned as 'Dog' and also as 'Sits in the Middle'; born about the close of the 18th century. He was noted not only for his warlike character but for the large number of horses he acquired; hence his name. According to the account given by the Indians to Grinnell (Story of the Indian, 236, 1895), he commenced to gather and to breed horses immediately after the Piegan first came into possession of them from the Kutenai (1804-06), and also made war on the Shoshoni for the purpose of taking horses from them. His herd became so extensive that they numbered more than all the others belonging to the tribe and required a large number of herders to take care of them. Many Horses was a signer of the first treaty of his tribe with the whites, on the upper Missouri, Oct. 17, 1855, which he signed as "Little Dog." He was killed in 1867 at the battle of Cypress Hill between the Piegan and the allied Crows and Apsinai, at which time he was an old man. (c. t.)

Manyikakhthi (Ma-nyi'-ka-qci', 'coyote'). A subgens of the Michirache or Wolf gens of the Iowa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 238, 1897.

Manyinka ('earth lodge'). A Kansa gens, the 1st on the Ishtunga side of the tribal circle. Its subgentes are Manyinkatanga and Manyinkazhinga.

Earth.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877. Manyinka.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1897. Manyinka-gaze.—Dorsey in *Am. Manyinkainihkashina (Manyin'ka i'niy-k'ācin'a, 'earth people'). A social division of the Osage.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 235, 1897.

Manyinkatanga (Manyinka taŋga, 'large earth'). A subgens of the Manyinka gens of the Kansa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1897.

Manyinkatuhudje (Manyin'ka tu'hū udje, 'lower part of the blue earth'). A former Kansa village at the mouth of Big Blue r., Kans.—Dorsey, Kansa MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1882.

Manyinkashinga (Manyinka jiŋga, 'small earth'). A subgens of the Manyinka gens of the Kansa.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 230, 1897.

Manzanita (Span.: 'little apple', but referring here to Arctostaphylos manzanita). A reservation of 640 acres of unpatented desert land occupied by 59 so-called Mission Indians, situated 170 m. from Mission Tule River agency, s. Cal.—Ind. Aff. Rep., 175, 1902; Kelsey, Rep., 25, 1906.

Manzano (Span.: 'apple tree'). A small New Mexican village 6 m. n. w. of the ruins of Quarai and about 25 m. e. of the Rio Grande, at which is an old apple orchard that probably dates from the mission period prior to 1676. Whether the orchard pertained to the neighboring mission of Quarai, or whether the former Tigua settlement adjacent to Manzano had an independent mission, is not known. A remnant of the Tigua now living near El Paso claim to have come from this and neighboring pueblos of the Salinas country. The aboriginal name of the pueblo near Manzano is unknown. The present white village dates from 1829. Consult Banelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 259 et seq., 1892. See Pueblos, Tanoan, Tigua. Manzano.—Abert quoted in Trans. Am. Ethnol. Soc., ii, xciv, 1848. Manzana.—Pac. R. R. Rep., iii, pt. 4, 98, 1856. Manzanas.—Parke, map N. Mex., 1851. Manzano.—Edwards, Campaign, map, 1847.

Maon. An unidentified tribe on upper Cumberland r., at the beginning of the 18th century; perhaps the Cherokee, or possibly the Shawnee.—Tonti (ca. 1700) in French, Hist. Coll. La., i, 82, 1846.

Maple sugar. In some of the Eastern states and parts of Canada the production of maple sugar and sirup is one of the thriving industries of the country. The census statistics of 1900 show that during the year 1899 there were made in the United States 11,928,770 pounds of maple sugar and 2,056,611 gallons of sirup. The total values of the sugar and sirup for 1899 were respectively $1,074,260 and $1,562,451. The production of maple sirup seems to have increased somewhat, while that of maple sugar appears to have declined. This industry is undoubtedly of American Indian origin. The earliest extended notice of maple sugar is "An Account of a sort of Sugar made of the Juice of the Maple in Canada," published in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society for 1684-85, where it is stated that "the savages have practiced this art longer than any now living among them can remember." In the Philosophical Transactions for 1720-21 is printed an account of sugar-making in New England by a Mr Dudley. The Indian origin of maple sugar is indicated also by notices in Joutel; Lafiteau, who states directly that "the French make it better than the Indian women, from whom they have learned how to make it"; Bossu, who gives similar details about French sugar-making in the Illinois country; and other early writers. In various parts of the country the term "Indian sugar" (Canad. Settlers' Guide, 66, 1860) has been in use, affording further proof of the origin of the art of making maple sugar among the aborigines. Some of the Indian names of the trees from which the sap is obtained afford additional evidence, while maple sap and sugar appear in the myths and legends of the Menominee, Chippewa, and other tribes. The technique of maple-sugar making also reveals its Indian origin, not merely in the utensils employed, but also in such devices as straining through hemlock boughs, cooling on the snow, etc. For maple sugar cooled on the snow the Canadian-French dialect has a special term, tire, besides a large number of special words, like sucrerie, 'maple-sugar bush'; toque, 'sugar snowball'; tremette, 'maple-sugar sop', etc. The English vocabulary of maple-sugar terms is not so numerous. Humbo (q. v.), a New Hampshire term for 'maple sirup,' is said to be of Indian origin. The details of the evidence of the Indian origin of this valuable food product will be found in H. W. Henshaw, "Indian Origin of Maple Sugar," Am. Anthropol., III, 341-351, 1890, and Chamberlain, "The Maple amongst the Algonkian Tribes," ibid., IV, 39-43, 1891, and "Maple Sugar and the Indians," ibid., 381-383. See also Loskiel, Hist. Miss. United Breth., 179, 1794. (A. F. C.)

Maquanani (Ma'qkuanani, 'red-tail hawk'). A subphratry or gens of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., pt. I, 42, 1896.

Maquanago. A former village, probably of the Potawatomi, near Waukeshah, s. e. Wis., on lands ceded to the United States in 1833.—Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., Wis. map, 1899.

Maquantequat. A tribe or band at war with Maryland in 1639 (Bozman, Md., II, 164, 1837). The commission to Nicholas Hervey, from which Bozman obtained his information, does not give the locality of these Indians, but indicates that they resided in the territory of the colony. In the Archives (Proc. Council, 1636-67, 363, 1885), "Indians of Maquamticough" are mentioned; these are undoubtedly the same, but the locality has not been identified further than that it was on the Eastern shore. It is possible they were not Algonquian.

Maquinana.—Cabrillo (1542) in Smith, Coloc. Doc. Fla., 183, 1867. Maquin, Nanee.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Apr. 17, 1863 (mistaken for two villages).

Maquinna. A chief of the Moosachaht, a Nootka tribe, who attained notoriety as the chief who captured the brig Boston, in Mar., 1803, and massacred all of her crew except the blacksmith, John Jewitt, and a sailmaker named Thompson. After being held in captivity until July, 1805, they were liberated by Capt. Hill of the brig Lydia, also of Boston. The story of the captivity of these two men was afterward extracted from Jewitt by Roland Alsop of Middletown, Conn., and published in America and Europe. A point near the entrance of Nootka sd. is now called Maquinna pt. See Narrative of the Adventures and Sufferings of John R. Jewitt, in various editions from 1815 to 1869. (J. R. S.)

Maracook. See Maypop.

Marameg (from Man-un-aig, Chippewa for 'catfish.'—Verwyst). Evidently a band or division of the Chippewa, which seems to have been, at the dawn of the history of the upper lake region, in the process of disintegration. The first notice of them is that given by Dablon in the Jesuit Relation of 1670, at which time they resided on L. Superior, apparently along the e. half of the n. shore. They were then in close union with the Sauteurs, or Chippewa of Sault Ste Marie. Dablon, speaking of the Chippewa of the Sault, says: "These are united with three other nations, who are more than 550 persons, to whom they granted like rights of their native country. . . . These are the Noquets who are spread along the s. side of L. Superior, where they are the originals; and the Outchibous with the Marameg of the n. side of the same lake, which they regard as their proper country." Here the Chippewa of the n. side of the lake are distinguished from those of Sault Ste Marie to the same extent as are the Marameg and Noquet. The Chippewa settlement at the Sault, where the fishing was excellent, seems to have drawn thither the other divisions, as this gave them strength and control of the food supply. The early notices of the Marameg and Noquet appear to indicate that these two tribes became absorbed by the Chippewa and their tribal or subtribal distinction lost, but there are reasons (see Noquet and Menominee) for believing that these two peoples were identical. Tailhan, in his notes on Perrot's Mémoire, assumes without question that the two tribes were incorporated with the Chippewa of the Sault, who were distinguished by the name Pahouitigouchirini. The Marameg are mentioned under the name Malamechs in the Proces-verbal of the Prise de Possession in 1671 as present at the conference on that occasion. According to Shea they are mentioned in the MS. Jesuit Relation of 1672-73 as being near the Mascoutin, who were then on Fox r., Wis. If, as supposed, the people of this tribe are those referred to by La Chesnaye (Margry, vi, 6) under the name "Malanas ou gens de la Barbue," they must have resided in 1697, in part at least, at Shaugawaumikong (the present Bay-field, Wis.), on the s. shore of L. Superior. The attempt to identify them with the "Miamis of Maramek" mentioned in a document of 1695 (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 619) as residing on Maramec (Kalamazoo) r., in Michigan, is certainly erroneous. (J. M. C. T.)

Marble. The various forms of the carbonates of lime and magnesia, classed as marbles, were used to some extent by the Indian tribes for carvings, utensils, and ornaments. They include many varieties of ordinary marbles such as are used for building, as well as the cave forms known as stalactite, deposited as pendent masses by dripping water, and stalagmite, which is deposited by the same agency upon the floor. Travertine formed by rivers and springs is of nearly identical character. These deposits frequently present handsome translucent and banded effects. The purer, less highly colored varieties are sometimes called alabaster (see Gypsum), and the compact, beautifully marked forms are known as onyx. See Mines and Quarries.

Maria. A Micmac settlement in Maria township, Bonaventure co., Quebec, containing 80 Indians in 1884, 93 in 1904.

Mariames. A tribe mentioned by Cabeza de Vaca as living, in 1528-34, "behind" the Quevenes, probably in the vicinity of Matagorda bay, Texas. The people subsisted mainly on roots and seem never to have enjoyed plenty except in the season of the prickly pears. They ground the bones of fish, mixed the dust with water, and used the paste as food. They are said to have killed their female infants to prevent their falling into the hands of their enemies, and also, because of their continued warfare, to avoid the temptation of marrying within their tribe. The region where the Mariames lived was within the later domain of the Karankawan tribes, which are now extinct (see Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., 46, 1891). Manzanet (1670) mentions a tribe called the Muruam, probably identical with this, and Orozco y Berra (Geog., 303, 1864) mentions the Mahuames as a former tribe of n. e. Mexico or s. Texas, which was gathered into the mission of San Juan Bautista, Coahuila, in 1699. These also may be identical.

Gila, s. Ariz. In 1775, according to Garcés, their rancherias extended about 40 m. along the Gila from about the mouth of the Hassayampa to the Aguas Calientes, although Garcés adds that "some of them are found farther down river." They call themselves Pipatsje, 'people,'

Maricopa being their Pima name. Emory states that they have moved gradually from the Gulf of California to their present location in juxtaposition with the Pima, Carson having found them, as late as 1826, at the mouth of the Gila. They joined the Pima, whose language they do not understand, for mutual protection against their kindred, but enemies, the Yuma, and the two have ever since lived peaceably together. In 1775 the Maricopa and the Yuma were at war, and as late as 1857 the latter, with some Mohave and Yavapai, attacked the Maricopa near Maricopa Wells, s. Ariz., but with the aid of the Pima the Maricopa routed the Yuma and their allies, 90 of the 93 Yuma warriors being killed. After this disaster the Yuma never ventured so far up the Gila. Heintzelman states, probably correctly, that the Maricopa are a branch of the Cuchan (Yuma proper), from whom they separated on the occasion of an election of chiefs (H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 1857). Like the Pima, the Maricopa are agriculturists, and in habits and customs are generally similar to them. Venegas (Hist. Cal., II, 182, 185, 192, 1759) states that about 6,000 Pima and Cocomaricopa lived on Gila r. in 1742, and that they extended also to the Salado and the Verde; they are also said to have had some rancherias on the w. side of Colorado r., in a valley 36 leagues long. Garcés estimated the population at 3,000 in 1775. There were only 350 under the Pima school superintendent, Arizona, in 1905.

By act of Feb. 28, 1859, a reservation was set apart for the Maricopa and the Pima on Gila r., Ariz.; this was enlarged by Executive order of Aug. 31, 1876; revoked and other lands set apart by Executive order of June 14, 1879; enlarged by Executive orders of May 5, 1882, and Nov. 15, 1883. No treaty was ever made with them.

The following rancherias and other settlements at different periods are judged, from their situation, to have belonged to the Maricopa tribe: Aicatum, Amoque, Aopomue, Aqui, Aquimundurech, Aritutoc, Atiahigui, Aycate, Baguiburisac, Caborh, Caborica, Cant, Chontikwuchik, Coat, Cocoigui, Cohate, Comarchdut, Cua-buridurch, Cudurimuitac, Duezturnac, Gohate, Guias, Hinama, Hiyayulge, Marin. A chief of the Licatiut, apparently a band or village of the Gallinomero, about the present San Rafael, Marin co., Cal., in the early part of the 19th century. The Spanish accounts relating to him are conflicting. According to the most definite authority he was defeated and captured in battle with Spanish troops in 1815 or 1816 and carried to San Francisco, but escaped and resumed hostilities from his refuge place on the Marin ids. He was retaken in 1824, and accepting his fate, retired to San Rafael mission, where he died in 1834, or, according to other accounts, as late as 1848. The county takes its name from him. See Bancroft, Hist. Cal., II, VII; 1886-1890.

Maringoman's Castle. A palisaded village, so named after a Waoranec chief who occupied it in 1635, formerly on Murderer's cr., at Bloominggrove, Ulster co., N. Y.—Ruttenber, Tribes Hudson R., 94, 1872.

Mariposan Family (adapted from Span. mariposa, 'butterfly,' the name of a county in California). The name applied by Powell to a linguistic stock of Indians, generally known as Yokuts, in San Joaquin valley, Cal. Their territory extended from the lower Sierra Nevada to the Coast range, and from mounts Pinos and Tehachapi to Fresno and Chowchilla rs. A separate body dwelt in the N., in a narrow strip of territory along the San Joaquin, between Tuolumne and Calaveras rs., about the site of Stockton. These were the Cholovone. The Cocomoon, said to have been Mariposan, occupied an area within the limits of Moqueluman territory.

Physically the southern members of this family, from Kaweah and Tule rs. and from Tejon, are very similar to the Yuman tribes of s. California. They are fairly tall (169 cm.) and rather short-headed (cephalic index 82 to 83). Their superficial appearance is rather similar to that of the tribes of central California. They are not infrequently fat (Boas in Proc. A. A. S., XLIV, 261-9, 1896).

Their houses, especially those in the plains, were generally made of tules, and were often erected in rows, a village of the tribes about Tulare lake consisting of a row of such houses united into one. These long communal houses had an entrance and a fireplace for each family. Earth-covered sweat-houses were also built. Their implements and utensils were generally rude; the working of wood seems to have been confined to a few objects, such as bows and pipes, true wood carving not being practised. Their bows were of two types, one used for war and one for the hunt. Some of the tribes made a very crude and undecorated pottery similar to that of their Shoshonean neighbors of the mountains, which is the only occurrence of pottery in central California, and the art is probably a recent acquisition. The women were proficient basket makers, their product being predominantly of the coiled type. Shapes with a flat top and restricted opening are characteristic of this region and of the Shoshoneans immediately to the E.

The social organization of the tribes was very simple, with no trace of totemism or of any gentile system. Prohibition of marriage extended only to actually known blood relationships, entirely irrespective of groups. Chieftainship tended to be hereditary in the male line. The groups, or tribes, had more solidarity than elsewhere in California, as is shown by the occurrence of well-recognized names for the tribes. Hostilities were occasionally carried on between groups or with Shoshonean tribes, but in general the tribes were peaceful and friendly, even with their neighbors speaking alien languages. An initiation ceremony for young men consisted of a period of preparation followed by an intoxication produced by a decoction of jimson weed. A puberty ceremony for girls was not practised. The tabus and restrictions applied chiefly to childbirth and death. Death was followed by singing, dancing, and wailing. The body was buried or burned, the practice varying with the different tribes; the property of the deceased was destroyed, his house burned, and his name tabued. There was an elaborate annual mourning ceremony for the dead of the year, which took place about a large fire in which much property was consumed. This ceremony, which has been described as the Dance of the Dead, was followed by dancing of a festive character.

The Mariposan Indians were encountered by the Spaniards soon after their settlement in California, and with the other tribes of San Joaquin valley were generally known as Tulareños, etc., from the name of the lakes and of San Joaquin r., which during the Mission period bore the name Rio de los Tulares. No very considerable portion of the group seems to have come under the control of the Franciscan missionaries, but there was some intercourse and trade between the converted Indians of the coast regions and the Mariposan tribes of the interior. The Cholvone, Chukchansi, Tachi, Telamni, and other tribes were, however, at least in part, settled at San Antonio, San Juan Bautista, and other missions.

On the sudden overrunning of their country by the whites after the discovery of gold in California, the Indians of this family were either friendly or unable to make an effectual resistance. The Kaweah river tribes seem to have been the most hostile to the Americans, but no general Indian war took place in their territory, and treaties were made with all the tribes in 1851, by which they ceded the greater part of their territory (Royce in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 782, 1900). Many of the northern tribes were soon gathered on the Fresno River res., near Madera, and the southern tribes at Tejon; but the former was abandoned in 1859 and the latter in 1864. The Indians at Tejon were removed to Tule r., where, after another removal, the present Tule River res. was set apart for them in 1873 and occupied in 1876. The Indians of this reservation, mostly from Tejon and from Tule and Kaweah rs., numbered 154 in 1905. North of Tule r. the remaining Indians of this stock now live in and near their old homes; their numbers have greatly decreased and are not accurately known, while the Cholvone seem to be extinct.

About 40 tribes, each of about the numerical size of a village community, but possessing a distinct dialect, constituted the Yokuts or Mariposan family. About half of these are now extinct. These tribes, according to information furnished by Dr A. L. Kroeber, were the Cholvone, or, more correctly, Chulamni, about Stockton; the Chaushila, Chukchansi, Talinchi (properly Dalinchi), Henchi, Toltichi, Pitkachi, Hoyima, Tumna (Dumna), and Kechayi, on San Joaquin r. and n. to Chowchilla r.; the Kassovo (Gashowu), on Dry cr.; the Choinimni, Michahai, Chukaimina, Iticha (Aiticha), Toikhichi, Wechikhit, Nutunutu, Wilmilchi, Apiachi, and perhaps the Kochiyali, on Kings r.; the Tachi, Chunut, and Wowol, on Tulare lake, and the Tulamni and a tribe remembered only as Khomtinin ('southerners') on the smaller lakes to the s.; the Kawia (Gawia), Yokol or Yokod, Wikhamni, Wowolasi, Telamni, and Choinok, on Kaweah r.; and the Yaudanchi, Bokni-nuwad, Kumachisi, Koyeti, Paleuyami, Truhohayi, and Yauelmani, on the streams from Tule r. to Kern r.

Names given as if of Yokuts tribes, but which may be place names or may refer to Shoshonean or other groups, are Carise, Caruana, Chebontes, Chetienewash, Holclame, Holmiuk, Lenahuon, Montotos, Nonous, Sohonut, and Tatagua; also, entirely unidentifiable, Amonce, Kowsia, Nelcelchumnee, Noketotra or Nutrecho or Pohonatri, Nopthrinthes, Oponoche, and Ptolme.

Marmasece. Reported by some old Lummi as an extinct tribe on Puget sd., Wash., in about the habitat of their own people, by whom they may have been exterminated. They are also said to have killed three white men before the occupancy of the country by the Hudson's Bay Co. or the arrival of the first ships.

Marriage. Except that marital unions depend everywhere on economic considerations, there is such diversity in the marriage customs of the natives of North America that no general description will apply beyond a single great cultural group.

The Eskimo, except those tribes of Alaska that have been led to imitate the institutions of neighboring tribes of alien stocks, have no clan organization. Accordingly the choice of a mate is barred only by specified degrees of kinship. Interest and convenience govern the selection. The youth looks for a competent housewife, the girl for a skilled hunter. There is no wedding ceremony. The man obtains the parents' consent, presents his wife with garments, and the marriage is consummated. Frequently there are child betrothals, but these are not considered binding. Monogamy is prevalent, as the support of several wives is possible only for the expert hunter. Divorce is as informal as marriage; either party may leave the other on the slightest pretext, and may remarry. The husband may discard a shrewish or miserly wife, and the wife may abandon her husband if he maltreats her or fails to provide enough food. In such cases the children generally remain with the mother.

On the N. W. coast marriage between members of the same clan is strictly forbidden. The negotiations are usually carried on by the parents. The Kwakiutl purchases with his wife the rank and privileges of her family, to be surrendered later by her father to the children with interest, depending on the number of offspring. When the debt is paid the father has redeemed his daughter, and the marriage is annulled unless the husband renews his payment. Among the other tribes of the group an actual sale of the girl is rare. The Tlingit, Tsimshian, coast Salish, and Bellacoola send gifts to the girl's parents; but presents of nearly equal or even superior value are returned. Monogamy predominates. In case of separation Salish parents divide their children according to special agreement. Among the Tlingit, Haida, Tsimshian, and Heiltsuk the children always belong to the mother. If a husband expels his wife from caprice he must return her dowry; if she has been unfaithful he keeps the dowry and may demand his wedding gifts.

On the lower Pacific coast the clan system disappears. The regulations of the Indians of California vary considerably. Some tribes have real purchase of women; others ratify the marriage merely by an exchange of gifts. Polygamy is rare. Divorce is easily accomplished at the husband's wish, and where wives are bought the purchase money is refunded. Among the Hupa the husband can claim only half of his payment if he keeps the children. Wintun men seldom expel their wives, but slink away from home, leaving their families behind.

The Pueblos, representing a much higher stage of culture, show very different marriage conditions. The clan organization is developed, there is no purchase, and the marriage is arranged by the parents or independently by the young couple. The Zuni lover, after bringing acceptable gifts, is adopted as a son by the father of his betrothed, and married life begins in her home. She is thus mistress of the situation; the children are hers, and she can order the husband from the house should occasion arise.

Of the Plains Indians some had the gentile system, while others lacked it completely. They seem to have practised polygamy more commonly, the younger sisters of a first wife being potential wives of the husband. Among the Pawnee and the Siksika the essential feature of the marriage ceremony was the presentation of gifts to the girl's parents. In case of elopement the subsequent presentation of gifts legitimized the marriage and removed the disgrace which would otherwise attach to the girl and her family (Grinnell). The men had absolute power over their wives, and separation and divorce were common. The Hidatsa, Kiowa, and Omaha had no purchase. The women had a higher social position, and the wishes of the girls were consulted. Wives could leave cruel husbands. Each consort could remarry and the children were left in the custody of their mother or their paternal grandmother. Separation was never accompanied by any ceremony.

East of the Mississippi the clan and gentile systems were most highly developed. The rules against marriage within the clan organs were strictly enforced. Descent of name and property was in the female line among the Iroquoian, Muskogean, and s. e. Algonquian tribes, but in the male line among the Algonquians of the n. and w. Among some tribes, such as the Creeks, female descent did not prevent the subjection of women. As a rule, however, women had clearly defined rights. Gifts took the place of purchase. Courtship was practically alike in all the Atlantic tribes of the Algonquian stock; though the young men sometimes managed the matter themselves, the parents generally arranged the match. A Delaware mother would bring some game killed by her son to the girl's relatives and receive an appropriate gift in return. If the marriage was agreed upon, presents of this kind were continued for a long time. A Delaware husband could put away his wife at pleasure, especially if she had no children, and a woman could leave her husband. The Hurons and the Iroquois had a perfect matriarchate, which limited freedom of choice. Proposals made to the girl's mother were submitted by her to the women's council, whose decision was final among the Hurons. Iroquois unions were arranged by the mothers without the consent or knowledge of the couple. Polygamy was permissible for a Huron, but forbidden to the Iroquois. Divorce was discreditable, but could easily be effected. The children went with the mother.

Monogamy is thus found to be the prevalent form of marriage throughout the continent. The economic factor is everywhere potent, but an actual purchase is not common. The marriage bond is loose, and may, with few exceptions, be dissolved by the wife as well as by the husband. The children generally stay with their mother, and always do in tribes having maternal clans. See Adoption, Captives, Child life, Clan and Gens, Government, Kinship, Women.

Marriskintom. A village marked on Eanauts and Rapilly's map of 1777 on the e. side of lower Scioto r. in Ohio. It may have belonged to the Shawnee or to the Delawares, and is distinct from Muskingum. (J. M.)

Martha's Vineyard Indians. Martha's Vineyard id., off the s. coast of Massachusetts, was called by the Indians Nope, or Capawac. These may have been the names of tribes on the island and the smaller islands adjacent. The Indians thereon were subject to the Wampanoag and were very numerous at the period of the first settlement, but their dialect differed from those on the mainland. They seem not to have suffered by the great pestilence of 1617. In 1642 they were estimated at 1,500. The Mayhews carried on active missionary work among them and succeeded in bringing nearly all of them under church regulations and secured their friendship in King Philip's war. In 1698 they were reduced to about 1,000, in 7 villages: Nashanekamuck, Ohkonkemme, Seconchqt, Gay Head, Sanchecantacket or Edgartown, Nunnepoag, and Chaubaqueduck. In 1764 there were only 313 remaining, and about this time they began to intermarry with negroes, and the mixed race increased so that in 1807 there were about 360, of whom only about 40 were of pure blood. At that time they lived in 5 villages on or near the main island, the majority being at Gay Head. Soon thereafter they ceased to have any separate enumeration as Indians. (J. M.)

Masac's Village. A former Potawatomi village on the w. bank of Tippecanoe r., in the s. e. part of Fulton co., Ind., on a reservation sold in 1836. The name is also written Mosack. (J. M.)

Masamacush. A name of Hood's salmon (Salmo hoodii), found in the fresh-water lakes of the Atlantic slope of Canada (Rep. U. S. Com. Fish., 1872-73, p. 159): from masamegus or masamekus, a name of the salmon-trout in the Chippewa and Cree dialects of Algonquian. The word signifies, 'like a trout,' from namekus, 'trout,' and the prefix mas-, which has somewhat the force of the English suffix -ish. (A. F. C.)

Mascoming. A Weapomeioc village, in 1585, on the north shore of Albemarle sd., in Chowan co., N. C., adjoining the territory of the Chowanoc. (J. M.)

Mascoming.—Smith (1629), Virginia, 1, map, repr. 1819. Muscamonge.—Lane (1586), ibid., 1, 87.

Mascoutens ('little prairie people,' from muskata (Fox) or mashewé (Chippewa), 'prairie'; ens, diminutive ending. By the Hurons they were called Aasistaeronon, 'Fire people,' and by the French 'Nation du Feu.' These last names seem to have arisen from a mistranslation of the Algonquian term. In the Chippewa dialect 'fire' is ishkote, and might easily be substituted for mashkodé, 'prairie'. A term used by some early writers in a collective and indefinite sense to designate the Algonquian tribes living on the prairies of Wisconsin and Illinois; LaSalle even includes some bands of Sioux under the name. The name (Mashkôtens) is at present applied by the Potawatomi to that part of the tribe officially known as the "Prairie band" and formerly residing on the prairies of n. Illinois. The modern Foxes use the term Muskutáwa to designate themselves, the Wea, Piankashaw, Peoria, and Kaskaskia, on account of their former residence on the prairies of Illinois and Indiana. Gallatin was not inclined to consider them a distinct tribe, and Schoolcraft was of the opinion that they, together with the Kickapoo, were parts of one tribe. It is asserted by the Jesuit Allouez that the Kickapoo and Kitchigami spoke the same Algonquian dialect as the Mascoutens. Gallatin says the Sauk, Foxes, and Kickapoo "speak precisely the same language." Their close association with the Kickapoo would indicate an ethnic relation. According to an Ottawa tradition recorded by Schoolcraft there was at an early day a tribe known as Assegun (q. v.), or Bone Indians, residing in the vicinity of Michilimackinac. These, after a severe contest, were driven by the Ottawa into the southern peninsula of Michigan as far as Grand r. During this war on the eastern shore of L. Michigan the Ottawa and Chippewa, who had confederated with them, became involved in a quarrel with a people known as Mushkodainsug (or Mascoutens). From this period, according to the tradition, the Assegun and Mascoutens were confederates, and were driven still farther southward in the peninsula, after which they are lost to the tradition, except that it attributes to them the well known "garden beds" of southwestern Michigan. Although this tradition stands to a large extent alone, it is possibly not wholly unsupported. The chief items which seem to accord with it are the close relations between the Mascoutens and the Sauk, who are known to have resided at an early period in the lower Michigan peninsula, whence they passed into Wisconsin, where the two tribes were found closely associated; and the statement by Denonville (N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 378) that Champlain, in 1612, found (heard of) the people of this tribe residing at Sakinan, or Saginaw bay. To the same locality have the Sauk been traced. Although the evidence is not entirely satisfactory, it is probable that this tribe entered Wisconsin from southern Michigan, passing around the southern end of L. Michigan.

The first mention of the Mascoutens is by Champlain, in 1616, under the name Asistaguerouön (Œuvres, iv, 58, 1870); on his map (v, 1234) he locates them, under the name Assistagueronons, beyond and s. of L. Huron, L. Michigan being unknown to him. He says the Ottawa were then at war with them. Sagard (1636) places them nine or ten days journey w. of the s. end of Georgian bay (Hist. du Canada, 194, 1866). According to the Jesuit Relation for 1640 they were then at war with the Neuters, who were allies of the Ottawa. The first actual contact of the French with the Mascoutens of which there is any record was the visit of Perrot to their village near Fox r. Wis., previous to 1669. Winsor (Cartier to Frontenac, 152) says Nicolet visited their village in 1634. That he passed up Fox r., probably to the portage, is doubtless true, but that he visited the Mascoutens is not positively known, as it is stated in the Jesuit Relation for 1646 that up to that time they had seen no European, and that the name of God had not reached them. They were visited in 1670 by Allouez and in 1673 by Marquette, both finding them in their village near the portage between Fox and Wisconsin rs., living in close relation with the Miami and the Kickapoo. After the visit by Marquette they are mentioned by Hennepin, who places them in 1680 on L. Winnebago; though Membre at the same date locates at least a part of the tribe and some of the Foxes on Milwaukee r. Marest, writing in 1712, says that a short time previous thereto they had formed a settlement on the Ohio at the mouth of the Wabash, or more likely at Old Fort Massac, whose occupants had suffered greatly from contagious disorders. In the same year the upper Mascoutens and the Kickapoo joined the Foxes against the French. In the same year the Potawatomi and other northern tribes made a combined attack on the Mascoutens and Foxes at the siege of Detroit, killing and taking prisoners together nearly a thousand of both sexes. In 1718 the Mascoutens and Kickapoo were living together in a single village on Rock r., Ill., and were estimated together at 200 men. In 1736 the Mascoutens are mentioned as numbering 60 warriors, living with the Kickapoo on Fox r., Wis., and having the wolf and deer totems. These are among the existing gentes of the Sauk and Foxes. They are last mentioned as living in Wisconsin in the list of tribes furnished to James Buchanan (Sketches N. A. Ind., i, 139) by Heckewelder, which relates to the period between 1770 and 1780. The last definite notice of them is in Dodge's list of 1779, which refers to those on the Wabash in connection with the Piankashaw and Vermilions (Kickapoo). After this the Mascoutens disappear from history, the northern group having probably been absorbed by the Sauk and Fox confederacy, and the southern group by the Kickapoo.

Notwithstanding some commendatory expressions by one or two of the early missionaries, the Mascoutens, like the Kickapoo, bore a reputation for treachery and deceit, but, like the Foxes, appear to have been warlike and restless. According to the missionaries, they worshiped the sun and thunder, but were not much given to religious rites and ceremonies, and did not honor as large a variety of minor deities as many other tribes; but such early statements regarding any tribe must be taken with allowance. Their petitions to their deities were usually accompanied by a gift of powdered tobacco.

The missions established among the Mascoutens were St Francis Xavier and St James. (J. M. C. T.)

Mashpee (from massa-pee or missi-pi, 'great pool.'—Kendall). A former settlement on a reservation on the coast of Marshpee tp., Barnstable co., Mass. The reservation was established in 1660 for the Christian Indians of the vicinity, known as South Sea Indians, but it was afterward recruited from all a. s. Massachusetts, and even from Long Island. In 1698 they numbered about 285, and their population generally varied from 300 to 400 up to the 19th century. They intermarried with negroes and afterward with Hessians; in 1792 the mixed-bloods formed two-thirds of the whole body, and the negro element was then increasing, while the Indians were decreasing. In 1832 the mixed race numbered 315. (J. M.)

Masipa ('coyote'). Given by Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, ii, 181, 1889) as a gens of the Mohave who are said to have been originally a band of the Maricopa.

Maskasinik. A division of the Ottawa, mentioned in the Jesuit Relation for 1657-58 with the Nikikouek, the Michesaking (Missisauga), and others, as nations long known to the French in Canada. There is no other known reference to them. They may possibly be the same as the Achiligouan. (J. N. B. H.)

Maskeg. See Muskeg.

Maskegon (Müskigök, 'they of the marshes or swamps.'—W. J.). An Algonquian tribe so closely related to the Cree that they have appropriately been called a subtribe. According to Warren the Maskegon, with the Cree and the Monsoni, form the northern division of the Chippewa group, from which they separated about eight generations before 1850. The traders knew them as Swampy Crees. From the time the Maskegon became known as a distinct tribe until they were placed on reserves by the Canadian government they were scattered over the swampy region stretching from L. Winnipeg and L. of the Woods to Hudson bay, including the basins of Nelson, Hays, and Severn rs., and extending s. to the watershed of L. Superior. They do not appear to be mentioned in the Jesuit Relations or to have been known to the early missionaries as a distinct people, though the name "Masquikoukiaks" in the Proces-verbal of the Prise de Possession of 1671 (Perrot, Mém., 293, 1864) may refer to the Maskegon. Tailhan, in his notes to Perrot, gives as doubtful equivalents "Mikikoueks ou Nikikoueks," the Otter Nation (see Amikwa), a conclusion with which Verwyest (Missionary Labors) agrees. Nevertheless their association with the "Christinos" (Cree), "Assinipouals" (Assiniboin), and "all of those inhabiting the countries of the north and near the sea" (Hudson bay), would seem to justify identifying them with the Maskegon. If so, this is their first appearance in history.

Their gentes probably differ but little from those of the Chippewa. Tanner says that the Pezheuw (Beaheu) or Wildcat gens is common among them. No reliable estimate can be formed of their numbers, as they have generally had no distinct official recognition. In 1889 there were 1,254 Maskegon living with Chippewa on reservations in Manitoba at Birch, Black, Fisher, Berens, and Poplar rs., Norway House, and Cross lake. The Cumberland, Shoal lake, Moose lake, Chemewawin, and Grand Rapids bands of Saskatchewan, numbering 605 in 1903, consisted of Maskegon, and they formed the majority of the Pas band, numbering 118, and part of the John Smith, James Smith, and Cumberland bands of Duck Lake agency, numbering 356. There were also some under the Manitowpah agency and many among the 1,075 Indians of St. Peter's res. in Manitoba. (J. M.)

Maskinonge. A species of pike (Esox ester) found in the great lakes and the waters of the adjacent regions. The word is variously spelled maskinonge, mascalonge, muskelunge, muskellunge, etc., and abbreviated into lunge or longe. As one of the earlier forms of this word, masquinongy, and the Canadian French masquinongé and maskinongé, indicate, the terminal e was once sounded. The origin of the word is seen in mashkinonge or maskinonge, which in the Chippewa and Nipissing dialects of Algonquian is applied to this fish; although, as the etymology suggests, it might also be used of other species. According to Cuoy (Lex. Algonq., 194, 1886), mashkinonje is derived from mask, 'big,' and kinonje, 'fish.' This is perhaps better than the etymology of Lacombe and Baraga, which makes the first component to be maskk or mdsk, 'ugly.' The folk-etymological masqué allongé of Canadian French has been absurdly perpetuated in the pseudo-Latin mascalongus of ichthyologists. (A. F. C.)

Masks. Throughout North America masks were worn in ceremonies, usually religious or quasi-religious, but sometimes purely social in character. Sometimes the priests alone were masked, sometimes only those who took part, and again the entire company. In all cases the mask served to intensify the idea of the actual presence of the mythic animal or supernatural person. The simplest form of mask was one prepared from the head of an animal, as the buffalo, deer, or elk. These realistic masks did not stand for the actual buffalo, deer, or elk, but for the generic type, and the man within it was for the time endowed with or possessed of its essence or distinctive quality where the belief obtained that the mask enabled the wearer to identify himself for the time being with the supernatural being represented. A ceremony of purification took place when the mask was removed (Culin). Among the Eskimo the belief prevailed "that in early days all animated beings had a dual existence, becoming at will either like man or the animal form they now wear; if an animal wished to assume its human form the forearm, wing, or other limb was raised and pushed up the muzzle or beak as if it were a mask, and the creature became manlike in form and features. This idea is still held, and it is believed that many animals now possess this power. The manlike form thus appearing is called the inua, and is supposed to represent the thinking part of the creature, and at death becomes its shade." Many of the masks of the N. and the Pacific coast are made with double faces to illustrate this belief. "This is done by having the muzzle of the animal fitted over and concealing the face of the inua below, the outer mask being held in place by pegs so arranged that it can be removed quickly at a certain time in the ceremony, thus symbolizing the transformation." Sometimes the head of a bird or animal towered above the face mask; for instance, one of the sand-hill crane was 30 inches long, the head and beak, with teeth projected at right angles, about 24 inches; the head was hollowed out to admit a small lamp which shone through the holes representing the eyes; below the slender neck, on the breast, was a human face. The shaman who fashioned this mask stated that once when he was alone on the tundra he saw a sand-hill crane standing and looking at him. As he approached, the feathers on the breast of the bird parted, revealing the face of the bird's inua. In certain ceremonies women wore masks upon the finger of one hand. "The mask festival was held as a thanksgiving to the shades and powers of earth, air, and water for giving the hunters success." (Nelson in 18th Rep. B. A. E., 1899.)

In the N., on the Pacific coast, in the S. W., among some of the tribes of the plains, and among probably all the eastern tribes, including the ancient pile dwellers of Florida, masks made of wood, basketry, pottery, or hide were carved, painted, and ornamented with shell, bark fiber, hair, or feathers. They might be either male or female. The colors used and the designs carved or painted were always symbolic, and varied with the mythology of the tribe. Frequently the mask was provided with an interior device by which the eyes or the mouth could be opened or closed, and sometimes the different parts of the mask were so hinged as to give the wearer power to change its aspect to represent the movement of the myth that was being ceremonially exemplified. With the sacred masks there were prescribed methods for consecration, handling, etc.; for instance, among the Hopi they were put on or off only with the left hand. This tribe, according to Fewkes, also observed rites of bodily purification before painting the masks. Some of the latter were a simple face covering, sometimes concealing only the forehead; to others was attached a helmet, symbolically painted. The Hopi made their masks of leather, cloth, or basketry, and adorned them with appendages of wood, bark, hair, woven fabrics, feathers, herbs, and bits of gourd which were taken off at the close of the ceremony and deposited in some sacred place or shrine. The mask was not always worn; in one instance it was carried on a pole by a hidden man. Altars were formed by masks set in a row, and sacred meal was sprinkled upon them. The mask of the plumed serpent was spoken of as "quiet"; it could never be used for any purpose other than to represent this mythical creature; nor could it be repainted or adapted to any other purpose, as was sometimes done with other masks. Masks were sometimes spoken of as kachinas, as many of them represented these ancestral and mythical beings, and the youth who put on such a mask was temporarily transformed into the kachina represented. Paint rubbed from a sacred mask was regarded as efficacious in prayer, and men sometimes invoked their masks, thanking them for services rendered. Some of the Hopi masks are very old; others are made new yearly. Certain masks belong to certain clans and are in their keeping. No child not initiated is allowed to look upon a kachina with its mask removed, and certain masks must never be touched by pregnant women. Among the Hopi also a mask was placed over the face of the dead; in some instances it was a mere covering without form, in others it was made more nearly to fit the face. "A thin wad of cotton, in which is punched holes for the eyes, is laid upon the face . . . and is called a rain-cloud, or prayer to the dead to bring the rain." (Fewkes in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 1897.)

Young people sometimes indulged in festivities and made queer masks with which to disguise themselves; for example, masks of bladder or rawhide representing the head of the Thunderbird were made by the boys of the poorer classes among some of the Siouan tribes when the thunder was first heard in the spring. Covering their heads and faces with the masks, the boys proceeded to their uncles' tents and, imitating the sound of thunder, struck the doorflaps with sticks. Then with much merriment at the expense of the boys the uncles invited them in and gave them presents of leggings, moccasins, or blankets. On the N. W. coast masks were occasionally made as toys for the amusement of children. But generally the mask was a serious representation of tribal beliefs, and all over the country the fundamental idea embodied in it seems to have been that herein described.

Mason's Ruins. A small ruined house group, so named by Lumholtz (Unknown Mex., i, 48, 1902) from a Mexican member of his expedition; situated on the end of a ridge near Rio Bavispe, n. w. Chihuahua, Mex. The walls, which stand 3 to 5 ft high, consist of felsite blocks averaging 6 by 12 in., laid in gypsiferous clay mortar and coated with white plaster. The structure is ascribed to the Opata.

Maspeth. A small Algonquian tribe or band, a branch of the Rockaway, formerly living in a village about the site of the present Maspeth, between Brooklyn and Flushing, Long Island, N. Y. The name occurs as early as 1638. Ruttenber speaks of Mespeth as a considerable Canarsee village, attacked by the Dutch in 1644.

Massachusetts (Massa-adchu-es-et, 'at or about the great hill'; from massa 'great', wadchu 'hill or mountain', es 'small', et the locative.—Trumbull. In composition wadchu becomes adchu and adds ash for the plural. The name refers to the Blue Hills of Milton. Williams substitutes euk for et in forming the tribal designation, and uses the other as the local form. Cotton in 1708 translated the word 'a hill in the form of an arrow-head'). An important Algonquian tribe that occupied the country about Massachusetts bay in e. Massachusetts, the territory claimed extending along the coast from Plymouth northward to Salem and possibly to the Merrimac, including the entire basin of Neponset and Charles rs. The group should perhaps be described as a confederacy rather than as a tribe, as it appears to have included several minor bodies. Johnson described the group as formerly having "three kingdoms or sagamoreships having under them seven dukedoms or petty sagamores." They seem to have held an important place among the tribes of s. New England prior to the coming of the whites, their strength being estimated as high as 3,000 warriors, although it is more likely that the total population did not exceed that number. Capt. John Smith (1614) mentions 11 of their villages on the coast and says they had more than 20. In consequence of war with the Tarratine and the pestilence of 1617 in which they suffered more than any other tribe, the English colonists who arrived a few years later found them reduced to a mere remnant and most of the villages mentioned by Smith depopulated. In 1631 they numbered only about 500, and 2 years later were still further reduced by smallpox, which carried off their chief, Chickatabot. Soon thereafter they were gathered, with other converts, into the villages of the "Praying Indians," chiefly at Natick, Nonantum, and Ponkapog, and ceased to have a separate tribal existence. As they played no important rôle in the struggles between the settlers and natives, the chief interest that attaches to them is the fact that they owned and occupied the site of Boston and its suburbs and the immediately surrounding territory when the whites first settled there. In 1621, when Standish and his crew from Plymouth visited this region, they found the Indians but few, unsettled, and fearful, moving from place to place to avoid the attacks of their enemies the Tarratine.

Although the Algonquian Indians of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, taken as a whole, formed a somewhat homogeneous group, yet there were linguistic differences which seem to justify De Forest (Indians Conn., 1853) in doubting Gookin's statement that the languages were so much alike that the people of the different tribes could easily understand one another. The Massachusetts were more closely allied to the Narraganset than to any other of the surrounding tribes whose languages are known, the people of the two being able to understand each other without difficulty. For their customs, beliefs, etc., see Algonquian Family.

Following are the villages of the Massachusetts Indians so far as known, some of them being more or less conjectural: Conohasset, Cowate, Magaehnak, Massachusetts, Mishawum, Mystic (Middlesex co.), Nahapassumkeck, Nasnocomack, Natick, Naumkeag (Essex co.), Neponset, Nonantum, Patuxet, Pequimmit, Pocapawmet, Punkapog, Sagoquas, Saugus, Seccasaw, Titicut, Topeent, Totant, Totheet, Wessagusset, Winnisimmet, and Wonasquam.

Massachusetts. One of the villages of the tribe of the same name in 1614, according to Capt. John Smith; probably the chief settlement of the tribe, which then held their territory about Massachusetts bay, Mass. In 1617 that portion of the coast extending northward into Maine was ravaged by a pestilence, so that the tribe was almost extinct before the arrival of the Puritans in 1620.

Massapequa ('great pond', from massa, 'great' and peg or pequa, 'pond'). It occurs frequently in dialectic forms in New England and on Long Island). An Algonquian tribe formerly on the s. coast of Long Island, N. Y., about Seaford and Babylon, extending from Ft Neck s. to Islip. Their chief village, which was probably of the same name as the tribe, appears to have been at Ft Neck. "Under constant fear of attack from their more warlike neighbors, the Indians at each end of the island had built at Ft Neck and at Ft Pond, or Konkhongauk, a place of refuge capable of holding 500 men" (Flint, Early Long Island, 1896). The stronghold of the Massapequa was destroyed in 1653 by Capt. Underhill in the only great Indian battle fought on Long Island. The women and children took refuge on Squaw id. during the battle. Until lately the remains of a quadrangular structure, its sides 90 feet in length, marked the place where the fort stood. Tackapousha, the Massapequa sachem, was a thorn in the flesh of the settlers in his vicinity, it being impossible to satisfy his demands. The records show that both the English and the Dutch were obliged to pay tribute to him time and again. He was one of the most turbulent characters known to the aboriginal history of Long Island. (J. Massasauga. A western species of rattlesnake (Sistrurus catenatus). This reptile is more properly termed Mississauga and derives its appellation from the place and ethnic name Mississauga (Chamberlain, Lang. of Mississaugas, 59, 1892), from the Chippewamisi, 'great,' and adgor sauk, 'river mouth.' (A. F. C.)

Massasoit ('great chief'; proper name, Wosamequin [Wasamegin, Osamekin, etc.], 'Yellow Feather'). A principal chief of the Wampanoag of the region about Bristol, R. I., who was introduced by Samoset to the Puritans at Plymouth in 1621. He was preeminently the friend of the English. Drake (Aborig. Races, 81, 1880) says of him: "He was a chief renowned more in peace than war, and was, as long as he lived, a friend to the English, notwithstanding they committed repeated usurpations upon his lands and liberties." He had met other English voyagers before the advent of the Puritans. While ill in 1623 he was well treated by the English. In 1632 he had a brief dispute with the Narraganset under Canonculus, and in 1649 he sold the site of Duxbury to the English. His death took place in 1662. Of his sons, one, Metacombet, became famous as King Philip (q. v.), the leading spirit in a long struggle against the English. (A. F. C.)

Masset. A Haida town on the s. side of Masset inlet, near its mouth, Queen Charlotte Ids., Brit. Col. Its name in the Masset dialect is Ataiwas ('at' was, 'white slope', which in the Skidegate dialect appears as gat'rai'xiwas). According to the inhabitants the sea formerly came in over the ground now occupied by houses, but the latter were then situated on higher ground just back of the present site. At that time, too, there was an independent town around a hill called Edjao (¹'djao), which stands at the eastern end. Until lately the band holding possession was the Skidaokao. According to John Work's estimate, made between 1836 and 1841, there were 160 houses and 2,473 people at Masset, but this enumeration must have included all the neighboring towns, and probably numbered the smokehouses. The number of houses, enumerated by old people, in the two towns, Masset proper and Edjao (27 and 6 respectively) would indicate a total population of about 528, 432 in the former and 96 in the latter. Adding to these figures the estimated numbers in the two neighboring towns of Yan and Kayung, the grand total would be 1,056, or less than half of Work's figure. It is probable, however, that the population had decreased between Work's time and that which the old men now recall. According to the Canadian Report of Indian Affairs for 1904 there were 356 people at Masset; these include the remnant of all the families that lived once between Chawagis r. and Hippa id. A few people have moved to the neighboring town of Kayung. A mission of the Anglican Church is maintained at Masset, the oldest on the Queen Charlotte ids., and all the Indians are nominal Christians.

Mataguay. A former Diegueño rancheria on upper San Luis Rey r., San Diego co., Cal.; later on Agua Caliente No. 1 res., occupied by Warner's ranch. By decision of the U. S. Supreme Court the Indians were dispossessed of their lands, and by act of May 27, 1902, an additional tract was purchased at Pala, and the Mataguay people, who numbered 11 in 1903, were removed thereto in that year.

Mataguay.—Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Min. Ind., 24, 1883. Mataguay.—Hayes (1850) cited by Bancroft, Nat. Rac., i, 458, 1882. Matajuai.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34 Cong., 3d sess., 133, 1857. Mootayuhw.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 11, 1860.

Mataitaikeok (Ma-tai-tai-ke-ök, 'many eagles'). A former Cree band, named from their chief, who was known to the French as Le Sonnant. In 1856 they roamed and hunted in the country along the "Montagnes des Bois," and traded with the fur companies on Red r. of the North and on the Missouri near the mouth of the Yellowstone. They numbered about 300 lodges.—Hayden, Ethnol. and Philol. Mo. Val., 237, 1862.

Matamo. A Diegueño rancheria near San Diego, s. Cal.; probably the same as Matmork la Puerta, represented in the treaty of 1852 at Santa Isabel.

Matamó.—Ortega (1775) cited by Bancroft, Hist. Cal. i, 253, 1884. Matmork la Puerta.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess., 132, 1857.

Matanakons. Mentioned by De Laet about 1633 (N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., i, 303, 1841) as a Delaware tribe formerly in New Jersey. The name may have some connection with Manta (q. v.) or with Matiniconk, the Indian name of an island in Delaware r. Cf. Matinecoc. (J. M.)

Matantonwan (said to mean 'village of the great lake which empties into a small one,' and therefore probably from mdo-te, 'the outlet of a lake'). One of the two early primary divisions of the Mdewakanton Sioux (Neill, Hist. Minn., 144, 1858). They seem to have been a distinct tribe when visited by Perrot in 1689. They are mentioned as residing at the mouth of Minnesota r. in 1685. To this division belonged in 1858 the Khemnnichan, Kapozha, Maghayuteshni, Makhpiyamaza, Kheyataotonwe, and Tintaotonwe bands. All these are now on Santee res., Nebr.

Mah-tah-ton.—Lewis and Clark, Discov., 34, 1806. Mantantans.—Perrot (1689), quoted by Neill, Hist. Minn., 144, 1858. Mantantons.—La Harpe quoted by Neill, Hist. Minn., 170, 1858. Mantanton Sedoux.—Le Sueur (1700) quoted by Neill, Ibid., 166. Mantantons.—Prise de Possession (1689) in Margry, Déc., v, 34, 1843. Mantantons.—Perrot, Mém., 804, 1864 (misprint). Matabantowaher.—Balbi, Atlas Ethnog., 55, 1826. Mentontons.—Pénicaud (1700) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., II, pt. 2, 6, 1864. Mentonton.—Pénicaud (1700) in Margry, Déc., v, 414, 1883.

Matantuck. See Magnus.

Matanza (Span.: 'massacre'). A name frequently appearing on early Spanish maps, and on maps derived therefrom, apparently as settlements, but in reality to mark the locality or supposed locality where a massacre had taken place. A Matanza appears on maps of the Quivira region, in which Francisco Leyva Bonilla and his companions were killed by the natives about 1594-96; and another on the e. coast of Florida, below St Augustine, where the Huguenot colonists were massacred by the Spaniards in 1565.

Matapan (probably from the Nahuatl mallilli, ail, and pan, which suggests 'in the blue water.'—Buelna). A subdivision of the Tehueco that inhabited a village of the same name on the lower Rio Fuerte, in n. w. Sinaloa, Mex.—Orozco y Berra, Geog., 58, 1864.

Matape. A Endeve settlement, which evidently contained also some Coguinachi Opata, in lat. 29°, lon. 110°, central Sonora, Mexico. Identified by Bandelier with the Vacapa or Vacupa of Marcos de Niza (1539). The mission of San José de Matape was established there in 1629; it had 482 inhabitants in 1678 and but 35 in 1730. According to Davila (Sonora Histórico, 317, 1894) it was a Coguinachi pueblo. Not to be confounded with Bacapa, a Papago settlement.

Bacapa.—Coles, Garcés Diary, II, 481, 1900. Matapa.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, v, 123, 1890. Matape.—Sonora Materiales (1730) quoted by Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 513, 1884. San José de Matape.—Zapata (1678) in Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., III, 353, 1857. S. José Matape.—Bancroft, No. Mex. States, I, 246, 1884. Vacapa.—Marcos de Niza (1539) in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., IX, 259, 1838. Vacupa.—Niza (1539) in Hakluyt, Voy., III, 439, 1600.

Matapeake. Mentioned as a tribe that once occupied Kent id., Queen Anne co., Md. (Davis, Daystar of American Freedom, 45, 1855). They lived at one time near Indian Spring, and at another on Matapax Neck.

Matarango. A tribe living w. of Darwin, s. e. Cal.; probably an offshoot of the Panamint, as they speak a similar language. (H. W. H.)

Matatoba. A tribe or band of the Dakóta, probably the Mantantonwan division of the Mdewakanton.

Matatoba.—Pachot (1722) in Margry, Déc., VI, 518, 1886. Sioux of the Prairies.—Ibid. (distinct from the Teton).

Matanguamend. A village on the n. bank of the Potomac, in 1608, in Charles co., Md., probably near Mattawoman cr.—Smith (1629), Virginia, I, map, repr. 1819.

Matawachkarini ('people of the shallows.'—Hewitt). A small tribe or band living in 1640 on middle Ottawa r., but found in 1672 in the vicinity of the s. end of Hudson bay, near the Monsoni. They were doubtless one of the bands, known to the French as Algonkin, which were broken and dispersed by the Iroquois invasion about 1660. See Mattawan.

Matasouachkarini.—Champlain, Œuvres, III, 302, 1870. Matasouachkariniens.—Jes. Rel. 1643, 61, 1858. Matasouachkarinouek.—Ibid., 1672, 54, 1858. Matasouachkarini.—Ibid., III, index, 1858. Matasouachkariniuk.—Ibid., 1658, 22, 1858. Matasouachkariniouek.—Ibid., 1646, 34, 1858. Matasouachkariniuk.—Ibid., 1646, 145, 1858. Matasouachkarini.—Ibid., 1640, 34, 1858. Matasouachkarini.—Ibid., III, index, 1858. Matasouachkarini.—Ibid. Matou-ouescarini.—Champlain (1613), Œuvres, III, 302, 1870.

Matchasaung. A former Iroquois village on the left bank of the e. branch of Susquehanna r., about 13 m. above Wyoming, Pa.—Doc. Hist. N. Y., II, 715, 1851.

Matchcoat. During the era of trade with the Indians almost throughout the Algonquian seaboard certain garments supplied in traffic were called by the English "matchcoats," a corruption of a name belonging to one of the cloaks or mantles of the natives. The Algonquian word from which it was derived is represented by Chippewa matshigoté, Delaware urachgotey, 'petticoat.' (A. F. C.)

Matchcouchtin. A Nanticoke village in 1707, probably in Pennsylvania.—Evans (1707) in Day, Penn., 391, 1843.

Matcheattochousie. A Nanticoke village in 1707, probably in Pennsylvania.—Evans (1707) in Day, Penn., 391, 1843.

Matchebenashewish ('ill-looking bird,' or 'ill-natured bird.'—Hewitt). A Potawatomi village, called after a chief of this name, formerly on Kalamazoo r., probably in Jackson co., Mich. The reservation was sold in 1827. The name is also written Matchebenarhsheish. (J. M.)

Matchedash. A name formerly used to designate those Mississauga living at Matchedash bay, Ontario.

Matchedash.—Chauvignerie (1736) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 1066, 1855. Matchedash.—Henry, Travels, 35, 179, 1809. Matchitashk.—Ibid. Matchitashk.—Memoir of 1718 in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., ix, 889, 1855.

Matchinkoa. A village containing 600 families of Illinois, Miami, and others, situated 30 leagues from Ft Crevecoeur, near Peoria, Ill., in 1682 (La Salle in Margry, Déc., ii, 201, 1877). The word may be connected with Chinko (q. v.).

Matchopick ('bad bay or inlet.'—Hewitt). A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on the n. bank of the Rappahannock, in Richmond co., Va. Cf. Matchotic.

Matchopeake.—Purchas, Pilgrimes, iv, 1716, 1625-26. Matchopeak.—Simons in Smith (1629), Virginia, i, 185, repr. 1819. Matchopick.—Smith, ibid., map.

Matchotic ('bad inlet.'—Hewitt). A group of tribes of the Powhatan confederacy occupying the country between Potomac and Rappahannock rs. down to about the middle of Richmond co., Va., comprising the Tauxenent, Potomac, Cuttatawomen, Pissasec, and Onawmant. They numbered perhaps 400 warriors in 1608, but 60 years later, according to Jefferson, had become reduced to 60 warriors. See Appomattox. (J. M.)

Appomattox.—Jefferson, Notes, table, 138, 1801. Appomatrix.—Herrman, map (1670) in Rep. on Line between Va. and Md., 1873. Matchotickes.—Archives Md., Proc. Council, 1636-67, 281, 1885. Matchotics.—Jefferson, op. cit. Matox.—Ibid.

Matchotic. A former village on the s. bank of Potomac r. in Northumberland co., Va., a short distance below Nominy inlet.

Matchotick.—Herrman, map (1670) in Rep. on Line between Va. and Md.

Matchotic. A former village on Machodoc cr., King George co., Va.

Upper Matchodie.—Jefferson, Notes, 138, 1801. Upper Matchotick.—Herrman, map (1670) in Rep. on Line between Va. and Md.

Matchut. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on Pamunkey r., New Kent co., Va.

Matchot.—Smith (1629), Virginia, ii, 15, repr. 1819. Matchut.—Ibid., i, map.

Matagarele (matagá 'juniper', rellé 'below': 'below the junipers'). A Tarahumara rancheria near Palanquo, Chihuahua, Mexico.—Lumholtz, inf'n, 1894.

Mathews, Mary. See Bosomworth, Mary.

Mathiaca. A Timuquanan tribe and village on the w. side of upper St Johns r., Fla., in the 16th century.

Mathiaca.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., ii, map, 1521. Mathiaqua.—Laudonnière (1565) quoted by Shipp, De Soto and Fla., 525, 1881. Mathiaqua.—Fairbanks, Hist. Fla., 105, 1871.

Mathomauk. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on the w. bank of James r., in Isle of Wight co., Va.—Smith (1629) Virginia, i, map, repr. 1819.

Mathue. A tribe that traded in 1652 with Indians on Patuxent r., Md. There is no means of determining its location

(Bozman, Maryland, ii, 467, 1837). Possibly the Mantua, Monthees, or Munsees, or perhaps the Manta division of the Delawares. (J. M.)

Mathwa (M'-ath-wa, 'owl'). A gens of the Shawnee (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 168, 1877.

Matliha. A large Chumashan village, said by Indians to have been on Buena Ventura r., Ventura co., Cal. A village of this name is mentioned in mission archives as having been situated near Santa Inez mission.

Ma'-ti-la-ha.—Henshaw, Buena Ventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1884. Matliha.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, Oct. 18, 1861. Matlija.—Ibid., July 24, 1863.

Matilpe ('head of the Maamtagiyala'). A Kwakiutl sept which has recently branched off from the rest of the true Kwakiutl. The gentes are Maamtagiyala, Gyeksem, and Haalakyemae. The principal winter village is Etsekin. Pop. 55 in 1904.

Mat-tee-sep.—Can. Ind. Aff., 189, 1884. Matilpi.—Ibid., pt. 2, 166, 1901. Matlith-pi.—Sproat in Can. Ind. Aff., 145, 1879. Mat-til-par.—Kane, Wand. in N. Col., 118a, 1884. Mat-til-par.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, v, 488, 1855.

Matinecoo. An Algonquian tribe which formerly inhabited the n. w. coast of Long Island, N. Y., from Newtown, Queens co., to Smithtown, Suffolk co. They had villages at Flushing, Glen Cove, Cold Spring, Huntington, and Cow Harbor, but even before the intrusion of the whites they had become greatly reduced, probably through wars with the Iroquois, to whom they paid tribute. In 1650 Secretary Van Tienhoven reported but 50 families left of this once important tribe. Ruttenber includes them in his Montauk group, which is about equivalent to Metoac (q. v.); but the interrelationship of the tribes in the western part of Long Island has not been definitely determined. (J. M. C. T.)

Matinacocks.—Macauley, N. Y., ii, 164-65, 1829. Matinecocks.—Clark, Onondaga, i, 18, 1849. Matinicocks.—Macauley, N. Y., ii, 222, 1829. Martineau hounk.—Van Tienhoven (1650) in N. Y. Doc. Matora. An unidentified tribe placed by Marquette (Shea, Discov. Miss. Val., 268, 1852), on his map of 1673, w. of the Mississippi, about the w. border of Arkansas.

Matsaki ('salt city,' because the Zufi Goddess of Salt is said to have made a white lake there). A ruined pueblo of the Zufi near the n. w. base of Thunder mt., 3 m. e. of Zufi pueblo, Valencia co., N. Mex. It was the Maquea of Castañeda's narrative of Coronado's expedition in 1540-42, hence formed one of the Seven Cities of Cibola. It was occupied until the beginning of the Pueblo revolt of Aug., 1680, when it was permanently abandoned, the inhabitants fleeing with the other Zufi to the summit of the adjacent Thunder mtn., there remaining for several years. During the mission period Matsaki was a visita of Halona. See Mindeleff in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 86, 1891, and the writers cited below. (F. W. H.)

Maquea.—Castañeda (1596) in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 517, 1896. Maqui.—Bandler in Mag. West. Hist., 608, Sept. 1886. Mosqui.—Onate (1598) in Doc. Mā'çqui.—Boas in 64th Rep. Brit. A. A. S., 454, 1894. Maisqui.—Brit. Col. map, Ind. Aff. Victoria, 1872. Mamakey.—Custer quoted by Gatschet, notes, B. A. E. Matsqui.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1901, pt. ii, 158.

Mattabesec (from massa-sepuēs-et, 'at a [relatively] great rivulet or brook.'—Trumbull). An important Algonquian tribe of Connecticut, formerly occupying both banks of Connecticut r. from Wethersfield to Middletown or to the coast and extending westward indefinitely. The Waugunk, Pyquaug, and Montowese Indians were a part of this tribe. According to Ruttenber they were a part of the Wappinger, and perhaps occupied the original territory from which colonies went out to overrun the country as far as Hudson r. The same author says their jurisdiction extended over all s. w. Connecticut, including the Mahackeno, Uncowa, Paususset, Wepawaug, Quinnipiac, Montowese, Sukiang, and Tuxnia. (J. M.)

Mattabesec.—Kendall, Trav., i, 92, 1809. Mattabesec.—Doc. of 1646 cited by Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 26, 1881. Mattabesec.—Writer (ca. 1642) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Mattakeset. A former village situated about the site of Duxbury, Plymouth co., Mass. It was probably subject to the Wampanoag. In 1685 it had 40 inhabitants exceeding 12 years of age. (J. M.)

Mamatakeset.—Hinckley (1685) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 4th s., v, 133, 1861.

Mattamuskeet. A village of the Machapunga, the only one belonging to the tribe in 1700-01, and containing then, according to Lawson, 30 warriors. Probably situated on the lake of the same name in Hyde co., N. C.

Marimisket.—Lawson (1714), Hist. Car., 383, repr. 1860. Masamashketa.—Col. Rec. N. C. (1713), II, 82, 1886. Matamashkita.—ibid., 29. Matamuskeet.—ibid., 31. Mattamuskeeta.—ibid., 45. Mattcumaka.—Col. Rec. N. C. (1713), II, 2, 1886. Mattumsket.—ibid., 168.

Mattanock. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on the w. side of Nansemond r., near its mouth, in Nansemond co., Va.—Smith (1629), Virginia, I, map, repr. 1819.

Mattapanient (probably of the same meaning as Mattapony, q. v.). An Algonquian tribe or band that formerly lived on Patuxent r., Md., probably in St Marys co. Their principal village, of the same name, may have been at Mattapony cr. A Catholic mission was established there in 1636. In 1651 they, with others, were removed to a tract on Wicomico r. They were possibly but a band or division of the Conoy (q. v.), and are to be distinguished from the Mattapony of Virginia, sometimes written Mattapanient. (J. M.)

Matapaman.—Map, ca. 1640 or 1650, in Maps to Accompany the Rept. of the Com'r on the Bd'y bet. Va. and Md., 1873. Matapanient.—Bozman, Md., I, 141, 1837. Mattapanient.—Strachey (ca. 1612), Virginia, 39, 1849. Mattapanians.—Bozman, Md., II, 421, 1837. Mattapanient.—Smith (1629), Virginia, I, 118, repr., 1819. Mattapany.—Herrman, Map (1670), in Maps to Accompany the Rept. of the Com'r on the Bd'y bet. Mattapoiset (a form of Mattabesec, q. v.). A village, in 1622, near the present Mattapoisett, Plymouth co., Mass.

Mattapoisett.—Deed of 1664 in Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 3, 14, 1848. Mattapoiset.—Watts (1734) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., x, 31, 1823. Mattapouist.—Harris, Voy. and Trav., I, 856, 1766. Mattapuyet.—Mourt (1622) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., viii, 258, 1802.

Mattapony. The proper form of this name, both in Virginia and Maryland, appears to be Mattapanient, although both that and Mattapanient occur on Capt. John Smith's map and in his text, the latter being probably a misprint. Heckewelder's attempted interpretation of 'bad bread', or 'no bread at all', based on the theory that it contains the word pona, 'pone', 'bread', is evidently without value. The Mattapony is a small tribe of the Powhatan confederacy (q. v.) living in 1608, according to Smith, on Mattapony r., Va., and having 30 men, or a total of perhaps a little more than 100. On Smith's map the town "Mattapanient" appears to be located in the upper part of the present James City co., near the mouth of Chickahominy r. In 1781, according to Jefferson (Notes on Va., 1825), they still numbered 15 or 20, largely of negro blood, on a small reservation on the river of their name. These figures, however, are probably too low, as the name is still preserved by about 45 persons of mixed blood on a small state reservation on the s. side of Mattapony r., in King William co. These survivors are closely related to the Pamunkey, whose reservation is only 10 m. distant. See Mattapanient. (J. M.)

Mattapanient.—Smith, Hist. Va. (1624), Arber ed., 347, 1884. Mattapanient.—ibid., map. Mattapanens.—Boudinot, Star in the West, 127, 1816. Mattapanens.—Macaulay, N. Y., II, 168, 1829. Mattapanies.—Jefferson (1781), Notes, 130, 1825.

Mattawamkeag ('a bar of gravel divides the river in two.'—Vetromile). A principal Penobscot village formerly on Penobscot r., about Mattawamkeag point, Penobscot co., Me.

Madawamke.—Gyles (1736) in Drake, Trag. Wild., 78, 1841. Mattawamkeag.—Godfrey in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., vii, 4, 1876. Mattawamkeag.—Vetromile, Abnakiis, 52-53, 1866. Mettasakik.—Maurault, Abenakis, v, 1866. Montawamkeag.—Conf. (1786) in Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., vii, 10, 1876.

Mattawan ('river of shallows.'—Hewitt). A popular name for the Algonquian Indians living on Mattawan r., a branch of upper Ottawa r., Ontario. They are probably a part of the Nipissing or of the Temiscaming, q. v. Cf. Matawachkarini. (J. M.)

Mataouirion.—Jes. Rel. 1672, 46, 1858. Mataovan.—La Hontan (1703), New Voy., map, 1735. Matawag.—Wm. Jones, inf'n., 1805 (correct form). Matawin.—McLean, Hudson Bay, I, 87, 1849.

Mattawottis. A former Diegueño rancharia under the mission of San Miguel de la Frontera, n. Lower California.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 18, 1860.

Mattinacook. A band of the Penobscot who, in 1876, occupied Mattinacook id. in Penobscot r., near Lincoln, Penobscot co., Me.

Mattawacook.—Me. Hist. Soc. Coll., vii, 103, note, 1876.

Mattituck (Matuh'tugk, 'place without wood', or 'badly wooded.'—Trumbull). A Corchaug village, about 1640, on the site of the present Mattituck, Suffolk co., Long Island, N. Y. (J. M.)

Mattituck.—Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 27, 1881 (early form). Mattituck.—Records (1649) in Thompson, Long Id., I, 378, 1843. Mattituck.—Thompson, ibid., 392.

Mattole (Wishosk name). An Athapaskan tribe whose principal settlements were along Bear and Mattole rs., Cal. They resisted the white race more vigorously than the natives of this region generally did and suffered practical extermination in return. They were gathered on a reservation near C. Mendocino for a time, and some of them were afterward taken to Hupa Valley res. A few still live in their old territory. They differ somewhat from their Athapascan neighbors in language and culture; they burn the dead; the men tattoo a distinctive mark on the forehead, but in other respects they are similar to the Hupa. (P. E. G.)

Matole.—Bancroft, Nat. Races, III, 643, 1874. Mat-tol.—Powers in Cont. N. A. Ethnol., III, 107, 1877. Mattole.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1864, 119, 1865. Tul'wah.—Powers, op. cit., 124 ('foreigners': Wallaki name).

Mattowacca. A name of the hickory shad (Clupea mediocris), found from Newfoundland to Florida; probably from one of the southeastern dialects of the Algonquian stock. (A. F. C.)

Matyata (or Mak'yana, contracted from Mak'yanawin, 'country of the salt lake.'—Cushing). Described by Fray Marcos de Niza in 1539, under the name Marata, as a province s. e. of Cibola (Hakluyt, Voy., III, 440), although Coronado, in the following year, asserted that "the kingdom of Marata is not to be found, neither have the Indians any knowledge thereof." Bandelier and Cushing identify Marata with Matyata, or Makyata, "the name given by the Zuñi to a cluster of now ruined pueblos which they declare to have been occupied by a branch of their own people. After long dissensions and even warfare with the inhabitants of the Zuñi basin, those of Matyata were compelled to submit, and to join the former in their settlements. The group of ruins called Matyata or Makyata lies s. e. of Zuñi on the trail leading to Acoma; and the condition of the ruins (described by Alvarado in 1540) shows that their abandonment is more recent than that of other ancient pueblos in that region." According to Cushing descendants of the former inhabitants of Matyata are to-day residents of Zuñi. Consult Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 120, 1890; v, 174, 1890; and for Alvarado's description of these supposed ruins see Winship in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896. See Kyama-kyakwe, Kyatsutuma, Pikyaaivan. Ar-cho-o-tak-o-pe.—Fewkes in Jour. Am. Eth. and Arch., I, 100, 1891. Ma'k'ya-na.—Cushing, inf'n, 1891 (or Ma'k'ya-na-win: 'country of the salt lake'). Ma-kyata.—Cushing quoted by Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, III, 120, 1890 (Ma-tya-ta, or). Marata.—Marcos de Niza (1539) in Hakluyt, Voy., III, 440, 1600. Marta.—Mota-Padilla, Hist. de la Conquista, 169, 1742 (Marata, or). Ma-tya-ta.—Cushing quoted by Bandelier, op. cit. (or Ma-kyata). Ma-tyata.—Bandelier in Revue d'Ethnographie, 206, 1886.

Mangua. A former Gabrieleonorancheria in Los Angeles co., Cal., at a locality later called Rancho Felis.—Ried (1852) quoted by Taylor in Cal. Farmer, June 8, 1860.

Maukekose (probably for Ma'kona, 'bear cub,' or 'little bear.'—W. J.). A former Potawatomi village, commonly known as Mau-ke-kose's village, from the name of its chief, near the head of Wolf cr., in Marshall co., Ind., on a reservation sold under the provisions of the treaty of Dec. 10, 1834. The name is also written Muckkose and Muck-Rose. (J. M.)

Mauls. See Hammers.

Maumee Towns. A common name for a group of villages formerly at the head of Maumee r., near Ft Wayne, Allen co., Ind. When destroyed by the whites in 1790 there were 7 villages, all within a few miles of each other, on the Maumee or its branches. Two of these were Miami, three Delaware, and two Shawnee. Omeé was the principal one, and together they contained about 225 houses. See Kekionga. Maumee towns.—So called from their situation on Maumee r. Omeé towns.—Harmar (1790) in Rupp, West. Pa., app., 225, 1846 (commonly so called; Omeé is the French An Mi, contracted from Au Miami; Omeé is given by Harmar as the name of the principal village, on the site of Kekionga, while he puts "Kegalogue" on the opposite bank of St Joseph r.).

Mashantuxet ('at or in the little place of much wood,' or 'smaller wooded tract of land,' in contradistinction to Mashantucket, or Mashantackuck, the name of a tract on the w. side of Thames r., in Montville.—Trumbull). A Pequot settlement in 1762, at the site of the present Ledyard, New London co., Conn.

Mashantucket.—Early records quoted by Trumbull, Ind. Names Conn., 26, 1881 (an occasional form). Mashantuxet.—Stiles (1761) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., x, 102, 1909. Mashantucksett.—Stiles quoted by Trumbull, op. cit.

Mashapogue (probably 'great pond,' from massa, 'great', pog or peag, 'pond'; or massa-pe-ak, 'great-water land'; cf. Mashpee and Massapequa). A village, probably belonging to the Narraganset, in Providence co., R. I., in 1837. Mashapogue.—Williams (1661) in R. I. Col. Rec., I, 18, 1856. Mashapawog.—Doc. of 1640, ibid., 28. Mashapogue.—Deed of 1637, ibid., 18.

Mauthpi ('dirty river.'—Hewitt). A Montagnais tribe in 1863 on the reservation at Manicouagan, on St Lawrence r., Quebec.—Hind, Lab. Penin., II, 124, 1863.

Mawakhota ('skin smeared with whitish earth'). A band of the Two-kettle Sioux.

Ma-wahota.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897. Ma-wahota.—ibid.

Mawsootoh (Maw-soo-toh', 'bringing along'). A subclan of the Delawares (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Mayaca. A Timuquanan district and village, about 1565, on the e. coast of N. Florida. De Bry locates it e. of upper St Johns r.; Bartram, e. of L. George. Maocoya.—Fairbanks, Hist. Fla., 139, 1871. Maocya.—Barcia, Ensayo, 129, 1723. Maarquua.—Shipp, De Soto and Fla., 517, 1881. Maarquiam.—Barcia, Ensayo, 51, 1723. Mayaca.—Fontaneda (1576), Memoir, Smith trans., 21, 1854. Mayaco.—Bartram, Voy., I, map, 1799. Mayaca.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., II, map, 1591. Mayarqua.—Laudonnière (1564), L'Hist. Notable, 108, 1858.

Mayajuna. A former Timuquanan village on the e. coast of Florida, n. of the Ais country.

Mayaguad.—Fontaneda (1575) in Doc. Inéd., v. 544, 1566. Mayajuas.—Fontaneda in Ternaux-Compans, Voy., xx, 26, 1841. Mayajuas.—Ibid., 35.

Mayara. A Timucuan chief, said to have been "rich in gold and silver," and also the name of his town on lower St Johns r., Fla., in the 16th century.

Maiera.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., II, map, 1591. Mayara.—Laudonnière (1564) in French, Hist. Coll. La., 242, 1869. Mayra.—Laudonnière, Hist. Notable, 88, 1858.

Maycock. A sort of squash or pumpkin. According to Schele de Vere (Americanisms, 60, 1871) it is still found in Virginia. Trumbull (Sci. Pap. Asa Gray, I, 336, 1889) cites as early forms macocks (Smith, 1606-08), macock gourd (Strachey, 1610), macokos (Strachey), and macocquer (L'Ecluse, 1591-1605). Beverley (Hist. Va., 124, 1705) identifies the maycock with the squash of New England. Smith (Arber ed., 359, 1884) describes macocks as "a fruit like unto a muske mellon, butt lesse and worse." The word is derived from a form of muhawk, 'gourd', in the Virginian dialect of Algonquian, cognate with the Delaware machgachk, 'pumpkin.' See Macocks. (A. F. C.)

Mayes, Joel Bryan. A prominent mixed-blood of the Cherokee tribe and twice principal chief of the nation. He was born Oct. 2, 1833, in the old Cherokee Nation, near the present Cartersville, Ga. His father, Samuel Mayes, was a white man from Tennessee, while his mother, Nancy Adair, was of mixed blood, the daughter of Walter Adair, a leading tribal officer, and granddaughter of John, one of the Adair brothers, traders among the Cherokee before the Revolution. The boy removed with the rest of his tribe in 1838 to Indian Ter., where he afterward was graduated from the male seminary at Tahlequah, and after a short experience at teaching school, engaged in stockraising until the outbreak of the Civil war in 1861, when he enlisted as a private in the First Confederate Indian Brigade, coming out at the close of the war as quartermaster. He returned to his home on Grand r. and resumed his former occupation, but was soon after made successively clerk of the district court, circuit judge (for two terms of 10 years in all), associate justice, and chief justice of the Cherokee supreme court. In 1887 he was elected principal chief of the Cherokee Nation, succeeding D. W. Bushyhead, and was reelected in 1891, but died in office at Tahlequah, Dec. 14 of that year, being succeeded by Col. C. J. Harris. Chief Mayes was of fine physique, kindly disposition, and engaging personality. He was three times married, his last wife having been Miss Mary Vann, of a family distinguished in Cherokee history. (J. M.)

Mayeye. A former Tonkawan tribe which, in the first half of the 18th century, lived near San Xavier r., Tex., apparently either modern San Gabriel or Little r. Joutel in 1687 (Margry, Déc., III, 288, 1878) heard of the Meghey n. of Colorado r., somewhere near where the Spaniards later actually found the Mayeye. Rivera (Diario, leg. 2062, 1736) in 1727 met them at springs called Puentezitas, 15 leagues w. of the junction of the two arms of the Brazos and 35 leagues from the Colorado. In 1738 they were mentioned with the Deadoses (q. v.) of the same locality (Orobio y Basterra, letter of Apr. 26, Archivo General, MS.). About 1744 Fray Mariano Francisco de los Dolores visited a rancheria of Mayeyes, Yojuanes, Deadoses, Bidais, and others near San Xavier r. (Arricivita, Chronica, pt. 2, 322, 1792). In 1740 it had been planned to take this and the Sanas (Zana) tribes to San Antonio (Descripción, 1740, Mem. Nueva España, xxviii, 203, MS.), where a few of the Sanas and Erviapiames had already been gathered. As a result of the efforts of Father Dolores, 4 chiefs of the "Yojuanes, Deadoses, Mayeyes, and Rancheria Grande" went to San Antonio to ask for a mission (Despatch of the Viceroy, Mar. 26, 1751, Lamar Papers, MS.), and about 1747 the San Xavier group of missions was founded for them. When the site was abandoned, "notwithstanding the tenacity with which the Mayeyes especially had always clung to the district of San Xavier," some of them were moved to the Guadalupe, where an abortive attempt was made to reestablish them (Arricivita, op. cit., 337). Some of the Mayeye who had been baptized at San Xavier entered San Antonio de Valero mission at San Antonio, and were living there as late as 1769 (MS. Burial records). The Mayeye and their relations were bitter enemies of the Apache, and in the middle of the 18th century, when the Comanche forced the Apache southward, the Mayeye and other Tonkawans were apparently pushed to the s. e., where they mingled with the Karankawan tribes. In 1772 Mezières (Informe, July 4, 1772, MS.) said the Mayeye wandered with the Tonkawa and Yojuane between the Trinity and the Brazos; and in the same year Bonilla, quoting Mezières, associated them with the same tribes, all of whom, though in alliance with the Wichita and their congeners, were despised by the latter as vagabonds. Such has been the usual attitude of other tribes toward the Tonkawa ever since. While Bucareli existed on the Trinity, from 1774 to 1779, the Mayeye visited it. In 1778 Mezières (Carta, Mar. 18, MS.) reported 20 families of Coco and Mayeye apostates opposite Culebra id., in the Karankawa country. In 1779 the Spanish government feared an alliance of Mayeye, Coco, Karankawa, and Arkokisa (Croix to Cabello, Dec. 4, MS.). The Mayeye were included in the census of 1790, and were in the jurisdiction of Nacogdoches. Sibley, in 1805, says the "Mayes" were then living on San Gabriel cr., near the mouth of the Guadalupe, on St Bernard bay, Tex., and numbered about 200 men; they were hostile to the Spaniards, but professed friendship for the French; they were surrounded by tribes speaking languages different from their own and were adept in the sign language. The last trace of the tribe was found by Gatschet in 1884 (Karankawa Inds., 36, 1891), when he met an old Indian who had known this people in his early days on the Texas coast, and who stated that they spoke a dialect of the Tonkawa.

Mayi. An important Pomo village on upper Clearlake, Cal.—A. L. Kroeber, Univ. Cal. MS., 1903.

Mayndeshkish ('Coyote pass'). An Apache clan or band at San Carlos agency and Ft Apache, Ariz., in 1881 (Bourke in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 112, 1890). The corresponding clan of the Navaho is Mai-theshkizh.

Mayne Island. The local name for a body of Sanetch on the s. e. coast of Vancouver id.; pop. 28 in 1904.—Can. Ind. Aff. for 1902 and 1904.

Mayo ('terminus', because the Mayo r. was the dividing line between them and their enemies.—Ribas). One of the principal tribes of the Cahita group of the Piman stock, residing on the Rio Mayo, Sinaloa, Mexico. Their language differs only dialectically from that of the Yaqui and the Tehueco. The first notice of the tribe is probably that in the "Segunda Relacion Anonima" of the journey of Nuño de Guzman, about 1530 (in Icazbalceta, Coleccion de Documentos, II, 300, 1866), where it is stated that after passing over the Rio de Tamachola (Fuerte) and traveling 30 leagues (northward) they came to a river called Mayo on which lived a people of the same name. Ribas (p. 237) declares that in his day it was the most populous of all the tribes of Sinaloa, estimating their number at 30,000, some 8,000 or 10,000 of whom were warriors. Hedid not consider them so warlike as the surrounding tribes, but in their customs, dwellings, and other respects the Mayo resembled them. Hardy (Travels in Mexico, 424, 1829) states that at the time of his visit there were 10 towns on the Rio Mayo, with an estimated population of 10,000. According to Davila (Sonora, 315, 1894) their industries were reduced to the cultivation of the soil, the raising of sheep and domestic birds, and the manufacture of woolen shawls. He says the Mayo pueblos are larger than those of the Yaqui, but the number of people of the latter is now greater than that of the former. The

Mayo settlements, so far as known, are Baca, Batacosa, Camoa, Conicari, Cuirimpo, Echojoa, Huatabampo, Macoyahui, Masiaca, Navahoa, San Pedro, Santa Cruz de Mayo, Tepahue, Tesia, and Toro. See Cuhita. (F. W. H.)

Mayo.—ten Kate in Bull. Soc. d'Anthrop. de Paris, 375, 1883 (misprint). Maya.—Ribas, Hist. Triunphos, 237, 1645. Maya.—Rel. Anonima (1530), op. cit.

Maypop. The fruit of the passion-flower (Passiflora incarnata). Capt. John Smith (Va., 123, repr. 1819) and Strachey (Trav. Va., 72) speak of this fruit as maracock and state that the Indians cultivated it before the coming of the whites. Trumbull (Sci. Pap. Asa Gray, 342, 1889) considers that maracock is the Brazilian Tupi mburucua, related to the Carib merécuya (Breton, 1665), the fruit of a vine, the name and the thing having both come from South America. Maypop would thus ultimately represent, through maracock, this Tupi loan-word. (A. F. C.)

Maysonce. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on the N. bank of the Chickahominy, in New Kent co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., 1, map, repr. 1819.

Mazakutemani ('shoots the gun [iron] as he walks'). A chief of the Sisseton Sioux, noted for his friendship for the whites; born in 1826 or 1827. In his early manhood he followed strictly the customs of his tribe; in 1850 he was a member of the Sisseton and Wahpeton delegation to Washington, and a signer of the Traverse des Sioux treaty of July 23, 1851. When about 29 years of age (about 1855) he became a convert to Christianity and thenceforward was an ardent supporter of the missionary work of Rev. Stephen R. Riggs. It was in the spring of 1857, when the massacre at Spirit Lake, Iowa, by Inkpaduta's band occurred, that Mazakutemani particularly manifested his friendship for the whites by following the murderous band and rescuing Miss Gardener, the only surviving white captive. Again, in 1862, on receiving word of the Sioux outbreak, he employed every effort to stay the massacre and to rescue the white captives, going boldly into the hostile camps and using his oratorical powers to accomplish his purpose. The final escape of the captives from death on this occasion was due largely to Mazakutemani's efforts and his cooperation with Gen. Sibley. He was the chief speaker for the Sisseton in their tribal deliberations as well as in their treaty negotiations with the United States commissioners. In addition to the treaty of Traverse des Sioux he signed the treaties of Washington, June 19, 1858; Sisseton agency, Dak., Sept. 20, 1872, and Lac Traverse agency, Dak., May 2, 1873. His death occurred probably before 1880. Consult S. R. Riggs (1) in Minn. Hist.

Soc. Coll., III, 82, 90, 1880; (2) Mary and I, 141, 1880; Heard, Hist. Sioux War, 156, 1863. (C. T.)

Mazapes. A former tribe of N. E. Mexico or S. Texas, probably Coahuiltecan, drawn from Nuevo Leon and gathered into the mission of San Antonio Galindo Motezuma, in Coahuila. Cf. Mahuames. Mazames.—Archivo General, xxxi, fol. 208, quoted by Orozco y Berra, Geog., 306, 1864 (probably identical). Mazapes.—Orozco y Berra, ibid., 302.

Mazapeta ('iron fire'). A chief of a village of 627 Yankton and Sisseton Sioux on Big Stone lake, Minn., in 1836. He was probably chief of the Yankton in the village, while The Grail was chief of the Sisseton.

Mahsapatah.—Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 612, 1858.

Mazepnaka ('piece of metal in the hair'). A band of the Sans Arcs Sioux.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 219, 1897.

Mdeiyedan (French: 'Lac qui parle', 'Speaking lake'). A band of the Wahpeton Sioux whose habitat was around Lac qui Parle, Minn. In 1836 (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 612, 1853) the band numbered 530 under Little Chief.

Lac qui Parle band.—Ind. Aff. Rep. 1859, 102, 1860. Lacqui-parle Indians.—Sibley (1852) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 29, pt. 2, 32d Cong., 2d sess., 9, 1853. Upper Wahpeton.—Sibley (1873) in Minn. Hist. Soc. Coll., III, 250, 1880.

Mdewakanton ('mystery lake village,' from mde 'lake', wakan 'sacred mystery', otonwe 'village'). One of the subtribes composing the Santee division of the Dakota, the other 3 being the Sisseton, Wahpeton, and Wahpekute. A. L. Riggs contends that the Mdewakanton are the only Dakota entitled to the name Isanyati ('Santee'), given them from their old home on Mille Lac, Minn., called by them Isantamde, 'knife lake.' In every respect this tribe appears to be most intimately related to the Wahpeton. Wahpekute, and Sisseton. It is possible that the Mdewakanton formed the original stem from which the other 3 subtribes were developed. It is probable that the Nadowessious mentioned by early missionaries and explorers were in most cases the people of this tribe and the tribes associated with them then living in the region of Mille Lac and the headwaters of the Mississippi. Dr. Williamson, who spent years among these Indians, fixes the home of this tribe (who by tradition had once lived on Lake of the Woods and N. of the great lakes and had migrated toward the S. W.) at Mille Lac, the source of Rum r., which is apparently the ancient location of the Isati of Hennepin. This identifies the Isati with the Mdewakanton and sustains the conclusion of Riggs. After the Mdewakanton came to the Mississippi they appear to have scattered themselves along that river in several villages extending from Sauk Rapids to the mouth of Wisconsin r. and up the Minnesota 35 m. According to Neill (Minn. Hist. Coll., 1, 262, 1872) this splitting into bands was due to the influence of French traders. This author asserts that the people of this division were still residing at Mille Lac at the time Le Sueur built his post near the mouth of Blue Earth r. in 1700, and that their change of location to the region of lower Minnesota r. was due to the establishment of trading posts in that section. This would indicate a later removal to that locality than Williamson supposed. Rev. G. H. Pond, as quoted by Neill, says: "When to this we add the fact that traders taught them to plant corn, which actually took the place of wild rice, nothing was wanting to bring the Mdewakantons south to the Minnesota r. Accordingly tradition tells us that this division of the Dakotas no sooner became acquainted with traders, and the advantage of the trade, than they erected their teepees around the log hut of the white man and hunted in the direction of the Minnesota r., returning in the 'rice-gathering moon' (September) to the rice swamps nearest their friends." In Le Sueur's list of the eastern Dakota tribes the name Issati is dropped and that of Mdewakanton, under the form Mendeouacantons, is used, evidently for the first time. The whites came into more intimate relation with this tribe than with any other of the Dakota group, but the history—which is not of general interest except in so far as it relates to the outbreak of 1862, in which some of them took an active part—is chiefly that of the different bands and not of the tribe as a whole. After their defeat by the United States, they and the Winnebago were removed to Crow Creek res., Dakota Ter. Subsequently the Mdewakanton and Wahpekute were transferred to the Santee res. in Nebraska. Ultimately lands were assigned them in severalty, the reservation was abolished, and the Indians became citizens of the United States. In general customs and beliefs they resemble the other divisions of the eastern Sioux. (See Dakota.)

The tribe joined in the following treaties with the United States: Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 15, 1830, by which they and other eastern Sioux tribes ceded a strip 20 m. wide from the Mississippi to Des Moines r., Ia. Convention at St. Peters, Minn., Nov. 30, 1836, with the upper Mdewakanton, agreeing on certain stipulations regarding the treaty of July 15, 1830. Treaty of Washington, Sept. 29, 1837, by which they ceded to the United States all their interest in lands e. of the Mississippi. Treaty of Mendota, Minn., Aug. 5, 1851, by which they ceded all their lands in Iowa and Minnesota, retaining as a reservation a tract 10 m. wide on each side of Minnesota r. Treaty of Washington, June 19, 1858, by which they sold that part of their reservation n. of Minnesota r., retaining the portion s. of the river, which they agreed to take in severalty. By act of Mar. 3, 1863, the President was authorized to set apart for them a reserve beyond the limits of any state and remove them thereto, their reserve in Minnesota to be sold for their benefit. The new reserve was established by Executive order, July 1, 1863, on Crow cr., S. Dak. See Reservations.

Lewis and Clark (1804) estimated them at 300 fighting men or 1,200 souls; Long in 1822 (Exped. St. Peter's R., 380, 1824) estimated the various bands as follows:

MDEWAKANTON

Keoxa (Kiyuksa), 400; Eanbosandata (Khemnichan), 100; Kapozha, 300; Oanoska (Ohanhanska), 200; Tetankatane (Tintaotonwe), 150; Taopa, 300; Weakaote (Khemnichan), 50. According to the Census of 1890 there were 869 Mdewakanton and Wahpekute on Santee reservation, Nebr., and 292 at Flandreau, S. Dak. The report for 1905 mentions as not under an agent 150 at Birch Cooley and 779 elsewhere in Minnesota. The recognized divisions are as follows: (1) Kiyuksa, (2) Ohanhanska, (3) Tacanhpisapa, (4) Anoginajin, (5) Tintaotonwe, and (6) Oyateshicha, belonging to the Wakpaatonwedan division, which seems to have constituted the whole tribe in early times, and (7) Khemnichan, (8) Kapozha, (9) Magayuteshni, (10) Mahpiyamaza, (11) Mahpiyawich-asta, (12) Kheyataatonwa, and (13) Taoapa, constituting the Matantonwan division, which early French writers spoke of as a powerful tribe associated with but not a part of the Mdewakanton. The following subdivisions have not been identified: Town band Indians, Mankato, Nasiampaa, and Upper Medawakanton.

Measurements. Among civilized people, previous to the introduction of the metric system, linear measurements were derived mostly, if not exclusively, from the human body, and although in later centuries these measurements became standardized, it is not long since they were all determined directly from the human frame. It is still common, even for white men, in the absence of a graduated rule, to compute the inch by the transverse dimension of the terminal joint of the thumb, and for women to estimate a yard by stretching cloth from the nose to the tips of the fingers—the arm being extended and thrown strongly backward—or to estimate an eighth of a yard by the length of the middle finger. The use of the span as a standard of lineal measure is also still quite common. Within the last 30 years it has been a custom for traders to sell cloth to Indians by the natural yard or by the brace, and although this measure on a trader of small stature might be much less than 3 feet, the Indians preferred it to the yardstick. Below is given a list of what may be called natural measures which are known to have been employed by Indians. Some of the larger measures have been in general use among many tribes, while some of the smaller ones have been used by the Navaho and Pueblo shamans in making sacrificial and other sacred objects and in executing their dry-paintings. Some are also employed by Pueblo women in making and decorating their pottery.

Linear measures.—1. One finger width: the greatest width of the terminal joint of the little finger in the palmar aspect. 2. Two finger widths: the greatest width of the terminal joints of the first and second fingers held closely together, taken in the palmar aspect. 3. Three finger widths: the greatest width of the terminal joints of the first, second, and third fingers, taken as above. 4. Four finger widths: the width of the terminal joints of all four fingers of one hand, taken under the same conditions. 5. The joint: the length of a single digital phalanx, usually the middle phalanx of the little finger. 6. The palm: the width of the open palm, including the adducted thumb. 7. The finger stretch: from the tip of the first to the tip of the fourth finger, both fingers being extended. 8. The span: the same as our span, i. e., from the tip of the thumb to the tip of the index finger, both stretched as far apart as possible. 9. The great span: from the tip of the thumb to the tip of the little finger, all the digits being extended, while the thumb and little finger are strongly adducted. 10. The cubit: from the point of the elbow to the tip of the extended middle finger, the arm being bent. 11. The short cubit: from the point of the elbow to the tip of the extended little finger. 12. The natural yard: from the middle of the chest to the end of the middle finger, the arm being outstretched laterally at right angles with the body; this on a tall Indian equals 3 feet or more; among some tribes the measure is taken from the mouth to the tip of the middle finger. 13. The natural fathom, or brace: measured laterally on the outstretched arms, across the chest, from the tip of one middle finger to the tip of the other; this is twice the natural yard, or about 6 feet. The stature of white men usually equals or exceeds this measure, while among Indians the contrary is the rule—the arm of the Indian being usually proportionally longer than the arm of the white. This standard was commonly adopted by Indian traders of the N. in former days. They called it "brace," a word taken from the old French. There seems to be no evidence that the foot was ever employed by the Indians as a standard of linear measure, as it was among the European races; but the pace was employed in determining distances on the surface of the earth.

Circular measures.—1. The grasp: an approximate circle formed by the thumb and index finger of one hand. 2. The finger circle: the fingers of both hands held so as to inclose a nearly circular space, the tips of the index fingers and the tips of the thumbs just touching. 3. The contracted finger circle: like the finger circle but diminished by making the first and second joints of one index finger overlap those of the other. 4. The arm circle: the arms held in front as if embracing the trunk of a tree, the tips of the middle fingers just meeting.

Scales and weights were not known on the western continent previous to the discovery. There is no record of standards of dry or liquid measure, but it is probable that vessels of uniform size may have been used as such. See Exchange, and the references thereunder. (w. m.)

Mecastria. Mentioned by Ofiate (Doc. Inéd., xvi, 114, 1871) as a pueblo of the Jemez in New Mexico in 1598. It can not be identified with the present native name of any of the ruined settlements in the vicinity of Jemez. In another list by Ofiate (ibid., 102), Quiamera and Fia are mentioned. A comparison of the lists shows the names to be greatly confused, the mera (of Quiamera) and fia making a contorted form of "Mecastria."

Medals. From time immemorial loyalty has been rewarded by the conferring of land and titles of nobility, by the personal thanks of the sovereign, the presentation of medals, and the bestowal of knightly orders the insignia of which were hung on the breast of the recipient. With the Indian chief it was the same. At first he was supplied with copies of his own weapons, and then with the white man's implements of war when he had become accustomed to their use. Brass tomahawks especially were presented to the Indians. Tecumseh carried such a tomahawk in his belt when he was killed at the battle of the Thames, in Canada, and his chief warrior, John Naudee, removed it and the silver belt buckle from the body. There were also presented to the Indian chiefs silver hat-bands, chased and engraved with the royal arms; silver gorgets to be worn suspended from the neck and having the royal arms and emblems of peace engraved upon them; and silver belt buckles, many of which exceeded 3 in. in diameter. The potency of the medal was soon appreciated as a means of retaining the Indian's allegiance, in which it played a most important part. While gratifying the vanity of the recipient, it appealed to him as an emblem of fealty or of chieftainship, and in time had a place in the legends of the tribe.

The earlier medals issued for presentation to the Indians of North America have become extremely rare from various causes, chief among which was the change of government under which the Indian may have been living, as each government was extremely zealous in searching out all medals conferred by a previous one and substituting medals of its own. Another cause has been that within recent years Indians took their medals to the nearest silversmith to have them converted into gorgets and amulets. After the Revolution the United States replaced the English medals with its own, which led to the establishment of a regular series of Indian peace medals. Many of the medals presented to the North American Indians were not dated, and in many instances were struck for other purposes.

SPANISH MEDALS.—Early Spanish missionaries also presented medals to the Indians; these are often found in graves other service, by the early Catholic missionaries" (Betts, p. 32). One of these medals is as follows:

1682. Obverse, the Virgin Mary, standing on a crescent and clouds, surrounded by a rayed glory, in field 1682; legend, Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe Ora Pro Nobis, Mexico. Reverse, bust of San Francisco de Assisi in dress of a monk, a halo above; legend, Francisco Ora Pro Nobis. Brass and silver; size, 1½ by 1½ in.

In 1864 there was found at Prairie du Chien, Wis., in an Indian grave, a silver medal, now in possession of the Wisconsin Historical Society, "supposed to have been given to Huisconsin, a Sauk and Fox chief" (Betts, p. 239). This was one of the regular "service medals" awarded by Spain to members of her army.

Obverse, bust of king to left; legend, Carolus III Rey de España e de las Indias. Reverse, within a cactus wreath, Por Merito. Silver; size, 2½ in., with loop.

FRENCH CANADIAN MEDALS.—The earliest record of peace medals in connection with the Canadian Indians is found in Canada Correspondence General, vol. iv, in which mention is made of "a Caughnawaga chief, November 27, 1670, who holds preciously a medal presented to him by the king." Leroux (p. 14) includes a medal caused to be struck by Cardinal Richelieu in 1631 for presentation to Canadian Indians. A large medal was issued in France in commemoration of the reigning family; this example proved so acceptable to the Indians that a series of six, varying slightly in design and in size from 1½ to 3½ in., was issued for presentation to them. Very few of the originals are now known to exist, but many restrikes have been made from the dies in the Musée Monétaire at Paris.

1693. Obverse, head of the king to right, laureated; legend, Ludovicus Magnus Rex Christianissimus. Reverse, four busts in field; legend, Felicitas Domus Augustæ. Seren. Dolph, Lud. D. Burg. Phil D. Card. D. Bitur. M.D.C.X.CIII.

After the death of the Dolphin, in 1712, the reverse type was changed, two figures replacing the four busts of Louis, the Dauphin, and his two sons. Of this medal only restrikes are now known.

1711. Obverse, bust of king to right; legend, Ludovicus XIII, D. G. FR. NAV. REX. Reverse, two Roman warriors; legend, HONOR ET VIRTUS. Silver; bronze, size, 2½ in.

In the succeeding reign a smaller medal of similar design was issued, bearing on the obverse the head of the king to the right, draped and laureated; legend, Louis XV Rex Christianissimus. A copy of this medal has been found with the legend erased and George III stamped in its place (McLachlan, p. 9). Silver; bronze; size, 2 in.

The General De Levi medal of 1658, and that of the first Intendant-General of Canada, Jean Varin, of 1683, though included by Leroux (p. 15) among the

in those portions of the United States once occupied by the Spanish. Several of these medals were found at the old Cayuga mission in New York, established in 1657 for the Huron refugees among the Iroquois and discontinued 30 years later. "The medals are of a religious character, and are supposed to have been given, in recognition of religious zeal or peace medals, are excluded by Betts and other writers. Leroux (p. 17) figures the French Oswego medal of 1758 as belonging to the peace medal series. "As medals were freely distributed about this time, some of them may have been placed in Indian hands" (Beauchamp, p. 64).

1758. Obverse, head of king to left, nude and hair flowing; legend, Ludovicus XV Orbis Imperator; in exergue, 1758. Reverse, in field four forts; legend, West, Oswego, Fort Mahon; in exergue, Expung. St. Davidis Arce et Solo Equata. Silver; brass; size, 1½ in.

BRITISH MEDALS.—The earliest medals presented to American Indians by the English colonists are those known as the Pamunkey series. By Act 38, Laws of Virginia, in the 14th year of King Charles II, March, 1661 (see Henings's Statutes, II, 185), there were caused to be made, possibly in the colony, "silver and plated plaques to be worn by the Indians when visiting the English settlements." They were plain on the reverse, in order to permit the engraving of the names of the chiefs of the Indian towns.

1670. Obverse, bust of king to right; legend in outer circle, Charles II, King of England, Scotland, France, Ireland and Virginia; the center of the shield a slightly convex disk bearing the legend, the royal arms, and in one corner a tobacco plant. Encircled by ribbon of the Garter, below the disk in an oval surface, is the inscription: The Queen of Pumaunkey; above the disk a crown. Reverse, plain, with 5 rings attached for suspension. Silver; copper; oval; size, 4 by 6 in.

1670. Obverse, same as last; legend, Ye King of —. Reverse, a tobacco plant; legend, Piomock. Silver; copper; oval; size, 4 by 6 in.

In a proposal made by Robert Hunter, captain-general, etc., to the chief of the Five Nations, at Albany, Aug. 16, 1710, during the reign of Queen Anne, it is recorded: "Your brothers who have been in England and have seen the great Queen and her court, have no doubt informed you how vain and groundless the French boasting has been all along. Her Majesty has sent you as pledges of her protection a medal for each nation, with her royal effigies on one side and the last gained battle on the other. She has sent you her picture, in silver, twenty to each nation, to be given to the chief warriors, to be worn about their necks, as a token that they should always be in readiness to fight under her banner against the common enemy." This was probably the silver medal struck in 1709 in commemoration of the battle and capture of Tour-nay by the British.

arms and flags, a town in the distance; legend, Turnace Expurgato; in exergue, M.D.C.C.IX. Gold; silver; size, 1½ in.

A series of six medals was issued during the reigns of George I and George II, of similar design, in brass and copper; sizes, 1½ to 1¼ in. "The medals were not dated, and it is known that the later Georges used the same design" (Beauchamp, p. 27).

1758. Obverse, bust of king to left, laureated; legend, Georgius II, D. G. MAG. BRI. FRA. ET HIB. REX. F. D. Reverse, the royal arms, within the Garter, surmounted by a crown and a lion; upon ribbon, below, DIEU ET MON DROIT. Silver, cast and chased; size, 1½ in., with loop and ring.

The last was one of 30 medals brought from England in 1753 by Sir Danvers Osborne, governor of New York, for presentation to friendly Indians of the Six Nations. The medals were provided with broad scarlet ribbons (Hist. Mag., Sept. 1865, p. 85; Betts, p. 177).

In July, 1721, the governor of Pennsylvania presented to the Seneca chief, Ghosont, a gold coronation medal of George I, charging him "to deliver this piece into the hands of the first man or greatest chief of the Five Nations, whom you call Kannygoodt, to be laid up and kept as a token of friendship between them" (Hawkins, II, 426).

1721. Obverse, bust of king to right, laureated, hair long, and in scale armor, lion's head on breast and mantle; legend, Georgius. D. G. MAG. BRI. FR. ET HIB. REX.; on truncation, E. Hannibal. Reverse, the king seated, to right, beneath a canopy of state, is being crowned by Britannia, who rests her hand upon a shield; in exergue, INAUGURAT 11, Oct. MDCCXIII.

The following medal seems to have been a trader's token or store card, possibly given to the Indians to gain their good will:

1757. Obverse, a trader buying skins from an Indian; legend, The Red Man Came to Elton Daily. Reverse, a deer lying beneath a tree; legend, Skins bought at Eltons; in exergue, 1757 (Am. Jour. Numismat., VII, 90). Copper, size, 1½ in.

The first Indian peace medal manufactured in America is thought to have been the following. It was presented by The Friendly Association for the Regaining and Preserving Peace With the Indians by Pacific Means, a society composed largely of Quakers. The dies were engraved by Edward Duffield, a watch and clock maker of Philadelphia, and the medals were struck by Joseph Richardson, a member of the society. Many restrikes have been issued.

1757. Obverse, bust of the king to right, hair long and laureated; legend, Georgius II Dei Gratia.

Reverse, Indian and white man seated, a council fire between them; white man offers calumet and Indian extends hand for it; above Indian a rayed sun, back of white man a tree; legend, Let us Look to the Most High who Blessed our Fathers with Peace; in exergue, 1757. Silver; copper; pewter; size, 1½ in.

INDIAN PEACE MEDAL OF 1757

On the capture of Montreal by Sir Jeffrey Amherst, Sept. 8, 1760, an interesting series of medals, known as the conquest medals, was issued. McLachlan says they "were evidently made in America, and presented to the Iroquois and Onondagas, and other chiefs who assisted in the campaign." To each of the 23 chiefs, though they did but little fighting, was presented a medal by Sir William Johnson, who, in his diary, under date of July 21, 1761, says: "I then delivered the medals sent me by the General for those who went with us to Canada last year, being twenty-three in number." Beauchamp (p. 61) says: "In 1761 Johnson had similar medals for the Oneidas, but none of them have been found."

1760. Obverse, view of a town, with bastions, on a river front, five church spires, island in river; in foreground, to left, a bastion with flag of St George; in exergue, in an incused oval, D. C. F.; this side is cast and chased. Reverse, in field engraved, Montreal, remainder plain for insertion of name and tribe of the recipient. Silver; size, 1½ in. Pewter; size, 1½ in.

Beauchamp (p. 66) says: "Two medals, relating to the capture of Montreal and conquest of Canada, seem more likely to have been given by Johnson to the Indians in 1761. As the two medals have Indian symbols, and one Amherst's name, and that of Montreal, they seem to suit every way Johnson's lavish distribution of medals at Otsego, when sent by his leader."

Canada; behind her a beaver climbing up a bank; legend, Canada Subdued; in exergue, MDCC LX; below, S. P. A. C. Silver; bronze; size, 1½ in.

To commemorate the marriage of George III and Queen Charlotte a small special medal was struck, in 1761, for general distribution to insure the allegiance of the savages in the newly acquired province (McLachlan, p. 13).

1761. Obverse, bust of king and queen facing each other; above, a curtain with cords and tassels falling midway between the heads. Reverse, the royal arms, with ribbon of the Garter, and motto on ribbon below, Dieu et Mon Droit. Silver; size, 1½ in., pierced for suspension.

The following series of medals is supposed to have been struck for presentation to Indian chiefs in Canada at the close of the French and Indian wars. There were five in the series, differing in size and varying slightly in design; they were formed of two shells joined together; one of lead and others of pewter, with tracings of gilding, have been found.

In 1763 Pontiac rebelled against British rule, and the Government entered into treaty with the remaining friendly chiefs. A council was held at Niagara in 1764, at which time the series of three medals known as the "Pontiac conspiracy medals" was presented to the chiefs and principal warriors.

1764. Obverse, bust of king, to left, in armor and in very high relief, long hair tied with ribbon, laureated; legend, Georgius III. D. A. M. BRI. FRA. ET HIB. REX. F. D. Reverse, an officer and an Indian seated on a rustic bench in foreground; on the banks of a river, to right, three houses on a rocky point; at junction of river with ocean, two ships under full sail. The Indian holds in his left hand a calumet, with his right grasps the hand of the officer; at left of Indian, in the background, a tree, at right a mountain range; legend, Happy While United; in exergue, 1764. In field, stamped in two small incused circles, D. C. F. and N York. Silver; size, 3½ by 3½ in.; loop, a calumet and an eagle's wing.

In 1765 a treaty was made with the British and Pontiac, and his chiefs were presented by Sir William Johnson, at Oswego, with the medals known as "the lion and wolf medals." A large number of these were distributed, and two reverse dies have been found. The design represents the expulsion of France from Canada (see Parkman, Pontiac Conspiracy, chap. xxxi; Betts, p. 238; Leroy, p. 156; McLachlan, p. 13).

1766. Obverse, bust of king to right, in armor, wearing the ribbon of the Garter; legend, Georgius III Dei Gratia. Reverse, to left, the British lion reposing under a tree; to right, a snarling wolf; behind lion, a church and two houses; behind wolf, trees and bushes. Silver; size, 2½ in.

A large body of Indians assembled in general council at Montreal, Aug. 17, 1778, representing the Sioux, Sauk, Foxes, Menominee, Winnebago, Ottawa, Potawatomi, and Chippewa. It is generally supposed that at this time the presentation of the medals took place, in consideration of the assistance rendered the British in the campaigns of Kentucky and Illinois and during the War of the Revolution. Gen. Haldimand, commander in chief of the British forces in Canada, also gave a certificate with each medal (see Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., 1896; Betts, p. 284-286).

1778. Obverse, bust of king to right, wearing ribbon of the Garter. Reverse, the royal arms, surrounded by ribbon of the Garter and motto, surmounted by a crown, supported by the lion and the unicorn; at bottom ribbon, with motto, Dieu et Mon Droit; shield of pretense crowned. Silver; size, 2½ in., with loop for suspension.

The following medals were presented, until about the time of the war of 1812, to Indian chiefs for meritorious service, and continued in use possibly until replaced by those of 1814 (Leroux, p. 157):

1794. Obverse, bust of king to right, in armor, wearing ribbon of the Garter, hair long, cloak over shoulders; two laurel branches from bottom of medal to height of shoulders of bust; legend, Georgius III Dei Gratia; in exergue, 1794. Reverse, on plain field, the royal arms with supporters, surmounted by helmet and crest, encircled by ribbon of the Garter, and below ribbon and motto. Silver; size, 1½ in.

At the close of the war of 1812, the Government, desirous of marking its appreciation of the services rendered by its Indian allies, besides making other presents and grants of land, caused the following medal, in three sizes, to be struck in silver for presentation to the chiefs and principal warriors (Leroux, p. 158):

1814. Obverse, bust with older head of king to right, laureated, draped in an ermine mantle, secured in front with a large bow of ribbon, wearing the collar and jewel of St George; legend, Georgius III Dei Gratia Britanniarum Rex F. D.; under bust, T. Wyon, Jun. S. Reverse, the royal arms of Great Britain with shield of pretense of Hanover, surmounted by a crown and crested helmet, all encircled by ribbon of the Garter and supporters, below a ribbon with motto, Dieu et Mon Droit; above ribbon, a rose, thistle, and shamrock; behind helmet on both sides, a display of acanthus leaves; in exergue, 1814. Silver; size, 2½ to 4½ in.

The following medal, in three sizes, was struck in 1840 for participants in the early treaties of the Queen's reign. It is possible that it may have been presented also to the Indians of Lower Canada who took no part in the abortive uprising of 1837 (McLachlan, p. 36; Leroux, p. 161):

F. D.; under neck W. Wyon, E. A. Reverse, arms of Great Britain, surmounted by crown and crested helmet, encircled by ribbon of the Garter, supported by the lion and the unicorn; below, ribbon with motto, Dieu et Mon Droit, the rose and thistle; in exergue, 1840. Silver; sizes, 2½ to 4½ in.

The medal known as the Ashburton treaty medal was given through Lord Ashburton, in 1842, to the Micmac and other eastern Indians for services as guards and hunters, and assistance in laying out the boundary between the United States and Canada.

1842. Obverse, bust of queen in an inner dentilated circle, garland of roses around psyche knot; under bust, B. Wyon; no legend. Reverse, arms of Great Britain in an inner circle, surmounted by a crowned and crested helmet, encircled by the ribbon of the Garter; legend, Victoria Dei Gratia Britanniarum Regina Fid. Def. Ribbon in lower field backed by the rose and thistle (Betts, p. 159). Silver; size, 2½ in.

In 1848 the Peninsular War medal was issued, to be given to any officer, non-commissioned officer, or soldier who had participated in any battle or siege from 1793 to 1814. In general orders, dated Horse Guards, June 1, 1847, were included the battles of Chateaugay, Oct. 26, 1813, and of Chrystlers Farm, Nov. 11, 1813, covering the invasion of Canada by the American army in 1813. "The medal was also conferred upon the Indians, the name of the battles engraved on clasps, and the name of the recipient on the edge of the medal, with title of warrior" (Leroux, p. 177).

The Prince of Wales on his visit to Canada in 1860 was received by Indians in full ceremonial dress. Each chief was presented with a large silver medal, while the warriors received smaller medals. This medal is known as the Prince of Wales medal.

In 1860, when the Government had acquired the lands of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory and after the extinction of the Indian land titles, the following medal was presented to the Indians under Treaty No. 1. In the Report of the Commissioners it is stated: "In addition each Indian received a dress, a flag, and a medal as marks of distinction." These medals at first were not struck for this occasion.

1860. Obverse, head of the queen to right, crowned; legend, Victoria Regina; under bust, J. S. and B. Wyon, S. C. Reverse, two branches of oak, center field plain for the engraving of name and tribe of recipient. Silver; size, $3\frac{1}{2}$ in.

The very large Confederation medal of 1867, with an extra rim soldered on it, was used in 1872 for Treaty No. 2. It was presented to the Indians subsequent to the acquisition of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory, at which time the Indian titles were extinguished. "Twenty-five were prepared, but found so cumbersome no more were used" (Leroux, p. 219).

1872. Obverse, bust of queen to right, within an inner circle having milled edge ground, with veil and necklace; legend, Dominion of Canada; below, Chief's Medal, 1872; below bust, S. Wyon. Reverse, in inner circle Britannia seated with lion and four female figures, representing the four original provinces of the Canadian confederation; legend, Jureatus et Patrius Vigor (Canada Instaurata, 1867); in outer circle, Indians of the North West Territories. Silver; bronze; size, $3\frac{1}{2}$ in.

The following medal was struck especially to replace the large and inartistic medal last described, and was intended for presentation at future treaties:

1873. Obverse, head of queen to right, crowned with veil and necklace; legend, Victoria D. G. Britt. REG. F. D.; below bust, J. S. Wyon. Reverse, a general officer in full uniform, to right, grasping the hand of an Indian chief who wears a feather headdress and leggings; pipe of peace at feet of figures; in background, at back of Indian, several wigwags; back of officer, a half sun above horizon; legend, Indian Treaty No. —, on lower edge, 187—. Silver; size, 3 in., with loop for suspension.

A series of three medals was struck by the Hudson's Bay Company for presentation to the Indians of the great Northwest for faithful services. These were engraved by G. H. Kuchler of the Birmingham mint, 1790 to 1805.

1793. Obverse, bust of king to left, long hair and draped; legend, Georgius III D. G. Britanniarum Rex Fidei. Def.: under bust, G. H. K. Reverse, arms of the Hudson's Bay Company: argent, a cross gules, four beavers proper, to the left, surmounted by a helmet and crest, a fox supported by two stags; motto on ribbon, Pro Felle Culem (Leroux, p. 59). Silver; sizes, $1\frac{1}{2}$ by 3 in.

MEDALS OF THE UNITED STATES.—The earliest known Indian medal struck within the United States is that of 1780, as follows:

1780. Obverse, arms of Virginia; legend, Rebellion to Tyrants is Obedience to God. Reverse, an officer and an Indian seated under a tree, the Indian holding a calumet in his hand; in the background, a sea on which are three ships, in the middle-ground, a rocky point and a house; legend, Happy White United. Silver; pewter; size, $2\frac{1}{2}$ in.; loop, a calumet and an eagle's wing.

The pewter medal presented by the Government to the Indians represented at the Ft Harmar treaty in Ohio, in 1789, bears on the obverse the bust of Washington with full face, and on the reverse the clasped hands and crossed calumet and tomahawk, with the date 1789, and legend, Friendship, the Pipe of Peace. The tribes present at the treaty were the Ottawa, Delawares, Hurons, Sauk, Potawatomi, and Chippewa.

Of the early United States medals possibly the most interesting is that known as the Red Jacket medal, presented to this celebrated Seneca by Washington at Philadelphia in 1792. This was one of several similar medals, one of which is dated 1793. Of it Loubat says: "The medals were made at the United States Mint when Dr Rittenhouse was director, 1792-1795." See Red Jacket.

1792. Obverse, Washington in uniform, bareheaded, facing to the right, presenting a pipe to an Indian chief, who is smoking it; the Indian is standing, and has a large medal suspended from his neck. On the left is a pine tree, at its foot a toma-hawk; in the background, a farmer plowing; in exergue, George Washington President 1792—all engraved. Reverse, arms and crest of the United States on the breast of the eagle, in the right talon of which is an olive branch, in the left a sheaf of arrows, in its beak a ribbon with the motto E Pluribus Unum; above, a glory breaking through the clouds and surrounded by 13 stars. Size, $6\frac{1}{2}$ by $4\frac{1}{2}$ in.

In the Greenville treaty of 1795, between the United States and representatives of the Hurons, Delawares, Ottawa, Chippewa, Potawatomi, Sauk, and other tribes, a part of the function, as usual, involved the presentation of peace medals. The medal in this case was a facsimile of the oval Red Jacket medal, in silver, engraved and chased, with a change in the date to 1795. Size, 4 by 6 in. As there were many signers, a considerable number of these medals must have been distributed.

During the second administration of Washington, in 1796, there was issued a series of four medals, in silver and bronze, called "the Season medals," which Snowden (p. 95) states were Indian peace medals. These are as follows:

1796. No. 1. Obverse, a shepherd with staff in left hand, and a cow, two sheep, and a lamb in foreground; in background, a hill, tree, and farmhouse with open door, in which two persons are seen; on base, C. H. Kuchler, F.; in exergue, U. S. A. Reverse, legend in five parallel lines, Second Presidency of George Washington MDCCLXVI, within a wreath of olive branches; in bow, the letter K. Size, 1½ in.

No. 2. Obverse, interior of a room: in background, a woman; in foreground, a woman spinning; at left a child guarding a cradle, on right an open fireplace; on base, C. H. K. F.; in exergue, U. S. A. Reverse, same as No. 1.

No. 3. Obverse, in foreground, farmer sowing; in background, a farmhouse and a man plowing; on base, Kuchler; in exergue, U. S. A. Reverse, same as No. 1.

No. 4. Obverse, bust of Washington in uniform, to left, in a wreath of laurel; legend, In War Enemies. Reverse, bust of Franklin, to left, in wreath of laurel; legend, In Peace Friends. Tin; size, 1 in.

"Of the medals taken along and of which use was made by the explorers [Lewis and Clark] there were three sizes, or grades, one, the largest and preferred one, 'a medal with the likeness of the President of the United States'; the second, 'a medal representing some domestic animals'; the third, 'medals with the impression of a farmer sowing grain'. I have found in 'The Northwest Coast,' by James G. Swan, a cut of a medal of the third class, but I have seen no representation of the second class. The third class medal was made of pewter. These medals were given to chiefs only" (Wheeler, Trail of Lewis and Clark, 139-140).

The following were struck especially for presentation to Indian chiefs, and had their inception, Apr. 20, 1786, when Representative McKean moved "that the Board of the Treasury ascertain the number and value of the medals received by the Commission appointed to treat with the Indians, from the said Indians, and have an equal number with the arms of the United States, made in silver and returned to the chiefs, from whom they were received." The result was the final adoption of a series of medals, each bearing on the obverse the bust of a President, and on the reverse a symbol of peace. This series began with the administration of President Jefferson. The John Adams medal was made many years after his administration, and though not so considered at first, it is now regarded as included in the series. At the time of the first issue, however, a die was made for the obverse of the Adams medal. The reverse used was that of the smaller Jefferson medal; a few were struck in soft metal, which are now exceedingly rare.

Obverse, bust of president to right, clothed, hair in curls and cue; legend, John Adams, Pres. U. S. A.; on truncation, Leonard. Reverse, two hands clasped, on cuff of one three stripes and as many buttons with displayed eagle; the other wrist has a bracelet with spread-eagle; legend, Peace and Friendship, and crossed calumet and tomahawk.

The medal of Adams now used is practically the same, except the arrangement of the face, and the legend, John Adams, President of the United States; in exergue, A. D. 1797; in truncation, Furst. Reverse, the same as last. Bronze; size, 2 in.

The Jefferson medal is as follows:

Obverse, bust of president to right; legend, Th. Jefferson, President of the U. S. A. D. 1801. Reverse, same as last. Silver and bronze; sizes, 4 in., 2½ in., 2 in.

The medals that followed were the same in design, metal, and size, with the names of the respective Presidents, until the administration of Millard Fillmore, in 1850, when the reverse was entirely changed, as follows:

THE JEFFERSON MEDAL OF 1801

An Indian in war dress and a pioneer in foreground, the latter leaning on a plow; to right a hill, in center background a river and a sailing boat; to left two cows beyond a farmhouse; American flag back of the figures; legend, Labor, Virtue, Honor; in exergue, J. Wilson, F. Silver and bronze; size, 3 in.

During the next two administrations this type was retained, but in 1862, during the administration of Abraham Lincoln, another change in the reverse was made:

In field, an Indian plowing, children playing at ball, a hill and a log cabin and a church; a river with boats and ships in background; in an outer circle, following curve of medal, an Indian scalping another; below, an Indian woman weeping, a quiver of arrows with bow and calumet. Silver and bronze; size, 2½ in.

The reverse was again changed during the administration of Andrew Johnson, as follows:

Figure of America clasping the hand of an Indian in war dress, before a monument surmounted by a bust of George Washington; at feet of Indian are the attributes of savage life; at feet of America those of civilization. Silver and bronze; size, 2½ in.

The medal issued during the administration of President Grant was entirely different:

Obverse, bust of president within a wreath of laurel; legend, United States of America, Liberty, Justice and Equality; below, Let us have peace, a calumet and a branch of laurel. Reverse, a globe resting on implements of industry with the Bible above and rays behind it; legend, On earth peace, good will toward men.

In 1877, during the administration of President Hayes, change was made to an oval medal:

No change was made in size or type until the administration of Benjamin Harrison, when the old round form of medal was resumed:

Obverse, bust of president to right, draped; legend, Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States, 1889. Reverse, two hands clasped, crossed calumet and tomahawk; legend, Peace and Friendship. Sizes, 3 in., 2½ in., 2 in.

This medal was continued to the administration of President Roosevelt.

The issuance of peace medals was not confined to the governments, as the various fur companies also presented to Indian chiefs medals of various kinds and in various metals, as, for example, the medals of the Hudson's Bay Company from 1790 to 1805, above described. The Chouteau Fur Company, of St Louis, caused to be given by its agents in the N. W. the following:

Obverse, bust of Pierre Chouteau, to left, clothed; legend, Pierre Chouteau, Jr., & Co., Upper Missouri Outfit. Reverse, in field, crossed tomahawk and calumet, and clasped hands; legend, Peace and Friendship, 1813. Silver; size, 3½ in.

Medfield. In 1677 there was a settlement of Christian Indians (perhaps Nipmuc) at this place, in Norfolk co., Mass.—Gookin (1677) in Drake, Bk. Inds., bk. 2, 115, 1848.

Medicine and Medicine-men. Medicine is an agent or influence employed to prevent, alleviate, or cure some pathological condition or its symptoms. The scope of such agents among the Indians was extensive, ranging, as among other primitive peoples, from magic, prayer, force of suggestion, and a multitude of symbolic and empirical means, to actual and more rationally used remedies. Where the Indians are in contact with whites the old methods of combating physical ills are slowly giving way to the curative agencies of civilization. The white man in turn has adopted from the Indians a number of valuable medicinal plants, such as cinchona, jalapa, hydrastis, etc.

In general the tribes show many similarities in regard to medicine, but the actual agents employed differ with the tribes and localities, as well as with individual healers. Magic, prayers, songs, exhortation, suggestion, ceremonies, fetishes, and certain specifics and mechanical processes are employed only by the medicine-men or medicine-women; other specific remedies or procedures are proprietary, generally among a few old women in the tribe; while many vegetal remedies and simple manipulations are of common knowledge in a given locality.

The employment of magic consists in opposing a supposed malign influence, such as that of a sorcerer, spirits of the dead, mythic animals, etc., by the supernatural power of the healer's fetishes and other means. Prayers are addressed to benevolent deities and spirits, invoking their aid. Healing songs, consisting of prayers or exhortations, are sung. Harangues are directed to evil spirits supposed to cause the sickness, and often are accentuated by noises to frighten such spirits away. Suggestion is exercised in many ways directly and indirectly. Curative ceremonies usually combine all or most of the agencies mentioned. Some of them, such as Matthews describes among the Navaho, are very elaborate, prolonged, and costly. The fetishes used are peculiarly shaped stones or wooden objects, lightning-riven wood, feathers, claws, hair, figurines of mythic animals, representations of the sun, of lightning, etc., and are supposed to embody a mysterious power capable of preventing disease or of counteracting its effects. Mechanical means of curing consist of rubbing, pressure with the hands or feet, or with a sash or cord (as in labor or in painful affections of the chest), bonesetting, cutting, cauterizing, scarifying, cupping (by sucking), blood-letting, poulticing, clysmata, sweat bath, sucking of snake poison or abscesses, counter irritation, tooth pulling, bandaging, etc. Dieting and total abstinence from food were forms of treatment in vogue in various localities. Vegetable medicines were, and in some tribes still are, numerous. Some of these are employed by reason of a real or fancied resemblance to the part affected, or as fetishes, because of a supposed mythical antagonism to the cause of the sickness. Thus, a plant with a worm-like stem may be given as a vermifuge; one that has many hair-like processes is used among the Hopi to cure baldness. Among the Apache the sacred tule pollen known as ha-dn-tin is given or applied because of its supposed supernatural beneficial effect. Other plants are employed as remedies simply for traditional reasons, without any formulated opinion as to their modes of action. Finally, all the tribes are familiar with and employ cathartics and emetics; in some cases also diaphoretics, diuretics, cough medicines, etc. Every tribe has also knowledge of some of the poisonous plants in its neighborhood and their antidotes.

The parts of plants used as medicines are most often roots, occasionally twigs, leaves, or bark, but rarely flowers or seeds. They are used either fresh or dry, and most commonly in the form of a decoction. Of this a considerable quantity, as much as a cupful, is administered at a time, usually in the morning. Only exceptionally is the dose repeated. Generally only a single plant is used, but among some Indians as many as four plants are combined in a single medicine; some of the Opatas mix indiscriminately a large number of substances. The proprietary medicines are sold at a high price. Some of these plants, so far as they are known, possess real medicinal value, but many are quite useless for the purpose for which they are prescribed. There is a prevalent belief that the Indians are acquainted with valuable specifics for venereal diseases, snake bites, etc., but how far this belief may be true has not yet been shown.

Animal and mineral substances are also occasionally used as remedies. Among Southwestern tribes the bite of a snake is often treated by applying to the wound a portion of the ventral surface of the body of the same snake. The Papago use crickets as medicine; the Tarahumare, lizards; the Apache, spiders' eggs. Among the Navaho and others red ochre combined with fat is used externally to prevent sunburn. The red, barren clay from beneath a campfire is used by White Mountain Apache women to induce sterility;

the Hopi blow charcoal, ashes, or other products of fire on an inflamed surface to counteract the supposed fire which causes the ailment. Antiseptics are unknown, but some of the cleansing agents or healing powders employed probably serve as such, though undesignedly on the part of the Indians.

The exact manner of therapeutic action is as absolutely unknown to the Indian as it is to the ignorant white man. Among some tribes the term for medicine signifies "mystery," but among others a distinction is made between thaumaturgic practices and actual medicines. Occasionally the term "medicine" is extended to a higher class of greatly prized fetishes that are supposed to be imbued with mysterious protective power over an individual or even over a tribe (see Orenda). Such objects form the principal contents of the so-called medicine-bags.

In many localities there was prepared on special occasions a tribal "medicine." The Iroquois used such a remedy for healing wounds, and the Hopi still prepare one on the occasion of their Snake dance. Among the tribes who prepare tiswin, or tesvino, particularly the Apache, parts of a number of bitter, aromatic, and even poisonous plants, especially a species of datura, are added to the liquid to make it "stronger"; these are termed medicines.

The causation and the nature of disease being to the Indian in large part mysteries, he assigned them to supernatural agencies. In general, every illness that could not plainly be connected with a visible influence was regarded as the effect of an introduction into the body, by malevolent or offended supernatural beings or through sorcery practised by an enemy, of noxious objects capable of producing and continuing pain or other symptoms, or of absorbing the patient's vitality. These beliefs, and the more rational ones concerning many minor indispositions and injuries, led to the development of separate forms of treatment, and varieties of healers.

In every Indian tribe there were, and in some tribes still are, a number of men, and perhaps also a number of women, who were regarded as the possessors of supernatural powers that enabled them to recognize, antagonize, or cure disease; and there were others who were better acquainted with actual remedies than the average. These two classes were the "physicians." They were oftentimes distinguished in designation and differed in influence over the people as well as in responsibilities. Among the Dakota one was called wakan witshasha, 'mystery man', the other pejihuta witshasha, 'grass-root man'; among the Navaho one is khathali, 'singer', 'chanter', the other izélini, 'maker of medicines'; among the Apache one is taiyin, 'wonderful', the other simply izé, 'medicine.'

The mystery man, or thaumaturgist, was believed to have obtained from the deities, usually through dreams, but sometimes before birth, powers of recognizing and removing the mysterious causes of disease. He was "given" appropriate songs or prayers, and became possessed of one or more powerful fetiches. He announced or exhibited these attributes, and after convincing his tribesmen that he possessed the proper requirements, was accepted as a healer. In some tribes he was called to treat all diseases, in others his functions were specialized, and his treatment was regarded as efficacious in only a certain line of affections. He was feared as well as respected. In numerous instances the medicine-man combined the functions of a shaman or priest with those of a healer, and thus exercised a great influence among his people. All priests were believed to possess some healing powers. Among most of the populous tribes the medicine-men of this class were associated in guilds or societies, and on special occasions performed great healing or "life (vitality) giving" ceremonies, which abounded in songs, prayers, ritual, and drama, and extended over a period of a few hours to nine days.

The ordinary procedure of the medicine-man was about as follows: He inquired into the symptoms, dreams, and transgressions of tabus of the patient, whom he examined, and then pronounced his opinion as to the nature (generally mythical) of the ailment. He then prayed, exhorted, or sang, the last, perhaps, to the accompaniment of a rattle; made passes with his hand, sometimes moistened with saliva, over the part affected; and finally placed his mouth over the most painful spot and sucked hard to extract the immediate principle of the illness. This result he apparently accomplished, often by means of sleight-of-hand, producing the offending cause in the shape of a thorn, pebble, hair, or other object, which was then thrown away or destroyed; finally he administered a mysterious powder or other tangible "medicine," and perhaps left also a protective fetich. There were many variations of this method, according to the requirements of the case, and the medicine-man never failed to exercise as much mental influence as possible over his patient. For these services the healer was usually well compensated. If the case would not yield to the simpler treatment, a healing ceremony might be resorted to. If all means failed, particularly in the case of internal diseases or of adolescents or younger adults, the medicine-man often suggested a witch or wizard as the cause, and the designation of some one as the culprit frequently placed his life in jeopardy. If the medicine-man lost several patients in succession, he himself might be suspected either of having been deprived of his supernatural power or of having become a sorcerer, the penalty for which was usually death.

These shaman healers as a rule were shrewd and experienced men; some were sincere, noble characters, worthy of respect; others were charlatans to a greater or less degree. They are still to be found among the less civilized tribes, but are diminishing in number and losing their influence. Medicine-women of this class were found among the Apache and some other tribes.

The most accomplished of the medicine-men practised also a primitive surgery, and aided, by external manipulation and otherwise, in difficult labor. The highest surgical achievement, undoubtedly practised in part at least as a curative method, was trephining. This operation was of common occurrence and is still practised in Peru, where it reached its highest development among American tribes. Trephining was also known in quite recent times among the Tarahumare of Chihuahua, but has never been found north of Mexico.

The other class of medicine men and women corresponds closely to the herbalists and the old-fashioned rural midwives among white people. The women predominated. They formed no societies, were not so highly respected or so much feared as those of the other class, were not so well compensated, and had less responsibility. In general they used much more common sense in their practice, were acquainted with the beneficial effects of sweating, poulticing, moxa, scarification, various manipulations, and numerous vegetal remedies, such as purgatives, emetics, etc. Some of these medicine-women were frequently summoned in cases of childbirth, and sometimes were of material assistance.

Besides these two chief classes of healers there existed among some tribes large medicine societies, composed principally of patients cured of serious ailments. This was particularly the case among the Pueblos. At Zúñi there still exist several such societies, whose members include the greater part of the tribe and whose organization and functions are complex. The ordinary members are not actual healers, but are believed to be more competent to assist in the particular line of diseases which are the specialty of their society and therefore may be called by the actual medicine-men for assistance. They participate also in the ceremonies of their own society. See Anatomy, Artificial Head Deformation, Health and Disease, Physiology.

Meggeckessou. Mentioned as if a Delaware village in 1659. The editor of the New York Colonial Documents locates it at Trenton Falls, N. J., on Delaware r. Meghecksjouw.—Hudde (1662) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., XII, 370, 1877. Meggecksjouw.—Beeckman (1663), ibid., 446. Meggeckessou.—Beeckman (1659), ibid., 255.

Mehashunga (Me-hā-shun'-gā, 'duck'). A Kansa gens.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 156, 1877.

Meherrin. An Iroquoian tribe formerly residing on the river of the same name on the Virginia-North Carolina border. Jefferson confounded them with the Tutelo. According to official colonial documents they were a remnant of the Conestoga or Susquehanna of upper Maryland, dispersed by the Iroquois about 1675, but this also is incorrect, as they are found noted under the name "Menheyricks" in the census of Virginia Indians in 1669, at which time they numbered 50 bowmen, or approximately 180 souls (Neill, Virginia, Carolorum, 326, 1886). It is possible that the influx of refugee Conestoga a few years later may have so overwhelmed the remnant of the original tribe as to give rise to the impression that they were all of Conestoga blood. They were commonly regarded as under the jurisdiction of Virginia, although their territory was claimed also by Carolina. They were closely cognate with the Nottoway, q. v. (J. M.)

Mé'-ko'-i'.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 174, 1877. Mikowa.—J. D. Prince, inf'n, 1905 (modern St Francis Abnaki form).

Meipontsky. A former tribe of piedmont Virginia, probably of Siouan stock, incorporated about 1700 with the Christians Indians. See Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894. Meipontsky.—Albany conf. (1722) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., v, 673, 1855. Meipontsky.—Byrd, Hist. Div. Line, II, 257, 1866.

Mejia. A hacienda 5 leagues below Isleta, N. Mex., on the Rio Grande, in 1692. At this date it probably contained a few Piro, or perhaps some Tigua from Isleta.—Vargas (1692) quoted by Davis, Span. Conq. N. Mex., 351, 1869; Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 200, 1889.

Mekadewagamitigweyawininiwak (Mä'-kādēwāgāmī'ūgēyā-wīnīnīwūg, 'people of the black water river.'—W. J.). A Chipewa band formerly living on Black r., S. E. Mich.

Black-River band.—Washington treaty (1836) in U. S. Ind. Treat., 227, 1873. Mā'kadiwagami tigwāyā-winiiniwag.—Wm. Jones, inf'n, 1906. Mekadewagami tigwāyā-winiiniwak.—Gatschet, Ojibwa MS., B. A. E., 1882. Wakaseo.—Smith in Ind. Aff. Rep., 53, 1851.

Mekewe. A former Chumashan village near Santa Inez, Santa Barbara co., Cal.—Taylor in Cal. Farmer, May 4, 1860.

Mekiohantun (Mē-ki-ictān-tūn). A former village of the Chastacosta on Rogue r., Ore.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 234, 1890 (given as a gens').

Mekumth (Mē-kūmth, 'long tree moss'). A former Alsea village, the highest on the n. side of Alsea r., Ore.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, III, 230, 1890.

Melajo. A Diegueño rancheria near San Diego, s. Cal.; probably identical with "Mileotonac, San Felipe," which was represented in the treaty of Santa Isabel in 1852.

Melajé.—Ortega (1775) quoted by Bancroft, Nat. Races, I, 253, 1884. Mielo-to-nae, San Felipe.—H. R. Ex. Doc. 76, 34th Cong., 3d sess. 132, 1857.

Meletocunk. Given as the name of a Delaware tribe formerly on the coast of New Jersey. Proud in 1798 applies this name to Metedeconk r. in Ocean co.

Meletocunk.—Macaulay, N. Y., II, 293, 1829. Melech-kongy.—De Laet (ca. 1683) in N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., I, 315, 1841.

Melona. A Timucuan village on the s. bank of lower St Johns r., Fla., in the 16th century.—De Bry, Brev. Nar., II, map, 1591.

Melosikakat. A Yukonikhotana village of 30 inhabitants, on Melozikakat r., a n. affluent of the Yukon, Alaska.—Petroff in 10th Census, Alaska, 12, 1884.

Melukits. A Kusan village or tribe on the n. side of Coos bay, coast of Oregon. Probably the village most often referred to by writers.—Milhau, Coos bay MS. vocab., B. A. E.; also MS. letter to Gibbs, B. A. E.

Melungeon. See Croatan Indians.

Memkumlis ('islands in front'). A village of the Mamalelekala and Koeksotenok, on Villageids, at the mouth of Knight inlet, Brit. Col.; pop. 215 in 1885.

Mēm-koom-liah.—Dawson in Trans. Roy. Soc. Can. for 1887, sec. II, 65. Memkumlis.—Boas in Bull. Am. Geog. Soc., 227, 1887.

Memoggyina (Mēmoggyn's, 'having salmon traps'). A gens of the Koeksotenok, a Kwakiutl tribe.—Boas in Rep. Nat. Mus. for 1895, 330.

Memramcook (same as amlamkook, 'variegated'). Mentioned by Rand (First Reading Book in Micmac, 81, 1875) as one of the 7 districts of the Micmac country. Memramcook.—Alcedo, Dic. Geog., III, 147, 1788.

Menacupunt. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on Pamunkey r., King William co., Va.—Smith (1629), Virginia, I, map, repr. 1819.

Menaskunt. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on the n. bank of Rappahannock r., Richmond co., Va.—

Smith (1629), Virginia, I, map, repr. 1819.

Menatonon. A chief, in 1585-86, of the Chowanoc (q. v.), an Algonquian tribe formerly living in n. e. North Carolina, but now extinct. He was prominent during the time that Ralph Layne was in charge of the party sent out by Sir Walter Raleigh to establish a colony, and was one of the chiefs from whom Layne obtained most of his information regarding the country visited, Menatonon being made a prisoner a few days for the purpose. This knowledge of the new country is included in the report sent to Raleigh. According to Layne (Hakluyt, Voy., III, 312, 1810), Menatonon was lame, but for a savage was very grave and wise, and well acquainted not only with his own territory but with the surrounding regions and their productions. It is probable that he died soon after Layne's visit, as John White, who was in the country two years later, mentions his wife and child as belonging to Croatan, but says nothing of him. (C. T.)

Menawzhetaunung. An Ottawa village, about 1818, on an island in the Lake of the Woods, on the s. boundary of Manitoba, Canada. (J. M.)

Me-nau-zhe-tau-naung.—Tanner, Narr., 202, 1830.

Me-nau-zhe-taw-naun.—Ibid., 198. Me-naw-zhe-ta-naung.—Ibid., 236.

Menché. Apparently a former Cochimi rancheria in Lower California, not far from Concho bay, on the gulf coast.—Doc. Hist. Mex. 4th s., v, 66, 1857.

Mendica. A tribe, met by Cabeza de Vaca during the earlier part of his stay in Texas (1527-34), that lived "in the rear," i. e., inland. Nothing further is known of it. The country mentioned was probably occupied by Karankawan tribes, which are now extinct. See Cabeza de Vaca, Smith trans., 84, 1851; Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., 46, 1891. (A. C. F.)

Menemesseg. A rendezvous of Nipmuc, Narraganset, and other hostile Indians in 1676, during King Philip's war, near New Braintree, Worcester co., Mass.

Menenquen. An unidentified tribe or band represented at the mission of San Antonio de Valero, Texas, between 1740 and 1750. They allied in their gentile state with the Caguas (Cavas?) and Sijames, who were related to the Emets and Sanas. There is some indication that they were from the middle or lower Guadalupe country. Some words of their language are preserved (Manzanet, 1690, in Texas Hist. Ass'n Quar., II, 309, 1899;

Menewa ('great warrior'). A half-breed Creek, second chief of the Lower Creek towns on Tallapoosa r., Ala.; born about 1765. He was noted for trickery and daring in early life, when he was known as Hothlepoysa ('crazy war hunter') and annually crossed the Cumberland to rob the white settlers in Tennessee of their horses. A murder committed in his neighborhood was charged to his band, and the people of Georgia burned one of their towns in revenge. It was suspected that MacIntosh had instigated the murder for the very purpose of stirring up trouble between the whites and his rival. When Tecumseh came to form a league against the white people, Menewa, foreseeing that MacIntosh with American aid and support would attack him in any event, readily joined in the conspiracy. He began the Creek war and was the war chief of his people, the head chief of the tribe being a medicine-man. Relying on a prophecy of the latter, Menewa made a wrong disposition of his men at the battle of the Horseshoe Bend, Gen. Jackson quickly discerning the vulnerable point in the Indian defenses. Menewa slew the false prophet with his own hand before dashing at the head of his warriors from the breastworks, already breached by the American cannon, into the midst of the Tennesseans, who were advancing to the assault. Of 900 warriors 830 were killed, and all the survivors, save one, were wounded. Menewa, left for dead on the field, revived in the night and, with other survivors, reached the hidden camp in the swamps where the women and children were waiting. The men on their recovery made their submission individually. Menewa's village was destroyed and his wealth in horses and cattle, peltry, and trade goods had disappeared. After his wounds were healed he reassumed authority over the remnant of his band and was in later years the leader of the party in the Creek Nation which opposed further cession of land to the whites and made resistance to their encroachments. MacIntosh counseled acquiescence in the proposal to deport the whole tribe beyond the Mississippi, and when for this he was condemned as a traitor, Menewa was reluctantly persuaded to execute the death sentence.

In 1826 he went with a delegation to Washington to protest against the treaty by which MacIntosh and his confederates, representing about one-tenth of the nation, had at Indian Spring, Jan. 8, 1821, presumed to cede to the United States the fertile Creek country. He proposed, in ceding the Creek country to the Government for white settlement, to reserve some of the land to be allotted in severalty to such of the nation as chose to remain on their native soil rather than to emigrate to a strange region. Through his advocacy the Government was induced to parcel some of the land among the Creeks who were desirous and capable of subsisting by agriculture, to be held in fee simple after a probationary term of five years. An arbitrary method of allotment deprived Menewa of his own farm and, as the one that he drew was undesirable, he sold it and bought other land in Alabama. When some of the Creeks became involved in the Seminole war of 1836, he led his braves against the hostiles. In consideration of his services he obtained permission to remain in his native land, but nevertheless was transported with his people beyond the Mississippi.

Menhaden. A fish of the herring family (Alosa menhaden), known also as bonyfish, mossbunker, hardhead, pauhagen, etc., found in the Atlantic coast waters from Maine to Maryland. The name is derived from the Narraganset dialect of Algonquian. Roger Williams (1643) calls munnawhattenug a "fish like a herring," the word being really plural and signifying, according to Trumbull (Natick Dict., 69, 1903), 'they manure.' The reference is to the Indian custom of using these fish as manure for cornfields, which practice the aborigines of New England transmitted to the European colonists. Menhaden is thus a corruption of the Narraganset term for this fish, munnawhat, 'the fertilizer.' See Pogy. (A. F. C.)

Meniolagomeka. A former Delaware or Munsee village on Aquashicola cr., Carbon co., Pa. In 1754 the inhabitants, or part of them, joined the Moravian converts at New Gnadenhuetten in the same county. (J. M.)

Menominee (meno, by change from mino, 'good', 'beneficent'; min, a 'grain', 'seed', the Chippewa name of the wild rice.—Hewitt. Full name Menominiwok ininiwok, the latter term signifying 'they are men'). An Algonquian tribe, the members of which, according to Dr William Jones, claim to understand Sauk, Fox, and Kickapoo far more easily than they do Chippewa, Ottawa, and Potawatomi, hence it is possible that their linguistic relation is near to the former group of Algonquians. Grignon (Wis. Hist. Soc.

adopted after the latter reached their historic seat; it is possible they were previously known as Noquet. Charlevoix (Jour. Voy., II, 61, 1761) says: "I have been assured that they had the same original and nearly the same languages with the Noquet and the Indians at the Falls."

The people of this tribe, so far as known, were first encountered by the whites when Nicolet visited them, probably in 1634, at the mouth of Menominee r., Wis.-Mich. In 1671, and henceforward until about 1852, their home was on or in the vicinity of Menominee r., not far from where they were found by Nicolet, their settlements extending at times to Fox r. They have generally been at peace with the whites. A succinct account of them, as well as a full description of their manners, customs, arts, and beliefs, by Dr W. J. Hoffman, appears in the 14th Rep. Bureau of Ethnology, 1896. In their treaty with the United States, Feb. 8, 1831, they claimed as their possession the land from the mouth of Green bay to the mouth of Milwaukee r., and on the west side of the bay from the height of land between it and L. Superior to the headwaters of Menominee and Fox rs., which claim was granted. They now reside on a reservation near the head of Wolf r., Wis.

Major Pike described the men of the tribe as "straight and well made, about the middle size; their complexions generally fair for savages, their teeth good, their eyes large and rather languishing; they have a mild but independent expression of countenance that charms at first sight." Although comparatively indolent, they are described as generally honest, theft being less common than among many other tribes. Drunkenness was their most serious fault, but even this did not prevail to the same extent as among some other Indians. Their beliefs and rituals are substantially the same as those of the Chippewa. They have usually been peaceful in character, seldom coming in contact with the Sioux, but bitter enemies of the neighboring Algonquian tribes. They formerly disposed of their dead by inclosing the bodies in long pieces of birchbark, or in slats of wood, and burying them in shallow graves. In order to protect the body from wild beasts, three logs were placed over the grave, two directly on the grave, and the third on these, all being secured by stakes driven on each side. Tree burial was occasionally practised.

The Menominee—as their name indicates—subsisted in part on wild rice (Zizania aquatica); in fact it is spoken of by early writers as their chief vegetal food. Although making such constant

AMI-QUEW—MENOMINEE MAN. (MCKENNEY AND HALL)

Coll., III, 265, 1857) speaks of the Noquet as a part of the Menominee, and states that "the earliest locality of the Menominee, at the first visits of the whites, was at Bay de Noque and Menominee r., and those at Bay de Noque were called by the early French Des Noques or Des Noquia." (See Noquet.) The Jesuit Relation for 1671 includes the Menominee among the tribes driven from their country—that is, "the lands of the south next to Michilimackinac," which is the locality where the Noquet lived when they first became known to the French. It is generally believed that the Noquet, who disappeared from history at a comparatively early date, were closely related to the Chippewa and were incorporated into their tribes; nevertheless, the name Menominee must have been use of it from the earliest notices we have of them, and aware that it could be readily grown by sowing in proper ground, Jenks (19th Rep. B. A. E., 1021, 1901), who gives a full account of the Menominee method of gathering, preserving, and using the wild rice, states that they absolutely refuse to sow it—evidently owing to their common unwillingness to "wound their mother, the earth."

Chauvignerie gives their principal totems as the Large-tailed Bear, the Stag, and the Kilou (a sort of eagle). Neill (Hist. Minn., 1858) classes the Menominee, evidently on French authority, as Folles Avoines of the Chat and Original or Wild Moose and Elk. Hoffman gives the modern totems as follows:

I. The Owa'sse wi'dishi'anun, or Bear phratry, consisting of the following totems and subphratries: Owa'sse (Bear), Miqk'a'no (Mud-turtle), Kita'mi (Porcupine), with the Namä'nu (Beaver) and O'sas (Muskkrat) and subphratries.

II. The Kinä'u' wi'dishi'anun, or Eagle phratry, consisting of the following totems: Pinäsh'iu (Bald Eagle), Kaka'k (Crow), Inä'qtëk (Raven), Ma'qkuana'ni (Red-tail Hawk), Hinanä'shiu' (Golden Eagle), Pe'nik'konau (Fish-hawk).

III. The Otä'tshia wi'dishi'anun, or Crane phratry, consisting of the following totems: Otä'tshia (Crane), Shakshak'eu (Great Heron), Os'se ("Old Squaw" Duck), O'kawa'siku (Coot).

IV. The Moqwai'o wi'dishi'anun, or Wolf phratry, consisting of the following totems: Moqwai'o (Wolf), "Hana" [änä'm] (Dog), Apa'q'sos (Deer).

V. The Mons wi'dishi'anun, or Moose phratry, with the following totems: Mö's (Moose), Oma'skos (Elk), Wabä'shiu (Marten), Wü'tshik (Fisher).

The earlier statements of Menominee population are unreliable. Most of the estimates in the nineteenth century vary from 1,300 to 2,500, but those probably most conservative range from 1,600 to 1,900. Their present population is about 1,600, of whom 1,370 are under the Green Bay school superintendency, Wis. Their villages (missions) were St Francis and St Michael.

The Menominee have entered into the following treaties with the United States:

(1) Treaty of peace at St Louis, Mo., Mar. 30, 1817; (2) Treaty of Prairie du Chien, Wis., Aug. 19, 1825, with the Menominee and other Indians, fixing boundary lines between the several tribes; (3) Treaty of Butte des Morts, Wis., Aug. 11, 1827, defining boundary lines between the Menominee, Chippewa, and Winnebago; (4) Treaty of Washington, Feb. 8, 1831, defining boundary lines and ceding lands to the United States, a portion of the latter to be for the use of certain New York Indians; (5) Treaty of Washington, Feb. 17, 1831, modifying the treaty of Feb. 8, 1831, in regard to the lands ceded for the use of the New York Indians; (6) Treaty of Washington, Oct. 27, 1832, in which certain modifications are made in regard to the lands ceded for the use of the New York Indians (Stockbridges and Munsee), and to certain boundary lines; (7) Articles of agreement made at Cedar Point, Wis., Sept. 3, 1836, ceding certain lands to the United States; (8) Treaty of Lake Powaw-hay-kon-nay, Oct. 18, 1848, ceding all their lands in Wisconsin, the United States to give them certain lands which had been ceded by the Chippewa; (9) Treaty at the Falls of Wolf r., May 12, 1854, by which they ceded the reserve set apart by treaty of Oct. 18, 1848, and were assigned a reserve on Wolf r., Wis.; (10) Treaty of Keshena, Wis., Feb. 11, 1856, ceding two townships of their reserve for the use of the Stockbridges and the Munsee.

Menominee. A Potawatomi village, taking its name from the resident chief, formerly situated on the n. side of Twin lakes, near the site of Plymouth, Marshall co., Ind., on a reservation sold in 1836. The name is also written Menomonee.

(J. M.)

Menoquet (possibly for Mino'kwat, 'good ice,' or Mina'kwit, 'banked cloud,' or Mena'kwat, 'fair weather.'—W. J.). A Potawatomi village, commonly called "Menoquet's village" from the name of a chief, formerly situated near the present Monoquet, Kosciusko co., Ind., on a reservation sold in 1836. The name is spelled also Menoquet, Menoga (Indiana Geol. Rep., map, 1883), Minoquet, and Monoquet.

Menoquet's Village. A Chippewa village, so called after its chief, formerly on Cass r., lower Michigan, on a reservation sold in 1837.

Menostamenton. An unidentified division of the Sioux.

Menostamenton.—Jefferys, Am. Atlas, map 5, 1776. Menostamenton.—De l'Isle, map of La., in Neill, Hist. Minn., 164, 1856.

Mento. A name used by French writers of the 17th and 18th centuries to designate a people in the vicinity of Arkansas r. and the southern plains. Marquette heard of them during his descent of the Mississippi in 1673, and located them on his map as w. of that river; Douay (1687) placed them near Red r. of Louisiana; Tonti (1690) states that they were in the vicinity of the Quapaw, and De l'Isle's map (1703) puts them on middle Arkansas r. La Harpe (1719) says they were 7 days' journey s. w. of the Osage. Beaurain about that time visited the people and gives the names of the 9 "nations" which, he says, formed one continuous village lying in a beautiful situation, the houses joining one another from e. to w. on the border of a s. w. branch of Arkansas r. The "nations" mentioned include the Tonkawa, Wichita, Comanche, Adai, Caddo, Waco, etc. The Mento were enemies of the Spaniards and the Apache tribes. (A. C. F.)

Meochkonek. A former Minisink village probably situated about upper Delaware r. ins. e. New York.—Vander Donck (1656) quoted by Rittenber, Tribes Hudson R., 96, 1872.

Mepayaya. A tribe mentioned in the manuscript relation of Francisco de Jesus Maria, in 1691, in his list of the Texas (i. e., the group of customary allies, including the Hasinai), as s. w. of the Nabadache country of Texas. This may be the Payaya tribe, who were in the vicinity of San Antonio. (H. E. B.)

Mequachake ('red earth.'—Hewitt). One of the 5 general divisions of the Shawnee, whose villages on the headwaters of Mad r., Logan co., Ohio, were destroyed by United States troops in 1791. (J. M.)

Meracouman. A tribe or village mentioned by Joutel as being on or near the route taken when going with La Salle in 1687 from Ft St Louis on Matagorda bay to Maligne (Colorado) r., Tex. If the list of so-called tribes given by the Ebanamo Indians and recorded by Joutel followed the geographic order of his line of march, the Meracouman must have dwelt near the Colorado r. of Texas. Joutel remarks that when the Indians approached or bathed in the current of the river, the horses always fled. Gatschet states that the custom of the Karankawa Indians of anointing their skin with shark's oil caused horses and cattle to run from the disagreeable odor to the distance of two or three miles. As Karankawan tribes are said to have dwelt in the vicinity of Colorado r., it is possible that the Meracouman may have belonged to that stock (see Gatschet, Karankawa Inds., 1891). Perhaps they are the Maliacones of Cabeza de Vaca or the Manico of Manzanet. In 1739 there were neophytes of the Merguan, or Merhuan, tribe at San Antonio de Valero mission (Baptismal records, partidas 448, 455, MS., cited by H. E. Bolton, inf'n, 1906). They were with others who appear to have come from near Guadalupe r., and they may be identical with the Meracouman, as well as with the Menenquen (q. v.). (A. C. F. H. E. B.)

Meracouman.—Joutel (1687) in French, Hist. Coll. La., I, 137, 1846. Meracouman.—Joutel (1687) in Margry, Déc., III, 298, 1878. Meracoumanes.—Barcia, Ensayo, 271, 1723.

Merced (Span.: 'grace', 'mercy'). A group of Cajuenche rancherias, situated, in 1775, in N. E. Lower California, w. of the Rio Colorado, and 4 leagues s. w. of Santa Olalla, a Yuma rancheria. These settlements contained about 300 natives when visited by Father Garcés in 1775 and were provided with abundant corn, melons, calabashes, and beans, but with little wheat. See Garcés, Diary (1775), 172-173, 1900.

Merced. A Pima rancheria, visited by Father Kino in 1700, and placed on maps of Kino (1701) and Venegas (1759) N. E. of San Rafael, in what is now S. Arizona. La Merced.—Venegas, Hist. Cal., I, 300, map, 1759. Merced.—Kino map (1701) in Bancroft, Ariz. and N. Mex., 360, 1889.

Merced. Mentioned as a tribe apparently inhabiting the Merced r. region, California. Probably Moquelumnan. Merced.—Barbour et al. (1851) in Sen. Ex. Doc. 4, 32d Cong., spec. sess., 60, 1858.

Mer, Gens de la (French: 'people of the sea,' or Gens de la Mer du Nord, 'people of the sea of the north'). A collective term applied by the early Jesuits to the Algonquian tribes about Hudson bay, Canada. (J. M.)

Gens de la Mer du Nord.—Jes. Rel. 1670, 70, 1856. Gens de Mer.—Ibid., 1643, 3, 1858.

Merip. A Yurok village on Klamath r., Cal., about 10 m. below the mouth of the Trinity. (A. L. K.)

Merkitsook. An Eskimo winter habitation near Bute bay, s. w. Greenland.—Crantz, Hist. Greenland, I, 8, 1767.

Merric. A small Algonquian tribe or division formerly inhabiting the s. coast of Queens co., Long Island, N. Y., from Rockaway to South Oyster bay. Their name survives in the hamlet of Merricks, which is on the site of their principal village. (J. M.)

Mershom. A former Chumashan village at Cañada de los Sauces, w. of San Buenaventura, Ventura co., Cal.

Mer-cum.—Henshaw, Buenaventura MS. vocab., B. A. E., 1894 (c=sh).

Mesa Chiquita (Span.: 'small mesa' or table-land). A Diegueño village in w. San Diego co., Cal.—Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Miss. Inds., 24, 1883.

Mesa del Nayarit. A pueblo of the Cora in the Sierra de Nayarit, on the upper waters of the Rio de Jesus María, in the n. part of the Territory of Tepic, lat. 23° 25', Mexico.—Lumholtz, Unknown Mex., I, 500, 1902.

Mesa Grande (Span.: 'large mesa' or table-land). A small Diegueño village in w. San Diego co., Cal., with 103 inhabitants in 1880. The name is now applied to a reservation of 120 acres of patented, largely desert land, 75 m. from Mission Tule River agency. See Jackson and Kinney, Rep. Mission Inds., 24, 1883; Ind. Aff. Rep., 175, 1902.

Mescal (Aztec: mexcalli, 'mell [maguey] liquor'). The fleshy leaf bases and trunk of various species of agave. It was roasted in pit ovens and became a sweet and nutritious food among the Indians of the states on both sides of the Mexican boundary. Mescal pits are usually circular depressions in the ground, 6 to 20 ft in circumference, sloping evenly to the center, a foot to 3 ft in depth, and lined with coarse gravel. A fire was built in the pit, raked out after the stones had become hot, and the mescal plants put in and covered with grass. After two days' steaming the pile was opened and the mescal was ready for consumption.

The product must not be confounded with the distilled spirit known in Mexico under the same name, nor with the peyote cactus. Mescal is a valuable food resource among the Apache (a division of whom, the Mescaleros, is named from their custom of eating mescal), as well as among the Mohave, Yuma, Ute, Paiute, and practically every tribe of the region producing the agave. An extensive commerce in this sweet was carried on with outlying tribes, as the Hopi and other Pueblos. So far as known mescal was not fermented by the Indians to produce an intoxicating drink before the coming of the Spaniards. The food value of mescal is regarded as of such importance that the entire population of Presidio del Norte (El Paso), on the failure of their crops half a century ago, subsisted for six months on roasted agave (Bartlett, Pers. Narr., II, 291, 1854). See Peyote. (W. H.)

Mescaleros (Span.: 'mescal people,' from their custom of eating mescal). An Apache tribe which formed a part of the Faraones and Vaqueros of different periods of the Spanish history of the S. W. Their principal range was between the Rio Grande and the Pecos in New Mexico, but it extended also into the Staked plains and southward into Coahuila, Mexico. They were never regarded as so warlike as the Apache of Arizona, otherwise they were generally similar. Mooney (field notes, B. A. E., 1897) records the following divisions: Nataina, Tuetinini, Tsihlinainde, Guhlka inde, and Tahuunde. These bands intermarry, and each had its chief and subchief. The Guhlka inde are apparently identical with the "Cuelcayenne" of Orozco y Berra and others, who classed them as a division of the Llaneros; the "Natages" are probably the same as the Nataina rather than the Lipan or the Kiowa Apache, while the Tsihlinainde seem to be identifiable with the "Chilpaines." In addition Orozco y Berra gives the Lipillanes as a Llanero division.

The Mescaleros are now on a reservation of 474,240 acres in s. New Mexico, set apart for them in 1873. Population 460 in 1905, including about a score of Lipan, q. v. (F. W. H.)

Mescalos. A former tribe or tribes in N. E. Mexico and s. Texas. The one oftenest referred to lived not far from the junction of the Salado with the Rio Grande, and Mescalos are mentioned at the neighboring mission of San Juan Bautista, founded in 1699. These spoke a Coahuiltecan dialect. De Leon, in 1689, mentions them in connection with the Hapes, Jumeues, and Xiabu. (H. E. B.) Mescalos.—De Leon (1689) in Tex. Hist. Mesheketo. A Potawatomi village which took its name from the resident chief, situated on Kankakee r., a short distance above the present Kankakee, n. e. Illinois, in 1833.—Camp Tippecanoe treaty (1834) in U. S. Ind. Treaties, 698, 1873.

Meshekunnoghquoh. See Little Turtle.

Meshingomesia. A former Miami village, commonly called after a chief of this name, situated on a reservation on the n. e. side of Mississinewa r., in Liberty tp., Wabash co., Ind. The reserve was originally established for Meshingomesia's father, Metosinia, or Matosinia, in 1838, and its inhabitants were known as Meshingomesia's band. In 1872 the land was divided among the surviving occupants and patented to them, being the last land held as an Indian reservation in Indiana.

Mesquites. A tribe represented in the 18th century at the San Antonio missions, Texas. They are mentioned as early as 1716, by Espinosa, who met one Indian of this tribe w. of Arroyo Hondo (Diario, 1716, MS.); he also met others near the Brazos of the Tonkawan Indians of Ranchería Grande. In 1727 Rivera mentions them at San Antonio with the Payayas and Agustayas (Diario, leg. 1994, 1736). There are proofs that in their gentile state they intermarried with the Ervapiames and Muruames (Baptismal Rec. of Valero, partidas 194, 418), and also with the Payayas (ibid., partida 90). The first baptism of one of this tribe recorded at San Antonio de Valero is dated Nov. 8, 1720. In 1734 one person at a residencia in San Antonio acted as interpreter for Xarame, Payaya, Siaguan, Agustaya, and Mesquite witnesses (Residencia de Bustillos y Zevallos, Bexar archives, 1730-36); but too much must not be inferred from this circumstance. In 1768 Solis reported Mesquites at San José mission, with Pampopas, Aguastallas, Pastias, and Xarames (Diario, Mem. Nueva España, xxvii, 270), and in 1793 Revillagigedo implied that this tribe constituted a part of the few neophytes still at this mission (Carta, Dic., 27, 1793). A tribe called Mesquites lived in 1757 across the Rio Grande at Villa de Santander. These were divided into 4 bands, consisting of 150 families (Tiendo de Cuervo, Revista, Archivo General, MS.).

Metal-work. Before the arrival of the whites, the tribes n. of Mexico had made considerable progress in the arts of metal-lurgy, dealing almost exclusively with copper (q. v.). The other metals utilized were gold, silver, iron, and galena (lead ore). Galena was known only in the form of ore, and the same is true of iron (hematite, pyrites, etc.), except where chance bits of meteoric iron came into the hands of the native artisan. Copper alone was mined (see Mines and Quarries).

The four metals, copper, gold, silver, and iron (meteoric), were shaped mainly by cold-hammering and grinding, but heat no doubt was employed to facilitate the hammering processes and in annealing. It is believed that copper was sometimes swaged, or in sheet form pressed into molds. But the remarkable repoussé figures representing elaborately costumed and winged personages in sheet metal, found in mounds in Georgia (Thomas), and other more highly conventionalized figures from Florida mounds (Moore), give evidence of a degree of skill seemingly out of keeping with what is known of the general accomplishments of the northern tribes. Cushing, however, has demonstrated that repoussé work of like character can be accomplished by simple methods—the employment of pressure with a bone or an antler point, the sheet being placed upon a yielding surface, as of buckskin; but some of this work, especially the Georgia specimens, shows a degree of precision in execution apparently beyond the reach of the methods thus suggested.

Examples of overlaying or plating with thin sheets of copper, found by Moore in the mounds of Florida and Alabama, and by Putnam, Moorehead, Mills, and others in the mounds of Ohio, are hardly less remarkable; but that these are well within the range of workmen of intelligence employing only stone tools has been amply proved by Willoughby. The thin sheets of copper are readily produced by hammering with stone tools with the aid of annealing processes and the skilful use of rivets (Moore). It can hardly be doubted that copper, gold, and silver were sometimes melted by aboriginal metal-workers N. of Mexico, and that bits of native copper were freed from the matrix of rock by this means. There seems to be no satisfactory record, however, of casting the forms of objects even in the rough, and there is no proof that ores of any kind were reduced by means of heat. It is a remarkable fact that up to the present time no prehistoric crucible, mold, pattern, or metal-working tool of any kind whatsoever has been identified. No metal-worker's shop or furnace has been located, although caches of implements and of the blank forms of implements more or less worked have been found in various places, Metate ruin. A prehistoric pueblo ruin in the Petrified Forest, across the wash from the "petrified bridge," near the Navaho-Apache co. boundary, Arizona; locally so called on account of the numerous stone milling troughs, or metates, set on edge in circular or linear form and scattered over the surface. The builders of the pueblo are unknown. The pottery, gray-brown and black in color, is coarse in texture and decorated with rude incision and by indented coiling.—Hough in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 318, 1903.

Metates. A former Opata pueblo at the E. base of the Sierra de Teras, about 12 m. W. of Baseraca, E. Sonora, Mexico. Possibly identical with Teras, Guepacomatzi, or Toapara, which pueblos are mentioned in early documents as being in that vicinity.—Bandelier in Arch. Inst. Papers, iv, 524 et seq., 1892.

Metas (prob. for Metawā, 'he sulks.'—W. J.). A Potawatomi chief, distinguished in his tribe as a warrior and an orator. When the Potawatomi were subsidized by the British at the beginning of the War of 1812 he was one of the leaders of the party that massacred the families of the garrison and citizens of Chicago as they were retreating to Detroit. He led the band that harassed the troops who marched in the fall of 1812 to the relief of Ft Wayne and was shot in the arm by Gen. W. H. Harrison. At a council held at Chicago in 1821 he impressed the whites by his eloquence and reasoning powers, and also when the treaty of the Wabash was concluded in 1826. He advocated the education of Indian youth and sent several from his tribe to the Choctaw academy in Kentucky. He died in a drunken debauch at Ft Wayne, in 1827, after having conducted difficult negotiations with dignity and skill in a conference with commissioners of the Government.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, 59-64, 1858. See Muskuwauweseptan.

Methy. The burbot (Lota maculosa), the loche of the Canadian French, a fish common in the waters of N. W. Canada. The word is taken from the name of this fish in the Wood Cree dialect of Algonquian, the Cree proper term being mihyey, according to Lacombe. L. Methy in Athabasca is named from this fish; also a lake in Labrador. (A. F. C.)

Meti. A former rancheria of gentile (probably Diegueño) Indians near San Diego, S. Cal.—Ortega (1775) quoted by Bancroft, Hist. Cal., i, 253, 1884.

Métis ('mixed,' from French métis, a derivative of Latin miscere, 'to mix'), or metis. A term used by the French-speaking population of the N. W. to designate persons of mixed white and Indian blood. Among the Spanish-speaking population of the S. W. the word metizo, of the same derivation, is used, but is applied more especially to those of half-white and half-Indian blood. The term mustee, a corruption of metizo, was formerly in use in the Gulf states. In the W. the term "half-breed" is loosely applied to all persons of mixed white and Indian blood, without regard to the proportion of each. See Mixed-bloods.

He gives atibidwiniid as the literal word for 'half-breed').

Metlakatla. A Tsimshian town 15 m. S. of Port Simpson, Brit. Col. Anciently

there were many towns in this neighborhood, and while the mission station of the Church of England (established in 1857 at a Tsimshian village of the same name) was conducted by Rev. Wm. Duncan, Metlakatla was a flourishing place. Trouble arising over the conduct of his work, Duncan moved in 1887 to Port Chester, or New Metlakatla, on Annette id., Alaska, and most of the Indians followed him. The old town, which contained 198 inhabitants in 1906, is now the site of an Indian school of the Church of England. New Metlakatla, including whites and Indians, numbered 823 in 1890 and 465 in 1900. See Missions. (J. R. S.)

Metoac (contraction of Meht-anaw-ack, 'land of the ear-shell or periwinkle.'—Tooker). A collective term embracing the Indians of Long Island, N. Y., who seem to have been divided into the following tribes, subtribes, or bands: Canarsee, Corchaug, Manhasset, Massapequa, Matinecock, Merric, Montauk, Nesaquake, Patchoag, Rockaway, Secatog, Setauket, and Shinnecock. There were besides these some minor bands or villages which have received special designations. They were closely connected linguistically and politically, and were probably derived from the same immediate ethnic stem. Rutenber classes them as branches of the Mahican. The Montauk, who formed the leading tribe in the eastern part of the island, are often confounded with the Metoac, and in some instances the Canarsee of the western part have also been confounded with them. The eastern tribes were at one time subject to the Pequot and afterward to the Narraganset, while the Iroquois claimed dominion over the western tribes. They were numerous at the first settlement of the island, but rapidly wasted away from epidemics and wars with other Indians and with the Dutch, disposing of their lands piece by piece to the whites. About 1788 a large part of the survivors joined the Brotherton Indians in Oneida co., N. Y. The rest, represented chiefly by the Montauk and Shinnecock, have dwindled to perhaps a dozen individuals of mixed blood. The Indians of Long Island were a seafaring people, mild in temperament, diligent in the pursuits determined by their environment, skilled in the management of the canoe, seine, and spear, and dexterous in the making of seawan or wampum (Flint). The chieftaincies were hereditary by lineal descent, including females when there was no male representative.

The Metoac villages were Canarsee, Cotsjewaninck, Cutchogue (Corchaug), Jameco, Keskaechquerem (?), Marychenwikingh, Maspeth (Canarsee), Mattituck (Corchaug), Merric, Mirrachtau-hacky, Mochgonnekonck, Montauk, Nach-aquatuck, Nesaquake, Ouheywickingh, Patchoag, Rechquaakie, Setauket, Sichtey-hacky, Wawepex (Matinecock). Meysascosic. A village of the Powhatan confederacy, in 1608, on the n. side of James r., in Charles City co., Va.—Smith (1629), Va., 1, map, repr. 1819.

Meyemma. Mentioned by Gibbs (Schoolcraft, Ind. Tribes, III, 139, 1853) as a Hupa village in Hupa valley, Cal., in 1851. Not identified. The name is perhaps of Yurok origin.

Mezo. The Lizard clan of the pueblo of Laguna, N. Mex. Although Laguna was not founded until 1699, the origin of the clan is unknown to the natives. It forms a phratry with the Skurshka (Water-snake), Sqowi (Rattlesnake), and Hatsi (Earth) clans, which came from Sia, Oraibi (probably), and Jemez, respectively. (F. W. H.)

Méyo-hánoh.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., IX, 351, 1896 (hánoh = 'people').

Miami (?Chippewa: Omaumeg, 'people who live on the peninsula'). An Algonquian tribe, usually designated by early English writers as Twightwees (twa'wh twa'wh, the cry of a crane.—Hewitt), from their own name, the earliest recorded notice of which is from information furnished in 1658 by Gabriel Druliettes (Jes. Rel. 1658, 21, 1858), who called them the Oumamik, then living 60 leagues from St Michel, the first village of the Potawatomi mentioned by him; it was therefore at or about the mouth of Green bay, Wis. Tailhan (Perrot, Mémoire) says that they withdrew into the Mississippi valley, 60 leagues from the bay, and were established there from 1657 to 1676, although Bacqueville de la Potherie asserts that, with the Mascoutens, the Kickapoo, and part of the Illinois, they came to settle at that place about 1667. The first time the French came into actual contact with the Miami was when Perrot visited them about 1668. His second visit was in 1670, when they were living at the headwaters of Fox r., Wis. In 1671 a part at least of the tribe were living with the Mascoutens in a palisaded village in this locality (Jes. Rel. 1671, 45, 1858). Soon after this the Miami parted from the Mascoutens and formed new settlements at the s. end of L. Michigan and on Kalamazoo r., Mich. The settlements at the s. end of the lake were at Chicago and on St Joseph r., where missions were established late in the 17th century, although the former is mentioned as a Wea village at the time of Marquette's visit, and Wea were found there in 1701 by De Courtemarche. It is likely that these Wea were the Miami mentioned by Allouez and others as being united with the Mascoutens in Wisconsin. The chief village of the Miami on St Joseph r. was, according to Zenobius (Le Clercq, II, 133), about 15 leagues inland, in lat. 41°. The extent of territory occupied by this tribe a few years later compels the conclusion that the Miami in Wisconsin, when the whites first heard of them, formed but a part of the tribe, and that other bodies were already in n. e. Illinois and n. Indiana. As the Miami and their allies were found later on the Wabash in Indiana and in n. w. Ohio, in which latter territory they gave their name to three rivers, it would seem that they had moved s. e. from the localities where first known within historic times. Little Turtle, their famous chief, said: "My fathers kindled the first fire at Detroit; thence they extended their lines to the headwaters of the Scioto; thence to its mouth; thence down the Ohio to the mouth of the Wabash, and thence to Chicago over L. Michigan." When Vincennes was sent by Gov. Vaudreville in 1705 on a mission to the Miami they were found occupying principally the territory n. w. of the upper Wabash. There was a Miami village at Detroit in 1703, but their chief settlement was still on St Joseph r. In 1711 the Miami and the Wea had three villages on the St Joseph, Maumee, and Wabash. Kekionga, at the head of the Maumee, became the chief seat of the Miami proper, while Ouiatenon, on the Wabash, was the headquarters of the Wea branch. By the encroachments of the Potawatomi, Kickapoo, and other northern tribes the Miami were driven from St Joseph r. and the country n. w. of the Wabash. They sent out colonies to the e. and formed settlements on Miami r. in Ohio, and perhaps as far e. as the Scioto. This country they held until the peace of 1763, when they retired to Indiana, and the abandoned country was occupied by the Shawnee. They took a prominent part in all the Indian wars in Ohio valley until the close of the war of 1812. Soon afterward they began to sell their lands, and by 1827 had disposed of most of their holdings in Indiana and had agreed to remove to Kansas, whence they went later to Indian Ter., where the remnant still resides. In all treaty negotiations they were considered as original owners of the Wabash country and all of w. Ohio, while the other tribes in that region were regarded as tenants or intruders on their lands. A considerable part of the tribe, commonly known as Meshingomesia's band, continued to reside on a reservation in Wabash co., Ind., until 1872, when the land was divided among the survivors, then numbering about 300.

The Miami men were described in 1718 as "of medium height, well built, heads rather round than oblong, countenances agreeable rather than sedate or morose, swift on foot, and excessively fond of racing." The women were generally well clad in deerskins, while the men used scarcely any covering and were tattooed all over the body. They were hard-working, and raised a species of maize unlike that of the Indians of Detroit, described as "white, of the same size as the other, the skin much finer, and the meal much whiter." According to the early French explorers the Miami were distinguished for polite manners, mild, affable, and sedate character, and their respect for and perfect obedience to their chiefs, who had greater authority than those of other Algonquian and n. w. tribes. They usually spoke slowly. They were land travelers rather than canoe men. According to Hennepin, when they saw a herd of buffalo they gathered in great numbers and set fire to the grass about the animals, leaving open a passage where they posted themselves with their bows and arrows; the buffalo, seeking to escape the fire, were compelled to pass the Indians, who killed large numbers of them. The women spun thread of buffalo hair, with which they made bags to carry the meat, toasted or sometimes dried in the sun. Their cabins were covered with rush mats. According to Perrot, the village which he visited was situated on a hill and surrounded by a palisade. On the other hand, Zenobius says that La Salle, who visited the villages on St Joseph r., taught them how to defend themselves with palisades, and even made them erect a kind of fort with intrenchments. Infidelity of the wife, as among many other Indians, was punished by clipping the nose. According to early explorers, they worshiped the sun and thunder, but did not honor a host of minor deities, like the Huron and the Ottawa. Three forms of burial appear to have been practised by the division of the tribe living about Ft Wayne: (1) The ordinary ground burial in a shallow grave prepared to receive the body in a recumbent position. (2) Surface burial in a hollow log; these have been found in heavy forests; sometimes a tree was split and the halves hollowed out to receive the body, when it was either closed with withes or fastened to the ground with crossed stakes; sometimes a hollow tree was used, the ends being closed. (3) Surface burial wherein the body was covered with a small pen of logs, laid as in a log cabin, the courses meeting at the top in a single log.

The French authors commonly divided the Miami into six bands: Piankashaw, Wea, Atchatchakangouen, Kilatika, Mengakonkia, and Pepicokia. Of these the first two have come to be recognized as distinct tribes; the other names are no longer known. The Pepicokia, mentioned in 1796 with the Wea and Piankashaw, may have been absorbed by the latter. Several treaties were made with a band known as Eel Rivers, formerly living near Thorntown, Boone co., Ind., but they afterward joined the main body on the Wabash.

According to Morgan (Anc. Soc., 168, 1877) the Miami have 10 gentes: (1) Mowhawa (wolf), (2) Mongwa (loon), (3) Kendawa (eagle), (4) Ahpakosea (buzzard), (5) Kanozawa (Kanwasowau, panther), (6) Pilawa (turkey), (7) Ahseponna (raccoon), (8) Monnato (snow), (9) Kulswa (sun), (10) Water. Chauvignerie, in 1737, said that the Miami had two principal totems—the elk and crane—while some of them had the bear. The French writers call the Atchatchakangouen (Crane) the leading division. At a great conference on the Maumee in Ohio in 1793 the Miami signed with the turtle totem. None of these totems occurs in Morgan's list.

It is impossible to give a satisfactory estimate of the numbers of the Miami at any one time, on account of confusion with the Wea and Piankashaw, who probably never exceeded 1,500. An estimate in 1764 gives them 1,750; another in the following year places their number at 1,250. In 1825 the population of the Miami, Eel Rivers, and Wea was given as 1,400, of whom 327 were Wea. Since their removal to the W. they have rapidly decreased. Only 57 Miami were officially known in Indian Ter. in 1885, while the Wea and Piankashaw were confederated with the remnant of the Illinois under the name of Peoria, the whole body numbering but 149; these increased to 191 in 1903. The total number of Miami in 1905 in Indian Ter. was 124; in Indiana, in 1900, there were 243; the latter, however, are greatly mixed with white blood. Including individuals scattered among other tribes, the whole number is probably 400.

The Miami joined in or made treaties with the United States as follows: (1) Greenville, O., with Gen. Anthony Wayne, Aug. 3, 1795, defining the boundary of Ohio r. and ceding certain tracts of land; (2) Ft Wayne, Ind., June 7, 1803, with various tribes, defining boundaries and ceding certain lands; (3) Grouseland, Ind., Aug. 21, 1805, ceding certain lands in Indiana and defining boundaries; (4) Ft Wayne, Ind., Sept. 30, 1809, in which the Miami, Eel River tribes, and Delawares ceded certain lands in Indiana, and the relations between the Delawares and Miami regarding certain territory are defined; (5) Treaty of peace at Greenville, O., July 22, 1814, between the United States, the Wyandot, Delawares, Shawnee, Seneca, and the Miami, including the Eel River and Wea tribes; (6) Peace treaty of Spring Wells, Mich., Sept. 8, 1815, by the Miami and other tribes; (7)

St Mary's, O., Oct. 6, 1818, by which the Miami ceded certain lands in Indiana; (8) Treaty of the Wabash, Ind., Oct. 23, 1826, by which the Miami ceded all their lands in Indiana, n. and w. of Wabash and Miami rs.; (9) Wyandot village, Ind., Feb. 11, 1828, by which the Eel River Miami ceded all claim to the reservation at their village on Sugar Tree cr., Ind.; (10) Forks of Wabash, Ind., Oct. 23, 1834, by which the Miami ceded several tracts in Indiana; (11) Forks of the Wabash, Ind., Nov. 6, 1838, by which the Miami ceded most of their remaining lands in Indiana, and the United States agreed to furnish them a reservation w. of the Mississippi; (12) Forks of the Wabash, Ind., Nov. 28, 1840, by which the Miami ceded their remaining lands in Indiana and agreed to remove to the country assigned them w. of the Mississippi; (13) Washington, June 5, 1854, by which they ceded a tract assigned by amended treaty of Nov. 28, 1840, excepting 70,000 a. retained as a reserve; (14) Washington, Feb. 23, 1867, with Seneca and others, in which it is stipulated that the Miami may become confederated with the Peoria and others if they so desire.

Among the Miami villages were Chicago, Chippekawkey, Choppatee's village, Kekionga, Kenapacomaqua, Kokomo, Kowasikka, Little Turtle's village, Meshingomesia, Missiniquimeschan (Piankashaw), Missisnewa, Osaga, Pahedketcha, Piankashaw (Piankashaw), Pickawillanee, Raccoon's village, Seek's village, St Francis Xavier (mission, with others), Thorntown (Eel River Miami).

Miami River. A Seminole settlement, with 63 inhabitants in 1880, about 10 m. N. of the site of Ft Dallas, not far from Biscayne bay, on Little Miami r., Dade co., Fla.—MacCauley in 5th Rep. B. A. E., 478, 1887.

Miantonomo. A noted chief of the Narraganset, nephew of Canonicus. In 1632 he visited Boston and was received by the governor. He was more than once suspected of disloyalty to the English, but managed to clear himself when summoned to Boston in 1638. He helped the English against the Pequot the next year and warred against the Mohegan. In 1638 he signed the tripartite agreement between the English of Connecticut, the Narraganset, and the Mohegan. He is said to have been impressed by the preaching of Roger Williams in 1643. During the years 1640–42 he was suspected of treachery to the English, but again made satisfactory explanations. In 1643 war broke out between the Mohegan and the Narraganset, and in a battle in which the latter were defeated Miantonomo was taken prisoner. He was delivered to the English at Hartford, was tried at Boston in September, 1643, by the Court of Commissioners of the United Colonies of New England, who, after referring the matter to the convocation of the clergy, which condemned him, sentenced him to death at the hands of Uncas. This sentence was barbarously executed by Wawequa, the brother of Uncas, in the presence of the latter. For this disgraceful proceeding the English authorities were to blame, as otherwise Uncas would never have taken his prisoner's life. De Forest (Hist. Inds. of Conn., 198, 1852) takes a rather high view of the character of Miantonomo, whom he characterizes as "respected and loved by everyone who was not fearful of his power." Theological bias against Roger Williams and his Indian friends played some part in the matter of his treatment by the commissioners. He was buried where he fell, and the spot, on which a monument was erected in 1841, has since been known as Sachem's Plains. Miantonomo is praised in Durfee's poem, "What cheer." Nanantenoo was a son of Miantonomo. (A. F. C.)

Mica. This durable and showy mineral was in very general use by the Indian tribes E. of the great plains, the translucent variety known as muscovite being most highly prized. It was mined at many points in the Appalachian highland, from Georgia to St Lawrence r. (see Mines and Quarries). It occurs also in South Dakota, but it is not probable that the mound-building tribes obtained it from this source. From the Eastern highland it passed, by trade or otherwise, to remote parts: to Florida in the s. and to the upper Mississippi valley in the n. w. The crystals were often of large size, measuring 2 ft or more in diameter. The sheets into which they were readily divided were much prized for mirrors, and were also cut into a great variety of shapes for personal ornaments, and possibly also for ceremonial use. Sheets of mica were used also for burial with the dead and as sacrificial offerings. Squier and Davis give an account of the discovery of 14 human skeletons that were carefully covered with mica plates, estimated at 15 or 20 bushels, some of the plates being from 8 to 10 in. long and from 4 to 5 in. wide, and all from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 in. in thickness. Atwater describes the discovery of many thick sheets, one of which measured 36 in. long by 18 in. wide. With a skeleton in the Grave Creek mound, near Wheeling, W. Va., 150 disks of sheet mica, measuring from $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 in. in diameter and having each 1 or 2 perforations, were found. From the Turner mounds in Hamilton co., Ohio, several ornamental figures of sheet mica were obtained; one of them is a grotesque human figure, others are animal forms, including a serpent (Putnam). Mica occurs on many sacrificial altars of the mound-builders, who no doubt regarded it as of special significance.

Michiboussa. Mentioned by Tonti (French, Hist. Coll. La., 1, 82, 1846) in connection with and apparently as one of the tribes of the Illinois confederacy in 1681. The name is perhaps an erroneous designation for some well-known tribe or band.

Michigamea (Algonquian: 'great water,' from michi 'great,' 'much,' guma 'water'. Baraga gives the correct form of 'Michigan' as Mishigumaw, 'the big lake', while Dr Wm. Jones says that the Chippewa of the n. shore of L. Superior refer to L. Michigan by the name Mishawiguma, 'big, wide, or expansive waste,' on account of the few or no islands). A tribe of the Illinois confederacy, first visited by Marquette when he descended the Mississippi in 1673. Their village was situated at that time on the w. side of the Mississippi and near a lake bearing the same name as the tribe, probably Big lake, between the St Francis and Mississippi rs., Ark. This tribe was the most southerly of the confederacy, and its extreme southern situation has led some authors to the conclusion that the people were not Algonquian, but this is an evident error. It must have been shortly previous to the time that the first knowledge of the tribes of this general region was obtained that a group or division of the Illinois confederacy, including the Cahokia, Tamaroa, and possibly the Michigamea, pushed southward to escape the attacks of the Sioux and the Foxes. It is therefore probable that at this period the Michigamea moved on into s. Illinois, and thence passed over into s. e. Missouri. The intimate relation of the ancient remains of these two sections would seem to confirm this opinion. About the end of the 17th century they were driven out by the Quapaw or Chickasaw, crossing over into Illinois and joining the Kaskaskia. According to Chauvignerie their totem was the crane. He attributed to them 250 warriors, which is evidently an exaggeration, as he estimated the whole Illinois confederacy at only 508 warriors. It is probable that the Michigamea were only a remnant at the time they joined the Kaskaskia. They were never prominent in Indian affairs. In 1803 Gen. W. H. Harrison supposed that there was but one man of the tribe left alive, but as late as 1818 the names of 3 Michigamea appear as signers of a treaty with the Illinois. (J. M. C. T.)

Michilimackinac (Mishhima'kinung, 'place of the big wounded person,' or 'place of the big lame person.'—W. J.). A name applied at various times to Mackinac id. in Mackinac co., Mich.; to the village on this island; to the village and fort at Pt St Ignace on the opposite mainland, and at an early period to a considerable extent of territory in the upper part of the lower peninsula of Michigan. It is derived from the name of a supposed extinct Algonquian tribe, the Mishinimaki or Mishinimakinagog.

According to Indian tradition and the Jesuit Relations, the Mishinimaki formerly had their headquarters at Mackinac id. and occupied all the adjacent territory in Michigan. They are said to have been at one time numerous and to have had 30 villages, but in retaliation for an invasion of the Mohawk country they were destroyed by the Iroquois. This must have occurred previous to the occupancy of the country by the Chippewa on their first appearance in this region. A few were still there in 1671, but in Charlevoix's time (1744) none of them remained. When the Chippewa appeared in this section they made Michilimackinac id. one of their chief centers, and it retained its importance for a long period. In 1761 their village was said to contain 100 warriors. In 1827 the Catholic part of the inhabitants, to the number of 150, separated from the others and formed a new village near the old one. When the Hurons were driven w. by the Iroquois they settled on Mackinac id., where they built a village some time after 1650. Soon thereafter they removed to the Noquet ids. in Green bay, but returned about 1670 and settled in a new village on the adjacent mainland, where the Jesuits had just established the mission of St Ignace. After this the Hurons settled near the mission; the fugitive Ottawa also settled in a village on the island where Nouvel established the mission of St Francis Borgia among them in 1677, and when the Hurons removed to Detroit, about 1702, the Ottawa and Chippewa continued to live at Michilimackinac. Michipicoten (Mishibigwadunk, 'place of bold promontories,' or 'region of big places.'—W. J.). The designation of the Algonquian Indians living on Michipicoten r., Ontario, n. of L. Superior, and extending into Ruperts Land. In Canada they are officially classed as "Michipicoten and Big Heads," consisting of two bands belonging to different tribes. The smaller band consists of Chipewewa and are settled on a reservation known as Gros Cap, on the w. side of the river, near its mouth; the other band belongs to the Maskegon and resides mainly near the Hudson's Bay Co.'s post on Brunswick lake, on the n. side of the dividing ridge. The two bands together numbered 283 in 1884, and 358 in 1906. See Têtes de Boule. (J. M.)

Micmac (Migmak, 'allies'; Nigmak, 'our allies.'—Hewitt). The French called them Souriquois. An important Algonquian tribe that occupied Nova Scotia, Cape Breton and Prince Edward ids., the n. part of New Brunswick, and probably points in s. and w. Newfoundland. While their neighbors the Abnaki have close linguistic relations with the Algon-quian tribes of the great lakes, the Micmac seem to have almost as distant a relation to the group as the Algonquians of the plains (W. Jones). If Schoolcraft's supposition be correct, the Micmac must have been among the first Indians of the N. E. coast encountered by Europeans, as he thinks they were visited by Sebastian Cabot in 1497, and that the 3 natives he took to England were of this tribe. Kohl believes that those captured by Cortereal in 1501 and taken to Europe were Micmac. Most of the early voyagers to this region speak of the great numbers of Indians on the n. coast of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and of their fierce and warlike character. They early became friends of the French, a friendship which was lasting and which the English—after the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, by which Acadia was ceded to them—found impossible to have transferred to themselves for nearly half a century. Their hostility to the English prevented for a long time any serious attempts at establishing British settlements on the n. coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, for although a treaty of peace was concluded with them in 1760, it was not until 1779 that disputes and difficulties with the Micmac ceased. In the early wars on the New England frontier the Cape Sable Micmac were especially noted.

The missionary Biard, who, in his Relation of 1616, gives a somewhat full account of the habits and characteristics of the Micmac and adjacent tribes, speaks in perhaps rather too favorable terms of them. He says: "You could not distinguish the young men from the girls, except in their way of wearing their belts. For the women are girdled both above and below the stomach and are less nude than the men. . . . Their clothes are trimmed with leather lace, which the women curry on the side that is not hairy. They often curry both sides of elk skin, like our buff skin, then variegate it very prettily with paint put on in a lace pattern, and make gowns of it; from the same leather they make their shoes and strings. The men do not wear trousers. . . . they wear only a cloth to cover their nakedness." Their dwellings were usually the ordinary conical wigwams covered with bark, skins, or matting. Biard says that "in summer the shape of their houses is changed; for they are broad and long that they may have more air." There is an evident attempt to show these summer bowers in the map of Jacomo di Gastaldi, made about 1550, given in vol. iii of some of the editions of Ramusio. Their government was similar to that of the New England Indians; polygamy was not common, though practised to some extent by the chiefs; they were expert canoeemen, and drew much of their subsistence from the waters. Cultivation of the soil was very limited, if practised at all by them, when first encountered by the whites. Biard says they did not till the soil in his day.

According to Rand (Micmac First Reading Book, 1875), they divided their country, which they called Megumage, into 7 districts, the head-chief living in the Cape Breton district. The other six were Pictou, Memramcook, Restigouche, Eskegawaage, Shubenacadie, and Annapolis. The first three of these formed a group known as Sigunikt; the other three formed another group known as Kespoogwit. In 1760 the Micmac bands or villages were given as Le Have, Miramichi, Taboginkik, Pohomoosh, Gediak (Shediac), Pictou, Kashpugowitk (Kespoogwit), Chignecto, Isle of St Johns, Nalkitgoniash, Cape Breton, Minas, Chigabennakadik (Shubenacadie), Keshpugowitk (Kespoogwit, duplicated), and Risheboutou (Richibucto). The Gaspeians are a band of Micmac differing somewhat in dialect from the rest of the tribe.

In 1611 Biard estimated the Micmac at 3,000 to 3,500. In 1760 they were reported at nearly 3,000, but had been lately much wasted by sickness. In 1766 they were again estimated at 3,500; in 1880 they were officially reported at 3,892, and in 1884 at 4,037. Of these, 2,197 were in Nova Scotia, 933 in New Brunswick, 615 in Quebec, and 292 on Prince Edward id. In 1904, according to the Report of Canadian Indian Affairs, they numbered 3,861, of whom 579 were in Quebec province, 992 in New Brunswick, 1,998 in Nova Scotia, and 292 on Prince Edward id. The number in Newfoundland is not known.

The Micmac villages are as follows: Antigonishe (?), Beaubassin (mission), Boat Harbor, Chignecto, Eskusone, Indian Village, Isle of St Johns, Kespoogwit, Kigicapiagiak, Le Have, Maria, Minas, Miramichi, Nalkitgoniash, Nipigiguit, Pictou, Pohomoosh, Restigouche, Richibucto, Rocky Point, Shediac, Shubenacadie, and Taboginkik. Micoma. A Chumashan village between Goleta and Pt Conception, Cal., in 1542.—Cabrillo, Narr. (1542) in Smith, Colec. Doc. Fla., 183, 1857.

Miconope. See Mikanopy.

Middle Creeks. A term used by some English writers to designate the Creeks on lower Tallapoosa r., Ala., Spanish and French writers sometimes using the name Talipuce, or Talepuse. (A. S. G.)

Middle-settlement Indians. The Cherokee formerly living in upper Georgia and w. North Carolina, as distinguished from those in South Carolina and Tennessee.—Imlay, W. Ter., 363, 1797.

Middle Town. A former Seneca village, 3 m. above the site of Chemung, N. Y., destroyed by Sullivan in 1779.—Jones (1780) in N. Y. Doc. Col. Hist., VIII, 785, 1857.

Miduuski. An Ahtena village on the e. bank of Copper r., Alaska, below the mouth of Tonsina cr.

Miemissouks. Given as the name of a tribe somewhere between Bellingham bay and Fraser r., in Washington or British Columbia. Probably Salishan, otherwise unidentifiable.

Mie-misouks.—Starling in Ind. Aff. Rep., 170, 1852. Misouk.—Ibid., 171.

Migicihiliniou (Migistwintniwug, 'people of the Eagle clan'; or perhaps Migistwintniwug, 'people with wampum', or 'people with the cowrie shells.'—W. J.). Given by Dobbs as the name of a band of (Algonquian?) Indians residing on the "Lake of Eagles," between L. Winnipeg and Lake of the Woods—probably Eagle lake, some distance N. E. of Lake of the Woods. He thinks they were related to the Assiniboin, "because of the great affinity of their language." As this statement is in contradiction to his subsequent assertion, known from other evidence to be correct, that the Assiniboin dwelt w. of L. Winnipeg, it may be inferred that these "Eagle-men" belong to the Chippewa, who have among their gentes one named Omegeezee, "Bald Eagle."

Mihtukmechackick. A name, signifying 'tree eaters,' which, according to Roger Williams' Key (Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., III, 209, 1794), referred to "a people so called (living between three or four hundred m. w. into the land) from their eating mih-tuck-quash, 'trees.' They are men-eaters; they set no corn, but live on the bark of chestnut and walnut and other fine trees. They dry and eat this bark with the fat of beasts and sometimes of men. This people are the terror of the neighboring natives." The name Adirondack (q. v.), applied by the Iroquois to certain Algonquian tribes of Canada, signifies 'they eat trees'. (J. M. C. T.)

Miiter. The Humming-bird clan of San Felipe pueblo, N. Mex., of which there were only one or two survivors in 1895.

Miitar-hano.—Hodge in Am. Anthropol., IX, 351, 1896 (hano = 'people').

Mikakhenikashika ('those who made or adopted the stars as their mark or means of identity as a people.'—La Flesche). A Quapaw gens.

Mika'q'e ni'kaci'ya.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 223, 1897. Star gens.—Ibid.

Mikanopy ('head chief'). A Seminole chief. On May 9, 1832, a treaty was signed purporting to cede the country of the Seminole to the United States in exchange for lands w. of the Mississippi. The Seminole had already relinquished their desirable lands near the coast and retired to the pine barrens and swamps of the interior. Mikanopy, the hereditary chief, who possessed large herds of cattle and horses and a hundred negro slaves, stood by young Osceola and the majority of the tribe in the determination to remain. Neither of them signed the agreement to emigrate given on behalf of the tribe by certain pretended chiefs on Apr. 23, 1835. In the summer of that year the Indians made preparations to resist if the Government attempted to remove them. When the agent notified them on Dec. 1 to deliver their horses and cattle and assemble for the long journey they sent their women and children into the interior, while the warriors were seen going about in armed parties. The white people had condemned the Seminole as a degenerate tribe, enervated through long contact with the whites. Although Mikanopy, who was advanced in years, was the direct successor of King Payne, the chief who united the tribe, the agent said he would no longer recognize him as a chief when he absented himself from the council where the treaty was signed. When the whites saw that the Seminole intended to fight, they abandoned their plantations on the border, which the Indians sacked and burned. Troops were then ordered to the Seminole country, and a seven-years' war began. In the massacre of Dade's command, Dec. 28, 1836, it is said that Mikanopy shot the commander with his own hand. He took no further active part in the hostilities. He was short and gross in person, indolent, and self-indulgent in his habits, having none of the qualities of a leader.—McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, II, 271, 1858.

Mikasi ('coyote and wolf people'). A subgens of the Mandhinkagaghe gens of the Omaha.

Migasi.—Dorsey in 15th Rep. B. A. E., 223, 1897.

Mikasuki. A former Seminole town in Leon co., Fla., on the w. shore of Miccosukee lake, on or near the site of the present Miccosukee. The name has been applied also to the inhabitants as a division of the Seminole. They spoke the Hitchiti dialect, and, as appears from the title of B. Smith's vocabulary of their language, were partly or wholly emigrants from the Sawokli towns on lower Chattahoochee r., Ala. The former town appears to have been one of the 'red' or 'bloody' towns, for at the beginning of the Seminole troubles of 1817 its inhabitants stood at the head of the hostile element and figured conspicuously as "Red Sticks," or "Batoas Rouges," having painted high poles, the color denoting war and blood. At this time they had 300 houses, which were burned by Gen. Jackson. There were then several villages near the lake, known also as Mikasuki towns, which were occupied almost wholly by negroes. In the Seminole war of 1835-42 the people of this town became noted for their courage, dash, and audacity.

Military Societies. Although the various tribes were in a state of chronic warfare one with another, little is known of their system of military organization, with the exception, perhaps, of those of the Plains and the Pueblo regions. There is abundant evidence, however, that the military code was as carefully developed as the social system among most of the tribes n. of Mexico. The exceptions were the Eskimo and the thinly scattered bands of the extreme n., the California tribes, and the various bands w. of the Rocky mts. commonly grouped as Paiute. East of the Mississippi, where the clan system was dominant, the chief military functions of leadership, declaration, and perhaps conclusion of war, seem to have been hereditary in certain clans, as the Bear clan of the Mohawk and Chipewewa, and the Wolf or Munsee division of the Delawares. It is probable that if their history were known it would be found that most of the distinguished Indian leaders in the colonial and other early Indian wars were actually the chiefs of the war clans or military societies of their respective tribes. If we can trust the Huguenot narratives, the ancient tribes of n. Florida and the adjacent region had a military system and marching order almost as exact as that of a modern civilized nation, the various grades of rank being distinguished by specific titles. Something similar seems to have prevailed among the Creeks, where, besides war and peace clans, there were war and peace towns, the war or "red" towns being the assembly points for all war ceremonies, including the war dance, scalp dance, and torture of prisoners. The "Red Stick" band of the Seminole, noted in the Florida wars as the most hostile portion of the tribe, seem to have constituted in themselves a war society. Among the confederated Sauk and Foxes, according to McKenney and Hall, nearly all the men of the two tribes were organized into two war societies which contested against each other in all races or friendly athletic games and were distinguished by different cut of hair, costume, and dances. With the more peaceful and sedentary Pueblo tribes, as the Zuñi and Hopi, military matters were regulated by a priesthood, as the "Priesthood of the Bow" of the Zuñi, which formed a close corporation with initiation rites and secret ceremonies.

Throughout the plains from n. to s. there existed a military organization so similar among the various tribes as to suggest a common origin, although with patriotic pride each tribe claimed it as its own. Maximilian was inclined to ascribe its origin to the Crows, perhaps on the ground of their well-known ceremonial temperament, but it is probably much older than their traditional separation from the Hidatsa. In each tribe the organization consisted of from 4 to 12 societies of varying rank and prominence, ranging from boys or untried warriors up to old men who had earned retirement by long years of service on the warpath and thenceforth confined themselves to the supervision of the tribal ceremonies. The name of each society had reference to some mystic animal protector or to some costume, duty, or peculiarity connected with the membership. Thus, among the Kiowa there were 6 warrior societies, known respectively as Rabbits, Young Mountain Sheep, Horse Caps, Black Legs, Skunkberry People (alias Crazy Horses), and Chief Dogs. The Rabbit society consisted of boys of about 10 to 12 years of age, who were trained in their future duties by certain old men, and who had a dance in which the step was intended to imitate the jumping motion of a rabbit. The next four societies named were all of about equal rank, varying only according to the merit or reputation of the officers at any particular time; but the K'oitsefko or 'Chief Dogs' were limited to 10 picked and tried warriors of surpassing courage, each of whom, at his investiture with the sacred sash of the order, took a solemn obligation never, while wearing it, to turn his face from the enemy in battle except at the urgent appeal of the whole war party. It was the duty of the leader, who wore a black sash passing around his neck and hanging down to the ground, to dismount and anchor himself in the front of the charge by driving his lance through the end of the sash into the earth, there to exhort the warriors without moving from his station unless, should the battle be lost, they released him by pulling out the lance. Should they forget or be prevented in the hurry of flight, he must die at his post. In consequence of the great danger thus involved, the K'oitsef scarf was worn only when it was the deliberate intention to fight a pitched and decisive battle.

Each society had its own dance, songs, ceremonial costume, and insignia, besides special tabus and obligations. The ceremonial dance of one society in each tribe was usually characterized by some species of clown play, most frequently taking the form of speech and action the reverse of what the spectators were expecting. The organization among the Arapaho, Cheyenne, Sioux, and other tribes was essentially the same as among the Kiowa. At all tribal assemblies, ceremonial hunts, and on great war expeditions, the various societies took charge of the routine details and acted both as performers and as police. Among the Cheyenne the Hotamitaneo, or Dog Men society ("Dog Soldiers"), acquired such prominence in the frontier wars by virtue of superior number and the bravery of their leadership that the name has frequently been used by writers to designate the whole organization.

Milky Wash ruin. A prehistoric pueblo ruin extending $\frac{1}{2}$ of a mile along the edge of Milky hollow, about 9 m. e. of the Petrified Forest, Apache co., Ariz. Much of the ruin has disappeared over the bluff. The houses were small and rudely constructed; the pottery is coarse and undecorated, and red, gray, and black in color; stone implements show excellent workmanship. A feature of the ruin is its stove-like fire altars. See Hough in Rep. Nat. Mus. 1901, 319-20, 1903.

Milluch. The Chehalis name of a village on the s. side of Grays harbor, Wash.—Gibbs, MS. no. 248, B. A. E.

Milly. The handsome young daughter of Hillis Hadjo (q. v.), a Seminole chief. When, in Dec. 1817, a party of Seminole captured an American named McKrimmon and carried him to Mikasuki, Hillis Hadjo, who resided in that town, ordered him to be burnt to death. The stake was set, McKrimmon with his head shaved was bound to it, and wood was piled about him. When the Indians finished their dance and were about to kindle the fire, Milly rushed to her father and upon her knees begged that he would spare the prisoner's life; but it was not until she evinced a determination to perish with him that her plea was granted. McKrimmon was subsequently sold to the Spaniards and thus obtained his liberty. After Hillis Hadjo's death, Milly, who with her father's family was captured by American troops, received an offer of marriage from McKrimmon, but refused to accept it until she was satisfied that the offer was prompted by motives other than his obligation to her for saving his life. See McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, iii, 193, 1838; Drake, Inds., 403, 1880.

Milpais. A Papago village with 250 inhabitants in 1869 (Browne, Apache Country, 291, 1869). Probably intended for Malpais (Span.: 'bad land', locally referring specifically to spread-out lava), or for Milpas ('cultivated patches').

Milpillas. Two Tepehuane pueblos, one known as Milpillas Grandes (Span. 'great little-cultivated-patches'), the other as Milpillas Chiquitas, both situated in s. w. Durango, Mexico. The inhabitants of both villages are now much mixed with whites and Aztecs.

Mimbrenños (Span.: 'people of the willows'). A branch of the Apache who took their popular name from the Mimbres mts., s. w. N. Mex., but who roamed over the country from the e. side of the Rio Grande in N. Mex. to San Francisco r. in Arizona, a favorite haunt being near Lake Guzman, w. of El Paso, in Chihuahua. Between 1854 and 1869 their number was estimated at 400 to 750, under Mangas Coloradas (q. v.). In habits they were similar to the other Apache, gaining a livelihood by raiding settlements in New Mexico, Arizona, and Mexico. They made peace with the Mexicans from time to time and before 1870 were supplied with rations by the military post at Janos, Chihuahua. They were sometimes called Coppermine Apache on account of their occupancy of the territory in which the Santa Rita mines in s. w. N. Mex. are situated. In 1875 a part of them joined the Mescaleros and a part were under the Hot Springs (Chiricahua) agency, N. Mex. They are now divided between the Mescalero res., N. Mex., and Ft Apache agency, Ariz., but their number is not separately reported. (F. W. H.)

Mines and Quarries. The term mining is usually applied to operations connected with the procuring of metals from the earth, while the term quarrying is applied to the procuring of stone. The former term sometimes refers also to the obtaining of minerals occurring in minute quantities, as turquoise, or of substances, as clay, salt, and other, not usually removed in solid or bulky bodies, especially where deep excavations or tunneling are required. Gold, silver, and copper were used by many of the more progressive American tribes before the discovery; but copper was the only metal extensively used N. of Mexico. The smelting of ores was probably imperfectly understood, even by the most advanced tribes, and iron, except in meteoric form or in the ore, was unknown. Their most important mines of copper (q. v.) with which we are acquainted were in N. Michigan penin. and on Isle Royale in L. Superior. Here the native metal occurs in masses and bits distributed in more or less compact bodies of eruptive rock. The mining operations consisted in removing the superficial earth and debris and in breaking up the rock with stone sledges and by the application of heat, thus freeing the masses of metal, some of which were of large size. One specimen, partially removed from its bed by the aborigines and then abandoned, weighed nearly 3 tons. "It was 16½ feet below the surface, and under it were poles, as if it had been entirely detached, but it had not been much displaced" (Winchell in Pop. Sci. Monthly, Sept. 1881). Another very large mass encountered in the shaft of the Minnesota mine on Ontonagon r., Mich., which had been partially removed by the native miners, is referred to by MacLean: "The excavation [ancient] reached a depth of 26 ft., which was filled up with clay and a matted mass of moldering vegetable matter. At a depth of 18 ft., among a mass of leaves, sticks, and water, Mr Knapp discovered a detached mass of copper weighing 6 tons. This mass had been raised about 5 ft. along the foot of the lode on timbers by means of wedges and was left upon a cobwork of logs. These logs were from 6 to 8 in. in diameter, the ends of which plainly showed the marks of a cutting tool. The upper surface and edges of the mass of copper were beaten and pounded smooth, showing that the irregular protruding pieces had been broken off. Near it were found other masses. On the walls of the shaft were marks of fire. Besides charcoal there was found a stone sledge weighing 36 pounds and a copper maul weighing 25 pounds. Stone mauls, ashes, and charcoal have been found in all these mines" (MacLean, Mound Builders, 76-77, 1904). The excavations were generally not deep, being merely pits, but tunneling was occasionally resorted to (Gillman). In McCargole's cave, on Isle Royale, nearly a square mile of the surface has been worked over, the pits connecting with one another over a large part of the area. Countless broken and unbroken stone sledges, mostly roundish boulders of hard stone brought from the lake shore many miles away, are scattered over the surface and mixed with the debris. As indicated by the presence of rough grooves and notches, these implements were generally hafted for use. A remnant of a withe handle was preserved in one instance, and a wooden shovel, a wooden basin, a wooden ladder, and a piece of knotted rawhide string are among the relics obtained from the ancient pits by modern miners.

In glacial times extensive surfaces of the copper-bearing rocks were swept by the under surfaces of the great ice sheets, and thus many masses and bits of the metal, more or less scarred and battered, were carried southward over Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and even farther S. These masses, deposited with the rocky debris of moraines, were collected and utilized by the natives. The masses of copper, when obtained, were probably in the main carried away to distant settlements to be worked into implements, utensils, and ornaments. The distribution of the product was very wide, extending over the entire country N. of the great plains. Cinnabar, ocher, salt, alum, and clay were mined in many sections of the country, Indians sometimes going long distances in quest of these materials. Coal was and is obtained from exposures in the bluffs, by the Hopi Indians, and there is historical testimony that it was thus procured for pottery-burning in former times. Iron oxides were extensively mined by some tribes, as is illustrated in an iron mine recently opened in Franklin co., Mo., where deep, sinuous galleries had been excavated in the ore body for the purpose of obtaining the red and yellow oxides for paint (Holmes).

The quarrying of stone for the manufacture of implements, utensils, and ornaments was one of the great industries of the native tribes. Ancient excavations, surrounded by the debris of implement-making, are of common occurrence in the United States. Flint (q. v.) and other varieties of stone sufficiently brittle to be shaped by the fracture processes were especially sought, but soapstone, mica, and turquoise were also quarried. The flinty rocks include chert (usually called flint), novaculite, quartz, quartzite, jasper, argillite, rhyolite, and obsidian (q. v.). The best known flint quarries are those on Flint Ridge, Licking co., Ohio; at Mill Creek, Union co., Ill., and in the vicinity of Hot Springs, Ark. Many others have been located, and doubtless still others remain undiscovered in the forests and mountains.

At Flint Ridge extensive beds of richly colored flint of excellent quality occur, forming the summit of the flattish ridge. The ancient pittings cover hundreds of acres, and in numerous cases are still open to a depth of from 10 to 20 ft. About the pits are ridges and heaps of debris and many shop sites where the implement forms were roughed out, and masses of fractured flint and flakage, as well as countless hammerstones used in the shaping operations (see Stone-work). The flint body was first uncovered, probably with the aid of stone, antler, and wooden tools, and then broken up with heavy stone hammers, aided by the application of heat. Similar quarries occur in Coshocton co., as well as in other parts of Ohio, and in West Virginia, Indiana, Kentucky, and Tennessee. The quarries in Arkansas are perhaps even more extensive than those in Ohio, the stone in the best known examples being a fine-grained variety of chert known as novaculite (q. v.), which occurs in beds of great thickness and undetermined extent. The phenomena of the quarries correspond closely with those of Flint Ridge (Holmes). Similar quarries of chert are found at many points in Missouri and Indian Territory (Holmes). The great group of quarries found in the vicinity of Mill Creek, Ill., presents superficial indications corresponding closely with those of the Ohio and Arkansas quarries, but the stone obtained was a gray flint, which occurs in the form of nodular and lenticular masses, mostly of irregular outline. These concretions were well suited to the manufacture of the large flaked implements—spades, hoes, knives, and spearheads—found distributed over a vast area in the middle Mississippi valley. The original pittings, excavated in the compact deposits of calcareous clay and sand in which the nodules are embedded, often reached a depth of 25 ft or more. A rude stone pick was used in excavating, and stone as well as antler hammers were employed in the flaking work (Phillips). See Flint. Quarries of quartzite (q. v.) occur in Wyoming (Dorsey); of argillite (q. v.) in Bucks co., Pa. (Mercer); of jasper (q. v.) in the same county (Mercer); and of rhyolite (q. v.) in Adams co. (Holmes). Differing in type from the preceding are the extensive quarries on Piney branch of Rock cr., in the suburbs of Washington, D. C. Here quartzite boulders were quarried from the Cretaceous bluffs for the manufacture of flaked implements (Holmes). See Quartzite.

SECTION OF FILLED-UP BOW-DOER QUARRY, D. C. HEIGHT OF QUARRY FACE ABOUT 10 FT. (HOLMES)

Steatite (q. v.), called also soapstone, was quarried at many points along the Atlantic slope of the Appalachian highland from Georgia to New York, also in the New England states, and in the far West, especially in California. This stone was easily carved, and, because it is not readily fractured by heat, was much used by the Indians for cooking vessels and for tobacco pipes. The masses of this rock were uncovered, and lumps large enough to be shaped into pots were cut out with the aid of well-sharpened picks and chisels of stone (Holmes, McGuire, Schumacher, Reynolds, Angell).

Mica (q. v.) was quarried in many places in Virginia and North Carolina, the pittings being numerous and large. The sheets of this material were used by the natives for mirrors and for the manufacture of ornaments. Building stone was required in great quantities in the building of pueblos and cliff-dwellings in the arid region, but surface rock was so readily available that deep quarrying was not necessary. Catlinite (q. v.), a red-clay stone, was extensively quarried for the manufacture of tobacco pipes and ornaments. The quarries are situated in Pipestone co., Minn., and are still worked to some extent by the neighboring Siouan tribes. The industry is not regarded as a very ancient one, although the manufactured articles are widely distributed (Catlin, Holmes).

Turquoise (q. v.) is found in several of the Western states, but so far as known was mined extensively at only two points, Los Cerrillos, near Santa Fé, N. Mex. (Blake, Silliman), and at Turquoise mtn., Cochise co., Ariz. These mines were operated by the natives before the arrival of the Spanish, as is indicated by the pittings and rude stone mining tools found associated with them. The mines were operated also by the Spaniards, and in more recent years in a desultory way by the present inhabitants of the region. The mines at Los Cerrillos seem to have been extensively worked by the aborigines. Blake, who examined the site about 1855, says: "On reaching the locality I was struck with astonishment at the extent of the excavation. It is an immense pit with precipitous sides of angular rock, projecting in crags, which sustain a growth of pines and shrubs in the fissures. On one side the rocks tower into a precipice and overhang so as to form a cave; at another place the side is low and formed of the broken rocks which were removed. From the top of the cliff the excavation appears to be 200 ft in depth and 300 or more in width. The bottom is funnel-shaped and formed by the sloping banks of the debris of fragments of the sides. On this debris, at the bottom of the pit, pine trees over a hundred years old are now growing, and the bank of refuse rock is similarly covered with trees. This great excavation is made in the solid rocks, and tens of thousands of tons of rock have been broken out. This is not the only opening; there are several pits in the vicinity more limited in extent, some of them being apparently much more recent" (Blake in Am. Jour. Sci., 2d s., xxv, 227, 1858). Silliman (Eng. and Min. Jour., xxxii, 169, 1881) speaks of finding in these mines "numerous stone hammers, some to be held in the hand and others swung as sledges, fashioned with wedge-shaped edges and a groove for a handle. A hammer weighing over 20 pounds was found while I was at the Cerrillos, to which the withe was still attached, with its oak handle; the same scrub-oak which is found growing abundantly on the hill-sides, now quite well preserved after at least two centuries of entombment in this perfectly dry rock. The stone used for these hammers is the hard and tough hornblende andesite, or propylite, which forms the Cerro de Oro and other Cerrillos hills. With these rude tools, and without iron and steel, using fire in place of explosives, these patient old workers managed to break down and remove the incredible masses of these tufaceous rocks which form the mounds already described."

Among the various works which may be consulted on the native copper mines are: Foster and Whitney in H. R. Ex. Doc. 69, 31st Cong., 1st sess., 1850; Gillman in Smithsonian. Rep. 1873, 1874; Holmes in Am. Anthropol., n. s., iii, 1901; McLean, Mound Builders, 1879; Packard in Am. Antiq., xv, no. 2, 1893; Whittlesey in Smithsonian. Cont., xiii, 1862; Winchell in Pop. Sci. Mingo (Algonquian: Mingwee, 'stealthy, treacherous'). A name applied in various forms by the Delawares and affiliated tribes to the Iroquois and cognate tribes, and more particularly used during the late colonial period by the Americans to designate a detached band of Iroquois who had left the villages of the main body before 1750 and formed new settlements in Pennsylvania, on upper Ohio r. in the neighborhood of the Shawnee, Delawares, and neighboring tribes. From that period their relations were more intimate with the western tribes than with the Iroquois, and they were frequently hostile to the whites while the parent body was at peace. They gradually moved down the Ohio, and just previous to the Revolution were living in the vicinity of Steubenville, Ohio. In 1766 their settlement, known as Mingo town, contained 60 families, and was the only Indian settlement on the Ohio from Pittsburg to Louisville (Hutchins, Descrip., 1778). From the Ohio they crossed over to the headwaters of Scioto and Sandusky rs., where they began to be known as the Senecas of Sandusky, either because the majority were Seneca or because all the western Iroquois were supposed to be Seneca. They were called Seneca in their first relations with the Government, and that name thus became their official designation, generally with a descriptive addition to indicate their habitat. About 1800 they were joined by a part of the Cayuga, who had sold their lands in New York. In Ohio one part formed a connection with the Shawnee at Lewistown, while the rest had their village on Sandusky r. The mixed band at Lewistown became known as the Mixed Senecas and Shawnees, to distinguish them from the others, who were still called Senecas of Sandusky. In 1831 both bands sold their lands in Ohio and removed to a tract in Kansas, on Neosho r., whence they removed in 1867 to Indian Territory, where they now are, the two bands being united and having no connection with the Shawnee. In 1831 the Sandusky band numbered 251, but by 1885 the entire body had become reduced to 239. In 1905 they numbered 366.

On Herman's map of 1670 is a notice of a tribe called the Black Minnecas living beyond the mountains on the large Black Minnqua r., probably the Ohio r. Formerly, by means of a branch of this river which approached a branch of the Susquehanna above the Conestoga fort (probably the Juniata r.), "those Black Minnecas came over and as far as Delaware to trade, but the Sassquahana and Sinnicus Indians [Conestoga and Seneca] went over and destroyed that very great Nation." This statement and the location make it probable that the Black Minnecas were the Erie, q. v. (J. M.)

Miniconjou ("those who plant beside the stream"). A division of the Teton Sioux. Their closest affinity is with the Oglala, Brulé, and Hunkpapa Teton. As the whites did not come into actual contact with the Teton tribes until recent times, there is no evidence as to their antiquity as distinct organizations. The first mention of the Miniconjou, unless under some unidentified name, is by Lewis and Clark (1804). These authors (Expedition, i, 61, 1814) speak of them as "Tetons Minnakenozzo, a nation inhabiting both sides of the Missouri above the Cheyenne r., and containing about 250 men." This indicates a population of perhaps 800, probably much below their actual number. Their history since they became known to the whites consists, like that of the other Sioux, of little else than war with and raids upon other tribes and depredations on the whites. They are frequently alluded to in official and other reports as among the most unruly and troublesome of the Teton tribes. Hayden says: "This band, though peaceable when ruled by good chiefs, has always been very wild and independent, seldom visiting the trading posts, either on the Platte or on the Missouri, and having no intercourse with white men except with a few traders during the winter season." They were estimated in 1850 by Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. for 1850, 142) at 270 lodges, or between 2,100 and 2,200 people. At this time, and until brought upon reservations, they roamed over the Black hills and headwaters of Cheyenne r., being usually found from Cherry cr. on the Cheyenne to Grand r. Gen. Warren (1856) estimated them at 200 lodges and 1,600 souls. The Ind. Aff. Rep. for 1863 gives 1,280 as the population. They are now located with other Sioux bands on Cheyenne River res., S. Dak., but are not separately enumerated.

The divisions given by Lewis and Clark are as follows: (1) Minnakeezzo (Miniconjou), (2) Wanneewackatoenelar, (3) Tarcoehparh. Culbertson (Smithson. Rep. 1850, 142, 1851), mentions four: (1) River that Flies, (2) Those that Eat no Dogs, (3) Shell-earring band, (4) Lejagadacah. Swift (1884), from information received from Indian sources, gives the following divisions (15th Rep. B. A. E., 220, 1897): (1) Unkcheyuta, (2) Glaglahecha, (3) Sunkayuteshni (Those that Eat no Dogs), (4) Nighetanka, (5) Wakpokinyan, (6) Inyanhaoin (Shell-earring band), (7) Shikshichela, (8) Waglezaoim, (9) Wannawegha (probably the Wanneewackatoenelar).

The Miniconjou were participants in the peace treaty of Ft Sully, S. Dak., Oct. 10, 1865, and in the treaty of Ft Laramie, Wyo., Apr. 29, 1868, by which they and other Sioux tribes were pledged to cease hostilities and the United States agreed to set apart for them a reservation.

Minnehaha. The heroine in Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's Song of Hiawatha. Her father, home, and nationality are given in the lines—

At the doorway of his wigwam
Sat the Ancient Arrow-maker,
In the land of the Dacotahs,
Making arrow heads of Jasper,
Arrow heads of chalcedony.
At his side, in all her beauty,
Sat the lovely Minnehaha,
Sat his daughter, Laughing Water.

Minnehaha of the song is the poet's own creation. Some of the elements of her creation, such as nationality and name, were suggested from a book called Life and Legends of the Sioux, by Mrs Mary Eastman (N. Y., 1849). The book contains some observations on life of the Sioux, together with a miscellaneous assortment of sentiment and romance. The scene of the events related in the narratives is on the Mississippi with the center in and around Ft Snelling. This lay on the borderland between the Sioux and the Chippewa, who at the time were constantly at war with each other. So when the Algonkin hero is told by his grandmother that the time has come for him to marry, and he replies and makes known his selection in the words that—

In the land of the Dacotahs
Lives the Arrow-maker's daughter, we have the following dialogue which may be taken as an embodiment of the underlying motive in the poet's mind in the creation of his Minnehaha:

Bring not to my lodge a stranger
From the land of the Dacotahs!
Very fierce are the Dacotahs,
Often is there war between us,
There are feuds yet unforgotten,
Wounds that ache and still may open!

For that reason, if no other,
Would I wed the fair Dacotah,
That our tribes might be united,
That old feuds might be forgotten,
And old wounds be healed forever!

The name Minnehaha is first met with in Mrs Eastman's book. In the introduction of that work she makes the statement that between Ft Snelling and the Falls of St Anthony "are the Little Falls 40 ft. in height on a stream that empties into the Mississippi. The Indians call them Minnehaha, or 'Laughing Waters.'" This is plainly the source of the heroine's name. The word Minnehaha is taken from the Teton dialect of the Dakota language. It is a compound, the first part of which is mini and means water. Mini occupies initial place in composition, as, minito blue water, minisapa black water, miniyaya water-cask. The rendering of Minnehaha as 'Laughing Water' is explained as follows: The verb to laugh is ha (h=German ch); to laugh at, ihaha; and the noun laughter is haha. Hence, Minnehaha is literally 'water laughter.' The more reasonable definition of Minnehaha is to be sought from such a source as that given in the Dakota-English Dictionary of Stephen Return Riggs, according to whom haha as a noun in compounds denotes 'cascade,' 'cataract'; hence mini-haha would signify 'waterfall.' (w. j.)

Minnepata ('falling water'). A division of the Hidatsa.

Minipata.—Matthews, Inf'n, 1885. Min-ne-pa'-ta.—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 159, 1877. Water.—Ibid.

Minnetarees of Knife River. An unidentified Hidatsa division, mentioned by Lewis and Clark (Exped., i, 330, 1814). Possibly the Amahami.

Mipshantik (Mi'-p'-cun'-tik). A former Yaquina village on the n. side of Yaquina r., on the site of Toledo, Benton co., Oreg.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 229, 1890.

Miqkano ('mud-turtle'). A subphratry or gens of the Menominee.—Hoffman in 14th Rep. B. A. E., pt. i, 42, 1896.

Miramichi. A former Micmac village on the right bank of Miramichi r., New Brunswick, where it flows into the Gulf of St Lawrence. The French had a mission there in the 17th century, and in 1760 there was a Micmac village or band of that name. (J. M.)

Mishawum (probably from mishawumut, 'a great spring'—S. D. in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 2d s., x, 174, 1823; Jones (Ind. Bul., 1867) translates it 'large peninsula'). A Massachusetts village formerly at Charlestown, near Boston, Mass. It was commonly known as Sagamore John's town, from the name of a resident chief. The English settled there in 1628. (J. M.)

Misham.—Drake, Ind. Chron., 155, 1838. Mishawum.—Pemberton in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 1st s., iii, 241, 1794. Sagamore John's Town.—Early English writers.

Mishcup. One of the New England names of the porgy (Sparus argyrops). Roger Williams (1643) gives mishcup-padog, the plural form, as the word for bream in the Narraganset dialect of Algonquian. Mishcup, the singular, is derived from mishe, 'great', and kuppi, 'close together', referring to the scales of the fish. From mishcuppadog have been derived scuppaug and scup; also porgy or paugee. (A. F. C.)

Mishikhwutmetunne ('people who dwell on the stream called Mishi'). An Athapascan tribe formerly occupying villages on upper Coquille r., Oreg. In 1861 they numbered 55 men, 75 women, and 95 children (Ind. Aff. Rep., 162, 1861). In 1884 the survivors were on Siletz res. Dorsey (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 232, 1890) in that year obtained the following list of their villages (which he calls gentes) as they formerly existed on Coquille r. from the Kusan country to the head of the stream, although not necessarily at one period: Chockrelatan, Chuntshataa-

Missiasik (on the etymology of the name, see McAleer, Study in the Etymology of Missisquoi, 1906). An Algonquian tribe or body of Indians belonging to the Abnaki group, formerly living on Missisquoi r. in N. Vermont. Whether they formed a distinct tribe or a detached portion of some known Aknaki tribe is uncertain. If the latter, which seems probable, as the name "Wanderers" was sometimes applied to them, it is possible they were related to the Sokoki or to the Pequawket. They had a large village at the mouth of Missisquoi r., in Franklin co., on L. Champlain, but abandoned it about 1730 on account of the ravages of an epidemic, and removed to St Francis, Quebec. They subsequently sold their claims in Vermont to the "Seven Nations of Canada." Chauvignerie in 1736 gives 180 as the number of their warriors, indicating a population of 800. They seem to have been on peaceable terms with the Iroquois.

Mission Indians of California. The first settlements in California were not made until more than a century after the earliest colonization of the peninsula of

VICTORIANO, MISSION INDIAN (LUISEÑO), CALIFORNIA

Lower California. The mission of San Diego, founded in 1769, was the first permanent white settlement within the limits of the present state; it was followed by 20 other Franciscan missions, founded at intervals until the year 1823 in the region between San Diego and San Francisco bay and just n. of the latter. With very few exceptions the Indians of this territory were brought under the influence of the missionaries with comparatively little difficulty, and more by persuasion than by the use of force. There is scarcely a record of any resistance or rebellion on the part of the natives resulting in the loss of life of even a single Spaniard at any of the missions except at San Diego, where there occurred an insignificant outbreak a few years after the foundation.

The influence of the missions was probably greater temporally than spiritually. The Indians were taught and compelled to work at agricultural pursuits and to some extent even at trades. Discipline, while not severe, was rigid; refusal to work was met by deprivation of food, and absence from church or tardiness there, by corporal punishments and confinement. Consequently the Indians, while often displaying much personal affection for the missionaries themselves, were always inclined to be recalcitrant toward the system, which amounted to little else than beneficent servitude. There were many attempts at escape from the missions. Generally these were fruitless, both on account of the presence of a few soldiers at each mission and through the aid given these by other Indians more under the fathers' influence. The Indians at each mission lived at and about it, often in houses of native type and construction, but were dependent for most of their food directly on the authorities. They consisted of the tribes of the region in which the mission was founded and of more distant tribes, generally from the interior. In some cases these were easily induced to settle at the mission and to subject themselves to its discipline and routine, the neophytes afterward acting as agents to bring in their wilder brethren.

The number of Indians at each mission varied from a few hundred to two or three thousand. There were thus in many cases settlements of considerable size; they possessed large herds of cattle and sheep and controlled many square miles of land. Theoretically this wealth was all the property of the Indians, held in trust for them by the Franciscan fathers. In 1834 the Mexican government, against the protests of the missionaries, secularized the missions. By this step the property of the missions was divided among the Indians, and they were freed from the restraint and authority of their former masters. In a very few years, as might have been expected and as was predicted by the fathers, the Indians had been either deprived of their lands and property or had squandered them, and were living in a hopeless condition. Their numbers decreased rapidly, so that to-day in the region between San Francisco and Santa Barbara there are probably fewer than 50 Indians. In s. California the decrease has been less rapid, and there are still about 3,000 of what are known as Mission Indians; these are, however, all of Shoshonean or Yuman stock. The decrease of population began even during the mission period, and it is probable that the deaths exceeded the births at the missions from the first, though during the earlier years the population was maintained or even increased by accessions from unconverted tribes. At the time of secularization, in 1834, the population of many missions was less than a decade earlier. The total number of baptisms during the 65 years of mission activity was about 90,000, and the population in the territory subject to mission influence may be estimated as having been at any one time from 35,000 to 45,000. At this proportion the population of the entire state, before settlement by the whites, would have been at least 100,000, and was probably much greater. See California, Indians of, with accompanying map, also Missions; Population. (A. L. K.)

Missions. From the very discovery of America the spiritual welfare of the native tribes was a subject of concern to the various colonizing nations, particularly Spain and France, with whom the Christianization and civilization of the Indians were made a regular part of the governmental scheme, and the missionary was frequently the pioneer explorer and diplomatic ambassador. In the English colonization, on the other hand, the work was usually left to the zeal of the individual philanthropist or of voluntary organizations.

First in chronologic order, historic importance, number of establishments, and population come the Catholic missions, conducted in the earlier period chiefly by Jesuits among the French and by Franciscans among the Spanish colonies. The earliest mission establishments within the present United States were those begun by the Spanish Franciscan Fathers, Padilla, Juan de la Cruz, and Descalona of the Coronado expedition, among the Quivira (Wichita), Pecos, and Tigua in 1542. Three years later the work was begun among the Texas tribes by Father Olmos. A century thereafter the first Protestant missions (Congregational) were founded by Mayhew and Eliot in Massachusetts. From that period the work was carried on both N. and S. until almost every denomination was represented, including Orthodox Russian in Alaska and the Mormons in Utah.

THE SOUTHERN STATES.—All of this region, and even as far N. as Virginia, was loosely designated as Florida in the earlier period, and was entirely within the sphere of Spanish influence until about the end of the seventeenth century. The beginning of definite mission work in the Gulf territory was made in 1544 when the Catholic Franciscan Father Andrés de Olmos, a veteran in the Mexican field, struck northward into the Texas wilderness, and after getting about him a considerable body of converts led them back into Tamaulipas, where, under the name of Olives, they were organized into a regular mission town. In 1549 the Dominican Father Luis Cancer with several companions attempted a beginning on the w. coast of Florida, but was murdered by the Indians almost as soon as his feet touched the land. In 1565 St Augustine (San Agustín) was founded and the work of Christianizing the natives was actively taken up, first by the Jesuits, but later, probably in 1573, by the Franciscans, who continued with it to the end. Within twenty years they had established a chain of flourishing missions along the coast from St Augustine to St Helena, in South Carolina, besides several others on the w. Florida coast. In 1597 a portion of the Gualte tribe (possibly the Yamasi) on the lower Georgia coast, under the leadership of a rival claimant for the chieftainship, attacked the neighboring missions and killed several of the missionaries before the friendly Indians could gather to the rescue. In consequence of this blow the work languished for several years, when it was taken up with greater zeal than before and the field extended to the interior tribes. By the year 1615 there were 20 missions, with about 40 Franciscan workers, established in Florida and the dependent coast region. The most noted of these missionaries is Father Francisco Pareja, author of a grammar and several devotional works in the Timucua language, the first books ever printed in any Indian language of the United States and the basis for the establishment of the Timucuan linguistic family. In the year 1655 the Christian Indian population of N. Florida and the Georgia coast was estimated at 26,000. The most successful result was obtained among the Timucua in the neighborhood of St Augustine and the Apalachee around the bay of that name. In 1687 the Yamasi attacked and destroyed the mission of Santa Catalina on the Georgia coast, and to escape pursuit fled to the English colony of Carolina. The traveler Dickenson has left a pleasant picture of the prosperous condition of the mission towns and their Indian population as he found them in 1699, which contrasts strongly with the barbarous condition of the heathen tribes farther s., among whom he had been a prisoner.

The English colony of Carolina had been founded in 1663, with a charter which was soon after extended southward to lat. 29°, thus including almost the whole area of Spanish occupancy and mission labor. The steadily-growing hostility between the two nations culminated in the winter of 1703-4, when Gov. Moore, of Carolina, with a small force of white men and a thousand or more well-armed warriors of Creek, Catawba, and other savage allies invaded the Apalachee country, destroyed one mission town after another, with their churches, fields, and orange groves, killed hundreds of their people, and carried away 1,400 prisoners to be sold as slaves. Anticipating the danger, the Apalachee had applied to the governor at St Augustine for guns with which to defend themselves, but had been refused, in accordance with the Spanish rule which forbade the issuing of firearms to Indians. The result was the destruction of the tribe and the reversion of the country to a wilderness condition, as Bartram found it 70 years later. In 1706 a second expedition visited a similar fate upon the Timucua, and the ruin of the Florida missions was complete. Some effort was made a few years later by an Apalachee chief to gather the remnant of his people into a new mission settlement near Pensacola, but with only temporary result.

In the meantime the French had effected lodgment at Biloxi, Miss. (1699), Mobile, New Orleans, and along the Mississippi, and the work of evangelizing the wild tribes was taken up at once by secular priests from the Seminary of Foreign Missions in Quebec. Stations were established among the Tunica, Natchez, and Choctaw of Mississippi, the Taensa, Huma, and Ceni (Caddo) of Louisiana, but with slight result. Among the Natchez particularly, whose elaborately organized native ritual included human sacrifice, not a single convert rewarded several years of labor. In 1725 several Jesuits arrived at New Orleans and took up their work in what was already an abandoned field, extending their effort to the Alibamu, in the present state of Alabama. On Sunday, Nov. 28, 1729, the Natchez war began with the massacre of the French garrison while at prayer, the first victim being the Jesuit Du Poisson, the priest at the altar. The "Louisiana Mission," as it was called, had never flourished, and the events and after consequences of this war demoralized it until it came to an end with the expulsion of the Jesuits by royal decree in 1764.

The advance of the French along the Mississippi and the Gulf coast aroused the Spanish authorities to the importance of Texas, and shortly after the failure of La Salle's expedition 8 Spanish presidio missions were established in that territory. Each station was in charge of two or three Franciscan missionaries, with several families of civilized Indians from Mexico, a full equipment of stock and implements for farmers, and a small guard of soldiers. Plans were drawn for the colonization of the Indians around the missions, their instruction in religion, farming, and simple trades and home life, and in the Spanish language. Through a variety of misfortunes the first attempt proved a failure and the work was abandoned until 1717 (or earlier, according to La Harpe), when it was resumed—still under the Franciscans—among the various subtribes of the Caddo, Tonkawa, Carri-zos, and others. The most important center was at San Antonio, where there was a group of 4 missions, including San Antonio de Padua, the famous Alamo. The mission of San Sabá was established among the Lipan in 1757, but was destroyed soon after by the hostile Comanche. A more successful foundation was begun in 1791 among the now extinct Karankawa. At their highest estate, probably about the year 1760, the Indian population attached to the various Texas missions numbered about 15,000. In this year Father Bartolomé Garcia published a religious manual for the use of the converts at San Antonio mission, which remains almost the only linguistic monument of the Coahuiltecan stock. The missions continued to flourish until 1812, when they were suppressed by the Spanish Government and the Indians scattered, some rejoining the wild tribes, while others were absorbed into the Mexican population.

In 1735 the Moravians under Spangenberg started a school among the Yamacraw Creeks a few miles above Savannah, Ga., which continued until 1739, when, on refusal of the Moravians to take up arms against the Spaniards, they were forced to leave the colony. This seems to be the only attempt at mission work in either Georgia or South Carolina from the withdrawal of the Spaniards until the Moravian establishment at Spring Place, Ga., in 1801.

The great Cherokee tribe held the mountain region of both Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee, and for our purpose their territory may be treated as a whole. Dismissing as doubtful Bristock's account, quoted by Shea, of a Cherokee mission in 1643, the earliest missionary work among them appears to have been that of the mysterious Christian Priber, supposed, though not proven, to have been a French Jesuit, who established his headquarters among them at Tellico, E. Tenn., in 1736, and proceeded to organize them into a regular civilized form of government. After 5 years of successful progress he was seized by the South Carolina authorities, who regarded him as a French political emissary, and died while in prison. In 1801 the Moravians Steiner and Byhan began the Cherokee mission of Spring Place, N. W. Ga., and in 1821 the same denomination established another at Oothcaloga, in the same vicinity. Both of these existed until the missions were broken up by the State of Georgia in 1843. In 1804 Rev. Gideon Blackburn, for the Presbyterians, established a Cherokee mission school in E. Tennessee, which did good work for several years until compelled to suspend for lack of funds. In 1817 the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, under joint Congregational and Presbyterian management, established its first station in the tribe at Brainerd, not far from the present Chattanooga, Tenn., followed within a few years by several others, all of which were in flourishing condition when broken up in the Removal controversy in 1834. Among the most noted of these missionaries was Rev. S. A. Worcester, one of the principals in the founding of the 'Cherokee Phoenix' in 1828, the author of a large number of religious and other translations into Cherokee and the steadfast friend of the Indians in the controversy with the State of Georgia. He ministered to the tribe from his ordination in 1825 until his death in 1859, first in the old nation and afterward at Dwight, Ark., and Park Hill, near Tahlequah, Ind. T. Of an earlier period was Rev. Daniel S. Buttrick, 1817-47, who, however, never mastered the language sufficiently to preach without an interpreter. A native convert of the same period, David Brown, completed a manuscript translation of the New Testament into the new Cherokee syllabary in 1825.

In 1820 the American Board, through Rev. Mr Chapman, established Dwight mission for the Arkansas Cherokee, on Illinois cr., about 5 m. above its junction with the Arkansas, near the present Dardanelle, Ark. Under Rev. Cephas Washburn it grew to be perhaps the most important mission station in the S. W. until the removal of the tribe to Indian Ter., about 1839. From this station some attention also was given to the Osage. Of these missions of the American Board, Morse says officially in 1822: "They have been models, according to which other societies have since made their establishments." As was then customary, they were largely aided by Government appropriation. On the consolidation of the whole Cherokee nation in Indian Ter. the missionaries followed, and new stations were established which, with some interruptions, remained in operation until the outbreak of the Civil war.

In 1820 a Baptist mission was established at Valleytown, near the present Murphy, W. N. Car., in charge of Rev. Thomas Posey, and in 1821 another of the same denomination at Coosawatee, Ga. A few years later the Valleytown mission was placed in charge of Rev. Evan Jones, who continued with it until the removal of the tribe to the W. He edited for some time a journal called the 'Cherokee Messenger,' in the native language and syllabary, and also made a translation of the New Testament. The mission work was resumed in the new country and continued with a large measure of success down to the modern period. Among the prominent native workers may be named Rev. Jesse Bushyhead.

After many years of neglect the Muskogean tribes again came in for attention. In 1881 the Congregational-Presbyterian American Board, through Rev. Cyrus Kingsbury, established the first station among the Choctaw at Eliot, on Yalabusha r. in N. Miss. Three years later it was placed in charge of Rev. Cyrus Byington, the noted Choctaw philologist, who continued in the work there and in the Indian Ter., for nearly half a century, until his death in 1868. The Eliot mission in its time was one of the most important in the southern country. In 1820 a second Choctaw mission, called Mayhew, was begun, and became the residence of Rev. Alfred Wright, also known for his linguistic work. On the removal of the tribe to Indian Ter., about 1830, it became necessary to abandon these stations and establish others in the new country beyond the Mississippi. Among the most noted was Wheelock, organized by Rev. Alfred Wright in 1832. Others were Stockbridge, Bennington, Mt Pleasant, and Spencer Academy. The American Board also extended its effort to the immigrant Creeks, establishing in their nation, under the supervision of Rev. R. M. Loughridge, Kowetah (Kawita) mission in 1843, and Tallahassee shortly after, with Oak Ridge, among the removed Seminole, a few years later. Most of these continued until the outbreak of the Civil war, and were reorganized after the war was over. The school at Cornwall, Conn., was also conducted as an auxiliary to the mission work of the earlier period (see New England). Among the Presbyterian workers who have rendered distinguished service to Muskhogean philology in the way of religious, educational, and dictionary translation may be noted the names of Byington, Williams, Alfred and Allen Wright, for the Choctaw, with Fleming, Loughridge, Ramsay, Winslett, Mrs Robertson, and the Perrymans (Indian) for the Creeks.

The Baptists began work in the Indian Ter. about 1832, and three years later had 4 missionaries at as many stations among the Choctaw, all salaried as teachers by the United States, "so that these stations were all sustained without cost to the funds which benevolence provided for many purposes" (McCoy). In 1839 they were in charge of Revs. Smedley, Potts, Hatch, and Dr Allen, respectively. Missions were established about the same time among the Creeks, the most noted laborers in the latter field being Rev. H. F. Buckner, from 1849 until his death in 1882, compiler of a Muskogee grammar and other works in the language, with Rev. John Davis and Rev. James Perryman, native ministers who had received their education at the Union (Presbyterian) mission among the Osage (see Interior States). As auxiliary to the work of this denomination, for the special purpose of training native workers, the American Baptist Board in 1819 established at Great Crossings, in Kentucky, a higher school, known as the Choctaw Academy, sometimes as Johnson's Academy. Although intended for promising youth of every tribe, its pupils came chiefly from the Choctaw and the Creeks until its discontinuance about 1843, in consequence of the Indian preference for home schools.

Work was begun by the Methodists among the Creeks in Indian Ter. about 1835, but was shortly afterward discontinued in consequence of difficulties with the tribe, and was not resumed until some years later.

MIDDLE ATLANTIC STATES. The earliest mission establishment within this territory was that founded by a company of 88 Spanish Jesuits and lay brothers with a number of educated Indian boys, under Father Juan Bautista Segura, at "Axacan," in Virginia, in 1570. The exact location is uncertain, but it seems to have been on or near the lower James or Pamunkey r. It was of brief existence. Hardly had the bark chapel been erected when the party was attacked by the Indians, led by a treacherous native interpreter, and the entire company massacred, with the exception of a single boy. The massacre was avenged by Menendez two years later, but the mission effort was not renewed.

The next undertaking was that of the English Jesuits who accompanied the Maryland colony in 1633. The work was chiefly among the Conoy and Patuxent of Maryland, with incidental attention to the Virginia tribes. Several stations were established and their work, with the exception of a short period of warfare in 1639, was very successful, the principal chiefs being numbered among the converts, until the proscription of the Catholic religion by the Cromwell party in 1649. The leader of the Maryland mission was Father Andrew White, author of the oft-quoted "Relatio" and of a grammar and dictionary of the Piscataway (?) language.

The New York mission began in 1642, among the Mohawk, with the ministrations of the heroic Jesuit captive, Father Isaac Jogues, who met a cruel death at the hands of the same savages 4 years later. During a temporary peace between the French and the Iroquois in 1653 a regular post and mission church were built at Onondaga, the capital of the confederacy, by permission of the league. The Oneida, Cayuga, and Seneca invited and received missionaries. Much of their welcome was undoubtedly due to the presence in the Iroquois villages of large numbers of incorporated Christian captives from the destroyed Huron nation. The truce lasted but a short time, however, and before the summer of 1658 the missionaries had withdrawn and the war was again on. In 1666 peace was renewed and within a short time missions were again founded among all the tribes. In 1669 a few Christian Iroquois, sojourning at the Huron mission of Lorette, near Quebec, Canada, withdrew and formed a new mission settlement near Montreal, at a place on the St. Lawrence known as La Prairie, or under its mission name, St. Francois Xavier des Prés, the precursor of the later St. Francois Xavier du Sault and the modern Caughnawaga. The new town soon became the rallying point for all the Christian Iroquois, who removed to it in large numbers from all the tribes of the confederacy, particularly from the Mohawk towns. There also gathered the Huron and other Christian captives from among the Iroquois, as also many converts from all the various eastern Algonquian tribes in the French alliance. To this period belongs the noted Jesuit scholar, Etienne de Carheil, who, arriving in 1666, devoted the remaining 60 years of his life to work among the Cayuga, Hurons, and Ottawa, mastering all three languages, and leaving behind him a manuscript dictionary of Huron radices in Latin and French.

In 1668 also a considerable body of Christian Cayuga and other Iroquois, together with some adopted Hurons, crossed Lake Ontario from New York and settled on the N. shore in the neighborhood of Quinté bay. At their request Sulpician priests were sent to minister to them, but within a few years the immigrant Indians had either returned to their original country or scattered among the other Canadian missions. In 1676 the Catholic Iroquois mission town of The Mountain was founded by the Sulpician fathers on the island of Montreal, with a well-organized industrial school in charge of the Congregation sisters. In consequence of these removals from the Iroquois country and the breaking out of a new war with the Five Tribes in 1687, the Jesuit missions in New York were brought to a close. In the seven years' war that followed, Christian Iroquois of the missions and heathen Iroquois of the Five Nations fought against each other as allies of French or English, respectively. The Mountain was abandoned in 1704, and the mission transferred to a new site at the Sault au Recollet, N. of Montreal. In 1720 this was again removed to the Lake of Two Mountains (Oka, or Canasadaga) on the same island of Montreal, where the Iroquois were joined by the Nipissing and Algonkin, of the former Sulpician mission town of Isle aux Tourtes. Among the noted workers identified with it, all of the scholarly Sulpician order, may be named Revs. Déperét, Güen, Mathevet, 1746-81; De Terlaye, 1754-77; Guichart, Dufresne, and Jean Andre Cuoq, 1843-90. Several of these gave attention also to the Algonkin connected with the same mission, and to the Iroquois of St Regis and other stations. All of them were fluent masters of the Iroquois language, and have left important contributions to philology, particularly Cuoq, whose "Etudes philologiques" and Iroquois dictionary remain our standard authorities.

All effort among the villages of the confederacy was finally abandoned, in consequence of the mutual hostility of France and England. In 1748 the Sulpician Father François Picquet founded the new mission settlement of Presentation on the St Lawrence at Oswegatchie, the present Ogdensburg, N. Y., which within three years had a prosperous population of nearly 400 families, drawn chiefly from the Onondaga and Cayuga tribes. About 1756 the still existing mission town of St Francis Regis (St Regis), on the S. side of the St Lawrence where the Canada-New York boundary intersects it, was founded under Jesuit auspices by Iroquois emigrants from Caughnawaga mission. The Oswegatchie settlement declined after the Revolution until its abandonment in 1807. Caughnawaga, St Regis, and Lake of Two Mountains still exist as Catholic Iroquois mission towns, the two first named being the largest Indian settlements N. of Mexico.

About the year 1755 the first mission in W. Pennsylvania was established among the Delawares at Sawcunk, on Beaver r., by the Jesuit Virot, but was soon discontinued, probably on account of the breaking out of the French and Indian war.

Philology owes much to the labor of these missionaries, particularly to the earlier Jesuit, Jacques Bruyas, and the later secular priest, Father Joseph Marcoux (St Regis and Caughnawaga, 1813, until his death in 1855), whose monumental Iroquois grammar and dictionary is the fruit of forty years' residence with the tribe. Of Father Bruyas, connected with the Sault Ste Louis (Caughnawaga) and other Iroquois missions from 1667 until his death in 1712, during a part of which period he was superior of all the Canadian missions, it was said that he was a master of the Mohawk language, speaking it as fluently as his native French, his dictionary of Mohawk root words being still a standard. Father Antoine Rinfret, 1796-1814, has left a body of more than 2,000 quarto pages of manuscript sermons in the Mohawk language; while Rev. Nicolas Burtin, of Caughnawaga (1855-), is an even more voluminous author.

The Lutheran minister, John Campanius Holm (commonly known as Campanius), chaplain of the Swedish colony in Delaware in 1643-48, gave much attention to missionary work among the neighboring Indians and translated a catechism into the Delaware language. This seems to have been the only missionary work in the Atlantic states by that denomination.

Under the encouragement of the English colonial government the Episcopalians, constituting the established Church of England, undertook work among the Iroquois tribes of New York as early as the beginning of the 18th century. In 1700 a Dutch Calvinist minister at Schenectady, Rev. Bernardus Freeman, who had already given sufficient attention to the Mohawk to acquire the language, was employed to prepare some Gospel and ritual translations, which formed the basis of the first booklet in the language, published in Boston in 1707. In 1712 the English Society for the Propagation of the Gospel sent out Rev. William Andrews, who, with the assistance of a Dutch interpreter, Lawrence Claesse, and of Rev. Bernardus Freeman, translated and published a great part of the liturgy and some parts of the Bible 3 years later. The work grew and extended to other tribes of the Iroquois confederacy, being especially fostered at a later period by Sir William Johnson, superintendent for Indian affairs, who had published at his own expense, in 1769, a new edition of the Episcopal liturgy in the Mohawk language, the joint work of several missionaries, principal of whom was Rev. Henry Barclay. From this time until 1777 the principal worker in the tribe was Rev. John Stuart, who translated the New Testament into Iroquois. On the removal of the Mohawk and others of the Iroquois to Canada, in consequence of the Revolutionary war, a new edition was prepared by Daniel Claus, official interpreter, and published under the auspices of the Canadian provincial government. In 1787 a new translation of the Book of Common Prayer, prepared by the noted chief, Joseph Brant (see Theyandanequa), who had been a pupil of Wheelock's school, in Connecticut, was published at the expense of the English Government. In 1816 another edition appeared, prepared by the Rev. Eleazer Williams, a mixed-blood Caughnawaga, sometimes claimed as the "Lost Dauphin." Mr Williams labored chiefly among the Oneida in New York. He was succeeded, about 1821, by Solomon Davis, who followed the tribe in the emigration to Wisconsin. The latter was the author of several religious books in the Oneida dialect, including another edition of the Book of Common Prayer, published in 1837. In 1822 the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, already noted, definitely transferred its operations to the Iroquois res., on Grand r., Ontario, where it still continues, its principal establishment being the Mohawk Institute, near Brantford. For this later period the most distinguished name is that of Rev. Abraham Nelles, chief missionary to the Six Nations of Canada for more than 50 years, almost up to his death in 1884. He was also the author of a translation of the Common Prayer, in which he was aided by an educated native, Aaron Hill. (See also Canada, East.)

Of less historic importance was the Munsee mission of Crossweeksung, near the present Freehold, N. J., conducted by Rev. David Brainerd for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, in 1746-47.

In Virginia a school for the education of Indians was established in connection with William and Mary College, Williamsburg, about 1697, chiefly through the effort of Mr Robert Boyle, and some Indians were still under instruction there as late as 1760. Some earlier plans to the same end had been frustrated by the outbreak of the Indian war of 1622 (Stith). Under Gov. Spotswood a school was established among the Saponi about 1712, but had only a brief existence. Both of these may be considered as under Episcopal auspices.

In 1766, the Congregational minister Rev. Samuel Kirkland began among the Oneida of New York the work which he conducted with success for a period of nearly 40 years. The Stockbridge and Brotherton missions in New York and Wisconsin by the same denomination are properly a continuation of New England history, and are so treated in this article. To a later period belongs the Congregational mission among the Seneca of New York, maintained by Rev. Asher Wright from his first appointment in 1831 until his death in 1875. A fluent master of Seneca, he was the author of a number of religious and educational works in the language, besides for some years publishing a journal of miscellany in the same dialect.

The Friends, or Quakers, in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, from their first coming among the Indians, had uniformly cultivated kindly relations with them, and had taken every opportunity to enforce the teachings of Christianity by word and example, but seem not to have engaged in any regular mission work or established any mission schools in either of these colonies.

As early as 1791 the noted Seneca chief, Cornplanter, impressed by the efforts of the Quakers to bring about a friendly feeling between the two races, requested the Philadelphia yearly meeting to take charge of three boys of his tribe for education, one of them being his own son. In 1796 the meeting began regular work among the Iroquois in New York by establishing three workers among the Oneida and the Tuscarora. These teachers gave first attention to the building of a mill and a blacksmith shop, the introduction of farm tools, and the instruction of the Indians in their use. The women were instructed in household duties, including spinning and weaving. A school was also commenced, and the work progressed until 1799, when, in consequence of the suspicions of the Indians as to the ultimate purpose, the Quakers withdrew, leaving all their working plant behind. In 1798, on invitation of the Seneca, they established a similar working mission on the Allegany res., and later at Cattaraugus and Tunesassah, with the good result that in a few years most of the bark cabins had given place to log houses, and drunkenness was almost unknown. They remained undisturbed through the war of 1812, at one time forestalling a smallpox epidemic by the vaccination of about 1,000 Indians, but were soon afterward called on to champion the cause of their wards against the efforts at removal to the W. In the meantime the New York meeting, about 1807, had started schools among the Stockbridge and Brotherton tribes from New England, then living in the Oneida country. Owing to the drinking habits of the Indians, but little result was accomplished. The removal of the Oneida and Stockbridges, about 1822, and the subsequent disturbed condition of the tribes brought about, first, the curtailment of the work, and afterward its abandonment, about 1843.

In 1740 the Moravian missionary, Christian Rauch, began a mission among the Mahican at Shecomeco, near the present Pine Plains, Dutchess co., N. Y., which attained a considerable measure of success until the hostility of the colonial government, instigated by the jealousy of those who had traded on the vices of the Indians, compelled its abandonment about 5 years later. During its continuance the work had been extended, in 1742, to the Scaticook, a mixed band of Mahican and remnant tribes settled just across the line, about the present Kent, Conn. Here a flourishing church was soon built up, with every prospect of a prosperous future, when the blow came. Some of the converts followed their teachers to the W.; the rest, left without help, relapsed into barbarism. The Shecomeco colony removed to Pennsylvania, where, after a brief stay at Bethlehem, the Moravian central station, a new mission, including both Mahican and Delawares, was established in 1746 at Gnadenhuetten, on Mahoning r., near its junction with the Lehigh. A chief agent in the arrangements was the noted philanthropist, Count Zinzendorf. Gnadenhuetten grew rapidly, soon having a Christian Indian congregation of 500. Missions were founded at Shamokin and other villages in e. Pennsylvania, which were attended also by Shawnee and Nanticoke, besides one in charge of Rev. David Zeisberger among the Onondaga, in New York. The missionaries, as a rule, if not always, served without salary and supported themselves by their own labors. All went well until the beginning of the French and Indian war, when, on Nov. 24, 1755, Gnadenhuetten was attacked by the hostile savages, the missionaries and their families massacred, and the mission destroyed. The converts were scattered, but after some period of wandering were again gathered into a new mission at Nain, near Bethlehem, Pa. On the breaking out of Pontiac's war in 1763 an order was issued by the Pennsylvania government for the conveyance of the converts to Philadelphia. This was accordingly done, and they were detained there under guard, but attended by their missionary, Bernhard Grube, until the close of the war, suffering every hardship and in constant danger of massacre by the excited borderers.

On the conclusion of peace they established themselves on the Susquehanna at a new town, which was named Friedenshuetten, near the Delaware village of Wyalusing. In 1770 they again removed to Friedensstadt, on Beaver cr., in w. Pennsylvania, under charge of Zeisberger, and two years later made another removal to the Muskingum r., in Ohio, by permission of the western Delawares. By the labor of the missionaries, David Zeisberger, Bishop John Ettwein, Johannes Roth, and the noted John Heckewelder, who accompanied them to the W., the villages of Schoenbrunn and Gnadenhuetten were established in the midst of the wild tribes within the present limits of Tuscarawas co., the first-named being occupied chiefly by Delawares, the other by Mahican. The Friedensstadt settlement was now abandoned. In 1776 a third village, Lichtenau (afterward Salem), was founded, and the Moravian work reached its highest point of prosperity, the whole convert population including about 500 souls. Then came the Revolution, by which the missions were utterly demoralized until the culminating tragedy of Gnadenhuetten, Mar. 8, 1782, when nearly 100 Christian Indians, after having been bound together in pairs, were barbarously massacred by a party of Virginia borderers. Once more the missionaries, Zeisberger and Heckewelder, gathered their scattered flock, and after another period of wandering, settled in 1787 at New Salem, at the mouth of Huron r., L. Erie, s. Ohio. A part of them settled, by invitation of the British Government, at Fairfield, or Moraviantown, on Thames r., Ontario, in 1790, under the leadership of Rev. Christian Dencke, while the rest were reestablished in 1798 on lands granted by the United States at their former towns on the Muskingum. Here Zeisberger died in 1808, after more than 60 years of faithful ministry without salary. He is known to philologists as the author of a grammar and dictionary of the Onondaga, besides several smaller works in the Delaware language.

The mission, by this time known as Goshen, was much disturbed by the War of 1812, and the subsequent settlement of the country by the whites so far demoralized it that in 1823 those then in charge brought it to a close, a small part of the Indians removing to the W., constituting the present Munsee Christians in Kansas, while the remainder joined their brethren in Ontario, Canada. The latter, whose own settlement also had been broken up by the events of the same war, had been gathered a few years before into a new town called New Fairfield, by Rev. Mr. Dencke, already mentioned, who had also done work among the Chippewa. Dencke died in retirement in 1839, after more than 40 years of missionary service, leaving as his monument a manuscript dictionary of the Delaware language and minor printed works, including one in Chippewa. The Moravian mission at New Fairfield was kept up for a number of years after his death, but was at last discontinued, and both the "Moravians" and the "Munsees" of the Thames are now credited officially either to the Methodist or to the Episcopal (Anglican) church (see Canada, East).

The Munsee who had removed with the Delawares to Kansas were followed a few years later by Moravian workers from Canada, who, before 1840, had a successful mission among them, which continued until the diminishing band ceased to be of importance. Among the workers of this later period may be named Rev. Abraham Luckenbach, "the last of the Moravian Lenapists," who ministered to his flock during a 3 years' sojourn in Indiana, and later in Canada, from 1800 to his death in 1854, and was the author of several religious works in the language. Dencke, founder of the Thames r. colony, was also the author of a considerable manuscript religious work in the language and probably also of a grammar and dictionary.

Another Moravian missionary, Rev. John C. Pyrlæus, labored among the Mohawk from 1744 to 1751, and has left several manuscript grammatic and devotional works in that and the cognate dialects, as also in Mahican and Delaware. For several years he acted as instructor in languages to the candidates for the mission service. Rev. Johannes Roth, who accompanied the removal to Ohio in 1772, before that time had devoted a number of years to the work in Pennsylvania, and is the author of a unique and important religious treatise in the Unami dialect of the Delaware.

A remarkable testimony to the value of the simple life consistently followed by the Moravians is afforded in the age attained by many of their missionaries in spite of all the privations of the wilderness, and almost without impairment of their mental faculties, viz: Pyrlæus, 72 years; Heckewelder, 80; Ettwein, 82; Zeisberger, 87, and Grube, 92.

NEW ENGLAND.—The earliest New England mission was attempted by the French Jesuit Father Peter Biard among the Abnaki on Mt Desert id., Maine, in 1613, in connection with a French post, but both were destroyed by an English fleet almost before the buildings were completed. In the next 70 years other Jesuits, chief among whom was Father Gabriel Druillettes (1646-57), spent much time in the Abnaki villages and drew off so many converts to the Algonkin mission of Sillery (see Canada, East) as to make it practically an Abnaki mission. In 1683 the mission of St Francis de Sales (q. v.) was founded at the Falls of the Chaudière, Quebec, and two years later Sillery was finally abandoned for the new site. Among those gathered at St Francis were many refugees from the southern New England tribes, driven out by King Philip's war, the Pennacook and southern Abnaki being especially numerous. In 1700 the mission was removed to its present location, and during the colonial period continued to be recruited by refugees from the New England tribes. About 1685 missions were established among the Penobscot and the Passamaquoddy, and in 1695 the celebrated Jesuit Father Sebastian Râle (Rasle, Rasles) began at the Abnaki mission at Norridgewock on the Kennebec (the present Indian Old Point, Me.) the work which is so inseparably connected with his name. He was not, however, the founder of the mission, as the church was already built and nearly the whole tribe Christian. In 1705 the church and village were burned by the New Englanders, but rebuilt by the Indians. In 1713 a small band removed to the St Lawrence and settled at Bécancour, Quebec, where their descendants still remain. In 1722 the mission was again attacked and pillaged by a force of more than 200 men, but the alarm was given in time and the village was found deserted. As a part of the plunder the raiders carried off the manuscript Abnaki dictionary to which Râle had devoted nearly 30 years of study, and which ranks as one of the great monuments of our aboriginal languages. On Aug. 23, 1724, a third attack was made by the New England men, with a party of Mohawk allies, and the congregation scattered after a defense in which seven chiefs fell, the missionary was killed, scalped, and hacked to pieces, and the church plundered and burned. Râle was then 66 years of age. His dictionary, preserved at Harvard University, was published in 1833, and in the same year a monument was erected on the spot where he met his death. The mission site remained desolate, a large part of the Indians joining their kindred at St Francis. The minor stations on the Penobscot and St John continued for a time, but steadily declined under the constant colonial warfare. In 1759 the Canadian Abnaki mission of St Francis, then a large and flourishing village, was attacked by a New England force under Col. Rogers and destroyed, 200 Indians being killed. It was afterward rebuilt, the present site being best known as Pierreville, Quebec. The Ab-naki missions in Maine were restored after the Revolution and are still continued by Jesuit priests among the Penobscot and the Passamaquoddy.

Among other names distinguished in the Abnaki mission the first place must be given to the Jesuits Aubéry and Lesueur. Father Aubéry, after 10 years' work among the Indians of Nova Scotia, went in 1709 to St Francis, where he remained until his death in 1755. He acquired a fluent use of the language, in which he wrote much. Most of his manuscripts were destroyed in the burning of the mission in 1759, but many are still preserved in the mission archives, including an Abnaki dictionary of nearly 600 pages. Father Lesueur labored first at Sillery and then at Bécancour from 1715, with a few interruptions, until 1753, leaving as his monument a manuscript 'Dictionnaire de Racines' (Abnaki) of 900 pages, now also preserved in the mission archives. To the later period belong Rev. Ciquard, who ministered from 1792 to 1815 on the Penobscot, the St John, and at St Francis; Father Romagné, with the Penobscot and the Passamaquoddy from 1804 to 1825; Rev. Demilier, a Franciscan, who labored with marked success to the same tribes from 1833 to 1843, and the Jesuit Father Eugène Vétromile in the same field from about 1855 to about 1880. Each one of these has made some contribution to the literature of the language, the last-named being also the author of a history of the Abnaki and of two volumes of travels in Europe and the Orient.

The beginning of Protestant work among the Indians of s. New England may fairly be credited to Roger Williams, who, on being driven from his home and ministry in Massachusetts for his advocacy of religious toleration in 1635, took refuge among the Wampanoag and Narraganset, among whom he speedily acquired such influence that he was able to hold them from alliance with the hostiles in the Pequot war. In 1643 Thomas Mayhew, jr (Congregational), son of the grantee of Marthas Vineyard, Mass., having learned the language of the tribe on the island, began among them the work which was continued in the same family for four generations, with such success that throughout the terror of King Philip's war in 1675-76 the Christian Indians on the island remained quiet and friendly, although outnumbering the whites by 10 to 1. Thomas Mayhew, the younger, was lost at sea in 1657, while on a missionary voyage to England. The work was then taken up by his father, of the same name, and the native convert Hiacommes. It was continued from about 1673 by John Mayhew, son of the first-named, until his death in 1689, and then by Experience Mayhew, grandson of Thomas the elder, nearly to the time of his death in 1758. Each one of these learned and worked in the Indian language, in which Thomas, jr, and Experience prepared some small devotional works. The last of the name was assisted also for years by Rev. Josiah Torrey, in charge of a white congregation on the island. In 1720 the Indians of Marthas Vineyard numbered about 800 of an estimated 1,500 on the first settlement in 1642. They had several churches and schools, so that most of those old enough could read in either their own or the English language. The last native preacher to use the Indian language was Zachariah Howwoswe (or Hossweit), who died in 1821.

As far back as 1651 a building had been authorized at Harvard College for the accommodation of Indian pupils, but only one Indian (Caleb Cheesateaumuck) is on record as having finished the course, and he died soon afterward of consumption.

The most noted mission work of this section, however, was that begun by the noted Rev. John Eliot (Congregational) among a remnant of the Massachusetts tribe at Nonantum, now Newton, near Boston, Mass., in the fall of 1646. He was then about 42 years of age and had prepared himself for the task by three years of study of the language. The work was extended to other villages, and the reports of his and Mayhew's success led to the formation in 1649 of the English "Corporation for the Propagation of the Gospel among the Indians in New England" for the furtherance of the mission. As early as 1644 the Massachusetts government had made provision looking to the instruction of the neighboring tribes in Christianity, Eliot himself being the pioneer. In 1650 a community of Christian Indians, under a regular form of government, was established at Natick, 18 m. s. w. of Boston, and became the headquarters of the mission work. In 1674 the "Praying Indians," directly under the care of Eliot and his coadjutor, Samuel Danforth, in the Massachusetts Bay jurisdiction, numbered 14 principal villages with a total population exceeding 1,000, among the Massachusetts, Pawtucket, Nipmuc, and other tribes of s. Massachusetts, each village being organized on a religious and industrial basis. The Christian Indians of Plymouth colony, in s. e. Massachusetts, including also Nantucket, Marthas Vineyard, etc., under Revs. John Cotton and Richard Bourne, were estimated at nearly 2,500 more. Most of the converts however were drawn from broken and subject tribes. The powerful Wampanoag, Narraganset, and Mohegan rejected all missionary advances, and King Philip scornfully told Eliot that he cared no more for his gospel than for a button upon his coat. Most of Eliot's work fell to the ground with the breaking out of King Philip's war in the following year. The colonists refused to believe in the friendship of the converts, and made such threats against them that many of the Indians joined the hostiles and afterward fled with them to Canada and New York. The "praying towns" were broken up, and the Indians who remained were gathered up and held as prisoners on an island in Boston harbor until the return of peace, suffering much hardship in the meantime, so that the close of the war found the two races so embittered against each other that for some time it was impossible to accomplish successful results. Of the 14 praying towns in 1674 there were left only 4 in 1684. Eliot remained at his post until his death in 1690, in his 86th year, leaving behind him as his most permanent monument his great translation of the Bible into the Natick (Massachuset) language, besides a grammar and several minor works in the language (see Bible translations, Eliot Bible). Daniel Gookin, whose father had been official Indian superintendent, was Eliot's coadjutor in the later mission period. Eight years after Eliot's death the Indian church at Natick had but 10 members, and in 1716 it became extinct, as did the language itself a generation later.

Among Eliot's co-workers or successors in the same region the best known were Samuel Danforth, sr, from 1650 until his death in 1674; Rev. John Cotton, who preached to the Indians of both Natick and Plymouth from 1669 to 1697, being "eminently skilled in the Indian language"; his son, Josiah Cotton, who continued his father's work in the Plymouth jurisdiction for nearly 40 years; Samuel Treat, who worked among the Nauset Indians of the Cape Cod region from 1675 until his death in 1717, and translated the Confession of Faith into the language; Grindal Rawson, about 1687 to his death in 1715, the translator of "Spiritual Milk"; and Samuel Danforth the younger, who labored in e. Massachusetts from 1698 to his death in 1727, and was the author of several religious tracts in the native language. These and others were commissioned and salaried by the society organized in 1649.

About 1651 Rev. Abraham Pierson, under the auspices of the same society, began preaching to the Quinipiac Indians about Branford, w. Connecticut, and continued until his removal about 1669, when the work was undertaken by a successor, but with little result to either, the Indians showing "a perverse contempt," notwithstanding presents made to encourage their attendance at the services. A few years later Rev. James Fitch was commissioned to work among the Mohegan, and succeeded in gathering a small congregation, but found his efforts strongly opposed by Uncas and the other chiefs. The mission probably came to an end with King Philip's war. Efforts were continued at intervals among the tribal remnants of s. New England during the next century, partly through the society founded in 1649 and partly by colonial appropriation, but with little encouraging result, in consequence of the rapid decrease and demoralization of the Indians, the only notable convert being Samson Occom (q. v.). The English society withdrew support about 1760. A last attempt was made among the Mohegan by Miss Sarah L. Huntington in 1827, and continued for several years, chiefly by aid of governmental appropriation (De Forest).

In 1734 a Congregationalist mission was begun among the Mahican in western Massachusetts by Rev. John Sergeant, under the auspices of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. By hard study and constant association he was soon able to preach to them in their own language, into which he translated several simple devotional works. In 1736 the converts were gathered into a regular mission town, which was named Stockbridge, from which central point the work was extended into Connecticut and New York, and even as far as the Delaware r. In 1743 Rev. David Brainerd, who had been working also among the Mahican at the village of Kaunaumeeck, across the New York line, brought his congregation to consolidate with that of Stockbridge. Mr Sergeant died in 1749, and after a succession of briefer pastorates the work was taken up, in 1775, by his son, Rev. John Sergeant, jr, who continued with it until the end of his life. The westward advance of white settlement and the demoralizing influence of two wars accomplished the same result here as elsewhere, and in 1785 the diminishing Stockbridge tribe removed to New Stockbridge, N. Y., on lands given by the Oneida. Their leader in this removal was the educated Indian minister Samson Occom. Mr Sergeant himself followed in the next year. The mission was at that time supported by the joint effort of American and Scotch societies, including the corporation of Harvard College. In 1795 the settlement consisted of about 60 families, mostly improvident, unacquainted with the English language, and "in their dress and manners uncivilized" (Aborigines Com., 1844). Besides preaching to them in their own language, Mr Sergeant prepared for their use several small religious works in the native tongue. In 1821, with their chief, Solomon Aupaumut, they removed again (their missionary being unable to accompany them on account of old age), this time to the neighborhood of Green Bay, Wis., where about 520 "Stockbridge and Munsee," of mixed blood, still keep the name. Among the later missionaries the most distinguished is Rev. Jeremiah Slingerland, an educated member of the tribe, who served, from 1849, for more than 30 years. Merged with them are all who remain of the Brotherton band of New York, made up from tribal remnants of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Long Island—Mohican, Pequot, Narraganset, and Montauk—gathered into a settlement also in the Oneida country by the same Oocom in 1786. These in 1795 were reported as numbering about 39 families, all Christian, and fairly civilized. Among the names connected with the Stockbridge mission is that of Rev. Jonathan Edwards, jr., author of a short treatise on the Mahican ("Muhhekanew") language (1788), and of John Quinney and Capt. Hendrick Aupaumut, native assistants and translators under the elder Sergeant. For the Scaticook mission see Moravians—New York.

In addition to the regular mission establishments some educational work for the Indians was carried on in accord with a declared purpose at Harvard College, Cambridge, Mass., as already noted; at Moore's charity school for Indians, founded by Rev. Eleazer Wheelock at Lebanon, Conn., in 1754, and transferred in 1769 to Hanover, N. H., under the name of Dartmouth College, and the Foreign Mission School at Cornwall, Conn., by the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, beginning in 1817. The net result was small. (See Education.)

THE INTERIOR STATES.—The whole interior region of the United States, stretching from the English seaboard colonies to the main divide of the Rocky mts., was included under the French rule in the two provinces of Canada and Louisiana, and with one or two exceptions the mission work was in charge of French Jesuits from the first occupancy up into the American period. The very first mission worker, however, within this great region was the heroic Spanish Franciscan, Father Juan de Padilla, who gave up his life for souls on the Kansas prairies, as narrated elsewhere, nearly as early as 1542 (see New Mexico, Arizona, and California). The first mission west of the Huron country was established in 1660, probably on Keweenaw bay, Mich., by the veteran Huron missionary, the Jesuit René Menard, in response to repeated requests of visiting Chippewa and Ottawa. In the next year, while attempting to reach a colony of fugitive Hurons who had called him from Green Bay, he was lost in the forest and is believed to have been murdered by the Indians. In 1665 Father Claude Allouez established the mission of Saint Esprit on the s. shore of L. Superior, at La Pointe Chegoimegon (Shaugwaumikong), now Bayfield, Wis. Besides working here among the Ottawa and Huron refugees from the older missions destroyed by the Iroquois, he visited all the other tribes of the upper lake region from the Miami and the Illinois to the Sioux. Within the next few years other missions were established at Sault Ste Marie (Sainte Marie), Mackinaw (St Ignace), Green Bay (St François Xavier), and among the Foxes (St Marc) and Mascoutens (St Jacques), the two last named being about the southern Wisconsin line. Among other workers of this period were Dablon, DuRoi, and the noted discoverer, Marquette. The mission of St Joseph on the river of that name, near the present South Bend, Ind., was established by Allouez among the Potawatomi in 1688. It continued, with interruptions, until the removal of the tribe to the W. in 1839-41, when the missionaries accompanied the Indians and re-established the work in the new field. To this later period, in Indiana, belong the names of Fathers Rézé, Badin, Deseille, and Petit. The mission at Lapointe was abandoned in 1671 on account of the hostility of the Sioux, but most of the others continued, with some interruptions, down to the temporary expulsion of the Jesuits in 1764. A mission begun among the Sioux in 1728 was brought to a close soon after in consequence of the war with the Foxes.

The first regular mission among the Illinois (Immaculate Conception) was founded by Marquette in 1674 near the present Rockford, Ill., where at that time 8 confederate tribes were camped in a great village of 350 communal houses. It was known later as the Kaskaskia mission. Other missions were established also among the Peoria, on Peoria lake and at Cahokia, opposite St Louis, with such result that by 1725 the entire Illinois nation was civilized and Christian. Besides Marquette, the most prominent of the Illinois missionaries were Rale, noted elsewhere in connection with the Abnaki mission, and Father James Gravier, who arrived in 1693 and died 12 years later of wounds received from hostile Indians, leaving as his monument the great manuscript Peoria dictionary of 22,000 words. Despite apparent success, final result in Illinois was the same as elsewhere. The Natchez and Chickasaw interrupted the mission work for years, and gave opportunity for mission by hostile northern tribes. The consequence upon the proximate of garrison posts completed the civilization, and by 1750 the former Illinois nation was reduced to 1000 souls, with apparently but one

The Indiana missions at St. Joseph (Potawatomi and Miami), Vincennes (? Piankashaw), and on the Wabash (Miami) continued to flourish in spite of the decree of expulsion, when the property was confiscated by the government, although the Jesuits chose to remain as secular priests until their death. Their successors continued to minister to Indians as well as to the whites until the disruption and the tribes to the W., between 1800 and 1810, when the work was taken up at new homes by missionaries on the new ground. The majority of the missions in Michigan and Wisconsin were kept in existence either as permanent establishments or as visiting missions by secular priests. The first of these later missionaries was Frederick Baraga, of the diocese of Hapsburg, who, after having forfeited his estates to the government, came to the Indians, and for 36 years there labored with success, at Arbre Croche and afterward at St. Ignace, Lapointe, and other places on the upper lakes, more particularly the Chippewa village of Fond du Lac bay, which he made a prosperous Christian mission. When past 60 years of age, a nobleman nobility slept in his house, sometimes walked with him, and goes to minister to the numerous devotees of the Chippewa, as well as in German and French. The author of the great history of the Chippewa, after half a century of study and authority, has written three editions. The mission of St. Ignace, on the S. boundary, is now known as the center of the Chippewa mission, and is the most noted of the missions of Rev. Baraga, and is found in importance only to that of Baraga. In 1837 Father Augustin Ravoux established a mission among the Santee Sioux at Fari-bault's trading post in e. Minnesota, learning the language and ministering to the eastern bands for a number of years. In 1843 (or 1844) he published a devotional work in that dialect, which has passed through two editions. The first regular mission station among the Menominee of Wisconsin was established in 1844, and among the Winnebago, then at Long Prairie, Minn., in 1850. For 20 years earlier missionary work had been done among them, notably by Father Samuel Mazzuchelli, whose Winnebago Prayer Book, published in 1833, is mentioned by Pilling as "the first publication, so far as I know, of a text in any of the dialects in the Siouan family." In the farther W. work was carried on among all of the immigrant, and the principal of the native tribes, the chief laborers again being the Jesuits, whose order had been restored to full privilege in 1814. As the whole country was now explored and organized on a permanent governmental basis, and the Indian day was rapidly waning, these later missions have not the same historic interest that attaches to those of the colonial period, and may be passed over with briefer notice. Chief among them were the Potawatomi missions of St. Stanislaus and St. Mary, in Kansas, founded in 1836 by the Belgian Jesuits Von Quick-enborne, Hoecken, Peter J. de Smet, and others, working together, and the Osage mission of St. Francis Hieronymo, founded about 1847 by Fathers Shoenmaker and Bax. The girls of these two mission schools were in charge respectively of the Sisters of the Sacred Heart and the Sisters of Loretto. Temporary missions were also established in 1836 and 1847 respectively among the Kickapoo and the Miami.

The remote Flatheads in the mountains at the head of Missouri r. had heard of Christianity and had been taught the rudimentary doctrines by some adopted Caughnawaga Indians, and in 1831 they sent a delegation all the long and dangerous way to St. Louis to ask of Indian Superintendent Clark that missionaries be sent among them. To do this was not possible at the time, but with persevering desire other delegations were sent on the same errand, some of the envoys dying on the road and others being murdered by the Sioux, until the request met response. In 1834 the Methodist missionary, Jason Lee, with several assistants, accompanied a trading expedition across the mountains, but, changing his original purpose, passed by without visiting the Flat-heads and established himself in the vicinity of the trading post of Ft Vancouver, nearly opposite the mouth of the Willamette, in Washington. Another embassy from the Flatheads, in 1839, was successful, and in the next year the noted Belgian Jesuit, Peter John de Smet, priest, explorer, and author, was on the ground, 1,600 Indians of the confederated tribes being gathered to await his coming. In 1841 he founded the mission of St Mary on Bitter-root r., w. Mont., making it a starting point for other missions farther to the w., to be noted elsewhere. On account of the hostility of the Blackfeet the mission was abandoned in 1850, to be succeeded by that of St Ignatius on Flathead lake, within the present Flathead reservation, which still exists in successful operation, practically all of the confederated tribes of the reservation having been Christian for half a century. The principal co-workers in the Flathead mission were the Jesuits Canestrelli, Giorda, Mengarini, Point, and Ravalli. The first three of these have made important contributions to philology, chief among which are the Salish Grammar of Mengarini, 1861, and the Kalispel Dictionary, 1877, of Giorda, of whom it is said that he preached in six Indian languages.

Next in chronologic order in the central region, after the Catholics, come the Moravians. Their work among the Delawares and associated tribes in Ohio, and later in Ontario and Kansas, was a continuation of that begun among the same people in New York and Pennsylvania as early as 1740, and has been already noted.

After them came the Friends, or, as more commonly known, the Quakers. In all their missionary effort they seem to have given first place to the practical things of civilization, holding the doctrinal teaching somewhat in reserve until the Indians had learned from experience to value the advice of the teacher. In accord also with the Quaker principle, their method was essentially democratic, strict regard being given to the wishes of the Indians as expressed through their chiefs, their opinions being frequently invited, with a view to educating them to a point of self-government. In 1804 the Maryland yearly meeting, after long councils with the Indians, established an industrial farm on upper Wabash r. in Indiana, where several families from the neighboring Miami, Shawnee, and others soon gathered for instruction in farming. For several years it flourished with increasing usefulness, until forced to discontinue by an opposition led by the Shawnee prophet (see Tenakawatawa). The work was transferred to the main Shawnee settlement at Wapakoneta, Ohio, where, in 1812, a saw mill and grist mill were built, tools distributed, and a farm colony was successfully inaugurated. The war compelled a suspension until 1815, when work was resumed. In 1822 a boarding school was opened, and both farm and school continued, with some interruptions, until the final removal of the tribe to the W. in 1832-33. The teachers followed, and by 1837 the Shawnee mission was reestablished on the reservation in Kansas, about 9 m. w. from the present Kansas City. It was represented as flourishing in 1843, being then perhaps the most important among the immigrant tribes, but suffered the inevitable result on the later removal of the Shawnee to the present Oklahoma. The work was conducted under the joint auspices of the Indiana, Ohio, and Maryland yearly meetings, aided in the earlier years by liberal contributions from members of the society in England and Ireland. The most noted of the teachers were Isaac Harvey and his son, Henry Harvey, whose work covers the period from 1819 to 1842. During the period of the "peace policy" administration of Indian affairs, for a term of about a dozen years beginning in 1870, considerable work was done by laborers of the same denomination among the Caddo, Kiowa, Cheyenne, and other tribes of Oklahoma, but without any regular mission or school establishment. The best known of these workers was Thomas C. Battey, author of 'A Quaker among the Indians,' who conducted a camp school among the Kiowa in 1873.

The Presbyterians, who now stand second in the number of their mission establishments in the United States, began their labors in the Central states about the same time as the Friends, with a mission farm among the Wyandot on Sandusky r. in Ohio, in charge of Rev. Joseph Badger. It continued until 1810, when it was abandoned in consequence of the opposition of the traders and the conservative party led by the Shawnee prophet. Morse's report on the condition of the tribes in 1822 makes no mention of any Presbyterian mission work at that time excepting among the Cherokee (see Southern States). A few years later the Rev. Isaac Van Tassel, under authority from the American Board, was in charge of a mission among the Ottawa, at Maumee, Ohio. He compiled an elementary reading book, printed in 1829, the first publication in the Ottawa language.

In 1827, under the auspices of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a Congregational mission was begun among the Chippewa on Mackinaw id., upper Michigan, by Rev. J. D. Stevens and wife, who with others afterward extended their labors into N. Wisconsin, and later were transferred to the Sioux mission. In 1829 Rev. Frederick Ayer joined the Mackinaw station, and, after two years' study of the language, opened among the Chippewa at Sandy Lake, Minn., in 1831, what is said to have been the first school in Minnesota. He is the author of a small text-book in the language. Other stations were established soon after among the same tribe, at Lapointe, Wis., Pokegama lake, and Leech lake, Minn., but seem to have been discontinued about 1845. The Mackinaw mission had already been abandoned. Rev. Peter Dougherty, under the direct auspices of the Presbyterian mission board, labored among the Chippewa and the Ottawa at Grand Traverse bay, lower Michigan, in 1843-47+ and is the author of several text-books and small religious works in the language of the former tribe.

In 1834 two volunteer workers, Mr Samuel W. Pond and his brother Gideon, took up their residence in a village of the Santee Sioux on L. Calhoun, near the present St Paul, Minn. They afterward became regularly ordained missionaries under the American Board, continuing in the work for 18 years. In the same year Rev. Thomas S. Williamson, "the father of the Dakota mission," made a reconnaissance of the field for the same Board, and on his favorable report two mission stations were established in 1835—one at L. Harriet, near St Paul, under Rev. J. D. Stevens, formerly of the Mackinaw mission, the other under Williamson himself at Lac-qui-parle, high up on Minnesota r. With Mr Williamson then or later were his wife, his daughter, and his two sons, all of whom became efficient partners in the work. In 1837 Rev. Stephen R. Riggs, with his wife, Mary, and his son, Alfred L.—all known in mission annals—joined the station at Lac-qui-parle. In the next 10 or 12 years, as the good will of the Indians was gradually won and the working force increased, other stations were established, all among the Santee Sioux in Minnesota. Among these was the one started by Rev. John F. Aiton, in 1848, at Redwing, where Revs. Francis Denton and Daniel Gavan, for the Evangelical Missionary Society of Lucerne, had established the "Swiss mission" in 1837, these two missionaries now combining forces with the American workers. In 1852, in consequence of a cession of Indian land, the eastern station, then at Kaposia, was removed by Williamson to Yellow Medicine on the upper Minnesota, and two years later, in consequence of the burning of the Lac-qui-parle station, that mission also was removed to Hazelwood, in the same neighborhood.

The work continued with varying success until interrupted by the Sioux outbreak in the summer of 1862, when the missions were abandoned and the missionaries sought safety within the older settlements. Throughout the troubles the Christian Sioux generally remained friendly and did good service in behalf of the endangered settlers. As a result of the outbreak the Santee Sioux were removed to Niobrara, N. E. Nebr., where they now reside. The missionaries followed, and in 1866 the "Niobrara mission" was organized, the work being extended to other neighboring bands of Sioux, and the principal workers being Revs. John P. Williamson and Alfred L. Riggs, sons of the earlier missionaries. Nearly all the earlier Presbyterian work among the Sioux, as among the Cherokee, was conducted through the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

To the Congregational missionaries we owe most of our knowledge of the Sioux language, their work being almost entirely in the Santee or eastern dialect. Stevens, the Pond brothers, all of the Williamsons, and Stephen and Alfred Riggs have all made important contributions, ranging from school text-books and small devotional works up to dictionaries, besides adapting the Roman alphabet to the peculiarities of the language with such success that the Sioux have become a literary people, the majority of the men being able to read and write in their own language. It is impossible to estimate the effect this acquisition has had in stimulating the self-respect and ambition of the tribe. Among the most important of these philologic productions are Riggs' Grammar and Dictionary of the Dakota Language, published by the Smithsonian Institution in 1852, with a later revision by Dorsey, and Riggs and Williamson's Dakota Bible, published in 1880, being then, in Pilling's opinion, with two exceptions, the only complete Bible translation in any Indian language since Eliot's Bible in 1663. In much of the earlier linguistic work the missionaries had the efficient cooperation of Joseph Renville, an educated half-blood. As an adjunct to the educational work, a monthly journal was conducted for about 2 years by Rev. G. H. Pond, chiefly in the native language, under the title of 'The Dakota Friend,' while its modern successor, 'Iapi Oaye' ('The Word Carrier'), has been conducted under the auspices of the Niobrara mission since 1871.

In 1821 two Presbyterian missions were established among the Osage by the United Foreign Missionary Society. One of these, Harmony, was near the junction of the Marais des Cygnes with the Osage r., not far from the present Rich Hill, Mo.; the other, Union, was on the w. bank of Neosho r., about midway between the present Muskogee and Ft Gibson, Okla. Both were established upon an extensive scale, with boarding schools and a full corps of workers; but in consequence of differences with the agent and an opposition instigated by the traders, the Osage field was abandoned after about 15 years of discouraging effort (McCoy). One of these workers, Rev. William B. Montgomery, compiled an Osage reading book, published in 1834. Among others connected with the mission were the Revs. Chapman, Pixley, Newton, Sprague, Palmer, Vaill, Belcher, and Requa. The missions conducted by the same denomination among the removed Southern tribes in Oklahoma are noted in connection with the Southern states.

In 1834 two Presbyterian workers, Revs. John Dunbar and Samuel Allis, began work among the Pawnee of Nebraska under the auspices of the American Board, and later were joined by Dr Satterlee. After some time spent in getting acquainted with the people and the language, a permanent station was selected on Plum cr., a small tributary of Loup r., in 1838, by consent of the Pawnee, who in the meantime had also acknowledged the authority of the Government. Circumstances delayed the work until 1844, when a considerable mission and a Government station were begun, and a number of families from the different bands took up their residence adjacent thereto. In consequence, however, of the repeated destructive inroads of the Sioux, the ancient enemies of the Pawnee, the mission effort was abandoned in 1847 and the tribe returned to its former wild life.

About the year 1835 work was begun by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions among the Iowa and Sauk, then residing on Missouri r. in E. Nebraska. Attention was given also to some others of the removed tribes, and about 10 years later a mission was established among the Omaha and the Oto at Bellevue, near the present Omaha, Nebr., where, in 1850, Rev. Edward McKenney compiled a small Omaha primer, the first publication in that language. Both missions continued down to the modern period, despite the shifting fortunes of the tribes. Other prominent workers were Rev. Samuel Irvin, who gave 30 years of his life, beginning in 1837, to the first tribes named; and Rev. William Hamilton, who, beginning also in 1837, with the same tribes, was transferred to the Bellevue mission in 1853, rounding out a long life with a record of half a century spent in the service. Working in collaboration these two produced several religious and linguistic works in the Iowa language, published by the Mission press from 1843 to 1850, besides a collection of Omaha hymns and some manuscript translations by Mr Hamilton alone at a later period.

The pioneer Methodist mission work in the central region appears to have been inaugurated by a volunteer negro minister, Rev. Mr Stewart, who in 1816 began preaching among the Wyandot, about Sandusky, in Ohio, and continued with such success that 3 years later a regular mission was established under Rev. James B. Finley. This is the only work by that denomination noted in Morse's Report of 1822. In 1835, with liberal aid from the Government, as was then customary, the Southern branch established a mission about 12 m. from the present Kansas City, in Kansas, among the immigrant Shawnee. In 1839 it was in charge of Rev. Thomas Johnson, and 3 years later was reported in flourishing condition, with boarding school and industrial farm. In 1855 both this mission and another, established by the Northern branch, were in operation. Smaller missions were established between 1835 and 1840 among the Kickapoo (Rev. Berryman in charge in 1839), Kansa (Rev. W. Johnson in charge in 1839), Delawares, Potawatomi, and united Peoria and Kaskaskia, all but the last-named being in Kansas. A small volume in the Shawnee language and another in the Kansa were prepared and printed for their use by Mr Lykins, of the Shawnee Baptist mission. The work just outlined, with some work among the immigrant Southern tribes (see Southern States), seems to be the sum of Methodist mission labors outside of the Chippewa territory until a recent period. In 1837 a mission was started by Rev. Alfred Brunson among the Santee Sioux at Kaposia, or Little Crow's village, a few miles below the present St Paul, Minn., which existed until 1841, when, on the demand of the Indians, it was discontinued.

In 1823 the Wesleyan Methodist Society of England began work among the Chippewa and related bands in Ontario (see Canada, East), and some 20 years later the American Methodists began work in the same tribe along the s. shore of L. Superior in upper Michigan. In 1843 Rev. J. H. Pitezel took charge of the work, with headquarters at Sault Ste Marie as the principal station. Another station was established at Keweenaw pt. about the same time by Rev. John Clark. Others were established later at Sandy lake and Mille Lac, Minn., also among the Chippewa, and all of these were in successful operation in 1852.

The earliest Baptist worker in the central region was Rev. Isaac McCoy, afterward for nearly 30 years the general agent in the Indian mission work of that denomination. In 1818 he began preaching among the Wea in Indiana, and in 1820 organized at Ft Wayne, Ind., a small school for the children of the neighboring tribes, then in the lowest state of demoralization from wars, removals, drunkenness, and the increasing pressure of a hostile white population. His earliest associate was Mr Johnston Lykins, then a boy of 19, but later distinguished as a voluminous translator and author of a system of Indian orthography. Two years later this school was discontinued, and by treaty arrangement with the Government, which assumed a large part of the expense, two regular missions were established, viz: Carey (1822) for the Potawatomi, on St Joseph r. near the present South Bend, Ind., and Thomas (1823) among the Ottawa, on Grand r., Mich. Mr Lykins took charge among the Ottawa, to whom he was soon able to preach in their own language, while Mr McCoy continued with the Potawatomi. In consequence of the inauguration of the Government plan for the removal of the Indians to the W., both missions were abolished in 1830, the work being resumed among the Indians in their new homes in Kansas. A small mission established among the Chippewa at Sault Ste Marie, Mich., under Rev. A. Bingham about 1824, continued a successful existence in charge of its founder for about 25 years.

In 1831, while the removal of the Indians was still in progress, the Shawnee Mission was established under Mr Lykins about 10 m. s. w. from the present Kansas City, among the Shawnee. In the fall of 1833 Rev. Jotham Meeker, one of the former assistants in the E., arrived with a printing press and types, with which it was proposed to print for distribution among the various neighboring tribes educational and devotional works in their own languages according to a new phonetic system devised by Mr Meeker. The work of translating and printing was actively taken up, the first issue being a Delaware primer in 1834, believed to be the first book printed in Kansas. Within the next few years small volumes by various missionary workers were printed in the Shawnee, Delaware, Potawatomi, Ottawa, Wea, Kansas, Osage, Iowa, Oto, Creek, and Choctaw languages, besides a small journal in the Shawnee language. Not alone the Baptists, but also Methodists and Presbyterians working in the same field, availed themselves of the services of the Shawnee mission press. In the meantime other missions were established among the Delawares (Mr Ira D. Blanchard, 1833), Oto (Rev. Moses Merrill, 1833), Iowa (1834?), Ottawa (Rev. Jotham Meeker, 1837), and Potawatomi (Mr Robert Simerwell, 1837), besides stations among the removed southern tribes of Indian Ter. (See Southern States.) All of these first-named were within what is now Kansas excepting the Oto mission known as Bellevue, which was at the mouth of Platte r., near the present Omaha, Nebr. At this station Mr Merrill, who had previously worked among the Chippewa, made such study of the language that within 3 years he was able to preach to the Indians without an interpreter, besides compiling a book of hymns and one or two other small works in Oto. He died in 1840. The various missions remained in successful operation until about 1855, when, in consequence of the disturbed condition of affairs in Kansas, they were discontinued. All of the tribes have since been removed to Indian Ter.

The Episcopalians appear to have done no work in the interior until about 1830, when they had a station in the vicinity of Sault Ste Marie, Mich., among the Chippewa. In 1852 a mission was established among the Chippewa of Gull lake, Minn., by Rev. J. L. Breck, and in 1856 at Leech lake by the same worker. In 1860, through the efforts of Bishop H. B. Whipple, a mission was established among the Santee Sioux at the lower Sioux agency, Redwood, Minn., in charge of Rev. Samuel D. Hinman. The work was interrupted by the outbreak of 1862, but on the final transfer of the Indians to Niobrara, Nebr., in 1866, was resumed by Mr Hinman, who had kept in close touch with them during the period of disturbance. A large mission house, known as St Mary's, was erected, which later became the central station for the work of this denomination among the Sioux and neighboring tribes. In 1870 St Paul's mission was established at the Yankton Sioux agency, S. Dak., by Rev. Joseph W. Cook, and in 1872 work was begun at the Lower Brulé Sioux agency, S. Dak., by Rev. W. J. Cleveland, and extended later to the Upper Brulé and Oglala Sioux of Rosebud and Pine Ridge agencies, S. Dak. In the meantime Rev. J. Owen Dorsey had begun to labor among the Ponca, also in South Dakota, in 1871. The work is still being actively carried on in the same field. All of the Sioux missionaries named have rendered valuable service to philology in the preparation of hymnals, prayer books, etc., in the native language, together with a small mission journal 'Anpao' ('The Daybreak'), issued for a number of years in the Yankton Sioux dialect. The ethnologic researches of Mr Dorsey place him in the front rank of investigators, chief among his many contributions being his great monograph upon the Dhegiha (Omaha and Ponca) language, published under direction of the Bureau of American Ethnology, in whose service he spent the last years of his life. In connection with the Episcopal mission may be noted the lace-making industry for Indian women instituted by Miss Sibyl Carter, chiefly among the Chippewa.

In 1847 the Lutherans, under the auspices of the Evangelical Lutheran Missionary Society of Dresden, Germany, began work among the Chippewa in lower Michigan, principally in the present Saginaw and Gratiot cos. The first mission school was opened in that year at Frankenmuth, on Cass r., by Rev. A. Craemer. In 1847 he was joined by Rev. Edward Baierlein, who, a year or two later, established a second station at Bethany, on Pine r., in Gratiot co. Here Mr Baierlein compiled a small volume of reading lessons and Scripture stories, published in 1852. In the next year he was recalled and we hear no more of the mission, which was probably discontinued soon after.

In 1846 the first Mormon emigrants crossed the plains from Illinois and, after a long and toilsome journey, settled at Great Salt lake, Utah, where they have since transformed the desert into a garden and built up a religious commonwealth which now exercises a dominant influence over large portions of the Mountain states. Their religious tradition regards the Indians as the descendants of the so-called Lost Ten Tribes of Israel (q. v.), and while no statistics are available it is known that their unsalaried missionaries from the first have given special attention to the Indian tribes, with the result that many among the Ute, Shoshoni, Paiute, and others at least nominally belong to that denomination. In 1905-6 their missionary effort was extended to the Cheyenne and other tribes of Oklahoma.

One of the most recent mission enterprises undertaken in the middle W. is that of the Mennonites, a small but influential denomination of German origin, professing the principles of peace and nonresistance common to the Moravians and the Quakers. After a short preliminary sojourn in 1877, regular work was begun among the Arapaho at Darlington, Okla., by Rev. Samuel D. Haury in 1880, the enterprise being aided by the active cooperation of the Government and local Indian agent. In 1883 another station was opened at Cantonment, about 70 m. N. W., among the Cheyenne, by Mr Haury, while Rev. H. R. Voth took charge of the work at Darlington and continued with it until transferred to a new field of duty in Arizona about 10 years later. Two other stations were afterward established among the same tribes, and provision was made for the industrial training of Indian boys in schools and private homes in Kansas. In 1890 the Cantonment mission received an important accession in the arrival of Rev. Rudolph Petter and wife from Switzerland, who at once devoted themselves to a systematic study of the Cheyenne language in the tipi camps. The schools at both principal stations were in flourishing condition until the withdrawal of Government aid compelled their discontinuance in 1902. The Cantonment mission is still kept up, the Cheyenne work being in charge of Mr Petter and his wife, assisted by Miss Bertha Kinsinger, while Rev. John A. Funk ministers to the Arapaho. There is also a small station among the Cheyenne at Hammon, in charge of Rev. H. J. Kliever, and another among the Northern Cheyenne at Busby, Mont., in charge of Rev. and Mrs. Gustav Linscheid since its establishment in 1904. To Mr Petter we are indebted for our principal knowledge of the Cheyenne language, into which he has translated some parts of the Bible, a number of hymns, and the 'Pilgrim's Progress,' besides being the author of a reading book and an extended manuscript grammar and dictionary.

THE COLUMBIA REGION.—Through the influence of Catholic Caughnawaga and of some of the employes of the Hudson's Bay Co., many individuals among the tribes of the Columbia r., particularly Flatheads and Nez Percés, had adopted the principles and ceremonials of the Christian religion as early as 1820, leading later to the request for missionaries, as already noted. The first mission of the Columbia region was established in 1834 by a party under Rev. Jason Lee, for the Methodists, on the E. side of the Willamette at French Prairie, about the present Oregon City, Oreg. In 1840 it was removed to Chemeketa, 10 m. farther up the river. Other stations were established later at The Dalles of the Columbia, Oreg., by Revs. Lee and Perkins, in 1838; near Pt Adams, at the mouth of the Columbia, Oreg., by Rev. J. H. Froot, in 1841; and at Ft Nisqually on Puget sd., Wash., by Rev. J. P. Richmond in 1842. The tribes most directly concerned at the four stations, respectively, were the Kalapuya, Wasco, Clatsop, and Nisqualli, all in process of swift decline. For various reasons no success attended the project. The children in the schools sickened and died; one missionary after another resigned and went home; and Lee, as superintendent in charge, so far neglected his duties that in 1844 he was deposed and the church board, after investigation, ordered the discontinuance of the work, which had already cost a quarter of a million dollars. The Dalles station was bought by the Presbyterians, who now entered the same field (see Bancroft, Hist. Oreg., 1, 1886).

In the fall of 1836 the Presbyterians, under the leadership of Rev. Marcus Whitman, established their first mission in the Columbia region at Waiilatpu, now Whitman, on Wallawalla r., s. e. Wash., in territory claimed by the Cayuse tribe. The site had been selected by an advance agent, Rev. Samuel Parker, a few months earlier. Rev. H. H. Spalding, of the same party, about the same time, established a mission among the Nez Percés at Lapwai, on Clearwater r., a few miles above the present Lewiston, Idaho. Early in 1839 a second station was begun among the Nez Percés at Kamiah, higher up the Clearwater, but was discontinued in 1841. Revs. E. Walker and C. C. Eells established themselves at Chemakane, n. e. Wash., on a lower branch of Spokane r., among the Spokan.

The Spokane, whose chief had been educated among the whites, proved friendly, but from the very beginning the Cayuse and a considerable portion of the Nez Percés maintained an insulting and hostile attitude, the Cayuse particularly claiming that the missionaries were intruders upon their lands and were in league with the immigrants to dispossess the Indians entirely. In consequence the Kamiah station was soon abandoned. At Waiilatpu, the main station, Whitman was more than once in danger of personal assault, the irritation of the Indians constantly growing as the flood of immigrants increased. In consequence of the continued opposition of the Cayuse and the Nez Percés, the mission board in 1842 ordered the abandonment of all the stations but Chemakane. Whitman then crossed the mountains to New York to intercede for his mission, with some degree of success, returning the next year to find his wife a refugee at one of the lower settlements, in consequence of the burning of a part of the mission property by the Cayuse, who were restrained from open war only by the attitude of the Government agent and the Hudson's Bay Co.'s officers. In the summer of 1847 the Cayuse and neighboring tribes were wasted by an epidemic of measles and fever communicated by passing immigrant trains, all of which made Waiilatpu a stopping point. Two hundred of the Cayuse died within a few weeks, while of the Nez Percés the principal chief and 60 of his men fell victims. A rumor spread among the Cayuse that Whitman had brought back the disease poison from the E. and unloosed it for their destruction. The danger became so imminent that, actuated partly also by the opposition of the mission board, he decided to abandon Waiilatpu and remove to the former Methodist station at The Dalles, which he had already bought for his own denomination. At the same time he began negotiations with the Catholics for their purchase of Waiilatpu. Before the removal could be made, however, the blow fell. On Nov. 29, 1849, the Cayuse attacked Waiilatpu mission, killed Dr and Mrs Whitman and 7 others and plundered the mission property. Within a few days thereafter, before the Indians dispersed to their camps, 4 others of the mission force were killed, making 13 murdered, besides 2 children who died of neglect, or 15 persons in all. The rest, chiefly women, were carried off as prisoners and subjected to abuse until rescued by the effort of the Hudson's Bay Co., a month later. The Catholic Bishop Brouillet, who was on his way from below to confer with Whitman about the sale of the mission property, was one of the first to learn of the massacre, and hastening forward, was allowed to bury the dead and then found opportunity to send warning to the Lapwai mission in time for Spalding and his party to make their escape, some of them being sheltered by friendly Nez Percés, although the mission buildings were plundered by the hostiles. The Spokan chief, Garry, remained faithful and gave the people at Chemakane mission a bodyguard for their protection until the danger was past. As a result of the Indian war which followed the Presbyterian missions in the Columbia region were abandoned. During the brief period that the station at Kamiah had continued, the missionary Rev. Asa Smith had "reduced the Nez Percé dialect to grammatical rules." In 1839 the Lapwai mission received a small printing outfit with which Spalding and his assistants printed small primers, hymns, and portions of scripture in the language of the tribe by the aid of native interpreters. A Spokane primer of 1842, the joint work of Walker and Eells, is said to have been the third book printed in the Columbia r. region.

As we have seen, the first Christian teaching among the tribes of the Columbia region had come from the Catholic employees of the Hudson's Bay Co., through whose efforts many of the Nez Percés, Flatheads, and others had voluntarily adopted the Christian forms as early as 1820, and some years later sent delegates to St Louis to make requests for missionaries, to which the Methodists were first to respond. In 1838 Father Francis Blanchet and Modeste Demers arrived at Ft Vancouver, Wash., on the Columbia, from Montreal, to minister particularly to the French employees of the Hudson's Bay Co., having visited the various tribes farther up along the river en route. In the next year St Francis Xavier mission was established by Blanchet on the Cowlitz, in w. Washington, and St Paul mission at the French settlement on the lower Willamet, at Champoege, Oreg., while Father J. B. Bolduc, afterward the pioneer missionary on Vancouver id., began preaching to the tribes on Puget sd. In 1841 the Jesuit de Smet had founded the mission of St Mary among the Flatheads in w. Montana (see Interior States), while a companion Jesuit, Father Nicholas Point, established the Sacred Heart mission among the Cœur d'Alènes in Idaho.

In 1844 de Smet brought out from Europe a number of Jesuits and several sisters of the order of Notre Dame. Regular schools were started and the tribes on both sides of the river as far up as the present Canadian boundary were included within the scope of the work. In the meantime Blanchet had been made archbishop of the Columbia territory and had brought out from Quebec 21 additional recruits—Jesuits, secular priests, and sisters—with which reinforcements 6 other missions were founded in rapid succession, viz: St Ignatius, St Francis Borgia, and St Francis Regis, in Washington, among the Upper Pend d'Oreilles, Lower Pend d'Oreilles, and Colvilles, respectively, with 3 others across the line in British Columbia. Of these the first-named was the principal station, in charge of the Jesuit Fathers De Vos and Accolti. In the summer of 1847 Father N. C. Pandosy and 3 others, the first Oblate fathers in this region, established a mission at Ahtanam among the Yakima in w. Washington; Father Pascal Ricard, Oblate, founded St Joseph on the Sound near the present Olympia; and in October of the same year, after some negotiation for the purchase of the Presbyterian establishment under Whitman at Waiilatpu, Father John Brouillet arrived to start a mission among the Cayuse. Hardly had he reached the nearest camp, however, when the news came of the terrible Whitman massacre, and Brouillet was just in time to bury the dead and send warning to the outlying stations, as already detailed. The project of a mission among the Cayuse was in consequence abandoned. In the next year the secular Fathers Rousseau and Mesplée founded a station among the Wasco, at The Dalles of Columbia r., Oreg. Work was attempted among the degenerate Chinook in 1851, but with little result. Father E. C. Chirouse, best known for his later successful work at Tulalip school, began his labors among the tribes of Puget sd. and the lower Columbia about the same period. With the exception of the Wasco and Chinook, these missions, or their successors, are still in existence, numbering among their adherents the majority of the Christian Indians of Washington and s. Idaho. At the Tulalip school 'The Youth's Companion,' a small journal in the Indian language, set up and printed by the Indian boys, was begun in 1881 and conducted for some years. Father Louis Saintonge, for some years with the Yakima and Tulalip missions, is the author of several important linguistic contributions to the Chinook jargon and the Yakima language. Father Pandosy also is the author of a brief 'Grammar and Dictionary' of the Yakima.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.—As all of this region was colonized from Spain, the entire mission work until a very recent period was conducted by the Catholics and through priests of the Franciscan order. The earliest exploration of the territory w. of the Rio Grande was made by the Franciscan friar, Marcos de Niza, in 1539, and it was through his representations that the famous exploration of Coronado was undertaken a year later. Five Franciscans accompanied the army, and on the return of the expedition in 1542 three of these volunteered to remain behind for the conversion of the savages. Fray Luis de Escalona, or Descalona, chose Cicuye (Pecos) for his labors. Fray Juan de Padilla, with a few companions and a herd of sheep and mules, pushed on to distant Quivira, somewhere on the plains of Kansas. Fray Juan de la Cruz stayed at Tiguex, Coronado's winter quarters, properly Puaray on the Rio Grande, near the present Bernalillo, N. Mex. On arriving at Pecos Fray Luis sent back the message that while the tribe was friendly the medicine-men were hostile and would probably cause his death. So it apparently proved, for nothing more was ever heard of his fate or of that of Fray Juan de la Cruz at Tiguex. Of Fray Juan de Padilla it was learned years afterward that he had been killed by the Quivira people for attempting to carry his ministrations to another tribe with which they were at war.

In 1580 three other Franciscans, Rodriguez, Santa Maria, and Lopez, crossed the Rio Grande with a small escort and attempted to establish a mission at the same town of Tiguex, by that time known as Puaray, but were killed by the Indians within a few months of their arrival.

In 1598 Juan de Oñate with a strong party of 100 men, besides women and children, and 7,000 cattle, entered the country from Mexico and within a few months had received the submission of all the Pueblo tribes as far as the remote Hopi of Arizona, organizing a regular colonization and governmental administration and dividing the region into 7 mission districts in charge of a force of Franciscan friars. In 1617 the Pueblo missions counted 11 churches, with 14,000 "converts." In 1621 there were more than 16,000 converts, served by 27 priests in charge of Father Alonso Benavides, whose Memorial is our principal source of information for this period. Another distinguished name of this epoch is that of Father Geronimo de Zarate Salmeron, missionary, philologist, and historian. In 1630 there were some 50 priests serving more than 60,000 Christianized Indians in 90 pueblos, with 25 principal mission centers and churches. To this period belong the mission ruins at Abó and Tabira, or "Gran Quivira" (one of which may be the San Isidro of the lost Jumano tribe), which were abandoned in consequence of Apache invasions about 1675. The entire Pueblo population today numbers barely 10,000 souls in 25 villages.

About this time we begin to observe the first signs of revolt, due partly to the exactions of the Spanish military authorities, but more, apparently, to the attachment of the Indians, particularly the medicine-men, to their own native ceremonies and religion. About the year 1650 the wild tribes, known collectively as Apache, began the series of destructive raids which continued down almost to the present century. Increasing friction between the missionaries and the military administration prevented any united effort to meet the emergency. Missionaries were killed in outlying districts and several pueblos were wiped out by the wild tribes, until in 1675, after the murder of several missionaries and civilians and the execution or other punishment of the principals concerned, the Pueblo chiefs, led by Popé (q. v.) of San Juan, sent to the governor a message declaring that they would kill all the Spaniards and flee to the mountains before they would permit their medicine-men to be harmed. Conditions rapidly grew worse, until it was evident that a general conspiracy was on foot and an appeal was sent to Mexico by the governor for reinforcements. Before help could arrive, however, the storm broke, on August 10, 1680, the historic Pueblo revolt, organized and led by Popé.

Says Bancroft (Hist. Ariz. and N. Mex., 1889): "It was the plan of the New Mexicans to utterly exterminate the Spaniards; and in the massacre none were spared—neither soldier, priest, or settler, personal friend or foe, young or old, man or woman—except that a few beautiful women and girls were kept as captives."

Those in the S. were warned in time to escape, but those in the N., E., and W. perished to the number of over 400 persons, including 21 missionaries (see list, ibid., p. 179). Santa Fé itself, with a Spanish population of 1,000, after a battle lasting all day, was besieged nearly a week by 3,000 Indians, who were finally driven off by Gov. Otermin in a desperate sortie in which the Indians lost 350 killed. The result was the entire evacuation of New Mexico by the Spaniards until its reconquest by Vargas in 1692-94, when most of the missions were reestablished. The Pueblo spirit was not crushed, however, and in the summer of 1696 there was another outbreak by five tribes, resulting in the death of five missionaries, besides other Spaniards. The rising was soon subdued, except among the Hopi, who deferred submission until 1700, but only one of their seven or eight towns, Awatobi, would consent to receive missionaries again. For the favor thus shown to Christians the other Hopi combined forces and utterly destroyed Awatobi and killed many of its people before the close of the year. The Hopi did not again become a mission tribe, but in 1742 more than 440 Tigua, who had fled to the Hopi at the time of the great revolt, were brought back and distributed among the missions of the Rio Grande until they could be resettled in a new town of their own. (See Sandia.)

In 1733 Father Mirabal established a mission among the wild Jicarilla, on Trampas r., a few leagues from Taos, N. Mex. In 1746 and 1749 attempts were made to gather a part of the Navaho into 2 new missions established in the neighborhood of Laguna, but the undertaking was a failure. In the latter year the number of Christian Indians in New Mexico, including the vicinity of El Paso, was reported to be about 13,000. By this time the territory had been organized as a bishopric, and with the increase of the Spanish population the relative importance of the mission work declined. In 1780-81 an epidemic of smallpox carried off so many of the Christian Indians that by order of the governor the survivors were the next year concentrated into 20 missions, the other stations being discontinued. As the Indians assimilated with the Spanish population the missions gradually took on the character of ordinary church establishments, the Franciscans being superseded by secular priests. The majority of the Pueblo Indians of to-day, excepting those of Hopi and Zuni, are at least nominal Christians.

In the more recent historic period work has also been conducted at several pueblos by various Protestant denominations. In 1854 a Baptist minister, Rev. Samuel Gorman, began a mission at Laguna, N. Mex., which was kept up for several years. In 1894 Rev. C. P. Coe, of the same denomination, began a similar work for the Hopi of Arizona. The Mennonites, represented by Rev. H. R. Voth, had begun a year earlier at Oraibi a successful work among the Hopi, which is still carried on, being now in charge of Revs. Jacob Epp and John B. Frey.

About the year 1876 the Presbyterians, through Rev. John Menaul, established a mission at Laguna, the undertaking being afterward extended to Jemez and Zufli, N. Mex., besides an industrial school opened at Albuquerque in 1881. By means of a printing press operated at Laguna, with the aid of Indian pupils, several small devotional and reading books have been published by Menaul and Bercovitz, connected with the mission, which still continues.

With the exception of those among the Hopi, before the great revolt, the only missions in Arizona before the transfer of the territory to the United States were two in number, viz.: San Xavier del Bac and San Miguel de Guevavi, established under Jesuit auspices on the upper waters of Santa Cruz r., among a subtribe of the Pima, about 1732.

The Pima missions were a northern extension of the Jesuit mission foundation of northern Sonora, Mexico. The noted German Jesuit explorer, Father Eusebio Kino (properly Kühne), made several missionary expeditions into s. Arizona between 1692 and his death in 1710, but so far as known no regular stations were established until long after his death, the first priests in charge in 1732 being two other Germans, Father Felipe Segesser, at Bac, and Father Juan Grashoffer, at Guevavi. Besides the main establishment, several other Indian villages were designated as 'visitas,' or visiting stations. The Pima mission never flourished. In 1750 the tribes revolted and the missions were plundered, most of the missionaries escaping, and by the time peace was restored the contest had begun against the Jesuits, which resulted in the expulsion of the order from Spanish territory in 1767. Their place was at once filled by the Franciscans, but the work languished and steadily declined under the attacks from the wild tribes. About the year 1780 Guevavi was abandoned in consequence of Apache raids, and Tumacacori, in the same general region, was made mission headquarters. The work came to an end by decree of the revolutionary government in 1828, shortly after the transfer of authority from Spain to Mexico.

CALIFORNIA.—As in other parts of Spanish America, the Catholics were the sole mission workers in California until within a very recent period. The most noted of all the Spanish missions were the Franciscan missions of California, whose story is so closely interwoven with the history and romance of the Pacific coast, and whose ruins still stand as the most picturesque landmarks of the region. Their story has been told so often that we need not here go into details. The first one was established in 1769 at San Diego, near the s. boundary, by Father Junípero Serra (to whose memory a monument was erected at Monterey in 1891), who advanced slowly along the coast and passed the work on to his successors, until in 1828 there was a chain of 21 prosperous missions extending northward to beyond San Francisco bay. The full list, in the order of their establishment, with the names of the founders or superiors in charge of the California mission district at the time, is as follows: 1, San Diego de Alcalá (Serra, 1769); 2, San Carlos Borromeo de Monterey, alias Carmel (Serra, 1770); 3, San Antonio de Pádua (Serra, 1771, July); 4, San Gabriel Arcangel (Serra, 1771, Sept.); 5, San Luis Obispo de Tolosa (Serra, 1772); 6, San Francisco de Asis, alias Dolores (Serra, 1776, Oct.); 7, San Juan Capistrano (Serra, 1776, Nov.); 8, Santa Clara (Serra, 1777); 9, San Buenaventura (Serra, 1782); 10, Santa Barbara (Palou, 1786); 11, La Purísima Concepcion (Palou, 1787); 12, Santa Cruz (Palou, 1791, Sept.); 13, Nuestra Señora de la Soledad (Palou, 1791, Oct.); 14, San José (Lasuen, 1797, June 11); 15, San Juan Bautista (Lasuen, 1797, June 24); 16, San Miguel (Lasuen, 1797, July); 17, San Fernando Rey (Lasuen, 1797, Sept.); 18, San Luis Rey de Francia (Peyri, 1798); 19, Santa Inez (Tapis, 1804); 20, San Rafael (Payeras, 1817); 21, San Francisco Solano, alias San Solano or Sonoma (Sonoma, 1823); 22, La Purísima Concepcion, on lower Colorado r. (Garcés, 1780); 23, San Pedro y San Pablo de Bicuñer, on lower Colorado r., possibly in Lower California (Garcés, 1780).

Among the many devoted workers connected with the California missions during the 65 years of their existence the most prominent, after Serra, are Fathers Crespi, Palou, and Peyri, the last-named being the founder, and for a number of years the superior, of San Luis Rey, which shared with San Diego the honor of being the largest and most important of the series. In 1810 the neophyte population of San Diego was 1,611, while that of San Luis Rey was 1,519.

The mission buildings, constructed entirely by Indian labor under supervision of the fathers, were imposing structures of brick and stone, some of which even in their roofless condition have defied the decay of 70 years. Around each mission, except in the extreme N., were groves of palms, bananas, oranges, olives, and figs, together with extensive vineyards, while more than 400,000 cattle ranged the pastures. Workshops, schoolrooms, store-rooms, chapels, dormitories, and hospitals were all provided for, and in addition to religious instruction and ordinary school studies, weaving, pottery-making, carpentry, and every other most useful trade and occupation were taught to the neophytes, besides the violin and other instruments to those who displayed aptitude in music. There were fixed hours for prayers and work, with three hours of rest at noon, and dancing and other amusements after supper and the angelus, which was one hour before sunset. The diet consisted of an abundance of fresh beef, mutton, wheat and corn bread, and beans, from their own herds and plantations. From the sale of the surplus were bought clothing, tobacco, and trinkets for the Indians, and the necessary church supplies. At seasonable intervals there were outing excursions to allow the neophytes to visit their wilder relatives in the hills. The missionaries taught by practical example at the plow, the brick-kiln, and in the vineyard. Duflot de Mofras, who made an official tour of the missions on behalf of the French government shortly before their utter ruin, says: "Necessity makes the missionaries industrious. One is struck with astonishment at seeing that with such small resources, generally without any European workmen, and with the aid of savage populations whose intelligence was of the lowest order and who were often hostile, besides the vast agricultural culture, they have been able to execute such extensive works of architecture and mechanical structures, such as mills, machinery, and workshops, besides bridges, roads, and canals for irrigation. The construction of almost all these missions required that timber, often cut upon steep mountains, should be brought 25 to 30 miles, and that the Indians should be taught how to make lime, cut stone, and mould bricks. This fact can not be mistaken—it was not merely by proselytism that the old missionaries succeeded in attracting the Indians. In the work of their conversion, if religion was the end, material comfort was the means. The missionaries had re-solved the great problem of making labor attractive."

The Indians themselves, of many tribes and dialects, were for the most part unwarlike and tractable, but without native energy, and probably, in their original condition, lower in the scale of civilization and morality than any others within the limits of the United States. Infanticide prevailed to such a degree that even the most earnest efforts of the missionaries were unable to stamp it out, the fact showing how little the new teaching really affected the deeper instinct of the savage. Although there were frequent raids by the wild tribes, there was little serious opposition to mission discipline, which was supported when necessary by military assistance from the nearest garrison. Despite regular life, abundance of food, and proper clothing according to the season, the Indian withered away under the restrictions of civilization supplemented by epidemic diseases introduced by the military garrisons or the seal hunters along the coast. The death rate was so enormous in spite of apparent material advancement that it is probable that the former factor alone would have brought about the extinction of the missions within a few generations.

But all this prosperity at last excited the cupidity of the recently established revolutionary government of Mexico, and in 1833-34 decrees were passed to "secularize" the missions and to expel the missionaries, who, as Spaniards, were hated by the revolutionists. The mission funds and vast herds were confiscated, the lands were distributed to eager political adventurers, and minor vandals completed the work of destruction, by taking even the tiles from the roofs and digging up the vines and fruit trees in the gardens. Some abortive provision was made for the Indians, of which in their helplessness they were unable to avail themselves, and in a few years, left without their protectors, they had again scattered to the mountains and swamps or sunk into the lowest degradation in the new mining towns. In 1834, when the blow came, the California missions had 30,650 Indians, with 424,000 cattle, 62,500 horses and mules; 321,900 sheep, goats, and hogs; and produced 122,500 bushels of wheat and corn. In 1842 there remained only 4,450 Indians, 28,220 cattle, and the rest in proportion. To-day, according to official report, there remain of the old Mission Indians only 2,855, whose condition is a subject of constant serious concern to philanthropists.

Two other California missions have a briefer history. In 1780 the military commander of the Sonora district determined to establish among the warlike Yuma two garrison posts with colony and mission attachments, despite the protests of the missionaries concerned, who foresaw that the combination would be disastrous to their own part of the work. Two sites were selected, however, in the fall of the year on the W. bank of the Colorado—the one, La Purísima Concepción, occupying the site of old Ft Yuma, the other, San Pedro y Pablo de Bicuñer, being 8 or 10 m. lower down, possibly just across the present Mexican border. Purísima mission was placed in charge of Father Francisco Garcés, the explorer, with Father Juan Barreneche as his assistant, while the other was given over to Fathers Diaz and Moreno. The event was as predicted. Within a year the Yuma were roused to hostility by the methods and broken promises of the military commander. In July, 1781, both settlements were attacked almost simultaneously, the buildings plundered and burned, the commander and every man of the small garrison killed after a desperate resistance, the four missionaries and nearly all the men of the colonies also butchered, and the women and several others carried off as captives. A subsequent expedition rescued the captives and buried the dead, but the Yuma remained unsubdued and the colony undertaking was not renewed. ALASKA.—Alaska was discovered by the Russians in 1741 and remained a possession of Russia until transferred to the United States in 1867. In 1794 regular missionary work was begun among the Aleut on Kodiak id. by monks of the Greek Catholic (Russian orthodox) church, under the Archimandrite Joaseaf, with marked success among the islanders, but with smaller result among the more warlike tribes of the mainland. Within a few years the savage Aleut were transformed to civilized Christians, many of whom were able to read, write, and speak the Russian language. Among the pioneer workers were Fathers Juvenal, murdered in 1796 by the Eskimo for his opposition to polygamy, and the distinguished John Veniaminof, 1823 to about 1840, the historian and philologist of the Alaskan tribes, and author of a number of religious and educational works in the Aleut and Tlingit languages, including an Aleut grammar and a brief dictionary. Fathers Jacob Netzevoff and Elias Tishnoff also have made several translations into the Aleut language. About the time of the transfer to the United States the Christian natives numbered 12,000, served by 27 priests and deacons, with several schools, including a seminary at Sitka. Chapels had been established in every important settlement from Prince William id. to the outermost of the Aleutian ids., a distance of 1,800 m., besides other stations on the Yukon. Kuskokwim, and Nushagak rs., and regular churches at Sitka, Killisnoo, and Juneau. In 1902 the Greek church had 18 ministers at work in Alaska. (See Russian influence.)

The first Protestant missions after the transfer to the United States were begun by the Presbyterians in 1877, under the supervision of Rev. Sheldon Jackson and Mrs. A. R. McFarland, with headquarters at Ft. Wrangell, where a school had already been organized by some Christian Indians from the Methodist station at Ft. Simpson, Brit. Col. Within the next 18 years some 15 stations had been established among the Indians of the s. coast and islands, besides two among the Eskimo, at Pt. Barrow and on St. Lawrence id. Among the earliest workers, besides those already named, were Rev. J. G. Brady, Rev. E. S. Willard, and Mr. Walter Stiles. The principal schools were at Sitka (1878) and Juneau (1886). At Pt. Barrow a herd of imported reindeer added to the means of subsistence. The majority of these missions are still in successful operation.

The next upon the ground were the Catholics, who made their first establishment at Wrangell in 1878, following with others at Sitka, Juneau, and Skagway. In 1886-87 they entered the Yukon region, with missions at Nulato on the Yukon, St. Ignatius on the Kuskokwim, St. Mary's (Akularak), St. Michael, Nome, Kusilvak id., Nelson id., Holy Cross (Koserefsky), and others, the largest schools being those at Koserefsky and Nulato. With the exception of Nulato all were in Eskimo territory. In 1903 the work was in charge of 12 Jesuits and lay brothers, assisted by 11 sisters of St. Anne. The Innu grammar and dictionary of Father Francis Barnum (1901) ranks as one of the most important contributions to Eskimo philology.

In 1884 the Moravians, pioneer workers among the eastern Eskimo, sent a commission to look over the ground in Alaska, and as a result a mission was established at Kevinak among the Eskimo of Kuskokwim r. in the next year by Revs. W. H. Weinland and J. H. Kilbuck, with their wives. In the same year other stations were established at Kolmakof, on the upper Kuskokwim, for Eskimo and Indians together, and farther s., at Carmel, on Nushagak r. In 1903 there were 5 mission stations in Eskimo territory, in charge of 13 white workers, having 21 native assistants, with Rev. Adolf Stecker as superintendent. The reindeer herd numbered nearly 400.

In 1886 the Episcopalians began work with a school at St. Michael, on the coast (Eskimo), which was removed next year to Anvik, on the Yukon, in charge of Rev. and Mrs. Octavius Parker and Rev. J. H. Chapman. In 1890 a mission school was started at Pt. Hope (Eskimo), under Dr. J. B. Driggs, and about the same time another among the Tanana Indians in the middle Yukon valley, by Rev. and Mrs. T. H. Canham. In 1903 the Episcopalians in Alaska, white and native, counted 13 churches, a boarding school, and 7 day schools, with a total working force of 31.

The Baptists also began work in 1886 on Kodiak id., under Mr W. E. Roscoe. In 1893 a large orphanage was erected on Wood id., opposite Kodiak, by the Woman's Home Mission Society, its sphere of influence now including a great part of the Alaska peninsula westward from Mt St Elias.

The Methodists, beginning also in 1886, have now several stations in s. e. Alaska, together with the flourishing Jesse Lee Industrial Home, under the auspices of the Methodist Woman's Home Mission Society, on Unalaska id.

In 1887 the Swedish Evangelical Union of Sweden, through Revs. Axel Karlson and Adolf Lydell, respectively, established stations at Unalaklik on Bering sea (Eskimo) and at Yakutat, on the s. coast among the Tlingit. In 1900, in consequence of an epidemic, an orphanage was founded on Golofnin bay. The civilizing and Christianizing influence of the Swedish mission is manifest over a large area.

In 1887 the Kansas Yearly Meeting of Friends began work on Douglas id., near Juneau, through Messrs E. W. Weesner and W. H. Bangham, chiefly for the white population. In 1892 a school was opened among the Kake Indians of Kuiu and Kupreanof ids., under the auspices of the Oregon meeting, and in 1897 another mission, under the auspices of the California meeting, was established among the Eskimo in Kotzebue sd. Here also is now a large reindeer herd.

In 1890 the Congregationalists, under auspices of the American Missionary Association, established the Eskimo mission school of Wales, at C. Prince of Wales, on Bering str., under Messrs W. T. Lopp and H. R. Thornton, the latter of whom was afterward assassinated by some rebellious pupils. In 1902 the school was in prosperous condition, with more than a hundred pupils and a herd of about 1,200 reindeer.

In 1900 the Lutherans, under the auspices of the Norwegian Evangelical Church, established an orphanage at the Teller reindeer station, Port Clarence, Bering str., under Rev. T. L. Brevig, assisted by Mr A. Hovick, the missionaries having charge also of the Government reindeer herds at the place. It was at Teller station that Rev. Sheldon Jackson, in 1892, inaugurated the experiment of introducing Siberian reindeer to supplement the rapidly diminishing food supply of the natives, as the whale had been practically exterminated from the Alaska coast. The experiment has proved a complete success, the original imported herd of 53 animals having increased to more than 15,000, with promise of solving the problem of subsistence for the Eskimo as effectually as was done by the sheep introduced by the old Franciscans among the Pueblos and through them the Navaho.

PRESENT CONDITIONS.—It may be said that at present practically every tribe officially recognized within the United States is under the missionary influence of some religious denomination, workers of several denominations frequently laboring in the same tribe. The complete withdrawal of Government aid to denominational schools some years ago for a time seriously crippled the work and obliged some of the smaller bodies to abandon the mission field entirely. The larger religious bodies have met the difficulty by special provision, notably in the case of the Catholics, by means of aid afforded by the Preservation Society, the Marquette League, and by the liberality of Mother Katharine Drexel, founder of the Order of the Blessed Sacrament, for Indian and Negro mission work. The Catholic work is organized under supervision of the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions, established in 1874, with headquarters at Washington. The report for 1904 shows a total of 178 Indian churches and chapels served by 152 priests; 71 boarding and 26 day schools, with 109 teaching priests, 384 sisters, and 138 other religious or secular teachers and school assistants. The principal orders engaged are the Jesuits, Franciscans, and Benedictines, and the sisters of the orders of St Francis, St Anne, St Benedict, St Joseph, Mercy, and Blessed Sacrament.

Of the other leading denominations engaged in Indian mission work within the United States proper, according to the official Report of the Board of Indian Commissioners for 1903, the Presbyterians come first, with 101 churches, 69 ordained missionaries and a proportionate force of other workers, and 32 schools. Next the Methodists, with 40 ordained missionaries, but with only one school; Episcopalians, 14 missions, 28 ordained missionaries, and 17 schools; Baptists, 14 missions, 15 ordained missionaries, and 4 schools—exclusive of the Southern Baptists, not reported; Congregationalists (American Missionary Association), 10 missions, 12 ordained missionaries, and 5 schools; Friends, 10 missions, 15 ordained missionaries, and 1 school; Mennonites, 5 missions, 6 ordained missionaries, but no school; Moravians, 3 missions, 3 ordained missionaries, and no school. Statistics for any other denominations, including the Mormons, are not given. The missionary work of each denomination reported is in charge of a central organization.

CANADA, EAST; NEWFOUNDLAND, ETC.—Canada, being originally a French possession, the mission work for a century and a half was almost entirely with the Catholics. Port Royal, now Annapolis, Nova Scotia, was founded in 1605, and the resident priest, Father Flèche, divided his attention between the French settlers and the neighboring Micmac. In 1611 the Jesuits, Fathers Peter Biard and Enemond Masse, arrived from France, but finding work among the Micmac made difficult by the opposition of the governor, they went to the Abnaki, among whom they established a mission on Mt Desert id., Maine, in 1613. The mission was destroyed in its very beginning by the English Captain Argall (see New England). In 1619 work was resumed among the Micmac and the Malecite of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and lower Quebec under the Récollet Franciscans and continued for at least half a century. The most distinguished of these Récollets was Father Chrestien Le Clercq, who, while stationed at the Micmac mission of Gaspé, at the mouth of the St Lawrence, from 1655 to about 1665, mastered the language and devised for it a system of hieroglyphic writing which is still in use in the tribe. Another of the same order is said to have been the first to compile a dictionary of a Canadian language, but the work is now lost. The eastern missions continued, under varying auspices and fortunes, until the taking of Louisbourg, Nova Scotia, by the English in 1745, when all the missionaries in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were either deported or compelled to seek other refuge. In their absence the Abbé Maillard, of Nova Scotia, ministered for some years to the Micmac and the Malecite, at first in secret and then openly after the peace of 1760. To him we owe a Micmac grammar and a treatise on the customs of the Indians. It was not until within the last century, when international and sectarian jealousies had largely passed away, that the work was resumed, continuing without interruption to the present time.

Work was begun in 1615 by the Récollets among the roving Montagnais and Algonkin of the Saguenay, Ottawa, and lower St Lawrence region. The pioneers were Fathers Dolbeau, Jamet, and Du Plessis, together with Father Le Caron in the Huron field. In 1636 Dolbeau had extended his ministrations to the outlying bands of the remote Eskimo of Labrador. The principal missions were established at Tadoussac (Montagnais), the great trading resort at the mouth of the Saguenay; Gaspé (Montagnais and Micmac) and Three Rivers (Montagnais and Algonkin), all in Quebec province; Miscou, N. B., for the Micmac, and on Georgian bay for the Hurons. In 1625 the Récollets called the Jesuits to their aid, and a few years later withdrew entirely, leaving the work to be continued by the latter order. In 1637 the Jesuit mission of St Joseph was founded by Le Jeune at Sillery, near Quebec, and soon became the most important colony of the christianized Montagnais and Algonkin. In 1648, at the request of the Abnaki, Father Gabriel Druliettes was sent to that tribe. In consequence of the later New England wars, large numbers of the Abnaki and other more southerly tribes took refuge in the Canadian missions (see New England).

In 1641 Fathers Charles Raymbault and Isaac Jogues, among the Ottawa bands on the headwaters of the river of that name, accompanied a party to the far W. and discovered the great L. Superior, planting a cross and preaching in the camps about the present Sault Ste Marie, Mich. In the next year a regular mission was established among the Nipissing, on the N. shore of the lake of the same name. Other missions followed, continuing until the dispersion of the Algonkin tribes by the Iroquois in 1650. Most of the fugitives fled westward, roving along the shores of L. Superior without missionary attention until visited by the Jesuit Allouez in 1667. Other names connected with this early Algonkin mission were those of Pijart, Garreau, and the pioneer explorer René Ménard. In 1657 the first Sulpicians arrived at Quebec from France, and soon afterward began work among the neighboring tribes, but with principal attention to the Iroquois colonies on both shores of L. Ontario, at Quinté and Oswegatchie (see New York). To this period belongs the wonderful canoe voyage of discovery by the two Sulpicians, Galinée and Dollier de Casson, in 1669–70, from Montreal up through the great lakes to Mackinaw, where they were welcomed by the Jesuits Dablon and Marquette, and then home, by way of French r., Nipissing, and the Ottawa. No less important was the discovery of an overland route from the St Lawrence to Hudson bay in 1671–72 by the Sieur St Simon, accompanied by the Jesuit Charles Albanel. Ascending the Saguenay from Tadoussac they crossed the divide, and after 10 months of toilsome travel finally reached the bay near the mouth of Rupert r., where Albanel, the first missionary to penetrate this remote region, spent some time preaching and baptizing among the wandering Maskegon along the shore. In 1720 a number of the christianized Iroquois, with fragments of the Algonkin bands, after years of shifting about, were gathered into a new mission settlement at Oka, or Lake of the Two Mountains (Lac des Deux Montagnes), also known under its Iroquois name of Canasadaga, on the N. bank of the St Lawrence, above the island of Montreal. It still exists as one of the principal Indian settlements.

Among the earlier missionaries in this region who have made important contributions to Algonquian philology may be noted: Father Louis André, Jesuit, who spent more than 40 years with the Montagnais and the Algonkin, from 1669, leaving behind him a manuscript dictionary of the Algonkin, besides a great body of other material; Father Antonio Silvy, Jesuit, of the same period, author of a manuscript Montagnais dictionary; Father Pierre Laure, Jesuit, with the Montagnais, 1720-38, author of a manuscript Montagnais grammar and dictionary, and other works; Father Jean Mathevet, Sulpician, at Oka, 1746 to 1781, the author of an Abnaki dictionary; Father Vincent Guichart, ministering to Algonkin and Iroquois at Oka from 1754 until his death in 1793, master of both languages and author of a manuscript Algonkin grammar; the Abbé Thavenet, Sulpician, at Oka, from about 1793 to 1815, author of an Algonkin grammar and dictionary and other miscellany, still in manuscript; Father J. B. La Brosse, Jesuit, with the Montagnais and Malecite, 1754 to his death in 1782, author of a number of religious and teaching works in the Montagnais language. Among the most distinguished laborers within the last century in the Montagnais, Algonkin, and Maskegon territories, stretching from the St Lawrence to Hudson bay, may be named Fathers Durocher (1829-73), Garin (1845-57), Laverlochère (1845-51), Lebrét (1861-69), Guéguen (1864-88+), and Prévost (1873-88+), all of the Oblate order, and each the author of some important contribution to American philology. Rev. Charles Guay has given attention to the language among the Micmac of New Brunswick. In recent years the most prominent name is that of Father J. A. Cuoq, Sulpician, already noted, missionary at Oka for more than half a century, beginning in 1847, master of the Mohawk and Algonkin languages, and author of a dictionary of each, besides numerous other important linguistic works.

According to the official Canadian Indian Report for 1906 the Catholic Indians of the five eastern provinces numbered 18,064, including all those of Prince Edward id., Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, nearly all those of Quebec, and two-fifths of the Christian Indians of Ontario. Every settlement of importance had a church, school, or visiting priest, the standard for industry being fair, for temperance good, and for honesty and general morality exceptionally high.

The noted Huron missions hold a place by themselves. The beginning was made by the Récollet, Joseph le Caron, who accompanied Champlain on his visit to the Huron country in 1615. The tribe at that time occupied the shores of Georgian bay, Ontario, and with other incorporated bands may have numbered 10,000 souls or more (some estimates are much higher), in from 15 to 30 towns or villages, several of which were strongly palisaded. They were probably then of strength equal to that of their hereditary enemies and final destroyers, the Iroquois of New York. In more or less close alliance with the Hurons were the cognate Tionontati and Neutrals, farther to the S. and S. W., in the peninsula between L. Erie and L. Huron. Le Caron spent the winter with the Hurons and Tionontati, established the mission of St Gabriel, made a brief dictionary of the language, and returned to the French settlements in the spring. The work was continued for some years by other Récollets, Gabriel Sagard, author of a Huron dictionary and a history of the Récollet missions, and Nicholas Viel, who was murdered by an Indian about 1624. In 1625 the Jesuits arrived in Canada to assist the Récollets, and the next year the heroic Jean de Brébeuf and another Jesuit, with Father Joseph Dallon, Récollet, reached St Gabriel. The Neutrals also were now visited, but without successful result. The work was brought to a temporary close by the English occupancy of Canada in 1629.

In 1634, after the restoration of French control, the work was resumed, this time by the Jesuits alone, with Brébeuf as superior, assisted then or later by Fathers Daniel, Garnier, Jogues, and others of less note. The mission church of Immaculate Conception was built in 1637 at Ossossani, one of the principal towns; St Joseph was established at Teanastayae, the capital, in the next year; the principal war chief of the tribe was baptized, and Christianity began to take root, in spite of the suspicions engendered by two wasting epidemic visitations, for which the missionaries were held responsible and solemnly condemned to death, until the current of opposition was turned by Brébeuf's courageous bearing. In 1639 there were 4 established missions with 13 priests working in the Huron country and visiting in the neighboring tribes. St Marys, on Wye r., had been made the general headquarters. A visitation of smallpox again spread terror through the tribe and for a time rendered the position of the missionaries unsafe. In consequence of these successive epidemics within a few years several towns had been depopulated and the tribe so much weakened as to leave it an easy prey for the invading Iroquois, whose inroads now became more constant and serious than before.

In 1641 the Iroquois invaded the Huron country in force, killed many, and carried off many others to captivity. In 1648, after a temporary truce, they resumed the war of extermination, with perhaps 2,000 warriors well armed with guns obtained from the Dutch, while the Hurons had only bows. On July 4 Teanastayae, or St Joseph, on the site of the present Barrie, was attacked and destroyed, the missionary, Father Anthony Daniel, killed with several hundred of his flock, and about 700 others were carried off as captives. The whole country was ravaged throughout the fall and winter, and one town after another destroyed or abandoned. On Mar. 16, 1649, a thousand warriors attacked St Ignatius town and massacred practically the whole population, after which they proceeded at once to the neighboring town of St Louis, where the burning and massacre were repeated, and two missionaries, Brébeuf and Father Gabriel Lalemant, killed after hours of the most horrible tortures. An attack on St Marys, where Father Ragueneau was stationed, was repulsed, after which the Iroquois retired.

This was the deathblow to the Huron nation. Fifteen towns were abandoned and the people scattered in every direction. Two whole town populations submitted to the conquerors and removed in a body to the Seneca country. Others fled to the Tionontati, who were now in turn invaded by the Iroquois and compelled, by burning and massacre, with the killing of Fathers Garnier and Chabanel, to abandon their country and flee with the rest. Others took refuge on the islands of L. Huron. Some joined the Neutrals, who soon after met the same fate.

For the next 50 years the history of the confederated Huron and Tionontati remnants is a mere record of flight from pursuing enemies—the Iroquois in the E. and the Sioux in the W. A considerable body which sought the protection of the French, after several removals was finally settled by Father M. J. Chaumonot in 1693 at (New) Lorette, near Quebec, where their descendants still reside (see Hurons; Lorette). To Chaumonot we owe a standard grammar and dictionary of the Huron language, only the first of which is yet published. In the meantime, in 1656-57, two-thirds of this band had bodily removed to the Iroquois country to escape destruction.

The other fugitives, composed largely or principally of Tionontati, fled successively to Manitoulin id. in L. Huron; Mackinaw; the Noquet ids. in Green bay, Wis.; westward to the Mississippi; back to Green bay, where they were visited by the Jesuit Menard in 1660; to Chegoimegon, near the present Bayfield, Wis., on the shore of L. Superior, where the Jesuit Allouez ministered to them for several years; back, in 1670, to Mackinaw, whence another party joined the Iroquois, and finally down to Detroit, Mich., when that post was founded in 1702. In 1751 a part of these, under Father de la Richard, settled at Sandusky, Ohio. From this period the Wyandot, as they now began to be called, took their place as the leading tribe of the Ohio region and the privileged lighters of the confederate council fire. Their last Jesuit missionary, Father Peter Potier, died in 1781, after which they were served by occasional visiting priests and later by the Presbyterians and the Methodists, until about the period of their removal to Kansas in 1842 (see Interior States).

The work of the Episcopalians (Anglican Church) among the Iroquois of New York, beginning about 1700 and continuing in Canada after the removal of a large part of the confederacy from the United States, has already been noted (see Middle Atlantic—New York). In 1763 Rev. Thomas Wood of Nova Scotia, having become acquainted with the Abbé Mailard and obtained the use of his Micmac manuscript, applied himself to the study of the language, dividing his ministrations thenceforth between the Indians and the whites until his death in 1778. He preached in the native tongue, in which he produced several religious translations. This seems to have been the only work recorded for this denomination in this part of the Dominion, and in the official Canadian Indian Report for 1906 no Indians are enumerated under this heading in the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, or Prince Edward id. In Quebec province the same report gives this denomination 119 Indians, including 60 Abnaki at St Francis and 48 Montagnais at Lake St John.

In Ontario province, besides the work already noted among the Iroquois, active and successful missionary effort has been carried on by the Episcopalians among the various Chippewa bands and others since about 1830. One of the principal stations is that at Garden River, opposite Sault Ste Marie, begun in 1835 by Rev. Mr McMurray, who was succeeded a few years later by Rev. F. A. O'Meara, afterward stationed on Manitoulin id., and later at Port Hope on L. Ontario. Besides building up a flourishing school, Mr O'Meara found time to translate into the native language the Book of Common Prayer, considerable portions of both the Old and the New Testament, and a volume of hymns, the last in cooperation with the Rev. Peter Jacobs. He died about 1870. Of the more recent period the most noted worker is Rev. E. F. Wilson, who began his labors under the auspices of the Church Mission Society in 1868. To his efforts the Indians owe the Shingwauk and Wawanosh homes at Sault Ste Marie, Ontario, where some 60 or 80 children are cared for, educated, and taught the rudiments of trades and simple industries. A school journal, set up and printed by the Indian boys, has also been conducted at intervals, under various titles, for nearly 30 years. Mr Wilson is the author of a number of Indian writings, of which the most important is probably a 'Manual of the Ojibway Language,' for the use of mission workers.

In 1835 a mission was established also on Thames r., among the Munsee, a remnant of those Delaware refugees from the United States who for so many years of the colonial period had been the object of Moravian care (see Middle Atlantic States). One of the pioneer workers, Rev. Mr Flood, translated the church liturgy into the language of the tribe.

Of 17,498 Christian Indians officially reported in 1906 in Ontario province, 5,253, or not quite one-third, are credited to the Episcopal or Anglican church, including—Iroquois in various bands, 3,073; "Chippewas of the Thames," 593; "Ojibewas of L. Superior," 554; "Chippewas and Saulteaux of Treaty No. 3" (Manitoba border), 709; "Munsees of the Thames" (originally Moravian converts from the United States; see Middle Atlantic States), 154; "Ojibewas and Ottawas of Manitoulin and Cockburn ids.," 169; Potawatomi of Walpole id., 79; and one or two smaller groups.

The work among the Eskimo of the Labrador coast—officially a part of Newfoundland—is conducted by the Moravians. In 1752 a reconnoitering missionary party landed near the present Hope-dale, but was attacked by the natives, who killed Brother J. C. Ehrhardt and 5 sailors, whereupon the survivors returned home and the attempt for a time was abandoned. One or two other exploring trips were made for the same purpose, and in 1769 permission to establish missions on the Labrador coast was formally asked by the Moravians and granted by the British government. In 1771 the first mission was begun at Nain, apparently by Brother Jens Haven. It is now the chief settlement on the Labrador coast. In 1776 Okak was established by Brother Paul Layritz, followed by Hope-dale in 1782, and Hebron in 1830. To these have more recently been added Zoar and Ramah. The efforts of the missionaries have been most successful, the wandering Eskimo having been gathered into permanent settlements, in each of which are a church, store, mission residence, and workshops, with dwelling houses on the model of the native iglu. Besides receiving religious instruction, the natives are taught the simple mechanical arts, but to guard against their innate improvidence, the missionaries have found it necessary to introduce the communal system, by taking charge of all food supplies to distribute at their own discretion. All the missions are still in flourishing operation, having now under their influence about 1,200 of the estimated 1,500 Eskimo along a coast of about 500 m. in length. The total number of mission workers is about 30 (see Hind, Labrador Peninsula.)

To these Moravian workers we owe a voluminous body of Eskimo literature—grammars, dictionaries, scriptural translations, hymns, and miscellaneous publications. Among the prominent names are those of Bourquin, about 1880, author of a grammar and a Bible history; Burghardt, gospel translations, 1813; Erdmann, missionary from 1834 to 1872, a dictionary and other works; Freitag, a manuscript grammar, 1839; and Kohlmeister, St John's Gospel, 1810. The majority of these Moravian publications were issued anonymously.

In 1820 the Wesleyan Methodists, through Rev. Alvin Torrey, began work among the immigrant Iroquois of the Ontario reservations, which was carried on with notable success for a long term of years by Rev. William Case. In 1823 Mr Case extended his labor to the Mississauga, a band of the Chippewa n. of L. Ontario. The most important immediate result was the conversion of Peter Jones (Kahkewakonaby), a half-breed, who was afterward ordained, and became the principal missionary among his people and the more remote Chippewa bands until his death in 1856. He is known as the author of a collection of hymns in his native language and also a small 'History of the Ojibway Indians.' Another noted missionary convert of this period was Shawundais, or John Sunday. Another native worker of a somewhat later period was Rev. Henry Steinhauer, Chippewa, afterward known as a missionary to the Cree. Still another pioneer laborer in the same region was Rev. James Evans, afterward also missionary to the Cree and inventor of a Cree syllabary. Contemporary with the transfer of Evans and Steinhauer to the Cree in 1840, Rev. George Barnley was sent to establish a mission at Moose Factory, James bay, which, however, was soon after abandoned. Beginning in 1851 Rev. G. M. McDougall established Methodist mission stations among the Chippewa along the N. shore of L. Superior, at Garden River and elsewhere, but afterward transferred his operations also to Cree territory. In 1861-62 Rev. Thomas Hurlburt, already a veteran worker, and considered the most competent Chippewa linguist in the Methodist mission, conducted a monthly journal, 'Petaubun,' in the language, at the Sarnia station.

According to the official Canadian Indian Report for 1906, the Methodist Indians of E. Canada numbered 4,557 in Ontario and 505 in Quebec, a total of 5,062, none being reported for the other eastern provinces. Those in Ontario included nearly all of the "Chippewas of the Thames," "Mississaguas," and "Iroquois and Algonquins of Watha," all of the 348 "Moravians of the Thames," and a considerable percentage of the "Six Nations" on Grand r. Those in Quebec province are chiefly Iroquois of the Oka, St Regis, and Caughnawaga settlements.

Of other denominations, the same official report enumerates 1,020 Baptists in Ontario, almost entirely among the Six Nations on Grand r., with 99 Congregationalists, 17 Presbyterians, and a total of 370 of all other denominations not previously noted. In the other eastern provinces—Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward id.—there is no representation.

The work of Rev. Silas T. Rand among the Micmac of Nova Scotia stands in a class by itself. Educated in a Baptist seminary, he became a minister, but afterward left that denomination to become an independent worker. His attention having been drawn to the neglected condition of the Indians, he began the study of the Micmac language, and in 1849 succeeded in organizing a missionary society for their special instruction. Under its auspices until its dissolution in 1865, and from that time until his death in 1889, he gave his whole effort to the teaching of the Micmac and to the study of their language and traditions. He is the author of a Micmac dictionary and of a collection of tribal myths as well as of numerous minor works, religious and miscellaneous.

CANADA, CENTRAL (Manitoba, Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, Alberta, s. Keewatin).—In the great plains region stretching from Hudson bay southwestward to the Rocky mts., the former battle ground of Cree, Assiniboin, and Blackfeet, the Catholics were again the pioneers, antedating all others by a full century. According to Bryce, "the first heralds of the cross" within this area were the French Jesuits accompanying Verendrye, who in the years 1731-1742 explored the whole territory from Mackinaw to the upper Missouri and the Saskatchewan, establishing trading posts and making alliances with the Indian tribes for the French government. Among these missionaries the principal were Fathers Nicholas Gonnor, who had labored among the Sioux as early as 1727; Charles Mesager, and Jean Aulneau, killed by the same tribe in 1736. No attempt was made during this period to form permanent mission settlements.

Then follows a long hiatus until after the establishment of the Red River colony in the early part of the 19th century by Lord Selkirk, who in 1816 brought out from eastern Canada Fathers Sévère Dumoulin and Joseph Provencher, to minister both to the colonists and to the Indian and mixed-blood population of the Winnipeg country. In 1822 Father Provencher was made bishop, with jurisdiction over all of Ruperts land and the Northwest territories, and carried on the work of systematic mission organization throughout the whole vast region until his death in 1853, when the noted Oblate missionary, Father Alexandre Taché, who had come out in 1845, succeeded to the dignity, in which he continued for many years.

The Catholic work in this central region has been carried on chiefly by the Oblates, assisted by the Gray Nuns. The first permanent mission was St Boniface, established at the site of the present Winnipeg by Provencher and Dumoulin in 1816. St Paul mission on the Assiniboin later became the headquarters of the noted Father George Belcourt, who gave most of his attention to the Saulteux (Chippewa of Saskatchewan region), and who from 1831 to 1849 covered in his work a territory stretching over a thousand miles from E. to W. For his services in preventing a serious uprising in 1833 he was pensioned both by the Government and by the Hudson's Bay Co. He is the author of a grammatic treatise and of a manuscript dictionary of the Saulteur (Chippewa) language, as well as of some minor Indian writings.

In the Cree field the most distinguished names are those of Fathers Albert Lacombe (1848-90), Alexandre Taché (1845-90), Jean B. Thibault (ca. 1855-70), Valentin Végreville (1852-90), and Émile Petitot (1862-82), all of the Oblate order, and each, besides his religious work, the author of important contributions to philology. To Father Lacombe, who founded two missions among the Cree of the upper North Saskatchewan and spent also much time with the Blackfeet, we owe, besides several religious and text-book translations, a manuscript Blackfoot dictionary and a monumental grammar and dictionary of the Cree language. Father Végreville labored among Cree, Assiniboin, and the remote northern Chipewyan, founded five missions, and composed a manuscript grammar, dictionary, and monograph of the Cree language. Father Petitot's important work among the Cree has been overshadowed by his later great work among the remote Athapascans and Eskimo, which will be noted hereafter. Among the Blackfeet the most prominent name is that of Father Émile Legal, Oblate (1881-90), author of several linguistic and ethnologic studies of the tribe, all in manuscript.

Episcopalian work in the central region may properly be said to have begun with the arrival of Rev. John West, who was sent out by the Church Missionary Society of England in 1820 as chaplain to the Hudson's Bay Co's establishment of Ft Garry (Winnipeg), on Red r. In the three years of his ministrations, besides giving attention to the white residents, he made missionary journeys among the Cree and others for a distance of 500 m. to the w. He was followed by Rev. David Jones in 1823, by Rev. Wm. Cochrane in 1825, Rev. A. Cowley in 1841, and Rev. R. James in 1846, by whom, together, the tribes farther to the n. were visited and brought within mission influence. In 1840 a Cree mission at The Pas, on the lower Saskatchewan, was organized by Henry Budd, a native convert, and in 1846 other stations were established among the same tribe at Lac la Ronge and Lac la Crosse, by James Settee and James Beardy respectively, also native converts. In 1838 a large bequest for Indian missions within Rupert's Land, as the territory was then known, had been made by Mr James Leith, an officer of the Hudson's Bay Co., and generously increased soon after by the company itself. With the assistance and the active effort of four missionary societies of the church, the work grew so that in 1849 the territory was erected into a bishopric, and on the transfer of jurisdiction from the Hudson's Bay Co. to the Canadian government in 1870 there were 15 Episcopal missionaries laboring at the various stations in the regions stretching from Hudson bay to the upper Saskatchewan, the most important being those at York Factory (Keewatin), Cumberland, and Carlton (Saskatchewan).

Among the most noted of those in the Cree country may be mentioned in chronological order, Rev. Archdeacon James Hunter and his wife (1844-55), joint or separate authors of a number of translations, including the Book of Common Prayer, hymns, gospel extracts, etc., and a valuable treatise on the Cree language; Bishop John Horden (1851-90), of Moose Factory, York Factory, and Ft Churchill stations, self-taught printer and binder, master of the language, and author of a number of gospels, prayer, and hymn translations; Bishop William Bompas (1865-90), best known for his work among the more northern Athapaskan tribes; Rev. W. W. Kirkby (1852-79), author of a Cree 'Manual of Prayer and Praise,' but also best known for his Athapaskan work; Rev. John Mackay, author of several religious translations and of a manuscript grammar; and Rev. E. A. Watkins, author of a standard dictionary. Among the Blackfeet, Rev. J. W. Tims, who began his work in 1883, is a recognized authority on the language, of which he has published a grammar and dictionary and a gospel translation.

Methodist (Wesleyan) effort in the Cree and adjacent territories began in 1840. In that year Rev. James Evans and his Indian assistant, Rev. Henry Steinhauer, both already noted in connection with previous work in Ontario, were selected for the western mission, and set out together for Norway House, a Hudson's Bay Co's post at the n. end of L. Winnipeg. Evans went on without stop to his destination, but Steinhauer halted at Lac la Pluie (now Rainy Lake) to act as interpreter to Rev. William Mason, who had just reached that spot, having been sent out under the same auspices, the Wesleyan Missionary Society of England, by arrangement with the Canadian body. The joint control continued until 1855, when the Canadian Methodists assumed full charge. Mr Evans had been appointed superintendent of Methodist work for the whole region, and after establishing Rossville mission, near Norway House, as his central station, spent the next six years until his health failed, in traversing the long distances, founding several missions, mastering the Cree language, and devising for it a syllabary, which has ever since been in successful use for all literary purposes in the tribe. His first printing in the syllabary was done upon a press of his own making, with types cast from the sheet-lead lining of tea boxes and cut into final shape with a jackknife. In this primitive fashion he printed many copies of the syllabary for distribution among the wandering hands, besides hymn collections and scripture translations. "By means of this syllabary a clever Indian can memorize in an hour or two all the characters, and in two or three days read the Bible or any other book in his own language" (MacLean). In later years, the credit for this invention was unsuccessfully claimed by some for Rev. William Mason. Rossville for years continued to be the principal and most prosperous of all the Methodist missions in the central region.

Rev. William Mason remained at Rainy Lake until that station was temporarily discontinued in 1844; he was then sent to Rossville (Norway House), where he was stationed until 1854, when the mission was abandoned by the Wesleyans. He then attached himself to the Episcopal church, with which he had formerly been connected, and was ordained in the same year, laboring thereafter at York Factory on Hudson bay until his final return to England in 1870, with the exception of 4 years spent in that country supervising the publication of his great Bible translation in the Cree language, printed in 1861. This, with several other Scripture and hymn translations, excepting a Gospel of St John, was issued under the auspices of the Episcopal Church Missionary Society. In his earlier linguistic (Methodist) work he was aided by Rev. Mr Steinhauer and John Sinclair, a half-breed, but in all his later work, especially in the Bible translation, he had the constant assistance of his wife, the educated half-breed daughter of a Hudson's Bay Co. officer. Rev. Mr Steinhauer, after some years with Mr Mason, joined Mr Evans at Norway House as teacher and interpreter. He afterward filled stations at Oxford House (Jackson bay), York Factory, Lac la Biche, White Fish Lake, Victoria, and other remote points, for a term of more than 40 years, making a record as "one of the most devoted and successful of our native Indian missionaries" (Young). Among later Methodist workers with the Cree may be mentioned Rev. John McDougall, one of the founders of Victoria station, Alberta, in 1862, and Rev. Ervin Glass, about 1880, author of several primary instruction books and charts in the syllabary.

At the same time (1840) that Evans and Mason were sent to the Cree, Rev. Robert T. Rundle was sent, by the same authority, to make acquaintance with the more remote Blackfeet and Assiniboin ("Stonies") of the upper Saskatchewan region. Visiting stations were selected where frequent services were conducted by Rundle, by Rev. Thomas Woolsey, who came out in 1855, and by others, but no regular mission was established until begun by Rev. George M. McDougall at Edmonton, Alberta, in 1871. In 1873 he founded another mission on Bow r., Alberta, among the Stonies (western Assiniboin), and continued to divide attention between the two tribes until his accidental death 2 years later. Other stations were established later at Ft MacLeod and Morley, in the same territory. The most distinguished worker of this denomination among the Blackfeet is Rev. John MacLean (1880-89), author of a manuscript grammar and dictionary of the language, several minor linguistic papers, 'The Indians: Their Manners and Customs' (1889), and 'Canadian Savage Folk' (1896).

Presbyterian mission work was inaugurated in 1865 by the Rev. James Nisbet, among the Cree, at Prince Albert mission on the Saskatchewan. No data are at hand as to the work of the denomination in this region, but it is credited in the official report with nearly a thousand Indian communicants, chiefly among the Sioux and the Assiniboin, many of the latter being immigrants from the United States.

According to the Canadian Indian Report for 1906, the Indians of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and the Northwest Territories, classified under treaties 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, designated as Chipewya, Cree, Saulteaux, Sioux, Assiniboin, Blackfeet, Bloods, Piegan, Sarcee, Stonies, and Chipewyan, are credited as follows: Catholic, 5,633; Anglican (Episcopal), 4,789; Methodist, 3,199; Presbyterian, 1,073; Baptist, 83; all other denominations, 80; pagan, 5,324. Some 3,308 remote northern Cree, under Treaty No. 8, and 165 non-treaty Indians are not included in the estimate.

CANADA, BRITISH COLUMBIA (including Vancouver id. and Metlakatla).—The earliest missionary entrance into British Columbia was made by the Catholics in 1839. In 1838 the secular priests Demers and Blanchet (afterward archbishop) had arrived at Fort Vancouver, Washington, as already noted (see Columbia Region), to minister to the employees of the Hudson's Bay Co. In the next year an Indian mission was organized at Cowitz, with visiting stations along the shores of Puget sd., and Father Demers made a tour of the upper Columbia as far as the Okanagan in British Columbia, preaching, baptizing, and giving instruction by means of a pictograph device of Father Blanchet's invention, known as the "Catholic ladder." Copies of this "ladder" were carried by visiting Indians to the more remote tribes and prepared the way for later effort. A second journey over the same route was made by Father Demers in the next year, and in 1841 he preached for the first time to a great gathering of the tribes on lower Fraser r. In the following year, 1842, by arrangement with the local Hudson's Bay Co. officers, he accompanied the annual supply caravan on its return from Ft Vancouver, on the Columbia, to the remote northern posts. On this trip, ascending the Columbia and passing over to the Fraser, he visited successively the Okinagan, Kamloops, Shuswap, and Takulli or Carriers, before arriving at their destination at Ft St James on Stuart lake. Return was made in the following spring, and on descending the Fraser he found that the Shuswap had already erected a chapel.

In the meantime de Smet and the Jesuits had arrived (see Columbia Region and Interior States—Flatheads) in the Columbia region, and between 1841 and 1844 had established a chain of missions throughout the territory, including three in British Columbia, among the Kutenai, Shuswap, and Okinagan. De Smet himself extended his visitations to the headwaters of the Athabasca, while in 1845-47 Father John Nobili, laboring among the upper tribes, penetrated to the Babines on the lake of that name. In 1847 there were seven chapels or mission stations in British Columbia, the northernmost being that among the Carriers, at Stuart Lake. In 1843 the first Hudson Bay post had been established on Vancouver id. at Camosun, now Victoria, and the beginning of missionary work among the Songish and the Cowichan was made by the secular priest, Father John Bolduc, already well known among the Sound tribes, who had for this reason been brought over by the officers in charge to assist in winning the good will of their Indian neighbors.

The Jesuit prosperity was short lived. Owing to difficulty of communication and pressing need in other fields, it was found necessary to abandon the British Columbia missions, except for an occasional visiting priest, until the work was regularly taken up by the Oblates in 1865 by the establishment of St Joseph mission near Williams lake, on the upper Fraser, by Rev. J. M. McGuckin, first missionary to the Tsilkotin tribe. Within the next few years he extended his ministrations to the remoter Sekani and Skeena. In 1873 the Stuart Lake mission was reestablished by Fathers Lejacq and Blanchet, and in 1885 was placed in charge of Father A. G. Morice, Oblate, the distinguished ethnologist and author, who had already mastered the Tsilkotin language in three years' labor in the tribe. Aside from his missionary labor proper, which still continues, he is perhaps best known as the inventor of the Déné syllabary, by means of which nearly all the Canadian Indians of the great Athapascan stock are now able to read and write in their own language. His other works include a Tsilkotin dictionary, a Carrier grammar, numerous religious and miscellaneous translations, an Indian journal, scientific papers, 'Notes on the Western Dénés' (1893), and a 'History of the Northern Interior of British Columbia' (1904). Father J. M. Le Jeune, of the same order, stationed among the Thompson River and Shuswap Indians since 1880, is also noted as the inventor of a successful shorthand system, by means of which those and other cognate tribes are now able to read in their own languages. He is also the author of a number of religious and text books in the same languages and editor of a weekly Indian journal, the 'Kamloops Wawa,' all of which are printed on a copying press in his own stenographic characters. Another distinguished veteran of the same order is Bishop Paul Durieu, since 1854 until his recent death, laboring successively among the tribes of Washington, Vancouver id. (Ft Rupert, in Kwakiutl territory), and Fraser r.

Episcopal work began in 1857 with the remarkable and successful missionary enterprise undertaken by Mr William Duncan among the Tsimshian at Metlakatla, first in British Columbia and later in Alaska. The Tsimshian at that time were among the fiercest and most degraded savages of the N. W. coast, slavery, human sacrifice, and cannibalism being features of their tribal system, to which they were rapidly adding all the vices introduced by the most depraved white men from the coasting vessels. Moved by reports of their miserable condition Mr Duncan voluntarily resigned a remunerative position in England to offer himself as a worker in their behalf under the auspices of the London Church Missionary Society. He arrived at Ft Simpson, n. coast of British Columbia, in Oct. 1857, and after some months spent in learning the language and making acquaintance with the tribe, then numbering 2,300, opened his first school in June, 1858. By courage and devotion through danger and difficulty he built up a civilized Christian body, which in 1860 he colonized to the number of about 340 in a regular town established at Metlakatla, an abandoned village site 16 m. s. of Ft Simpson. By systematic improvement of every industrial opportunity for years the town had grown to a prosperous, self-supporting community of 1,000 persons, when, by reason of difficulties with the local bishop, upheld by the colonial government. Mr Duncan and his Indians were compelled, in 1887, to abandon their town and improvements and seek asylum under United States protection in Alaska, where they formed a new settlement, known as New Metlakatla, on Annette id., 60 m. n. of their former home. The island, which is about 40 m. long by 3 m. wide, has been reserved by Congress for their use, and the work of improvement and education is now progressing as before the removal, the present population being about 500.

The first Episcopal bishop for British Columbia and Vancouver id. was appointed in 1859. In 1861 the Rev. John B. Good, sent out also by the London society, arrived at Esquimalt, near Victoria, Vancouver id., to preach alike to whites and Indians. At a later period his work was transferred to the Indians of Thompson and lower Fraser rs., with headquarters at St Paul's mission, Lytton. He has translated a large part of the liturgy into the Thompson River (Ntlak-pamuk) language, besides being the author of a grammatic sketch and other papers. In 1865 Kincolith mission was established among the Niska branch of the Tsimshian, on Nass r., by Rev. R. A. Doolan, and some years later another one higher up on the same stream. Kitwingham station, on Skeena r., was established about the same time. In 1871 Rev. Charles M. Tate took up his residence with the Nanaimo on Vancouver id., laboring afterward with the Tsimshian, Bellabella, and Fraser r. tribes. In 1876 Rev. W. H. Collison began work among the Haida at Masset, on the n. end of the Queen Charlotte ids., and in 1878 Rev. A. J. Hall arrived among the Kwakiutl at Ft Rupert, Vancouver id. Other stations in the meantime had been established throughout the s. part of the province, chiefly under the auspices of the London Church Missionary Society.

The first Methodist (Wesleyan) work for the Indians of British Columbia was begun in 1863 at Nanaimo, Vancouver id., by Rev. Thomas Crosby, who at once applied himself to the study of the language with such success that he was soon able to preach in it. In 1874 he transferred his labor to the Tsimshian at Port Simpson, on the border of Alaska, who had already been predisposed to Christianity by the work at Metlakatla and by visiting Indians from the S. Other stations were established on Nass r. (1877) and at Kitamat in the Bellabella tribe. Statistics show that the Methodist work has been particularly successful along the N. W. coast and in portions of Vancouver. There is no record of Presbyterian mission work, but some 400 Indians are officially credited to that denomination along the w. coast of Vancouver id.

According to the Canadian Indian Report for 1906 the Christian Indians of British Columbia are classified as follows: Catholic, 11,270; Episcopal (Anglican), 4,364; Methodist, 3,285; Presbyterian, 427; all other, 147.

CANADA, NORTHWEST (Athabasca, Mackenzie, Yukon, North Keewatin, Franklin).—The earliest missionaries of the great Canadian Northwest, of which Mackenzie r. is the central artery, were the Catholic priests of the Oblate order. The pioneer may have been a Father Grollier, mentioned as the "first martyr of apostleship" in the Mackenzie district and buried at Ft Good Hope, almost under the Arctic circle. In 1846 Father Alexandre Taché, afterward the distinguished archbishop of Red River, arrived at Lac Ile à la Crosse, a Cree station, at the head of Churchill r., Athabasca, and a few months later crossed over the divide to the Chipewyan tribe on Athabasca r. Here he established St Raphael mission, and for the next 7 years, with the exception of a visit to Europe, divided his time between the two tribes. In 1847 or 1848 Father Henry Farad, afterward vicar of the Mackenzie district, arrived among the Chipewyan of Great Slave lake, with whom and their congeners he continued for 18 years. To him we owe a Bible abridgment in the Chipewyan language. In 1852 arrived Father Valentin Végreville, for more than 40 years missionary to Cree, Assiniboin, and Chipewyan, all of which languages he spoke fluently; founder of the Chipewyan mission of St Peter, on Caribou lake, Athabasca, besides several others farther s.; and author of a manuscript grammar and dictionary of the Cree language, another of the Chipewyan language, and other ethnologic and religious papers in manuscript. In 1867 Father Laurent Legoff arrived at Caribou Lake mission, where he was still stationed in 1892. He is best known as the author of a grammar of the Montagnais, or Chipewyan language, published in 1889.

By far the most noted of all the Oblate missionaries of the great Northwest is Father Émile Petitot, acknowledged by competent Canadian authority as "our greatest scientific writer on the Indians and Eskimos" (MacLean). In 20 years of labor, beginning in 1862, he covered the whole territory from Winnipeg to the Arctic ocean, frequently making journeys of six weeks' length on snowshoes. He was the first missionary to visit Great Bear lake (1866), and the first missionary to the Eskimo of the N. W., having visited them in 1865 at the mouth of the Anderson, in 1868 at the mouth of the Mackenzie, and twice later at the mouth of Peel r. In 1870 he crossed over into Alaska, and in 1878, compelled by illness, he returned to the S., making the journey of some 1,200 m. to Athabasca lake on foot, and thence by canoe and portages to Winnipeg. Besides writingsome papers relating to the Cree, he is the author of numerous ethnological and philosophical works, dealing with the Chipewyan, Slavé, Hare, Dog-rib, Kutchin, and Eskimo tribes and territory, chief among which are his Dènè-Dindjié dictionary (1876) and his 'Traditions Indiennes' (1886).

Throughout the Mackenzie region the Catholics have now established regular missions or visiting stations at every principal gathering point, among the most important being a mission at Ft Providence, beyond Great Slave lake, and a school, orphanage, and hospital conducted since 1875 by the Sisters of Charity at Ft Chipewyan on Athabasca lake.

Episcopal effort in the Canadian Northwest dates from 1858, in which year Archdeacon James Hunter, already mentioned in connection with the Cree mission, made a reconnoitering visit to Mackenzie r., as a result of which Rev. W. W. Kirkby, then on parish duty on Red r., was next year appointed to that field and at once took up his headquarters at the remote post of Ft Simpson, at the junction of Liard and Mackenzie rs., 62° n., where, with the assistance of the Hudson's Bay Co's officers, he built a church and school. In 1862, after several years' study of the language, he descended the Mackenzie nearly to its mouth and crossed over the divide to the Yukon, just within the limits of Alaska, preaching to the Kutchin and making some study of the language, after which he returned to Ft Simpson. In 1869 he was appointed to the station at York Factory, on Hudson bay, where he remained until his retirement in 1878, after 26 years of efficient service in Manitoba and the Northwest. He is the author of a number of religious translations in the Chipewyan and Slavé languages.

The work begun on the Yukon by Kirkby was given over to Rev. (Archdeacon) Robert McDonald, who established his headquarters at St Matthew's mission on Peel r., Mackenzie district, "one mile within the Arctic circle." Here he devoted himself with remarkable industry and success to a study of the language of the Takudh Kutchin, into which he has translated, besides several minor works, the Book of Common Prayer (1885), a small collection of Hymns (1889), and the complete Bible in 1898, all according to a syllabic system of his own device, by means of which the Indians were enabled to read in a few weeks. In 1865 Rev. Wm. C. Bompas, afterward bishop of Athabasca and later of Mackenzie r., arrived from England. In the next 25 years he labored among the Chipewyan, Dog-ribs, Beavers, Slavé, and Ta-kudh tribes of the remote Northwest, and gave some attention also to the distant Eskimo. He is the author of a primer in each of these languages, as well as in Cree and Eskimo, together with a number of gospel and other religious translations. Another notable name is that of Rev. Alfred Garrioch, who began work in the Beaver tribe on Peace r., Athabasca, in 1876, after a year's preliminary study at Ft Simpson. He is the founder of Unjaga mission at Ft Vermilion, and author of several devotional works and of a considerable vocabulary in the Beaver language. To a somewhat later period belong Rev. W. D. Reeve and Rev. Spendlove, in the Slave lake region. Among the principal stations are Ft Chipewyan on Athabasca lake, Ft Simpson on the middle Mackenzie, and Ft's Macpherson and Lapierre in the neighborhood of the Mackenzie's mouth. Work has also been done among the Eskimo of Hudson bay, chiefly by Rev. Edmund Peck, who has devised a syllabary for the language, in which he has published several devotional translations, beginning in 1878. The greater portion of the Episcopal work in the Canadian Northwest has been under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society of London.

GREENLAND.—Greenland was first colonized from Iceland in 985 by Scandinavians, who became Christian about A. D. 1000. The aboriginal inhabitants were the Eskimo, with whom in the succeeding centuries the colonists had frequent hostile encounters, but there is no record of any attempt at missionary work. Some time shortly before the year 1500 the colony became extinct, there being considerable evidence that it was finally overwhelmed by the Eskimo savages. In 1721 the Norse Lutheran minister, Rev. Hans Egede, under the auspices of the government of Denmark, landed with his family and a few other companions upon the s. end of the island, in the belief that some descendants of the lost colony might yet be in existence. Finding no white inhabitants, he turned his attention to the evangelization of the native Eskimo, and thus became the founder both of the Greenland mission and of the modern Greenland settlement. A mission station which was named Godthaab was established on Baal r. on the w. coast, about 64° n., and became the center of operations, while Egede was made bishop and superintendent of missions. After some years of hardship and discouragement the home government was about to withdraw its support, and it seemed as if the mission would have to be abandoned, when, in 1733, the Moravians volunteered their aid. In the spring of that year three Moravian missionaries, Christian David, and Matthew and Christian Stach, arrived from Denmark to cooperate with Egede, with such good result that the principal work finally passed over to that denomination, by which it has since been continued. Egede in 1736 returned to Denmark to establish at Copenhagen a special training seminary for the work. He died in 1758, leaving the succession in office to his son, Rev. Paul Egede. The elder Egede was the author of a 'Description of Greenland,' which has been translated into several languages, besides several scriptural works in Eskimo. His son, Paul, accompanied his father on the first trip in 1721, learned the language, and in 1734 began the missionary work which he continued to his death in 1789, having been made bishop 10 years earlier. He is the author of a standard Danish-Latin-Eskimo grammar and dictionary, besides a number of religious works in the language and a journal of the Greenland missions from 1721 to within a year of his death. Still another of the same family, Rev. Peter Egede, nephew of the first missionary, was the author of a translation of Psalms.

With the settlement of the country from Denmark and the organization of regular parishes the Lutheran missions took on new life, special attention being given to the more northern regions. Godthaab remained the principal station, and several others were established, of which the most important to-day are Nugsoak on Disko bay, w. coast, and Angmagssalik, about 66° n., on the e. coast, the northernmost inhabited spot in that direction. The friendly cooperation between the two denominations seems never to have been interrupted, the ministers in many cases sharing their labors and results in common.

The Moravian work prospered. New Herrnhut, the first and most northerly mission, was established in 1733; Lichtenfels was founded 80 m. farther s. in 1758; 300 m. farther s. Lichtenau was founded in 1774; then came Frederiksdal in 1824, Umanak in 1861, and Igdlorpait in 1864. In 1881 the mission force numbered 19 and the native membership 1,545. Since 1801 the whole Eskimo population properly resident within the Moravian mission area has been Christian, but others have since moved in from the outlying territory. The work of civilization is nearly as complete for the whole e. coast.

As the result of the literary labors of nearly two centuries of missionary students, together with a few educated natives, the Eskimo literature of Greenland is exceptionally voluminous, covering the whole range of linguistics, Bible translations, hymn books, and other religious works, school text-books, stories, and miscellanies, besides a journal published at the Godthaab station from 1861 to 1885. With so much material it is possible only to mention the names of the principal workers in this field. For details the reader is referred to Pilling's 'Bibliography of the Eskimo Language.' In the Lutheran mission the most prominent names are Egede, father and son, Fabricius (1768-73); Janssen (period of 1850); Kjer (period of 1820); the Kleinschmidts, father and son (1793-1840); Kragh (1818-28); Steenholdt (period of 1850); Sternberg (1840-53); Thorhallesen (1778-89); Wandall (1834-40), and Wolf (1803-11). In the Moravian list are found Beck (died 1777); Beyer (period of 1750); Brodersen (period of 1790); Konigseer (period of 1780); Muller (period of 1840); together with Cranz, author of the 'History of Greenland and the Moravian Mission,' first published in 1765.

In the four centuries of American history there is no more inspiring chapter of heroism, self-sacrifice, and devotion to high ideals than that afforded by the Indian missions. Some of the missionaries were of noble blood and had renounced titles and estates to engage in the work; most of them were of finished scholarship and refined habit, and nearly all were of such exceptional ability as to have commanded attention in any community and to have possessed themselves of wealth and reputation, had they so chosen; yet they deliberately faced poverty and sufferings, exile and oblivion, ingratitude, torture, and death itself in the hope that some portion of a darkened world might be made better through their effort. To the student who knows what infinite forms of cruelty, brutishness, and filthiness belonged to savagery, from Florida to Alaska, it is beyond question that, in spite of sectarian limitations and the shortcomings of individuals, the missionaries have fought a good fight. Where they have failed to accomplish large results the reason lies in the irrepressible selfishness of the white man or in the innate incompetence and unworthiness of the people for whom they labored.

Mississauga (Chippewa: miisi, 'large,' ag or sauk, 'outlet (of a river or bay)' = 'large outlet,' referring to the mouth of Mississauga r.—Hewitt). Although this Algonquian tribe is a division or subtribe of the Chippewa, having originally formed an integral part of the latter, it has long been generally treated as distinct. When first encountered by the French, in 1634, the Mississauga lived about the mouth of the river of the same name, along the n. shore of L. Huron, and on the adjacent Manitoulin id. Although so closely allied to the Chippewa, they do not appear to have been disposed to follow that tribe in its progress westward, as there is no evidence that they were ever found in early times so far w. as Sault Ste Marie, but appear to have clung to their old haunts about L. Huron and Georgian bay. Early in the 18th century, influenced by a desire to trade with the whites, they began to drift toward the s. e. into the region formerly occupied by the Hurons, between L. Huron and L. Erie. Although they had destroyed a village of the Iroquois near Ft Frontenac about 1705, they tried in 1708 to gain a passage through the country of the latter, to trade their peltries with the English. At this time a part or band was settled on L. St Clair. About 1720 the French established a station at the w. end of L. Ontario for the purpose of stimulating trade with the Mississauga. Near the close of the first half of the century (1746-50), having joined the Iroquois in the war against the French, the Mississauga were compelled by the latter, who were aided by the Ottawa, to abandon their country, a portion at least settling near the Seneca r. of L. Erie. Others, however, appear to have remained in the vicinity of their early home, as a delegate from a Mississauga town "on the north side of L. Ontario" came to the conference at Mt Johnson, N. Y., in June, 1755. As it is also stated that they "belong to the Chippewese confederacy, which chiefly dwell about the L. Mississauga," it is probable that "north side of L. Ontario" refers to the shores of L. Huron. Being friendly with the Iroquois at this time, they were allowed to occupy a number of places in the country from which the Hurons had been driven. This is inferred in part from Chauvignerie's report of 1736, which locates parts of the tribe at different points on Mississauga r., Maniskoulin (Manitoulin?) id., L. St Clair, Kente, Toronto r., Matchitaa, and the w. end of L. Ontario. The land on which the Iroquois are now settled at Grand r., Ontario, was bought from them. For the purpose of sealing their alliance with the Iroquois they were admitted as the seventh tribe of the Iroquois league in 1746, at which date they were described as living in five villages near Detroit. It is therefore probable that those who went to live with the Seneca first came to the vicinity of Detroit and moved thence to w. New York. The alliance with the Iroquois lasted only until the outbreak of the French and Indian war a few years later.

According to Jones (Hist. Ojebways), as soon as a Mississauga died he was laid out on the ground, arrayed in his best clothes, and wrapped in skins or blankets. A grave about 3 ft deep was dug and the corpse interred with the head toward the w. By his side were placed his hunting and war implements. The grave was then covered, and above it poles or sticks were placed lengthwise to the height of about 2 ft, over which birch-bark or mats were thrown to keep out the rain. Immediately after the decease of an Indian, the near relatives went into mourning by blackening their faces with charcoal and putting on the most ragged and filthy clothing they possessed. A year was the usual time of mourning for a husband, wife, father or mother.

As the Mississauga were so frequently confounded with the Chippewa and other neighboring tribes who are closely connected, it is difficult to make a separate estimate of their numbers. In 1736 they were reported to number 1,300, about 250 being on Manitoulin id. and Mississauga r., and the rest in the peninsula of Ontario; in 1778 they were estimated at 1,250, living chiefly on the N. side of L. Erie, and in 1884 the number was given as 744. The population was officially reported in 1906 as 810, of whom 185 were at Mud Lake, 87 at Rice Lake, 35 at Scugog, 240 at Alnwick, and 263 at New Credit, Ontario. The New Credit settlement forms a township by itself and the Indian inhabitants have often won prizes against white competitors at the agricultural fairs. The New Credit Indians (who left the Old Credit settlement in 1847) are the most advanced of the Mississauga and represent one of the most successful attempts of any American Indian group to assimilate the culture of the whites. The Alnwick res. dates from 1830, Mud Lake from 1829, Scugog from 1842. Beldom, Chibabouinani, and Grape Island were former settlements. See Credit Indians, Matchedash.

Missouri ('great muddy,' referring to Missouri r.). A tribe of the Chiwere group of the Siouan family. Their name for themselves is Niútachi. According to Gale the early form of the word Missouri is Algonquian, of the Illinois dialect. The most closely allied tribes are the Iowa and the Oto. According to tradition, after having parted from the Winnebago at Green bay, the Iowa, Missouri, and Oto moved westward to Iowa r., where the Iowa stopped. The rest continued westward, reaching the Missouri at the mouth of Grand r. Here, on account of some dispute, the Oto withdrew and moved farther up Missouri r. Marquette's autograph map of 1673, which is perhaps the earliest authentic notice of the tribe, locates the Semessrit on Missouri r., apparently as far n. as the Platte. Joutel (1687) appears to have been the first writer to use the name Missouri in this form. It is stated that Tonti met the tribe a day and half's journey from the village of the Tamaroa, which was on the Mississippi, 6 leagues below Illinois r. About the beginning of the 18th century the French found them on the left bank of the Missouri, near the mouth of Grand r., and built a fort on an island near them. They continued to dwell in this locality until about 1800. According to Bourgmont (Margry, Déc., vi, 393, 1886) their village in 1723 was 30 leagues below Kansas r. and 60 leagues below the principal Kansa village. About 1798 they were conquered and dispersed by the Sauk and Fox tribes and their allies. Five or six lodges joined the Osage, two or three took refuge with the Kansa, and some amalgamated with the Oto, but they soon recovered, as in 1805 Lewis and Clark found them in villages s. of Platte r., having abandoned their settlements on Grand r. some time previously on account of smallpox. They were visited again by an epidemic in 1823. Although their number was estimated in 1702 at 200 families and in 1805 by Lewis and Clark at 300 souls, in 1829, when they were found with the Oto, they numbered only 80. Having been unfortunate in a war with the Osage, part of them joined the Iowa, and the others went to the Oto previous to the migration of the latter to Big Platte r. In 1842 their village stood on the bank of Platte r., Nebr. They accompanied the Oto when that tribe removed in 1882 to Indian Territory. There were only 40 individuals of the tribe remaining in 1885. They are now officially classed with the Oto, together numbering 368 in 1905 under the Oto school superintendent in Oklahoma. The gentes, as given by Dorsey (15th Rep. B. A. E., 240, 1897), were Tunanpin (Black bear), Hotachi (Elk), and Cheghita (Eagle) or Wakanta (Thunder-bird).

GEORGE BATES—MISSOURI

The Missouri joined in the following treaties with the United States: (1) Peace treaty of June 24, 1817; (2) Ft Atkinson, Ia., Sept. 26, 1825, regulating trade and relations with the United States; (3) Prairie du Chien, Wis., July 15, 1830, ceding lands in Iowa and Missouri; (4) Oto village, Nebr., Sept. 21, 1833, ceding certain lands; (5) Bellevue, upper Missouri r., Oct. 15, 1836, ceding certain lands; (6) Washington, Mar. 15, 1854, ceding lands, with certain reservation; (7) Nebraska City, Nebr., Dec. 9, 1854, changing boundary of reservation.

Morgan (Beach, Ind. Miscel., 220, 1877) used the term Missouri Indians to include the Ponca, Omaha, Kansa, Quapaw, Iowa, Oto, and Missouri. These are the Southern tribes of Hale (Am. Antiq., v, 112, 1883), and the Dhegiha and Chiwere groups of J. O. Dorsey. (J. O. D. C. T.)

Mistassin (from mista-assini, 'a great stone,' referring to a huge isolated rock in L. Mistassini, which the Indians regarded with veneration). An Algonquian tribe that lived on L. Mistassini, Quebec. They were divided by early writers into the Great and the Little Mistassin, the former living near the lake, the latter farther s. in the mountains. They first became known to the French about 1640, but were not visited by missionaries until some years later. They were attacked by the Iroquois in 1665, and in 1672 their country was formally taken possession of by the French with their consent. Although spoken of by Hind in 1863 as roving in bands with Montagnais and Nascapee over the interior of Labrador, it appears that in 1858 a portion of the tribe was on the lower St Lawrence.

Very little has been recorded in regard to their habits or characteristics. It is recorded that when attacked by the Iroquois in 1665 they had a wooden fort, which they defended successfully and with great bravery. Their only myth mentioned is that in regard to the great rock in the lake, which they believed to be a manito.

Mitsukwic. A former Nisqualli village "at the salmon trap on Squalli [Nisqualli] r.," Washington.—Gibbs, MS. No. 248, B. A. E.

Mittabscout. A village of about 20 houses in 1676, situated on Pawtuxet r., 7 or 8 m. above its mouth, in Providence or Kent co., R. I. It probably belonged to the Narraganset, but its chief disputed their claim.—Williams (1676) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Coll., 3d s., i, 71, 1825.

Mittulstik (Mit-té-ül'-stik). A former Yaquina village on the n. side of Yaquina r., Oreg., at the site of the present Newport.—Dorsey in Jour. Am. Folk-lore, iii, 229, 1890.

Mitutia. A village of the Cholorovone, a division of the Yokuts, situated e. of lower San Joaquin r., Cal.—Pinart, Cholorovone MS., B. A. E., 1880.

Miwok ('man'). One of the two divisions of the Moquelumnan family in central California, the other being the Olamentke. With a small exception in the w., the Miwok occupied territory bounded on the n. by Cosumnes r., on the e. by the ridge of the Sierra Nevada, on the s. by Fresno cr., and on the w. by San Joaquin r. The exception on the w. is a narrow strip of land on the e. bank of the San Joaquin, occupied by Yokuts Indians, beginning at the Tuolumne and extending northward to a point not far from the place where the San Joaquin bends to the w. The Miwok are said by Powers to be the largest "nation" in California, and a man of any of their tribes or settlements may travel from the Cosumnes to the Fresno and make himself understood without difficulty, so uniform is their language. Mixed-bloods. To gauge accurately the amount of Indian blood in the veins of the white population of the American continent and to determine to what extent the surviving aborigines have in them the blood of their conquerors and supplanters is impossible in the absence of scientific data. But there is reason to believe that intermixture has been much more common than is generally assumed. The Eskimo of Greenland and the Danish traders and colonists have intermarried from the first, so that in the territory immediately under European supervision hardly any pure natives remain. The marriages (of Danish fathers and Eskimo mothers) have been very fertile and the children are in many respects an improvement on the aboriginal stock, in the matter of personal beauty in particular. According to Packard (Beach, Ind. Miscel., 69, 1877) the last full-blood Eskimo on Belle Isle str., Labrador, was in 1859 the wife of an Englishman at Salmon bay. The Labrador intermixture has been largely with fishermen from Newfoundland of English descent.

Some of the Algonquian tribes of Canada mingled considerably with the Europeans during the French period, both in the E. and toward the interior. In recent years certain French-Canadian writers have unsuccessfully sought to minimize this intermixture. In the Illinois-Missouri region these alliances were favored by the missionaries from the beginning of the 18th century. As early as 1693 a member of the La Salle expedition married the daughter of the chief of the Kaskaskia. Few French families in that part of the country are free from Indian blood. The establishment of trading posts at Detroit, Mackinaw, Duluth, etc., aided the fusion of races. The spread of the activities of the Hudson's Bay Company gave rise in the Canadian Northwest to a population of mixed-bloods of considerable historic importance, the offspring of Indian mothers and Scotch, French, and English fathers. Manitoba, at the time of its admission into the dominion, had some 10,000 mixed-bloods, one of whom, John Norquay, afterward became premier of the Provincial government. Some of the employees of the fur companies who had taken Indian wives saw their descendants flourish in Montreal and other urban centers. The tribes that have furnished the most mixed-bloods are the Cree and Chippewa, and next the Sioux, of n. w. Canada; the Chippewa, Ottawa, and related tribes of the great lakes; and about Green bay, the Menominee. Toward the Mississippi and beyond it were a few Dakota and Blackfoot mixed-bloods. Harvard (Rep. Smithson. Inst., 1879) estimated the total number in 1879 at 40,000. Of these about 22,000 were in United States territory and 18,000 in Canada. Of 15,000 persons of Canadian-French descent in Michigan few were probably free from Indian blood. Some of the French mixed-bloods wandered as far as the Pacific, establishing settlements of their own kind beyond the Rocky mts. The first wife of the noted ethnologist Schoolcraft was the daughter of an Irish gentleman by a Chippewa mother, another of whose daughters married an Episcopal clergyman, and a third a French-Canadian lumberer. Although some of the English colonies endeavored to promote the intermarriage of the two races, the only notable case in Virginia is that of Pocahontas (q. v.) and John Rolfe. The Athapaskan and other tribes of the extreme N. W. have intermixed but little with the whites, though there are Russian mixed-bloods in Alaska. In British Columbia and the adjoining parts of the United States are to be found some mixed-bloods, the result of intermarriage of French traders and employees with native women. Some intermixture of captive white blood exists among the Apache, Comanche, Kiowa, and other raiding tribes along the Mexican and Texas border, the children seeming to inherit superior industry. The Pueblos, with the notable exception of the Lagunas, have not at all favored intermarriage with Europeans. The modern Siouan tribes have intermarried to some extent with white Americans, as some of them did in early days with the French of Canada. The Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma—Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creeks, and Seminole—have a large element of white blood, some through so-called squaw-men, some dating back to British and French traders before the Revolution. In the Cherokee Nation especially nearly all the leading men for a century have been more of white than of Indian blood, the noted John Ross himself being only one-eighth Indian. Mooney (19th Rep. B. A. E., 83, 1900) considers that much of the advance in civilization made by the Cherokee has been "due to the intermarriage among them of white men, chiefly traders of the ante-Revolutionary period, with a few Americans from the back settlements." Most of this white blood was of good Irish, Scotch, American, and German stock. Under the former laws of the Cherokee Nation anyone who could prove the smallest proportion of Cherokee blood was rated as Cherokee, including many of one-sixteenth, one-thirty-second, or less of Indian blood. In 1905 the Cherokee Nation numbered 36,782 citizens. Of these, about 7,000 were adopted whites, negroes, and Indians of other tribes, while of the rest probably not one-fourth are of even approximately pure Indian blood. Some of the smaller tribes removed from the E., as the Wyandot (Hurons) and Kaskaskia, have not now a single full-blood, and in some tribes, notably the Cherokee and Osage, the jealousies from this cause have led to the formation of rival full-blood and mixed-blood factions. During the Spanish domination in the S. E. Atlantic region intermixture perhaps took place, but not much; in Texas, however, intermarriage of whites and Indians was common. The peoples of Iroquoian stock have a large admixture of white blood, French and English, both from captives taken during the wars of the 17th and 18th centuries and by the process of adoption, much favored by them. Such intermixture contains more of the combination of white mother and Indian father than is generally the case. Some English-Iroquois intermixture is still in process in Ontario. The Iroquois of St. Regis, Caughnawaga, and other agencies can hardly boast an Indian of pure blood. According to the Almanach Iroquois for 1900, the blood of Eunice Williams, captured at Deerfield, Mass., in 1704, and adopted and married within the tribe, flows in the veins of 125 descendants at Caughnawaga; Silas Rice, captured at Marlboro, Mass., in 1703, has 1,350 descendants; Jacob Hill and John Stacey, captured near Albany in 1755, have, respectively, 1,100 and 400 descendants. Similar cases are found among the New York Iroquois. Dr. Boas (Pop. Sci. Mo., XLV, 1894) has made an anthropometric study of the mixed-bloods, covering a large amount of data, especially concerning the Sioux and the eastern Chippewa. The total numbers investigated were 647 men and 408 women. As compared with the Indian, the mixed-blood, so far as investigations have shown, is taller, men exhibiting greater divergence than women.

A large proportion of negro blood exists in many tribes, particularly in those formerly residing in the Gulf states, and among the remnants scattered along the Atlantic coast from Massachusetts southward. The Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma, having been slaveholders and surrounded by Southern influences, generally sided with the South in the Civil war. On being again received into friendly relations with the Government they were compelled by treaty to free their slaves and admit them to equal Indian citizenship. In 1905 there were 20,619 of these adopted negro citizens in these five tribes, besides all degrees of admixture in such proportions that the census takers are frequently unable to discriminate. The Cherokee as a body have refused to intermarry with their negro citizens, but among the Creeks and the Seminole intermarriage has been very great. The Pamunkey, Chickahominy, Marshpee, Narraganset, and Gay Head remnants have much negro blood, and conversely there is no doubt that many of the broken coast tribes have been completely absorbed into the negro race. See Croatan Indians, Métis, Popular fallacies. (A. F. C. J. M.)

Mixed Seneca and Shawnee. The former official designation of the mixed band of Mingo (Seneca) and Shawnee who removed from Lewistown, Ohio, to the W. about 1833 (see Mingo). By treaty of 1867 the union was dissolved, the Seneca joining the band known as "Seneca of Sandusky," and the Shawnee becoming a distinct body under the name of "Eastern Shawnee." Both tribes were assigned reservations in the present Oklahoma, where they still reside, numbering 101 and 366 respectively in 1905. (J. M.)

Moache. A division of the Ute, formerly roaming over s. Colorado and n. New Mexico. In 1871 they were reported to number 645; in 1903 the combined Capote, Moache, and Wiminuche on Southern Ute res. numbered 955. The name "Taos Utes" was formerly applied to those Ute who temporarily encamped in considerable numbers about Taos pueblo, N. Mex. As these were doubtless largely Moache, their synonyms are included here, although the Capote, Tabeguache, and Wiminuche were evidently also a part of them. See Ute.

The Moache joined with other Ute bands in the treaty of Washington, Mar. 2, 1868, affirming the treaty of Oct. 7, 1863, with the Tabeguache and defining the boundaries of their reservation.

Moanahonga ('great walker'). An Iowa warrior, known to the whites as Big Neck, and called also by his people Winaugusconey ('Man not afraid to travel'), because he was wont to take long trips alone, relying on his own prowess and prodigious strength. While he was of lowly birth he was exceedingly ambitious and contended for the honors and dignity for which his courage and address fitted him, but which his fellow tribesmen were loth to accord, wherefore he built a lodge apart from the rest and collected about him a band of admirers over whom he exercised the authority of chief. Gen. Clark induced him and Mahaskah to go to Washington in 1824 and there sign a treaty that purported to convey to the United States for an annual payment of $500 for 10 years the title of all the lands of the Iowa lying within the borders of Missouri. He did not understand the treaty, and after white settlers had taken possession of a considerable part of the Indian lands he set out in 1829 to visit St. Louis for the purpose of making complaint to Gen. Clark. A party of whites encountered his company of 60 men, made them all intoxicated, and decamped with their horses, blankets, and provisions. When they recovered from their stupor one of them shot a hog to satisfy their hunger. This provoked the anger of the settlers, 60 of whom rode up and commanded the Indians to leave the country. Moanahonga then withdrew his camp about 15 m. beyond the state boundary, as he supposed. When the white party followed him he went out to meet them with his pipe in his mouth in sign of peace. As he extended his hand in greeting the borderers fired, killing his brother at his side, and an infant. The Indians flew to their arms and, inspired anew by the call for vengeance of Moanahonga's sister, who was shot in the second volley, they drove the whites from the field, although these exceeded their fighting men two to one. The man who shot his sister Moanahonga burned at the stake. The U. S. troops were ordered out, and obtaining hostages from the Iowa returned to their barracks. Moanahonga and several others of his band were arrested and tried on a charge of murder, but were acquitted. He cultivated friendly relations with the whites after this, but always went with blackened face in sign of mourning, because, as he said, he had sold the bones of his ancestors. About 5 years afterward he fell in combat with a Sioux chief. See McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, i, 177-183, 1858.

Moapariats (Mo-a-pa-ri'-ats, 'mosquito creek people'). A band of Paiute formerly living in or near Moapa valley, s. E. Nev., and numbering 64 in 1873.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 50, 1874.

Mobile (meaning doubtful). A Muskogean tribe whose early home was probably Mauvila, or Mavilla, supposed to have been at or near Choctaw Bluff on Alabama r., Clark co., Ala., where De Soto, in 1540, met with fierce opposition on the part of the natives and engaged in the most obstinate contest of the expedition. The town was then under the control of Tascalusa (q. v.) probably an Alibamu chief. If, as is probable, the Mobilian tribe took part in this contest, they must later have moved farther s., as they were found on Mobile bay when the French began to plant a colony at that point about the year 1700. Wishing protection from their enemies, they obtained permission from the French, about 1708, to settle near Ft Louis, where space was allotted them and the Tohome for this purpose. Little is known of the history of the tribe. In 1708 a large body of Alibamu, Cherokee, Abihka, and Catawba warriors descended Mobile r. for the purpose of attacking the French and their Indian allies, but for some unknown reason contented themselves with destroying a few huts of the Mobilians. The latter, who were always friendly to the French, appear to have been christianized soon after the French settled there. In 1741 Coxe wrote that the chief city of the once great province of Tascalusa, "Mouvilla, which the English call Maubela, and the French Mobile, is yet in being, tho' far short of its former grandeur." At this date the Mobilians and Tohome together numbered 350 families. Mention is made in the Mobile church registers of individual members of the tribe as late as 1761, after which they are lost to history as a tribe. For subsistence they relied almost wholly on agriculture. Clay images of men and women and also of animals, supposed to be objects of worship by this people, were found by the French.

The so-called Mobilian trade language was a corrupted Choctaw jargon used for the purposes of intertribal communication among all the tribes from Florida to Louisiana, extending northward on the Mississippi to about the junction of the Ohio. It was also known as the Chickasaw trade language. (A. S. G. C. T.)

Moccasins. The soft skin shoe of the North American Indians and its imitations on the part of the whites. The word, spelled formerly also moccasin, is derived from one of the eastern Algonquian dialects: Powhatan (Strachey, 1612), mockasin, mawhecasun; Massachusetts (Eliot, ante 1660), mohkiason, mohkussin; Narraganset (Williams, 1643), mocussin; Micmac, m'cusun; Chippewa, makinin. It came into English through Powhatan in all probability, as well as through Massachusetts. The latter dialect has also mokus or mokis, of which the longer word seems to be a derivative. Hewitt suggests that it is cognate with makak, 'small case or box' (see Mocuck). After the moccasins have been named moccasin-fish (Maryland sunfish), moccasin-flower or moccasin-plant (lady's-slipper, known also as Indian's shoe), moccasin-snake or water-moccasin (Ancistrodon piscivorus), the upland moccasin (A. atrofuscus). In some parts of the South the term 'moccasin' is in colloquial use in the sense of intoxicated.

(A. F. C.)

With the exception of the sandal-wearing Indians living in the states along the Mexican boundary, moccasins were almost universally worn. The tribes of s. E. Texas were known to the southern Plains Indians as "Barefoot Indians," because they generally went without foot-covering, only occasionally wearing sandals. The Pacific coast Indians also as a rule went barefoot, and among most tribes women did not customarily wear moccasins. There are two general types of moccasins—those with a rawhide sole sewed to a leather upper, and those with sole and upper consisting of one piece of soft leather with a seam at the instep and heel. The former belongs to the Eastern or timber tribes, the latter to the Western or plains Indians. The Eskimo have soled footwear. The chief causes influencing this distribution are the presence or absence of animals furnishing thick rawhide, the character of trails and travel, and tribal usages. The boot or legging moccasin, worn from Alaska to Arizona and New Mexico, is still commonly a part of the woman's costume, and among most of the Pueblos the legging portion is a white-tanned deerskin to which the moccasin is attached, the skin being wrapped neatly and methodically around the calf of the leg and secured by means of a cord. Differences in cut, color, decoration, toe-piece, inset-tongue, vamp, heel-fringe, ankle-flaps, etc., show tribal and environmental characters and afford means of identification. Among the Plains tribes the decoration of moccasins presents a wide range of symbolism, and since this part of the costume has been less modified by contact with whites than other garments, it affords valuable material for the study of symbolic art.

The materials used in making moccasins are tanned skins of the larger mammals, rawhide for soles, and sinew for sewing. Dyes, pigments, quills, beads, cloth, buttons, and fur are applied to the moccasin as decoration. Many tribes make moccasins to be specially worn in ceremonies, and a number of tribes also employ their footwear in a guessing game known as the "moccasin game."

Great ingenuity was often displayed in cutting moccasins from a single piece of dressed hide, the most complicated pattern being found among the Klamath. The northern Athapaskan pattern has a T-shaped seam at the toe and heel, while in the Nez Percé type the seam is along one side of the foot from the great toe to the heel. In the moccasin of the Plains Indians the upper is in one piece and is sewed to a rawhide sole.

Mocho (El Mocho, Span.: 'the cropped, shorn, mutilated', so called because he had lost an ear in a fight). An Apache, celebrated in manuscript narratives pertaining to Texas in the 18th century. He was captured by the Tonkawa, but because of his eloquence and prowess was elevated to the chieftainship of that tribe on the death of its leader during an epidemic in 1777 or 1778. With the Spaniards El Mocho had a bad reputation. When he became chief the governor connived to get rid of him, to effect which Mezières bribed his rivals to allure him to the highway leading to Natchitoches, under the promise of presents when he should arrive there, and murder him, but this plot failed, and Mezières and the governor were obliged to conciliate him. Finally, in 1784, at the instigation of the government, he was killed. (H. E. B.)

Mochopa. An Opatá pueblo of Sonora, Mexico, and the seat of a Spanish mission founded between 1678 and 1730, at which latter date the population had become reduced to 24. It was abandoned between 1764 and 1800, owing to Apache depredations.

Mocock. See Mocuck.

Moctobi. A small tribe formerly residing in s. Mississippi. They are mentioned by Iberville, in 1699, as living at that time on Pascagoula r., near the Gulf coast, associated with the Biloxi and Paskagula, each tribe having its own village (Margry, Déc., iv, 195, 1880). Sauvole, who was at Ft Biloxi in 1699-1700, speaks of the "villages of the Pascoboulas, Biloxi, and Moctobi, which together contain not more than 20 cabins." Nothing is known respecting their language, nor has anything more been ascertained in regard to their history, but from their intimate relations with the Biloxi it is probable they belonged to the same (Siouan) linguistic stock. The name Moctobi appears to have disappeared from Indian memory and tradition, as repeated inquiry among the Choctaw and Caddo has failed to elicit any knowledge of such a tribe. What seems to be a justifiable supposition, in the absence of further knowledge, is that the three or four small bands were the remnants of a larger tribe or of tribes which, while making their way southward, had been reduced by war, pestilence, or other calamity, and had been compelled to consolidate and take refuge under the Choctaw. Consult Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894. See Capinans.

Mocuck. Defined by Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 399, 1877) as "a term applied to the box of birch bark in which sugar is kept by the Chippewa Indians." In the forms makak, mocock, mocuck, moukawk, mukuk, the word is known to the literature of the settlement of Canada and the W. in the early years of the 19th century, and is now in use among the English-speaking people of the maple-sugar region about the great lakes, and among the Canadian French as macaque. A trader in Minnesota in 1820 (cited by Jenks in 19th Rep. B. A. E., 1103, 1900) speaks of "a mocock of sugar, weighing about 40 pounds." The word is derived from mā'kāk, which in the Chippewa and closely related Algonquian dialects signifies a bag, box, or other like receptacle of birch-bark. (A. F. C.)

Modoc (from Mōatokni, 'southerners'). A Lutuanian tribe, forming the southern division of that stock, in s. w. Oregon. The Modoc language is practically the same as the Klamath, the dialectic differences being extremely slight. This linguistic identity would indicate that the local separation of the two tribes must have been comparatively recent and has never been complete. The former habitat of the Modoc included Little Klamath lake, Modoc lake, Tule lake, Lost River valley, and Clear lake, and extended at times as far E. as Goose lake. The most important bands of the tribe were at Little Klamath lake, Tule lake, and in the valley of Lost r. Frequent conflicts with white immigrants, in which both sides were guilty of many atrocities, have given the tribe an unfortunate reputation. In 1864 the Modoc joined the Klamath in ceding their territory to the United States and removed to Klamath res. They seem never to have been contented, however, and made persistent efforts to return and occupy their former lands on Lost r. and its vicinity. In 1870 a prominent chief named Kintpuash (q. v.), commonly known to history as Captain Jack, led the more turbulent portion of the tribe back to the California border and obstinately refused to return to the reservation. The first attempt to bring back the runaways by force brought on the Modoc war of 1872-73. After some struggles Kintpuash and his band retreated to the lava-beds on the California frontier, and from Jan. to Apr. 1873, successfully resisted the attempts of the troops to dislodge them. The progress of the war had been slow until April of that year, when two of the peace commissioners, who had been sent to treat with the renegades, were treacherously assassinated. In this act Kintpuash played the chief part. The campaign was then pushed with vigor, the Modoc were finally dispersed and captured, and Kintpuash and 5 other leaders were hanged at Ft Klamath in Oct., 1873. The tribe was then divided, a part being sent to Indian Ter. and placed on the Quapaw res., where they had diminished to 56 by 1905. The remainder are on Klamath res., where they are apparently thriving, and numbered 223 in 1905.

CHIKCHIKAM LUPATKUELATKO ("SCAR-FACED CHARLEY")—MODOC

The following were the Modoc settlements so far as known: Agawesh, Chakawech, Kalelk, Kawa, Keshlakchuish, Keuchishkeni, Kumbatuash, Leush, Nakoshkeni, Nushaltkagakni, Pashka, Plaikni, Shapashkeni, Sputuishkeni, Stukishkeni, Waisha, Wachamshwash, Welwashkeni, Wukakeni, Yaneks, and Yulalona.

Moenkapi ('place of the running water'). A small settlement about 40 m. n. w. of Oraibi, n. e. Ariz., occupied during the farming season by the Hopi. The present village, which consists of two irregular rows of one-story houses, was built over the remains of an older settlement—apparently the Rancheria de los Gandules seen by Oñate in 1604. Moenkapi is said to have been founded within the memory of some of the Mormon pioneers at the neighboring town of Tuba City, named after an old Oraibi chief. It was the headquarters of a large milling enterprise of the Mormons a number of years ago.

Mogg. An Abnaki chief. He had long been sachem of the Norridgewock and had been converted to Christianity by Pere Rale when the English settlers in Maine, in order to make good their title to territory which the Abnaki declared they had not parted with, began a series of attacks in 1722. Col. Westbrook in the first expedition found the village deserted and burned it. In 1724 the English surprised the Indians. The killing of Rale and many of the Indians, the desecration of the church, etc., left a blot on the honor of the colonists (Drake, Bk. Inds., 312, 1880). In the fight fell Mogg and other noted warriors. Whittier's poem "Mogg Megone" recounts the story. See Missions.

Mogollon (from the mesa and mountains of the same name in New Mexico and Arizona, which in turn were named in honor of Juan Ignacio Flores Mogollon, governor of New Mexico in 1712-15). A subdivision of the Apache that formerly ranged over the Mogollon mesa and mts. in w. New Mexico and e. Arizona (Ind. Aff. Rep., 380, 1854). They were associated with the Mimbrenos at the Southern Apache agency, N. Mex., in 1868, and at Hot Springs agency in 1875, and are now under the Ft Apache and San Carlos res., Ariz. They are no longer officially recognized as Mogollones, and their number is not separately reported.

Mohave (from hamok 'three', avi 'mountain'). The most populous and warlike of the Yuman tribes. Since known to history they appear to have lived on both sides of the Rio Colorado, though chiefly on the e. side, between the Needles (whence their name is derived) and the entrance to Black canyon. Ives, in 1857, found only a few scattered families in Cottonwood valley, the bulk of their number being below Hardyville. In recent times a body of Chemehuevi have held the river between them and their kinsmen the Yuma. The Mohave are strong, athletic, and well developed, their women attractive; in fact, Ives characterized them as fine a people physically as any he had ever seen. They are famed for the artistic painting of their bodies. Tattooing was universal, but confined to small areas on the skin. According to Kroeber (Am. Anthrop., iv, 284, 1902) their art in recent times consists chiefly of crude painted decorations on their pottery. Though a river tribe, the Mohave made no canoes, but when necessary had recourse to rafts, or balsas, made of bundles of reeds. They had no large settlements, their dwellings being scattered. These were four-sided and low, with four supporting posts at the center. The walls, which were only 2 or 3 ft high, and the almost flat roof were formed of brush covered with sand. Their granaries were upright cylindrical structures with flat roofs. The Mohave hunted but little, their chief reliance for food being on the cultivated products of the soil, as corn, pumpkins, melons, beans, and a small amount of wheat, to which they added mesquite beans, mescrew, piñon nuts, and fish to a limited extent. They did not practise irrigation, but relied on the inundation of the bottom lands to supply the needed moisture, hence when there was no overflow their crops failed. Articles of skin and bone were very little used, materials such as the inner bark of the willow, vegetable fiber, etc., taking their place. Pottery was manufactured. Baskets were in common use, but were obtained from other tribes.

According to Kroeber, "there is no full gentile system, but something closely akin to it, which may be called either an incipient or a decadent clan system. Certain men, and all their ancestors and descendants in the male line, have only one name for all their female relatives. Thus, if the female name hereditary in my family be Maha, my father's sister, my own sisters, my daughters (no matter how great their number), and my son's daughters, will all be called Maha. There are about twenty such women's names, or virtual gentes, among the Mohave. None of these names seems to have any signification. But according to the myths of the tribe, certain numbers of men originally had, or were given, such names as Sun, Moon, Tobacco, Fire, Cloud, Coyote, Deer, Wind, Beaver, Owl, and others, which correspond exactly to totemic clan names; then these men were instructed by Mastamho, the chief mythological being, to call all their daughters and female descendants in the male line by certain names, corresponding to these clan names. Thus the male ancestors of all the women who at present bear the name Hipa, are believed to have been originally named Coyote. It is also said that all those with one name formerly lived in one area, and were all considered related. This, however, is not the case now, nor does it seem to have been so within recent historic times." Bourke (Jour. Am. Folk-lore, ii, 181, 1889) has recorded some of these names, called by him gentes, and the totemic name to which each corresponds, as follows: Hualga (Moon), O-cha (Rain-cloud), Ma-ha (Caterpillar), Nol-cha (Sun), Hipa (Coyote), Va-had-ha (Tobacco), Shul-ya (Beaver), Kot-ta (Mescal or Tobacco), Ti-hil-ya (Mescal), Vi-ma-ga (a green plant, not identified), Ku-mad-ha (Ocatilla or Iron Cactus), Ma-li-ka (unknown), Mus (Mesquite), Ma-si-pa (Coyote).

The tribal organization was loose, though, as a whole, the Mohave remained quite distinct from other tribes. The chieftainship was hereditary in the male line. Their dead were cremated. The population of the tribe in 1775-76 was conservatively estimated by Garcés (Diary, 443, 1900) at 3,000, and by Leroux, about 1834 (Whipple, Pac. R. R. Rep., III, 1856), to be 4,000; but the latter is probably an overestimate. Their number in 1905 was officially given as 1,589, of whom 508 were under the Colorado River school superintendent, 856 under the Ft Mohave school superintendent, 50 under the San Carlos agency, and about 175 at Camp McDowell, on the Rio Verde. Those at the latter two points, however, are apparently Yavapai, commonly known as Apache Mohave.

No treaty was made with the Mohave respecting their original territory, the United States assuming title thereto. By act of Mar. 3, 1865, supplemented by Executive orders of Nov. 22, 1873, Nov. 16, 1874, and May 15, 1876, the present Colorado River res., Ariz., occupied by Mohave, Chemehuevi, and Kawia, was established.

Pasion, San Pedro, and Santa Isabel have been mentioned as rancherias of the Mohave.

Mohawk (cognate with the Narraganset Mohowatuck, 'they eat (animate) things,' hence 'man-eaters'). The most easterly tribe of the Iroquois confederation. They called themselves Kaniengehaga, 'people of the place of the flint.'

In the federal council and in other intertribal assemblies the Mohawk sit with the tribal phratry, which is formally called the "Three Elder Brothers" and of which the other members are the Seneca and the Onondaga. Like the Oneida, the Mohawk have only 3 clans, namely, the Bear, the Wolf, and the Turtle. The tribe is represented in the federal council by 9 chiefs of the rank of rotaner (see Chiefs), being 3 from every clan. These chiefships were known by specific names, which were conferred with the office. These official titles are Tekarihoken, Haienhwatha, and Satekarihwate, of the first group; Orenrehkowa, Deionhehkon, and Sharenhowanen, of the second group; and Dehennakarine, Rastawenserontha, and Shoskoharowanen, of the third group. The first two groups or clans formed an intratribal phratry, while the last, or Bear clan group, was the other phratry. The people at all times assembled by phratries, and each phratry occupied a side of the council fire opposite that occupied by the other phratry. The second title in the foregoing list has been Anglicized into Hiawatha (q. v.).

From the Jesuit Relation for 1660 it is learned that the Mohawk, during a period of 60 years, had been many times both at the top and the bottom of the ladder of success; that, being insolent and warlike, they had attacked the Abnaki and their congeners at the æ, the Conestoga at the s, the Hurons at the w and n, and the Algonquian tribes at the n; that at the close of the 16th century the Algonkin had so reduced them that there appeared to be none left, but that the remainder increased so rapidly that in a few years they in turn had overthrown the Algonkin. This success did not last long. The Conestoga waged war against them so vigorously for 10 years that for the second time the Mohawk were overthrown so completely that they appeared to be extinct. About this time (?1614) the Dutch arrived in their country, and, being attracted by their beaver skins, they furnished the Mohawk and their congeners with firearms, in order that the pelts might be obtained in greater abundance. The purpose of the Dutch was admirably served, but the possession of firearms by the Mohawk and their confederates rendered it easy for them to conquer their adversaries, whom they routed and filled with terror not alone by the deadly effect but even by the mere sound of these weapons, which hitherto had been unknown. Thenceforth the Mohawk and their confederates became formidable adversaries and were victorious most everywhere, so that by 1660 the conquests of the Iroquois confederates, although they were not numerous, extended over nearly 500 leagues of territory. The Mohawk at that time numbered not more than 500 warriors and dwelt in 4 or 5 wretched villages.

The accounts of Mohawk migrations previous to the historical period are largely conjectural. Some writers do not clearly differentiate between the Mohawk and the Huron tribes at the n and w, and from their own confederates as a whole. Besides fragmentary and untrustworthy traditions little that is definite is known regarding the migratory movements of the Mohawk.

In 1603, Champlain, while at Tadoussac, heard of the Mohawk and their country. On July 30, 1609, he encountered on the lake to which he gave his own name a party of nearly 200 Iroquois warriors, under 3 chiefs. In a skirmish in which he shot two of the chiefs dead and wounded the third, he defeated this party, which was most probably largely Mohawk. Dismayed by the firearms of the Frenchman, whom they now met for the first time, the Indians fled. The Iroquois of this party wore arrow-proof armor and had both stone and iron hatchets, the latter having been obtained in trade. The fact that in Capt. Hendricksen's report to the States General, Aug. 18, 1616, he says that he had "bought from the inhabitants, the Minquaes [Conestoga], 3 persons, being people belonging to this company," who were "employed in the service of the Mohawks and Machicans," giving, he says, for them, in exchange, "kettles, beads, and merchandise," shows how extensively the inland trade was carried on between the Dutch and the Mohawk. The latter were at war with the Mohegan and other New England tribes with only intermittent periods of peace. In 1623 a Mohegan fort stood opposite Castle id. in the Hudson and was "built against their enemies, the Maquaes, a powerful people." In 1626 the Dutch commander of Ft Orange (Albany), and 6 of his men, joined the Mohegan in an expedition to invade the Mohawk country. They were met a league from the fort by a party of Mohawk armed only with bows and arrows, and were defeated, the Dutch commander and 3 of his men being killed, and of whom one, probably the commander, was cooked and eaten by the Mohawk. This intermittent warfare continued until the Mohegan were finally forced to withdraw from the upper waters of the Hudson. They did not however relinquish their territorial rights to their native adversaries, and so in 1630 they began to sell their lands to the Dutch. The deed to the Manor of Rensselaerwyck, which extended w. of the river two days' journey, and was mainly on the æ side of the river, was dated in the year named. In 1637 Kilian Van Rensselaer bought more land on the æ side. Subsequently the Mohegan became the friends and allies of the Mohawk, their former adversaries.

In 1641 Ahatsistari, a noted Huron chief, with only 50 companions, attacked and defeated 300 Iroquois, largely Mohawk, taking some prisoners. In the preceding summer he had attacked on L. Ontario a number of large canoes manned by Iroquois, probably chiefly Mohawk, and defeated them, after sinking several canoes and killing a number of their crews. In 1642, 11 Huron canoes were attacked on Ottawa r. by Mohawk and Oneida warriors about 100 m. above Montreal. In the same year the Mohawk captured Father Isaac Jogues, two French companions, and some Huron allies. They took the Frenchmen to their villages, where they caused them to undergo the most cruel tortures. Jogues, by the aid of the Dutch, escaped in the following year; but in 1646 he went to the Mohawk to attempt to convert them and to confirm the peace which had been made with them. On May 16, 1646, Father Jogues went to the Mohawk as an envoy and returned to Three Rivers in July in good health. In September he again started for the Mohawk country to establish a mission there; but, owing to the prevalence of an epidemic among the Mohawk, and to the failure of their crops, they accused Father Jogues of "having concealed certain charms in a small coffer, which he had left with his host as a pledge of his return," which caused them thus to be afflicted. So upon his arrival in their village for the third time, he and his companion, a young Frenchman, were seized, stripped, and threatened with death. Father Jogues had been adopted by the Wolf clan of the Mohawk, hence this clan, with that of the Turtle, which with the Wolf formed a phratry or brotherhood, tried to save the lives of the Frenchmen. But the Bear clan, which formed a phratry by itself, and being only cousins to the others, of one of which Father Jogues was a member, had determined on his death as a sorcerer. On Oct. 17, 1646, the unfortunates were told that they would be killed, but not burned, the next day. On the evening of the 18th Father Jogues was invited to a supper in a Bear lodge. Having accepted the invitation, he went there, and while entering the lodge a man concealed behind the door struck him down with an ax. He was beheaded, his head elevated on the palisade, and his body thrown into the river. The next morning Jogues' companion suffered a similar fate. Father Jogues left an account of a Mohawk sacrifice to the god Aïreskoi (i. e., Areguë's gud', 'the Master or God of War'). While speaking of the cruelties exercised by the Mohawk toward their prisoners, and specifically toward 3 women, he said: "One of them (a thing not hitherto done) was burned all over her body, and afterwards thrown into a huge pyre." And that "at every burn which they caused, by applying lighted torches to her body, an old man, in a loud voice, exclaimed, 'Daimon, Aïreskoi, we offer thee this victim, whom we burn for thee, that thou mayest be filled with her flesh and render us ever anew victorious over our enemies.' Her body was cut up, sent to the various villages, and devoured." Megapolensis (1644), a contemporary of Father Jogues, says that when the Mohawk were unfortunate in war they would kill, cut up, and roast a bear, and then make an offering of it to this war god with the accompanying prayer: "Oh, great and mighty Aïreskuoni, we know that we have offended against thee, inasmuch as we have not killed and eaten our captive enemies—forgive us this. We promise that we will kill and eat all the captives we shall hereafter take as certainly as we have killed and now eat this bear." He adds: "Finally, they roast their prisoners dead before a slow fire for some days and then eat them up. The common people eat the arms, buttocks, and trunk, but the chiefs eat the head and the heart."

The Jesuit Relation for 1646 says that, properly speaking, the French had at that time peace with only the Mohawk, who were their near neighbors and who gave them the most trouble, and that the Mohegan (Mahingans or Mahinganak), who had had firm alliances with the Algonkin allies of the French, were then already conquered by the Mohawk, with whom they formed a defensive and offensive alliance; that during this year some Sokoki (Assokëkik) murdered some Algonkin, whereupon the latter determined, under a misapprehension, to massacre some Mohawk, who were then among them and the French. But, fortunately, it was discovered from the testimony of two wounded persons, who had escaped, that the murderers spoke a language quite different from that of the Iroquois tongues, and suspicion was at once removed from the Mohawk, who then hunted freely in the immediate vicinity of the Algonkin n. of the St Lawrence, where these hitherto implacable enemies frequently met on the best of terms. At this time the Mohawk refused Sokoki ambassadors a new compact to wage war on the Algonkin.

The introduction of firearms by the Dutch among the Mohawk, who were among the first of their region to procure them, marked an important era in their history, for it enabled them and the cognate Iroquois tribes to subjugate the Delawares and Munsee, and thus to begin a career of conquest that carried their war parties to the Mississippi and to the shores of Hudson bay. The Mohawk villages were in the valley of Mohawk r., N. Y., from the vicinity of Schenectady nearly to Utica, and their territory extended n. to the St Lawrence and s. to the watershed of Schoharie cr. and the e. branch of the Susquehanna. On the e. their territories adjoined those of the Mahican, who held Hudson r. From their position on the e. frontier of the Iroquois confederation the Mohawk were among the most prominent of the Iroquoian tribes in the early Indian wars and in official negotiations with the colonies, so that their name was frequently used by the tribes of New England and by the whites as a synonym for the confederation. Owing to their position they also suffered much more than their confederates in some of the Indian and French wars. Their 7 villages of 1644 were reduced to 5 in 1677. At the beginning of the Revolution the Mohawk took the side of the British, and at its conclusion the larger portion of them, under Brant and Johnson, removed to Canada, where they have since resided on lands granted to them by the British government. In 1777 the Oneida expelled the remainder of the tribe and burned their villages.

In 1650 the Mohawk had an estimated population of 5,000, which was probably more than their actual number; for 10 years later they were estimated at only 2,500. Thenceforward they underwent a rapid decline, caused by their wars with the Mahican, Conestoga, and other tribes, and with the French, and also by the removal of a large part of the tribe to Caughnawaga and other mission villages. The later estimates of their population have been: 1,500 in 1677 (an alleged decrease of 3,500 in 27 years), 400 in 1736 (an alleged decrease of 1,100 in 36 years), 500 in 1741, 800 in 1765, 500 in 1778, 1,500 in 1783, and about 1,200 in 1851. These estimates are evidently little better than vague guesses. In 1884 they were on three reservations in Ontario: 965 at the Bay of Quinté near the e. end of L. Ontario, the settlement at Gibson, and the reserve of the Six Nations on Grand r. Besides these there are a few individuals scattered among the different Iroquois tribes in the United States. In 1906 the Bay of Quinté settlement contained 1,320; there were 140 (including "Algonquins") at Watha, the former Gibson band which was removed earlier from Oka; and the Six Nations included an indeterminate number.

The Mohawk participated in the following treaties with the United States: Ft Stanwix, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1784, being a treaty of peace between the United States and the Six Nations and defining their boundaries; supplemented by treaty of Ft Harmar, O., Jan. 9, 1789. Konondaugua (Canandaugua), N. Y., Nov. 11, 1794, establishing peace relations with the Six Nations and agreeing to certain reservations and boundaries. Albany, N. Y., Mar. 29, 1797, by which the United States sanctioned the cession by the Mohawk to the state of New York of all their lands therein.

The names of the following Mohawk villages have been preserved: Canajoharie, Canastotaone, Canienga, Caughnawaga, Chuchtononeda, Kanagaro, Kowogonnugharieghuarie, Nowadaga, Onoalagona, Osquake, Saratoga, Schaunacata (Schenectady), Schoharie, and Teantotaloga. (J. N. B. H.)

Mohawk. One of the Lakmiut bands of the Kalapooian stock, on Mohawk r., an e. tributary of the Willamette, just n. of Eugene City, Oreg.—U. S. Ind. Treat. (1855), 19, 1873; Sanders in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1863, 88, 1864.

Mohegan (from maingan, 'wolf.'—Trumbull). An Algonquian tribe whose chief seat appears originally to have been on Thames r., Conn., in the n. part of New London co. They claimed as their proper country all the territory watered by the Thames and its branches n. to within 8 or 10 m. of the Massachusetts line, and by conquest a considerable area extending n. and e. into Massachusetts and Rhode Island, occupied by the Wabaquasset and Nipmuc. On the w. their dominion extended along the coast to East r., near Guilford, Conn. After the destruction of the Pequot in 1637 the Mohegan laid claim to their country and that of the western Nehantic in the s. part of New London co. The tribes w. of them on Connecticut r., whom they sometimes claimed as subjects, were generally hostile to them, as were also the Narraganset on their e. border.

The Mohegan seem to have been the eastern branch of that group of closely connected tribes that spread from the vicinity of Narragansett bay to the farther side of the Hudson (see Mahican), but since known to the whites the eastern and western bodies have had no political connection. At the first settlement of New England the Mohegan and Pequot formed but one tribe, under the rule of Sassacus, afterward known as the Pequot chief. Uncas, a subordinate chief connected by marriage with the family of Sassacus, rebelled against him and assumed a distinct authority as the leader of a small band on the Thames, near Norwich, who were afterward known in history as Mohegan. On the fall of Sassacus in 1637 the greater part of the survivors of his tribe fell under the dominion of the Mohegan chief, who thus obtained control of the territory of the two tribes with all their tributary bands. As the English favored his pretensions he also set up a claim to extensive adjoining territories in the possession of rival chiefs. He strengthened his position by an alliance with the English against all other tribes, and after the destruction of the Indian power in s.

New England, by the death of King Philip in 1676, the Mohegan were the only important tribe remaining s. of the Abnaki. As the white settlements extended the Mohegan sold most of their lands and confined themselves to a reservation on Thames r., in New London co., Conn. Their village, also called Mohegan, was on the site of the present town of that name on the w. bank of the river. Their ancient village seems to have been farther up, about the mouth of the Yantic. Besides the village at Mohegan, the villages of Groton and Stonington, occupied mainly by the remnant of the Pequot, were considered to belong to the Mohegan. They rapidly dwindled away when surrounded by the whites. Many joined the Scaticook, but in 1788 a still larger number, under the leadership of Occom, joined the Brotherton Indians in New York, where they formed the majority of the new settlement. The rest of the tribe continue to reside in the vicinity of Mohegan or Norwich, Conn., but are now reduced to about 100 individuals of mixed blood, only one of whom, an old woman, retained the language in 1904. They still keep up a September festival, which appears to be a survival of the Green Corn dance of the Eastern tribes. For interesting notes on this remnant, see Prince and Speck in Am. Anthropol., 1903 and 1904.

In 1643 the Mohegan were estimated to number from 2,000 to 2,500, but this included the Pequot living with them, and probably other subordinate tribes. In 1705 they numbered 750, and in 1774 were reported at 206. Soon after they lost a considerable number by removal to New York, and in 1804 only 84 were left, who were reduced to 69 five years later. They were reported to number 300 in 1825, and about 350 in 1832, but the increased numbers are probably due to the enumeration of negroes and mixed-bloods living with them, together with recruits from the Narraganset and others in the vicinity. The Mohegan villages were Groton, Mohegan, Showtucket, and Wabaquasset. For further information and synonyms, see Mahican. (J. M.) Manheken.—Brewster (1651) in Mass. Hist. Soc. Mohemencho. A tribe of the Monacan confederacy, formerly living on the upper waters of James r., Va. Jefferson locates them in Powhatan co., on the s. side of the river, a few miles above Richmond, but Strachey seems to place them higher up, in the mountains. (J. M.)

Moheton. An unclassified tribe living in 1671 in the mountains of s. w. Virginia, or the adjacent part of West Virginia, on the upper waters of a river flowing n. w.—perhaps New r. They had removed a short time previously from the headwaters of the Roanoke, in the mountains farther to the e. They were friends and neighbors of the Tutelo, and were possibly a cognate tribe, or they may have been Shawnee. (J. M.)

Mohickon John's Town. A village, probably occupied by a band of Mahican under a chief known as Mohickon John, formerly on the upper waters of Mohican r., probably on Jerome fork, in the present Ashland co., Ohio. It is probably the Mohickon Village mentioned by Croghan in 1760. (J. M.)

Mohock. From the reputation of the Mohawk, an Iroquoian people of central New York and parts of Canada, their name was used by the colonists in the sense of 'fierce fellow,' then 'ruffian,' or 'tough' in modern parlance. The word was specially applied to one of the many bands of ruffians who infested the streets of London at the beginning of the 18th century. As it appears in English literature it is spelled Mohock. Gay, the poet and dramatist (1688–1732), asks—Who has not heard the Scowrer's midnight fames? Who has not trembled at the Mohock's name? (A. F. C.)

Mohominge. A village of the Powhatan confederacy near the falls of James r., at Richmond, Va., about 1610 (Strachey, ca. 1612, Va., 25, 1849). It is not marked on Capt. John Smith's map.

Mohongo (or Myhangah). The wife of Kihegashugah, an Osage chief. These two, with four other members of the tribe, sailed from New Orleans in 1827, and on July 27 arrived at Havre, France, under the care of David Delaunay, a Frenchman who had lived 25 years in St Louis, and who is said to have been a colonel in the service of the United States. The Indians later went to Paris, and, as at Havre, were the objects of marked attention, being showered with gifts, entertained by people of prominence, and received at court by Charles X. The desire of Kihegashugah to visit France was inspired by a journey to that country by his grandfather in the time of Louis XIV. Kihegashugah and two others of the party died of smallpox on shipboard while returning to America. It is said that the expense of their return was borne by Lafayette. Landing at Norfolk, Va., the survivors of the party proceeded to Washington, where the accompanying portrait of Mohongo, from Kenney and Hall, was painted. See Six Indiens rouges de la tribu Osages (with portraits), 1827; Histoire de la tribu Osages, par P. V., 1827; McKenney and Hall, Ind. Tribes, i, 29, 1858; Fletcher in Am. Anthropol., ii, 395, 1900.

MOHONGO (MCKENNEY AND HALL)

Mohonk Indian Conferences. A series of annual meetings of friends of the Indians intended to facilitate intelligent discussion and conscientious agitation for desirable reforms. In these conferences a novel and effective way of forming and disseminating sound public opinion has been devised and for a score of years successfully employed, and through their instrumentality public speakers and those who write for the press have been kept in touch with the experts who know the facts. The Mohonk conferences, in their inception and their maintenance, are the idea and the work of Albert K. Smiley, member of the U. S. Board of Indian Commissioners, formerly professor of natural science at Haverford College, later in charge of the Friends' Boarding School at Providence, R. I. Having purchased the picturesque hotel overlooking beautiful L. Mohonk, in the Catskill range, w. of lower Hudson r., N. Y., Mr Smiley made it a resort for people of education, high principle, and philanthropic interests. Led by the wish to promote reform in the management of Indian affairs, he conceived the idea of inviting each year, as his personal guests for the greater part of a week in October, the people who knew most about Indian life, education, and mission work, and the relations of the Government to the Indians. Besides these experts in Indian affairs, were invited from 100 to 250 other people, leaders in shaping public opinion, such as editors of the secular and religious press, writers for reviews, clergymen of all denominations, presidents of universities and colleges, leading men and women teaching in public schools, lawyers and judges, Senators and Representatives in Congress, members of the Cabinet and heads of Departments, expert ethnologists, and, preeminently, such workers from the field as Indian agents of character and intelligence, teachers of Indian schools, army officers with a personal knowledge of Indians, and philanthropic people who had studied the Indians on the reservations. These meetings Mr Smiley, as a member of the Board of Indian Commissioners, called "Conferences with the Board," and until 1902 a member of the Board presided—Gen. Clinton B. Fisk, from 1883 until his death in 1890; Dr Merrill E. Gates, former president of Amherst College, chairman (now secretary) of the Board, from 1890 to 1902; in 1903, Hon. John D. Long, ex-Secretary of the Navy, and in 1904, Hon. Charles J. Bonaparte, present Secretary of the Navy. The proceedings of the conference for the first 20 years were printed as an appendix in the Annual Reports of the Board of Indian Commissioners.

During the four days of the meeting, in the mornings a three or four hours' session and in the evenings two to three hours have been given to addresses, papers, reports, and the freest discussion, in which the widest differences of opinion have been welcomed and carefully considered and discussed. Sympathetic attention to views the most divergent has resulted in such conservatively sound utterances in the annual Mohonk platform as have generally commanded the support of the great body of the best friends of the Indians. In the afternoon, in drives and walks about the lake and through the forest, congenial groups of interested friends often continued the discussions of the morning sessions, shaped resolutions, and devised plans for aiding reform.

At its first meeting in 1883 the conference reported in favor of larger appropriations for Indian education and more school buildings; the extension of laws relating to crime, marriage, and inheritance so as to cover Indians on reservations then "lawless"; more of religious education for Indians; the gradual withdrawal of rations from the able-bodied Indians because rations pauperized them; the inexpediency of leasing Indian grazing lands, and the need of greater care in selecting men of character as Indian agents. Still more progressive policies have been advocated in subsequent years. The conference early declared for land in severalty, with inalienable homesteads for Indian families; for educating Indians industrially as well as intellectually for citizenship, to be conferred as rapidly as practicable; and for uniform insistence upon monogamy, the sacredness of marriage, and the preservation at each agency of family records of marriages and relationships. The abolition of the system of appointing Indian agents as a reward for partisan service with little regard to fitness, was urgently advocated. The advantages of the "outing system," by which Indian children of school age were placed in carefully chosen homes of white people, to attend school with white children, and learn to work on white men's farms, were discussed and demonstrated. The breaking up of the tribal system in Indian Territory was advocated several years before the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes (q. v.) was appointed; and the conference has advocated the division of the great tribal trust funds into individual holdings, each Indian to have control of his own share of that money as soon as he shows himself able to begin to use it wisely. The development of native Indian industries, wherever practicable, has been intelligently favored. Sympathetic appreciation of all that is fine, artistically suggestive, and worthy of development in the nature, institutions, and arts of the Indian, has been marked and constant. (M. E. G.)

Mohotlath (Mô-hol'ath). A sept of the Opitchesaht, a Nootka tribe.—Boas in 6th Rep. N. W. Tribes Canada, 32, 1890.

Moicaqui. A former rancharia, probably of the Nevome, in Sonora, Mexico, visited by Father Kino in 1694.—Doc. Hist. Mex., 4th s., 1, 253, 1856.

Moingwena. The name (the etymology of which is doubtful) of a small tribe of the Illinois confederacy, closely affiliated with the Peoria. The name was applied also to the village in which they resided. The first recorded notice of the tribe is by Marquette in the account of his descent of the Mississippi with Joliet in 1673, when he found them residing in the vicinity of the Peoria village on the w. side of the Mississippi near the mouth of a river supposed to have been the Des Moines. Franquelin's map of 1688 gives the name of the river as "Moingana," and marks the Indian village of "Moingwena" on it. When Marquette returned from the S. in 1674, he passed up Illinois r. and found the Peoria in the vicinity of

L. Peoria, the tribe having removed hither after his descent the previous year. He does not mention the Moingwena in this connection, but from the fact that Gravier found them with the Peoria in this locality in 1700, it is presumed that they migrated thither with the latter tribe. As no mention is made of them after this time they probably were incorporated with the Peoria, thus losing their tribal distinction. (J. M. C. T.)

Moiseya (Môsteyu, a word of uncertain origin, sometimes rendered as a Cheyenne name meaning 'many flies' or 'flint people', but probably of foreign derivation). An Algonquian tribe which, according to the tradition of the Cheyenne, adjoined them on the N. E. in their old home in Minnesota, and started with them on their westward migration about the year 1700, but turned back before reaching the Missouri r. It is said that some of their descendants are still with the Cheyenne. They are possibly identical with the Monsoni. (J. M.)

Mokaich. The Mountain Lion clan of the Keresan pueblos of Laguna, Sia, San Felipe, and Cochiti, N. Mex. The Mountain Lion clan of Laguna went to that village from the Rio Grande, dwelling first at Mt Taylor, or Mt San Mateo. With the Hapai (Oak) clan it formed a phratry, but it is probably now extinct. The clans of this name at Sia and San Felipe are quite extinct. (F. W. H.)

Mokohoko (Mokohoko, 'he who floats visible near the surface of the water'). A chief of the band of Sauk that took the lead in supporting Black Hawk (q. v.) in the Black Hawk war. He was of the Sturgeon clan, the ruling clan of the Sauk, and was a bitter enemy of Keokuk (q. v.). The band still retains its identity. It refused to leave Kansas when the rest of the tribe went to Indian Ter., and had to be removed thither by the military. It is now known as the Black Hawk band, and its members are the most conservative of all the Sauk. (W. J.)

Mokumiks ('red round robes'). A band of the Piegan division of the Siksika.
Mo-kum-ika.—Grinnell, Blackfoot Lodge Tales, 210, 1892.
Red Round Robes.—Ibid., 225.

Molala. A Wailatpuan tribe forming the western division of that family. Little is known of their history. When first met with they resided in the Cascade range between Mts Hood and Scott and on the w. slope, in Washington and Oregon. The Cayuse have a tradition that the Molala formerly dwelt with them s. of Columbia r. and became separated and driven westward in their wars with hostile tribes. Their dialect, while related, is quite distinct from that of the Cayuse, and the separation probably took place in remote times. The name Molala is derived from that of a creek in Willamette valley, Oreg., s. of Oregon City. A band of these Indians drove out the original inhabitants and occupied their land. Subsequently the name was extended to all the bands. The present status of the tribe is not certain. In 1849 it was estimated to number 100; in 1877 Gatschet found several families living on the Grande Ronde res., Oreg., and in 1881 there were said to be about 20 individuals living in the mountains w. of Klamath lake. Those on the Grande Ronde res. are not officially enumerated, but are regarded as absorbed by the other tribes with whom they live. With regard to the rest nothing is known. It is probable, however, that there are a few scattered survivors. The Molala joined with other bands of Willamette valley in the treaty of Dayton, Oreg., Jan. 22, 1855, and by treaty at the same place, Dec. 21, 1855, they ceded their lands and agreed to remove to a reservation. Chakankni, Chimbuiha, and Mukanti are said to have been Molala bands or settlements. (L. F.)

Momobi (Mo'-mo-bi, a species of lizard). A clan of the Lizard (Earth or Sand) phratry of the Hopi.—Stephen in 8th Rep. B. A. E., 39, 1891.

Monacan (possibly from an Algonquian word signifying a digging stick or spade). A tribe and confederacy of Virginia in the 17th century. The confederacy occupied the upper waters of James r. above the falls at Richmond. Their chief village was Rasawek. They were allies of the Manahoac and enemies of the Powhatan, and spoke a language different from that of either. They were finally incorporated with other remnants under the names of Saponi and Tutelo (q. v.). The confederacy was composed of the Monacan proper, Massinacac, Mohemencho, Monahassano, Monasiccapano, and some other tribes.

The Monacan proper had a chief settlement, known to the whites as Monacantown, on James r. about 20 mi. above the falls at Richmond. In 1669 they still had 30 bowmen, or perhaps about 100 souls. Thirty years later, the Indian population having died out or emigrated, a Huguenot colony took possession of the site. Consult Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894. (J. M.)

Monahassano (a name of uncertain etymology, but most probably connected with Yesah, the name which the Tutelo applied to themselves). A tribe of the Monacan confederacy, formerly living on the s. side of James r., near the mountains, in Bedford and Buckingham cos., Va. Lederer describes them as tall and warlike, and says their totem was three arrows. In 1671 they were 25 m. from the Saponi, on Staunton r. They seem to have been next in importance to the Monacan in the confederacy. See Tutelo. Consult Mooney, Siouan Tribes of the East, Bull. B. A. E., 1894. (J. M.)

Moncachtape ('killer of pain and fatigue'). A Yazoo Indian, noted chiefly on account of his real or supposed travels and his knowledge of various Indian languages. Le Page du Pratz, during his residence in Louisiana about the middle of the 18th century, met Moncachtape and obtained from him an account of his wanderings, according to which (DuPratz, Hist. La., III, 89–128, 1758), after the loss of his wife and children, he had devoted much of his time to traveling. One of his journeys was to the N. E., in which he passed up the Ohio, visited the Shawnee and Iroquois, and wintered among the Abnaki; thence he went up the St. Lawrence and returned to his home by way of the Mississippi. His second trip was to the N. W. coast by the route subsequently traveled by Lewis and Clark. He mentions the Tamaroa, Kansa, and Amikwa, and although he alludes to numerous tribes seen during his passage down Columbia r., he mentions no tribal names. He finally reached the Pacific coast, where, in addition to Indians, he met with bearded white men, who "came from sun-setting, in search of a yellow stinking wood which dyes a fine yellow color." With other Indians he ambushed and killed 11 of these strangers, 2 of whom bore firearms. These whites are described as small, but having large heads and long hair in the middle of the crown and wrapped in a great many folds of stuff, while their clothes were soft and of several colors. This story, so far as it relates to the western trip, is very doubtful on its face, and the names of tribes which it gives extend only as far as DuPratz' own knowledge of them; yet Quatrefages (Human Species, 205, 1895) accepts the story as credible, and that Moncachtape understood a number of languages is clearly proven. See also Clarke, Pion. Days in Oreg., 1905. (C. T.)

Mono. A general term applied to the Shoshonean tribes of s. e. California by their neighbors on the w. The origin and meaning of the name are obscure, its identity with the Spanish mono, 'monkey,' and its similarity, at least in certain dialects, to the Yokuts word for 'fly' (monai, etc.), are probably only coincidences. For subdivisions, see Mono-Paviotso.

Mono-Paviotso. One of the three great dialectic groups into which the Shoshoneans of the great plateau are distinguished. It includes the Mono of s. e. California, the Paviotso, or "Paiute," of w. Nevada, and the "Snakes" and Saidyuka of e. Oregon. Part of the Bannock may be related to these, but the eastern Bannock have affinities with the Ute.

The bands which seem to have formed the social unit of these people were each under one chief, and several of these are said to have been united into confederacies, such as the "Paviotso confederacy," but it is doubtful whether the relations existing between the constituent parts should properly be so termed.

The bands or divisions mentioned within the area occupied by this group are the following: Agaivanuna, Genega's band, Hadsapoke's band, Holkoma, Hoone-booeey, Intimbich, Itsaatiaga, Kaidatoia-bie, Kaivanungavidukw, Koeats, Koko-heba, Kosipatuwiwagaiyu, Kotsava, Koyuhow, Kuhpattikutteh, Kuyuidika, Laidukatuwait, Lohim, Loko, Naha-ego, Nim, Nogaie, Odukeo's band, Olanche, Onaluck's band, Pagantso, Pagwiho, Panitoy, Pavuwiwuyai, Petenegowat, Petodeeka, Piattuiabbe, Poatsituhtikutteh, Poskeea, San Joaquin's band, Sawagativa, Shobarbooeer, Sunananahogwa, Temoksee, Togwingani, Tohaktivi, Toiwait, Tonawitsowa, Tonoyiet's band, Toquimas, To Repe's band, Tosarke's band, Tsapakah, Tubianwapu, Tupustikutteh, Tuziyammos, Wahi's band, Wahtatkin, Walpapi, Warartika, Watsequeorda's band, Winnemucca's band, Woksachi, Yahuskin, and Yammostuwiwagaiya.

Numaltachi, given as a village on Tuolomne r., Cal., may in reality be another band.

From figures given in the report of the Indian office for 1903 it would appear that the total number in this division is in the neighborhood of 5,400.

Monongahela. A variety of whisky. Says Bartlett (Dict. of Americanisms, 401, 1877): "A river of Pennsylvania, so called, gave its name to the rye whisky of which large quantities were produced in its neighborhood, and indeed to American whisky in general, as distinguished from Usquebaugh and Inishowen, the Scotch and Irish sorts." The name is of Algonquian origin, but its etymology is uncertain. (A. F. C.)

Monsoni (Mongsoeythinuywuk, 'moosee people.'—Franklin). An Algonquian tribe in British America, often classed as a part of the Cree, to whom they are closely related, although they seem to be almost as closely related to the northern Chippewa. The first notice of them is in the Jesuit Relation for 1671. In that of 1672 they are located on the shore of James bay, about the mouth of Moosee r., which, according to Richardson, received its name from them. They are referred to under the name Aumonssoniks in the Procès verbal of the Prise de possession (1671), but were not represented at the ceremony, though Charlevoix asserts the contrary. Although Dobbs (1744) speaks of them as the Moose River Indians, he locates a village or band on the w. bank of Rainy r., near Rainy lake, and others on the n. shore of this lake. Some confusion has arisen in regard to the habitat and linguistic connection of the tribe from the fact that the geographic designation "Mosonee" is frequently used to include all that portion of Keewatin and adjacent territory stretching along Hudson bay from Moose r. northward to Nelson r., a region occupied chiefly by the Maskegon. The usual and most permanent home of the Monsoni, however, has been the region of Moosee r. According to Chauvignerie their totem was the moosee. There is no separate enumeration of them in the recent Canadian official reports. See Mosonee.

Montagnais (French 'mountaineers', from the mountainous character of their country). A group of closely related Algonquian tribes in Canada, extending from about St Maurice r. almost to the Atlantic, and from the St Lawrence to the watershed of Hudson bay. The tribes of the group speak several well-marked dialects. They are the Astouregamigoukh, Attikiriouetch, Bersiamite, Chiselec, Escoumains, Espamichkon, Kakouchaki, Mauthapi, Miskouaha, Mouchaouaouastiirinioek, Nascapee, Nekoubaniste, Otaguottouemin, Oukeestigouek, Oumamiwek, Papinachois, Tadousac, and Weperigweia. Their linguistic relation appears to be closer with the Cree of Athabasca lake, or Ayabaskawiniwug, than with any other branch of the Algonquian family. Champlain met them at the mouth of the Saguenay in 1603, where they and other Indians were celebrating with bloody rites the capture of Iroquois prisoners. Six years later he united with them the Hurons and Algonkin in an expedition against the Iroquois. In the first Jesuit Relation, written by Biard (1611-16), they are spoken of as friends of the French. From that time their name has a place in Canadian history, though they exerted no decided influence on the settlement and growth of the colony. The first missionary work among them was begun in 1615, and missions were subsequently established on the upper Saguenay and at L. St John. These were continued, though with occasional and long interruptions, until 1776. The Montagnais fought the Micmac, and often the Eskimo, but their chief and inveterate foes were the Iroquois, who drove them for a time from the banks of the St Lawrence and from their strongholds about the upper Saguenay, compelling them to seek safety at more distant points. After peace was established between the French and the Iroquois they returned to their usual haunts. Lack of proper food, epidemics, and contact with civilization are reducing their numbers. Turner (11th Rep. B. A. E., 1894) says they roam over the areas of Hamilton inlet as far as the Gulf of St Lawrence. Their western limits are imperfectly known. They trade at all the stations along the accessible coast, many of them at Rigolet and Northwest r. Sagard, in 1632, described them as Indians of the lowest type in Canada. Though they have occasionally fought with bravery, they are comparatively timid. They have always been more less nomadic and, although accepting the teachings of the missionaries, seem incapable of resigning the freedom of the forest for life in villages, nor can they be induced to cultivate the soil as a means of support. Mr Chisholm describes them as honest, hospitable, and benevolent, but very superstitious. Those who were induced to settle on the lower St Lawrence appear to be subject to sickness, which is thinning their numbers. All who have not been brought directly under religious influence are licentious. Conjuring was much practised by their medicine-men. Some of the early missionaries speak highly of their religious susceptibility. They bury their dead in the earth, digging a hole 3 ft deep and occasionally lining it with wood. The corpse is usually laid on its side, though it is sometimes placed in a sitting position. Above the grave is built a little birch-bark hut and through a window the relatives thrust bits of tobacco, venison, and other morsels. No reliable estimate can be given of their former numbers, but it is known that they have greatly decreased from sickness and starvation consequent on the destruction of game. In 1812 they were supposed to number about 1,500; in 1857 they were estimated at 1,100, and in 1884 they were officially reported at 1,395, living at Betsiamits, (Bersimis), Escoumains, Godbout, Grand Romaine, Lake St John, and Mingan, in Quebec. In 1906 they, together with the Nascapee, numbered, according to the Canadian official report, 2,183, distributed as follows: Bersimis, 499; Escoumains, 43; Natashquan, 76; Godbout, 40; Grand Romaine, 176; Lake St John, 551; Mingan, 241; St Augustine, 181; Seven Islands and Moisie, 376. Consult Chamberlain in Ann. Archæol. Rep. Ontario 1905, 122, 1906.

The bands and villages of the Montagnais are: Appeelat, Assuapmushan, Attikamegue, Bonne Espérance, Chicoutimi, Esquimaux Point, Godbout, Ile Percée (mission), Itamameou (mission), Islets de Jeremie (mission), Kapiminkouetiik, Mauthapi, Mingan, Moisie, Mushkoniatawee, Musquarro, Nabisippi, Natashquan, Pashashebo, Romaine, and St Augustine. Montauk (meaning uncertain). A term that has been used in different senses, sometimes limited to the particular band or tribe known by this name, but in a broader sense including most of the tribes of Long Island, excepting those about the w. end. It is occasionally used incorrectly as equivalent to Metoac, q. v.

The Indians of Long Island were closely related to the Indians of Massachusetts and Connecticut. Tooker (Cockenoe-de-Long Island, 1896) says that the dialect of the Montauk was more nearly related to the Natick of Massachusetts than was the Narraganset.

The Montauk, in the limited sense, formerly occupied Easthampton tp., Suffolk co., at the e. end of Long Island, and controlled all the other tribes of the island, except those near the w. end. That these so-called tribes were but parts of one group or tribe, or the loosely connected elements of what had been an organized body, seems apparent. Rutenber, speaking of the Montauk in the limited sense, says: "This chieftaincy was acknowledged both by the Indians and the Europeans as the ruling family of the island. They were indeed the head of the tribe of Montauk, the other divisions named being simply clans or groups, as in the case of other tribes. . . . Wyandance, their sachem, was also the grand sachem of Paumanacke, or Sewanhackey, as the island was called. Nearly all the deeds for lands were confirmed by him. His younger brothers, Nowedonah and Poygratasuck [Poggratcut], were respectively sachems of the Shincocock and the Manhasset." The Rockaway and Cannarsee at the w. end were probably not included. It is doubtful whether he is correct in including the west-end Indians in the confederacy. The principal Montauk village, which probably bore the name of the tribe, was about Ft Pond, near Montauk pt. The Pequot made them and their subordinates tributary, and on the destruction of that tribe in 1637, the Narraganset began a series of attacks which finally, about 1659, forced the Montauk, who had lost the greater part of their number by pestilence, to retire for protection to the whites at Easthampton. Since 1641 they had been tributary to New England. When first known they were numerous, and even after the pestilence of 1658-59, were estimated at about 500. Then began a rapid decline, and a century later only 162 remained, most of whom joined the Brotherton Indians of New York, about 1788, so that in 1829 only about 30 were left on Long Island, and 40 years later these had dwindled to half a dozen individuals, who, with a few Shinnecock, were the last representatives of the Long Island tribes. They preserved a form of tribal organization into the 19th century and retained their hereditary chiefs until the death of their last "king," David Pharaoh, about 1875. A few mixed-bloods are still officially recognized by the state of New York as constituting a tribe under Wyandanch Pharaoh, son of David. (J. M.)

Monterey Indians. The Costanoan Indians of Monterey co., Cal., numbering more than 100 in 1856. A vocabulary taken by Taylor (Cal. Farmer, Apr. 20, 1860) at that time is Rumsen. There are probably also remnants of the Esselen and other divisions of the Mutsun in the region of Monterey.

Montezuma, Carlos. An educated full-blood Apache, known among his people in childhood as Wasajah ('Beckoning'), born about 1866 in the neighborhood of the Four Peaks of the Mazatzal mts., present s. e. Arizona. In Oct., 1871, he was taken captive, with 16 or 18 other children including his two sisters, in a midnight raid by the Pima on his band, during the absence of the men on a mission of peace, while encamped in the Superstition mts., 40 or 50 m. w. of Globe. In this raid 30 or more of the Apache were killed. The captives were taken by the Pima to their rancherias on the Gila, whence, after a week's detention, Wasajah was taken to Adamsville, below Florence, and sold to Mr C. Gentile, a native of Italy, who was then prospecting in Arizona. Some months after the raid Wasajah's mother, who had escaped, was informed by an Indian runner that her boy had been seen at Camp Date Creek. Determined to recover her child, she applied to the agent for permission to leave the reservation, and being refused departed without leave. Her body was found later in a rugged pass in the mountains, where she had been shot by a native scout. Wasajah was taken by Mr. Gentile to Chicago and was called by him Carlos Montezuma—Carlos, from his own name, Montezuma, from the so-called Casa Montezuma (q. v.), near the Pima villages. He entered the public schools of Chicago in 1872, remaining until 1875, from which time until 1884 his education was continued in the public schools of Galesburg, Ill., Brooklyn, N. Y., and Urbana, Ill., and in the University of Illinois at the last-named place. In 1884 he entered the Chicago Medical School, from which he was graduated in 1889, receiving in the same year an appointment as physician in the U. S. Indian School at Stevenson, N. Dak. From 1890 until 1896 Dr Montezuma has served as physician successively at the Western Shoshone agency in Nevada, the Colville agency in Washington, and at the Carlisle Indian School. In the latter year he resigned from the service of the Indian department and settled in Chicago, where he is now engaged in the practice of his profession, in teaching in the College of Physicians and Surgeons and in the Post-graduate Medical School, and in arousing interest in his people through his writings.

Montezuma Castle. A prehistoric cliff-dwelling on the right bank of Beaver cr., a tributary of Rio Verde, 3 m. from old Camp Verde, central Arizona; popularly so-called because supposed to have been once occupied by the Aztecs, whereas there is no ground whatever for the belief that any Southwestern pueblo or cliff-village is of Mexican origin. The building is constructed in a natural recess in the side of a limestone cliff, the base of which is 348 ft from the edge of the stream and about 40 ft above it. The building, which is accessible only by means of ladders, consists of 5 stories, and in the same cliff are several cave-dwellings. The foundation of Montezuma Castle rests on cedar timbers laid longitudinally on flat stones on the ledge. The front wall is about 2 ft thick at the bottom and 13 in. at the top, and leans slightly toward the cliff. The first story consists of two small living rooms and a storeroom. The second floor, access to which is gained through a small opening in the ceiling of the first story, is more extensive, consisting of 4 apartments, bounded behind by the most massive wall of masonry in the entire structure, and resting on a ledge even with the floor of the second story. It is 28 ft in height, rising to the fifth story, around the front of which it forms a battlement 4½ ft high. It leans slightly toward the cliff, and is strongly but not symmetrically curved inward. The chord of the arc described by the top of the wall measures 43 ft, and the greatest distance from chord to circumference 8 ft. The third floor comprises the most extensive tier of rooms in the structure, extending across the entire alcove in the cliff in which the house is built. There are 8 of these rooms, in addition to 2 porches. The fourth floor consists of 3 rooms, neatly constructed, through the ceiling of one of which access is gained to the fifth or uppermost floor, which consists of a long porch or gallery having a battlement in front and an elevated backward extension on the right, with 2 rooms filling the corresponding space on the left. These 2 rooms are roofed by the rocky arch of the cliff, and are loftier than the lower chambers. Montezuma Castle, or Casa Montezuma, shows evidence of long occupancy in prehistoric times. Some of the rooms are smoothly plastered and smoke-blackened; the plastering bears finger-marks and impressions of the thumb and hand. The rooms are ceiled with willows laid horizontally across rafters of ash and black alder; upon this is a thick layer of reeds placed transversely, and the whole plastered on top with mortar, forming a floor to the chamber above. The ends of the rafters exhibit hacking with stone implements. The building, which threatened to collapse, was repaired by the Arizona Antiquarian Association about 1895, and in 1906 it was declared a national monument by proclamation of the President of the United States. Its origin is unknown. See Mearns in Pop. Sci. Month., Oct. 1890

(from whose description the above details are extracted); Hewett in Am. Anthropol., VI, 637, 1904; Land of Sunshine, Los Angeles, x, 44, 1898.

Montezuma Well. A large depression in the form of a "tank" or well in the summit of a low mesa on Beaver cr., about 9 m. N. of old Camp Verde, Ariz., in which are the well-preserved remains of several cliff-dwellings.

Montochtana ('a corner in the back part of the hut'). A Knaiakhotana clan of Cook inlet, Alaska. — Richardson, Arct. Exped., I, 407, 1851.

Montour. About 1665 a French nobleman named Montour settled in Canada, where, by an Indian woman, probably a Huron, he became the father of a son and two daughters. This son of Montour grew up among those Indians, who were at that time in alliance with the French. In 1685, while in the French service, he was wounded in a fight with two Mohawk warriors on L. Champlain. Subsequently he deserted the French cause to live with the "upper nations" of Indians. Through him, in 1708, Lord Cornbury succeeded in persuading 12 of these western tribes, including the Miami and the Hurons, to trade at Albany. For this work, in alienating the upper nations from the French trade and cause, he was killed in 1709 by order of the Marquis de Vaudreuil, governor of Canada, who boasted that, had Montour been taken alive, he would have had him hanged. One of the two daughters of the French nobleman, while living on the Susquehanna and the Ohio, became a noted interpreter and friend of the English, and was known as Madam Montour. Her sister appears to have married a Miami Indian.

Authorities regarding the Montours are not always consistent and are sometimes not reconcilable as to statements of material facts. Madam Montour appears to have been born in Canada previous to the year 1684. When about 10 years of age she was captured by some Iroquois warriors and adopted, probably by the Seneca, for at maturity she married a Seneca named Roland Montour, by whom she had 4, if not 5, children, namely, Andrew, Henry, Robert, Lewis, and Margaret, the last becoming the wife of Katarioniecha, who lived in the neighborhood of Shamokin, Pa. Roland had a brother called "Stuttering John" and a sister variously known as Catherine, Kate, Catrina, and Catreen. After the death of Roland, Madam Montour married the noted Oneida chief named Carondwanen, or "Big Tree," who later took the name Robert Hunter in honor of the royal governor of the province of New York. About 1729 her husband, Robert, was killed in battle with the Catawba, against whom he was waging war. Madam Montour first appeared as an official interpreter at a conference at Albany in August, 1711, between the delegates of the Five Nations and Gov. Hunter of New York. This was probably the occasion on which her husband adopted the name Robert Hunter. The wanton murder of her brother Andrew by Vaudreuil was bitterly resented by Madam Montour, and she employed her great influence among the Indians with such telling effect against the interests of the French that the French governor sought to persuade her to remove to Canada by the offer of great compensation and valuable emoluments. His efforts were unsuccessful. Finally, in 1719, he sent her sister to attempt to prevail on her to forsake the people of her adoption and the English cause, whereupon the Commissioners of Indian Affairs, learning of the overtures of the French governor, appreciating the value of her services to the province, and fearing the effect of her possible disaffection, invited her to Albany. It was then discovered that for a year she had not received her stipulated pay, so it was agreed by the commissioners that she should thereafter receive a "man's pay," and she was satisfied. Madam Montour acted also as interpreter in 1727 in Philadelphia at a conference between Lieut. Gov. Gordon and his council on the one hand and the several chiefs and delegates of the Six Nations, the "Conestogas, Gangawese, and the Susquehanna Indians," on the other. It is claimed that Madam Montour was a lady in manner and education, was very attractive in mind and body, and that at times she was entertained by ladies of the best society of Philadelphia; but as her sister was married to a Miami warrior, and she herself was twice married to Indians of the Five Nations, it is probable that her refinement and education were not so marked as claimed, and that the ladies of Philadelphia treated her only with considerate kindness, and nothing more. Nevertheless, from the testimony of those who saw and knew her, but contrary to the statement of Lord Cornbury, who knew her brother, it seems almost certain that she was a French-Canadian without any admixture of Indian blood in her veins, and that for some unaccountable reason she preferred the life and dress of her adopted people.

Whatever Roland's attitude was toward the proprietary government, that of his wife was always uniformly friendly, and after her second marriage it was even more cordial. Such was the loyalty of the family of Madam Montour that at least two of her sons, Henry and Andrew, received large grants of "donation lands" from the government; that of the former lay on the Chillisquaque, and that of the latter on the Loyalsock, where Montoursville, Pa., is now situated.

Witham Marshe refers to Madam Montour as the "celebrated Mrs Montour, a French lady," who, having "lived so long among the Six Nations, is become almost an Indian." Referring to her visits to Philadelphia, he says, "being a white woman," she was there "very much caressed by the gentlewomen of that city, with whom she used to stay for some time." Marshe, who visited her house, saw two of her daughters, who were the wives of war chiefs, and a lad 5 years old, the son of one of the daughters, who was "one of the finest featured and limbed children mine eyes ever saw, . . . his cheeks were ruddy, mixed with a delicate white, had eyes and hair of an hazel colour." In 1734 Madam Montour resided at the village of Ostonwackin, on the Susquehanna, at the mouth of Loyalsock cr., on the site of the present Montoursville, Lycoming co., Pa. It was sometimes called Frenchtown. In 1737 Conrad Weiser, while on his way to Onondaga, lodged here with Madam

Montour, who, he states, was "a French woman by birth, of a good family, but now in mode of life a complete Indian." In 1744, at the great treaty of Lancaster between the Six Nations and the provinces of Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, Madam Montour was present with two of her daughters, on which occasion she related to Marshe the story of her life. He represented her as genteel, of polished address, and as having been attractive in her prime; he also learned that her two sons-in-law and her only son were then absent, at war with the Catawba. In 1745 Madam Montour was living on an island in the Susquehanna, at Shamokin, having left Ostonswackin permanently. Prior to 1754 she became blind, but she was still vigorous enough to make a horseback trip from Logstown, on the Ohio, to Venango, a distance of 60 m., in two days, her son Andrew, on foot, leading the horse all the way.

When Count Zinzendorf visited Shamokin in 1742 he was welcomed by Madam Montour and her son Andrew. Seeing the Count and hearing that he came to preach the gospel, the truths of which she had almost forgotten, she burst into tears. It was learned that she believed that Bethlehem, the birthplace of Christ, was situated in France, and that it was Englishmen who crucified him—a silly perversion of the truth that originated with French religious teachers.

In view of the fact that there is no record of a governor of Canada named Montour, the belief that she was the daughter of such a personage seems groundless, notwithstanding her own statement to this effect to Marshe. Equally doubtful is the assertion that she was alive during the American Revolution, a statement possibly arising from the fact that she was confounded with her reputed granddaughter, Catherine of Catherine's Town, situated near the head of Seneca lake and destroyed by Sullivan's army in 1779. Being more than 60 years of age in 1744, it is not probable that she could have been an active participant in the Wyoming massacre, 34 years later, and there is no authentic evidence connecting Madam Montour with the shedding of blood, white or Indian.

ESTHER MONTOUR, justly infamous as the "fiend of Wyoming," a daughter of French Margaret, hence a granddaughter of Madam Montour and a sister of French Catherine and Mary, and the wife of Eghohowin, a ruling chief of the Munsee, was living in 1772 at Sheshequin, 6 m. below Tioga Point; but in this year she removed 6 m. above, to a place where she founded a new settlement, later known as Queen Esther's Town, which was destroyed by Col. Hartley in 1778. Thence she removed, probably to Chemung. It is known that there were Montours at the battle of Wyoming, for "Stuttering John" and Roland admitted it some years afterward. John and Catrina were always relentless enemies of the English colonies. That John, Roland, Esther, and Catherine and Mary were half-breeds is quite probable. But Esther's bloody work at Wyoming, July 3, 1778, has made her name execrated wherever known. Toward the end of June of the year named the Tory Colonel, John Butler, with about 400 British and Tories and about 700 Indians, chiefly Seneca, under Sagaiengwaraton, descended the Susquehanna on his way to attack the settlements in Wyoming valley, Pa. To defend the valley against this force there were 40 or 50 men under Capt. Detrick Hewitt, and the militia—about 400 men and boys, the residue of the three companies that had been enlisted in the Continental army. Col. Zebulon Butler, happening to be in the valley, took command of the little army, aided by Maj. Garret, Col. Dennison, and Lieut. Col. Dorrance.

The 400 undisciplined militia were soon outflanked and broken in the ensuing battle. After the enemy had gained the rear, an officer said to Hewitt: "See! the enemy has gained the rear in force. Shall we retreat?" "I'll be d—d if I do," was Hewitt's reply, and, like the other officers killed in action, he fell at the head of his men. The battle was lost. Then followed a most dreadful slaughter of the brave but overpowered soldiers of Wyoming. Without mercy and with the most fearful tortures, they were ruthlessly butchered, chiefly in the flight, and after having surrendered themselves prisoners of war. Placed around a huge rock and held by stout Indians, 16 men were killed one by one by the knife or tomahawk in the hands of "Queen Esther." In a similar circle 9 others were killed in the same brutal manner. From these two circles alone only one, a strong man named Hammond, escaped by almost superhuman effort. This slaughter, which made 150 widows and 600 orphans in the valley, gave Esther her bloody title.

CATHERINE MONTOUR, a noted character in the colonial history of Pennsylvania, and who gave the name of Catherine's Town to Sheoquaga, was another daughter of French Margaret, hence a granddaughter of Madam Montour. She became the wife of Telemut, a noted Seneca chief, named Thomas Hudson by the English, by whom she had a son named Amochol ('Canoe'), or Andrew, and two daughters. The statement that Catherine was an educated and refined woman and was admitted into good society in Philadelphia is, under the circumstances, most improbable. On Sept. 3, 1779, Sullivan's army destroyed Catherine's Town. Catherine, with several friends, lived in 1791 "over the lake not far from Niagara." Her son Amochol joined the Moravian church and was living at New Salem, or Petquoting, in 1788. John and Roland Montour were her brothers, the latter being the son-in-law of Sagaiengwaraton, a leading Seneca chief. Both Roland and John were famous war chiefs in the border warfare against the English colonies.

MARY MONTOUR, a sister of Catherine, Esther, and Andrew, was the wife of John Cook, another noted Seneca chief named Kanaghragait, sometimes also called "White Mingo," who lived on the Allegheny and the Ohio, and died in 1790 at Ft Wayne. From Zeisberger's Diary (II, 149, 1885) the curious information is obtained that Mary was a "Mohawk Indian woman," and that Mohawk was "her mother tongue." It is also stated that when a child Mary was baptized in Philadelphia by a Catholic priest. In 1791, on the removal of the Moravian mission from New Salem to Canada, among the new converts who accompanied the congregation was Mary, "a sister of the former Andrew Montour," and "a living polyglot of the tongues of the West, speaking the English, French, Mohawk, Wyandot [Huron], Ottawa, Chippewa, Shawnese, and Delaware languages."

ANDREW MONTOUR, whose Indian name was Sättelihu, the son of Madam Montour by her first husband, was for many years in the employ of the proprietary government of Pennsylvania as an assistant interpreter. In 1745 he accompanied Weiser and Shikellimy, the viceroy of the Six Nations on the Susquehanna, on a mission to Onondaga, the federal capital of the confederation. In 1748 Andrew was presented to the council of the proprietary government by Weiser as a person especially qualified to act as an interpreter or messenger. At this time he was prominent among the Delawares. Hitherto Weiser and Andrew were held asunder by jealousy, because of Andrew's efforts to secure the position of interpreter for Virginia in her negotiations with the Six Nations. But Weiser now needed Andrew to secure to the proprietary government the alliance of the Ohio Indians, and so sunk all personal differences. In introducing him to the council Weiser stated that he had employed Andrew frequently on matters of great moment and importance, and that he had found him "faithful, knowing, and prudent." At this time Andrew was fully remunerated for what he had already done for Weiser. Deputies from the Miami were expected at Philadelphia, but instead they went to Lancaster. Andrew Montour was the interpreter for the western Indians and Weiser for the Six Nations. Scaroyady, a noted Oneida chief, living on the Ohio, and exercising for the Six Nations jurisdiction over the western tribes similar to that exercised by Shikellimy over those in Pennsylvania, was to have been the speaker on this occasion, but he was incapacitated by a fall, and so Andrew was chosen speaker for the western Indians. He enjoyed remarkable influence and power over the Ohio tribes, and by his work at the various conferences of the colonies with them came into enviable prominence in the province. His growing power and influence, about 1750, attained such weight that the management of Indian affairs by Pennsylvania was seriously embarrassed. In 1752 Gov. Hamilton commissioned him to go and reside on Cumberland cr., over the Blue hills, on unpurchased lands, to prevent others from settling or trading there. In the following year the French authorities set a price of $500 on his head. In 1755 he was still on his grant, living 10 m. N. W. of Carlisle, Pa., and was captain, later major, of a company of Indians in the English service. In 1762 he was the King's interpreter to the united nations. Andrew served as an interpreter for the Delawares at Shamokin, where Conrad Weiser held a conference with the several tribes in that region for the purpose of bringing about peace between the southern confederation of Indians and the Six Nations and their allies. He also served as interpreter to the governor of Virginia at several important treaties. After receiving his grants from the government he was regarded as a man of great wealth, but in his public acts he found other means of swelling his fortune.

Montowese ('little god,' diminutive from manito, 'spirit.'—Trumbull). Applied by Ruttenber (Tribes Hudson R., 82, 1872), to Indians on Connecticut r. s. w. of Middletown, Middlesex co., Conn., though De Forest (Hist. Inds. Conn., 55, 1853), his authority, does not give the name as that of a tribe, but says: "Southwest of the principal seat of the Wangunks [Middletown] a large extent of country was held by a son of Sowheag [chief of the Mattabesec, q. v.] named Montowese." This area probably lay partly in Middlesex, but chiefly in New Haven co. This chief, in 1638, sold a tract N. of the site of New Haven comprising a large portion of that county. As his father was chief of the Mattabesec, his band probably belonged to that tribe. (J. M. C. T.)

Moonack. A Maryland-Virginia name of the ground-hog (Arctomys monax); also, by transference, the name of a mythic animal feared by many Southern negroes. The word occurs very early. Glover, in his account of Virginia (Philos. Trans. Roy. Soc., xi, 630, 1676), speaks of moonacks. John Burroughs (Winter Sunshine, 25, 1876), says: "In Virginia they call woodchucks 'moonacks.'" Lewis and Clark (Orig. Jour., ii, iv, 1905) use the forms moonax and moonor. It is probable that the monax in the scientific name of this animal is a Linnean latinization of its aboriginal appellation. The Virginian moonack, or monack, is cognate with the Delaware monachgeu (German form), the Passamaquoddy monimquess, the Micmac mun-umkuech, etc. The word signifies 'the digger,' from the Algonquian radical muna, or mona, 'to dig'; seen also in the Chippewa monaika, 'he scratches up'; in Cree, monahikew. The Sauk, Fox, and Kickapoo language has monanā's, 'little digger', for woodchuck, according to Dr William Jones. (A. F. C.)

Moonhartarne (Moon-har-tar-ne, 'digging'). A subdivision of the Delawares (q. v.).—Morgan, Anc. Soc., 172, 1877.

Moors. See Croatan Indians.

Moose. The common name of a species of large deer (Cervus alces) found in Maine and parts of Canada and formerly over most of N. E. North America. An identical term for this animal occurs in many Algonquian dialects: Virginian, moos; Narraganset and Massachusetts, moos; Delaware, mos; Passamaquoddy, mus; Abnaki, moiz; Chippewa, mo's; Cree, monna. All these words signify 'he strips or eats off,' in reference to the animal's habit of eating the young bark and twigs of trees. The word came into English from one of the New England dialects. Derivative words and expressions are: Moosee bird (Canada jay); moosee call, moosee horn, or moosee trumpet (a bark trumpet used to imitate notes of this animal); moosee elm (slippery elm); moose fly (a large brown fly common in Maine); moosewood (applied variously to the striped maple, Acer pennsylvanicus; the leatherwood (Dirca palustris), and the hobblebush (Viburnum lantanoides); moosee yard (the home and browsing-place of the moose in winter). (A. F. C.)

Moosehead Lake Indians. The common name of a band of Penobscot living on Moosehead lake, Me.—Vetromile, Abnaki, 22, 1866.

Moosemisse. A name current in parts of New England, Vermont in particular, for the false wintergreen (Pyrola americana). The name seems to have been transferred from another plant, since in Chippewa and Nipissing moosomish, signifying 'moose shrub,' designates the hobblebush (Viburnum lantanoides), called in Canadian French bois d'original. The word, which is written moosemisse also, is derived from some Algonquian dialect of the Chippewa group or a closely related one of the E. (A. F. C.)

Moquats (Mo'-quats). A band of Paiute formerly living near Kingston mt., S. E. Cal.—Powell in Ind. Aff. Rep. 1873, 51, 1874.

Moquelumnan Family (adapted from Moquelumne, a corruption of the Miwok Wakalumiuh, the name of a river in Calaveras co., Cal.). A linguistic family, established by Powell (7th Rep. B. A. E., 92, 1891), consisting of three divisions, the Miwok, the so-called Olamentke, and the Northern or Lake County Moquelumnan. The territory originally occupied was in three sections, one lying between Cosumnes and Fresno rs.; another in Marin, Sonoma, and Napa cos., the territory extending along the coast from the Golden Gate to Salmon cr., N. of Bodega bay and E. as far as the vicinity of Sonoma; and the third a comparatively small area in the S. end of Lake co., extending from Mt. St. Helena northward to the E. extremity of Clear lake (see Kroeber in Am. Anthropol., VIII, no. 4, 1906). The Miwok division, which constituted the great body of the family, was described as late as 1876 as the largest Indian group of California, both in population and in extent of territory.

Their houses were very rude, those of the Miwok having been simply frameworks of poles and brush, which in winter were covered with earth. In the mountains cone-shaped summer lodges of puncheons were made. Acorns, which formed their principal food, were gathered in large quantities when the harvest was abundant and stored for winter use in granaries raised above the ground. It has been asserted that the Miwok ate every variety of living creature indigenous to their territory except the skunk. They were especially fond of jackrabbits, the skins of which were rudely woven into robes. From lack of cedar they purchased bows and sometimes arrows from the mountain Indians, the medium of barter being shell money.

With the Miwok, chiefship was hereditary when the successor was of commanding influence, but this was seldom the case. As with most of the tribes of California, marriage among the Miwok tribes was practically by purchase, but in return for the presents given by the groom the father of the bride gave the new couple various substantial articles, and gifts of food were often continued by the parents for years after the marriage. The father, in old age, was ill treated, however, being little else than a slave to his daughter and her husband. When twins were born one of the children was killed. Shamanistic rites were performed by both men and women, and scarification and suction were the principal remedial agents. California balm of gilead (Picea grandis), and plasters of hot ashes and moist earth were also used in certain cases. Payment for treatment was made by the patient, and in case of non-recovery the life of the practitioner was demanded. The acorn dance, as well as a number of other ceremonies, principally for feasting or amusement, were formerly celebrated by the Miwok. They had no puberty dance, nor did they hold a dance for the dead, but an annual mourning and sometimes a special mourning were observed. All the possessions of the dead were burned with them, their names were never afterward mentioned, and those who bore the same name changed it for others. Formerly widows generally covered their faces with pitch and the younger women singed their hair short as signs of widowhood. Cremation generally prevailed among the Miwok tribes, but was never universal.

Comparatively few of the natives of the Miwok division of this stock survive, and these are scattered in the mountains, so that no accurate census has been taken. Six individuals of the so-called Olamentke division lived on Tomales bay in 1888.

The Moquelumnan tribes or rancherias that have been recognized are as follows:

Miwok.—Awani, Chowchilla, Chumidok, Chumtiya, Chumuk, Chumwit, Hittoya, Howehoes, Koni, Lopotatimni, Machemni, Mokelumne, Newichumni, Nuchu, Olowit, Olowiya, Pohonichi, Sakaikumne, Servushamne, Talatui, Tamoleka, Tumidok, Tumun, Walakumni, Yuloni.

Olamentke.—Bolas, Chokuyem, Guimen, Jukiusme, Likatuit, Nicassias, Numpali, Olumpali, Sonomi, Tamal, Tulares, Tumalehnias, Uchium.

Tribes or rancherias not classified according to the chief divisions are Apangasi, Aplache, Chupumni, Cosumni, Cotoplanemis, Hokokwito, Keeches, Kumaini, Lapapu, Lesamaiti, Macheto, Merced, Mikechuses, Nelcelchumnee, Notomidula, Numaltachi(?), Okechumne, Pahkanu, Petaluma, Potawackati, Potoyanti, Sakaya, Seantre, Siyante, Succaah, Suscols, Threse, Tiposies, Wahaka, and Wiskala.

Moravians. Mahican, Munsee, and Delawareans who followed the teachings of the Moravian brethren and were by them gathered into villages apart from their tribes. The majority were Munsee. In 1740 the Moravian missionaries began their work at the Mahican village of Shekomeko in New York. Meeting with many obstacles there, they removed with their converts in 1746 to Pennsylvania, where they built the new mission village of Friedenshuetten on the Susquehanna. Here they were more successful and were largely recruited from the Munsee and Delawareans, almost all of the former tribe not absorbed by the Delawareans finally joining them. They made another settlement at Wyalusing, but on the advance of the white population removed to Beaver r. in w. Pennsylvania, where they built the village of Friedensstadt. They remained here about a year, and in 1773 removed to Muskingum r. in Ohio, in the neighborhood of the others of their tribes, and occupied the three villages of Gnadenhuetten, Salem, and Schoenbrunn. In 1781, during the border troubles of the Revolution, the Hurons removed them to the region of the Sandusky and Scioto, in N. Ohio, either to prevent their giving information to the colonists or to protect them from the hostility of the frontiersmen. The next spring a party of about 140 were allowed to return to their abandoned villages to gather their corn, when they were treacherously attacked by a party of border ruffians and the greater part massacred in the most cold-blooded manner, after which their villages were burned. The remaining Moravians moved to Canada in 1791, under the leadership of Zeisberger, and built the village of Fairfield on Retrenche r. Here a number were massacred by the whites in 1812. They finally settled on the Thames in Orford tp., Kent co., Ontario. The number in 1884 was 275, but had increased in 1906, according to the Canadian official report, to 348. There were until recently a few in Franklin co., Kans. See Missions. (J. M. C. T.)

Mortars. Utensils employed by Indian tribes for the trituration of food and other substances. The Southwestern or Mexican type of grinding stone is known as a metate, and its operation consists in placing the substance to be treated, dry or moist, on the sloping upper surface of the slab and crushing and rubbing it with a flattish hand-stone until it is reduced to the required consistency or degree of fineness (see Metates, Mullers). This form of the utensil passes with many variations in size and shape into the typical mortar, a more or less deep receptacle in which the substance is pulverized if dry, or reduced to pulp if moist, by crushing with a pestle, which may be cylindrical, discoidal, globular, or bell-shaped. Mortars are made of stone, wood, bone (whale vertebrae), or improvised of rawhide or other substances depending on the region and the materials nearest at hand. The more primitive stone forms are boulders or other suitable pieces hol-ished, the stone in some cases, as in s. California, being obtained by quarrying from the rock in place. California furnishes the greatest variety of these utensils. In one district globular concretions were used: a segment of the shell was broken away and the softer interior removed, thus affording a deep symmetrical receptacle. In other localities cylindrical forms were worked out of lava or sandstone. under surface was

In others still, the conical, so as to be conveniently set in the ground. Ordinary mortars when in use are usually set in the ground to give them greater stability. The remarkable and handsome sandstone vessels and soapstone pots of s. California are not here classed as mortars. Occasionally the smaller mortars were embellished with engraved lines or sculptured to represent animal forms. Alaskan mortars, especially those of the Haida, are superior in this respect. An artistic mortar of this class, illustrated by Niblack, was used for pulverizing tobacco, and this is a type in very general use among the Northwestern tribes at the present time.

Perhaps the most remarkable mortars are those occurring frequently in the acorn-producing districts of the Pacific slope, where exposures of massive rock in place have worked in them groups of mortars, the conical receptacles numbering, in several observed cases, nearly a lowed out on the upper surface sufficiently to hold the material to be reduced, while the more highly specialized forms are tastefully shaped and carefully fin-hundred. Some of the Western tribes set a conical basket, after removing its bottom, within the rim of the mortar bowl to serve as a hopper for retaining the meal.

Primitive forms of this utensil are the rawhide mortars used by the Plains tribes for pounding pemmican, the piece of rawhide being forced into a depression in the ground, forming a basin. Again, the hide was placed beneath the stone or wooden mortar to catch the particles that fell over. The rough basket-like receptacle of sticks set in the ground by the Yuman tribes of lower Colorado r. is probably the rudest known form of this utensil. In size stone mortars vary from that of the tiny paint cup found among the toilet articles of the warrior to the substantial basin holding several gallons. The larger ones, especially those excavated in rock masses, were probably often used for "stone-boiling." (See Food.)

The substances pulverized in mortars were the various minerals used for paint, potsherds and shells for tempering clay, etc., medicinal and ceremonial substances of many kinds, including tobacco, and a wide range of food products, as maize, seeds, nuts, berries, roots, bark, dried meats, fish, grasshoppers, etc. A noteworthy group of paint mortars or plates, the use of which has heretofore been regarded as problematical, are described under the heading Notched plates. The wooden mortar was usually made of a short section of a log, hollowed out at one end and in some cases sharpened at the other for setting in the ground; but the receptacles were sometimes made in the side of a log or were cut out as individual utensils in basin or trough shape. The wooden mortar was in much more general use in districts where suitable stone was not available, as in Florida, in portions of the Mississippi valley, and on lower Colorado r. Mortuary customs. Yarrow (1st Rep. B. A. E., 1881) classifies Indian modes of burial as follows:

(1) Inhumation, (2) Embalment, (3) Deposition in urns, (4) Surface burial, (5) Cremation, (6) Aerial sepulture, (7) Aquatic burial. As the second relates to the preparation of the body, and the third, fourth, sixth, and seventh refer chiefly to the receptacles or the place of deposit, the disposal of the dead by the Indians may be classed under the heads Burial and Cremation.

The usual mode of burial among North American Indians has been by inhumation, or interment in pits, graves, or holes in the ground, in stone cists, in mounds, beneath or in cabins, wigwags, houses, or lodges, or in caves. As illustrations it may be stated that the Mohawk formerly made a large round hole in which the body was placed in a squatting posture, after which it was covered with timber and earth. Some of the Carolina tribes first placed the corpse in a cane hurdle and deposited it in an outhouse for a day; then it was taken out and wrapped in rush or cane matting, placed in a reed coffin, and deposited in a grave. Remains of this kind of wrapping have been found in some of the southern mounds, and in one case in a rock shelter. The bottom of the grave was sometimes covered with bark, on which the body was laid, and logs or slabs placed over it to prevent the earth from falling on the remains. An ancient form of burial in Tennessee, s. Illinois, at points on Delaware r., and among ancient pueblo dwellers in n. New Mexico, was in box-shaped cists of rough stone slabs. Sepulchres of this kind have been found in mounds and cemeteries. In some instances they were placed in the same general direction, but in excavations made by the Bureau of American Ethnology it was found that these cists, as well as the uninclosed bodies in mounds, were generally placed without regard to uniformity of direction. When uniformity did occur, it was generally an indication of a comparatively modern interment. The Creeks and the Seminole of Florida generally buried in a circular pit about 4 ft deep; the corpse, with a blanket or cloth wrapped about it, being placed in a sitting posture, the legs bent under and tied together. The sitting position in ancient burials has often been erroneously inferred from the bones occurring in a heap. It appears to have been a custom in the N. W., as well as in the E. and S. E., to remove the flesh by previous burial or otherwise, and then to bundle the bones and bury them, sometimes in communal pits. It was usual in grave burials to place the body in a horizontal position on its back, although the custom of placing on the side, often with the knees drawn up, was also practised; burial face downward, however, was rare. In addition to those mentioned, modes of burials in mounds varied. Sometimes a single body and sometimes several were placed in a wooden vault of upright timbers or of logs laid horizontally to form a pen. Dome-shaped stone vaults occur over a single sitting skeleton. Not infrequently the body was laid on the ground, slightly covered with earth, and over this a layer of plastic clay
